THE AVTHOR TO
The Reader.

I Hope it ſhall be to no diſcredite, if I now uſe againe by way of Preface, the ſame words with a few more, that I uſed twentie foure yeares ſince, in the firſt edition of this worke. Abraham Ortelius the worthy reſtorer of Ancient Geographie arriving heere in England, about thirtie foure yeares paſt, dealt earneſtly with mee that I would illuſtrate this Iſle of Britaine, or (as he ſaid) that I would reſtore antiquitie to Britaine, and Britaine to his antiquitie; which was, as I underſtood, that I would renew ancientrie, enlighten obſcuritie, cleare doubts, and recall home Veritie by way of recovery, which the negligence of writers and credulity of the common ſort had in a manner proſcribed and utterly baniſhed from amongſt us. A painfull matter I aſſure you, and more than difficult; wherein what toyle is to be taken, as no man thinketh, ſo no man believeth but hee that hath made the triall. Neverthelesſe how much the difficultie diſcouraged mee from it, ſo much the glory of my country encouraged me to undertake it. So while at one and the ſame time I was fearefull to undergoe the burthen, and yet deſirous to doe ſome ſervice to my Country, I found two different affections, Feare, and Boldneſſe; I know not how, conjoyned in me. Notwithſtanding by the moſt gracious direction of the Almighty, taking Industry for my conſort, I adventured upon it, and with all my ſtudie, care, cogitation, continuall meditation, paine, and travaile I imploied my ſelfe thereunto when I had any ſpare time. I made ſearch after the Etymologie of Britain & the firſt Inhabitants timorouſly, neither in ſo doubtfull a matter have I affirmed ought confidently. For I am not ignorant that the firſt originals of nations are obſcure by reaſon of their profound antiquitie, as things which are ſeene very deepe and far remote: like as the courſes, the reaches, the confluencies, & the out-lets of great rivers are wel knowne, yet their firſt fountaines and heads lie commonly unknown. I have ſuccinctly run over the Romans government in Britain, and the inundation of forraigne people thereinto, what they were, and from whence they came: I have traced out the ancient diviſions of theſe Kingdomes, I have ſummarily ſpecified the ſtates, and judiciall Courts of the ſame.

In the ſeverall Counties I have compendiouſly ſet downe the limits (and yet not exactly by pearch and pole to breed queſtions) what is the nature of the ſoile, which were places of greateſt antiquitie, who have beene the Dukes, Marqueſſes, Earles, Vicounts, Barons, and ſome of the moſt ſignall, and ancient families therein (for who can particulate all?) What I have performed, I leave to men of judgement. But time the moſt ſound and ſincere witnes will give the trueſt information, when envy which perſecuteth the living, ſhall have her mouth ſtopped. Thus much give me leave to ſay, that I have in no wiſe neglected ſuch things as are moſt materiall to ſearch, and ſift out the Truth. I have attained to ſome skill of the moſt ancient Britiſh and Engliſh-Saxon tongues: I have travailed over all England for the moſt part, I have conferred with moſt skilfull obſervers in each country, I have ſtudiouſly read over our owne country writers, old and new, all Greeke and Latine authors which have once made mention of Britaine. I have had conference with learned men in other parts of Chriſtendome: I have been diligent in the Records of this Realme. I have looked into moſt Libraries, Regiſters, and memorials of Churches, Cities, and Corporations, I have pored upon many an old Rowle, and Evidence: and produced their teſtimonie (as beyond all exception) when the cauſe required, in their very own words (although barbarous they be) that the honour of veritie might in no wise be impeached,

For all this I may be censured unadvised, and scant modest who being but of the lowest fourme in the schoole of Antiquitie, where I might well have lurked in obscuritie, have adventured as a scribler upon the stage in this learned age amidst the diversities of relishes both in wit and judgement. But to tell the truth unfainedly, the love of my Country which comprisseth all love in it, and hath endeared me unto it, the glory of the British name, the advise of some judicious friends hath overmastred my modestie, and (wild I, nild I,) hath enforced me against mine own judgment to undergo this burden too heavy for me, & so thrust me forth into the worlds view. For I see judgements, prejudices, censures, reprehensions, obtrectations, detractions, affronts, and confronts, as it were, in battaile array to environ me on every side: some there are which wholly contemne and avile this study of Antiquitie as a back-looking curiositie; whose authority as I do not utterly vilefie, so I do not overprize or admire their judgement. Neither am I destitute of reasons whereby I might approve this my purpose to well bred and well meaning men which tender the glory of their native Country: and moreover could give them to understand that in the studie of Antiquity, (which is alwaies accompanied with dignity, and hath a certaine resemblance with eternity) there is a sweet food of the mind well befitting such as are of honest and noble disposition. If any there be which are desirous to be strangers in their owne soile, and forrainers in their owne City, they may so continue and therein flatter themselves. For such like I have not written these lines, nor taken these paines. Some there be who may object the silly web of my stile, and rough hewed forme of my writing. Verily I acknowledge it, neither have I waied every word in Goldsmiths scales, as Varro commanded, neither purposed I to picke flowers out of the gardens of Eloquence. But why should they object this, when as Cicero the father of Eloquence denieth that this kind of argument can ΑΝΘΗΡΟΓΡΑΦΕΙΣΘΑΙ, that is, be flourished out, and as Pomponius Mela said, is incapable of all Eloquent speech.

Many happily will insult over me for that I have adventured to hunt after the originals of names by conjectures, who if they proceed on to reject all conjectures, I feare me a great part of liberall learning and humane knowledge will be utterly out-cast into banishment. For the edge of our understanding is so blunt that we are of necessitie enforced to prosecute many matters in all professions conjecturally. In Physick ΣΗΜΕΙΑ, ΤΕΚΜΗΡΙΑ, ΕΙΚΟΤΑ, which are nothing else but conjectures, have their place, and stand in good steed, likewise in Rhetoricke, Civil Law, and other arts they are admitted and allowed. And whereas conjectures are certaine detections of things unknown, and as Fabius termeth them, directions of reason to verity, I have alwaies thought that they were to be accounted among the skuppers wherewith Time worketh and draweth Veritie out of Democritus his deepe dungeon. But if these men may be induced to attribute ought to conjectures, I doubt not but my modestly and moderation in conjecturing may withall purchase my pardon; Plato in his Cratilus commandeth that we recal the originals of names to the barbarous tongues (for so he called al but Greek) as being most ancient. I thereupon in Etymologies and my conjectures have made recourse to the British, or Welsh tongue (so they now call it) as being the same which the Primitive and most ancient Inhabitants of this land used, and to the English-Saxons tongue which our Progenitors the English spake. He commandeth that the name be consonant to the nature of the thing, & the nature thereof to the name, if they be herein dissonant, I admit them not. In things, saith he, there is ΦΩΝΗ, ΣΧΗΜΑ, ΧΡΩΜΑ: that is, but I cannot aptly expresse them, A sound, a forme, and colour, if these discover not themselves in the name I reject the conjecture. As for obscure Etymologies, far fetched, hardly wrested, and which may be drawne diversly; I have vouchsafed them no place it this worke, finally I have beeue so sparing and cautelously forecasting in my conjectures that if I be not thought ΕΥΤΟΛΜΟΣ, that is, Happily adventurous, I shall not seeme ΤΟΛΜΗΡΟΣ, that is, Presumptuously audacious. And albeit I have once or twice framed two conjectures in one and the same name, yet I forget not in the meane time that Vnitie is consecrated unto Veritie.

There are some peradventure which apprehend it disdainfully and offensively that I have not remembred this or that family, when as it was not my purpose to mention any but such as were more notable, nor all them truely (for their names would fill whole volumes) but such as happned in my way according to the method I proposed to my selfe; And with Gods grace I may have a more convenient occaſion to deſerve well of the Nobilitie and Gentry. But happily they will be moſt offended herein who have leaſt deſerved of their country, or overvallew themſelves moſt, or whoſe Gentry may be but newly bloſſomed. Of whom yet I proteſt I would not offend any, and therefore deſire and hope their noble natures will not take it offenſively upon ſuch cauſeleſſe apprehenſions.

Others will call me in queſtion for that I have commended ſome perſons now living; yet I have done it ſparingly, and that out of an aſſurance of verity, out of the common conſent and voice of ſuch as can well judge of worth, & from no baſe flattery. By theſe ſparing commendations ſuch as are commended may be leſſoned that their deportments may be anſwerable, and that they preſerve and daily increaſe the ſame. Succeeding ages, which I reſpect more than the preſent, will render to every man his right whatſoever is now ſcribled in papers. In the meane time I wiſh them to remember, that to praiſe good men is but to ſhew a light of direction as out of a watch towre to poſteritie. True is that ſaying of Symmachus. Imitation is encouraged with the ſeemely praiſes of the good, and imitating vertue is cheriſhed by the example of others honour. If any ſay that I have ſought occaſion to commend ſome one or other, I confeſſe it. Neither is well-meaning without leaſing to be blamed among the good, and well deſerving, friends are not to be forgotten. Howſoever Virtue and Glory hath alwaies oppoſites, and men uſually envie the preſent, and reverence what is paſt; yet God forbid that we ſhould be ſo partially injurious as to thinke our times under moſt worthy Princes to be barrein of praiſeworthy perſons. As for ſuch as maligne the praiſe of the good, I feare me leaſt in their owne guiltineſſe they may apply the diſpraiſe of the bad to themſelves. As for my ſelfe I ſenſibly underſtand that which Plinie intimated to Tacitus in like caſe. There will bee great offence, and ſlender thankes, for albeit in the looſeneſſe of the world, there is much more to be diſcommended than commended; yet if you commend you ſhall be taxed as overſparing; if you diſcommend you ſhall be cenſured as overlaviſh, although you doe the one moſt compleatly, and the other moſt moderatly.

Some will blame me for that I have omitted this and that towne and Caſtle, as though I purpoſed to mention any but ſuch as were moſt notorious, and mentioned by ancient authours. Neither verily were it worth the labour once to name them, when as beſide the naked name there is nothing memorable. Truly it was my project and purpoſe to ſeeke, rake out, and free from darkeneſſe ſuch places as Cæſar, Tacitus, Ptolomy, Antonine the Emperor, Notitia Provinciarum, and other antique writers have ſpecified and Time hath overcaſt with miſt and darknes by extinguiſhing, altering, and corrupting their old true names. In ſearching & ſeeking after theſe, as I will not avouch uncertainties ſo I doe not conceale probabilities. That I have not found out every one although I have ſought after them with painfull & chargeable inquiery let it bee no imputation to mee, as it is not to a Spadiard that worketh in Mines, who while he findeth & followeth the maine vaines, ſeeth not the hidden ſmall fillets; or that I may uſe that which Columella did. As it is the commendation of a good Huntſman to find game in a wide wood, ſo it is no imputation if he hath not caught all, and likewiſe to me, Some things are to be left to the inquiſitive diligence of others, Neither, as a learned man ſaid, he teacheth well which teacheth all. An other age, and other men may daily find out more. It is enough for me to have begun, and I have gained as much as I looke for, if I ſhall draw others into this argument, whether they undertake a new worke or amend this.

There are certain, as I heare who take it impatiently that I have mentioned ſome of the moſt famous Monaſteries and their founders. I am ſory to heare it, and with their good favour will ſay thus much, They may take it as impatiently, and peradventure would have us forget that our anceſtours were, and we are of the Chriſtian profeſſion when as there are not extant any other more conſpicuous, and certaine Monuments, of their piety, and zealous devotion toward God. Neither were there any other ſeed-gardens from whence Chriſtian Religion, and good learning were propagated over this Iſle, howbeit in corrupt ages ſome weeds grew out overranckly.

Mathematicians wil accuſe me as though I had wholy miſſed the mark in the Coſmographical dimentions of longitude, & latitude. Yet heare me I pray you. I have carefully cõferred the Locall tables new & old, Manuſcript, and printed, of Oxford & Cambridge, and King Henry the Fifth. In the latitude they doe not vary much from Ptolomy, but agree wel together, neither do I thereupon imagine with Stadius, that the globe of the earth is removed from his

centre, therefore I have relied upon them. But in the Longitude there is no accord, no consent at all. What should I then doe? When as therefore the moderne navigators have observed that there is no variation of the Compasse at the Isles of Asores, I have thence begun with them, the account of Longitude as from the first Meridian, which yet I have not precisely measured.

As for obscuritie, fables, extravagant digressions I trust there is no cause to sue out my pardon. There will be no obscuritie but to them which have not sipped the first elements of Antiquitie, and our histories: upon fables I have no waies relied, and that I might not digresse extravagantly. I have had often recourse to the title of my booke (as Pliny adviseth) and eftsoones demanded of my selfe why I tooke penne in hand. Many have found a defect in this worke that Mappes were not adjoyned, which doe allure the eies by pleasant portraiture, and are the best directions in Geographicall studies, especially when the light of learning is adjoyned to the speechlesse delineations. Yet my abilitie could not compasse it, which by the meanes and cost of George Bishop, and John Norton is now performed out of the labours of Christopher Saxton, and John Norden, most skilfull Chorographers.

But least I should run at randome in my Preface. To accomplish this worke the whole maine of my Industrie hath been imploied for many yeares with a firme setled study of the truth, and sincere antique faithfulnesse to the glory of God and my country. I have done dishonour to no nation, have descanted upon no mans name, I have impaired no mans reputation, I have impeached no mans credit, no not Geffrey of Monmouth whose historie (which I would gladly support) is held suspected amongst the judicious. Neither have I assumed upon my self any perswasion of knowledge, but only that I have been desirous to know much. And so I right willingly acknowledge that I may erre much, neither will I sooth and smoth my errors. Who shooting all day long doth alwaies hit the mark? Many matters in these studies are raked under deceitfull ashes. There may be some escapes from memory, for who doth so comprehend particularities, in the treasury of his memory, that he can utter them at his pleasure? There may be mistakings in regard of my unskilfulnes, for who is so skilfull that strugling with Time in the foggie darke sea of Antiquity, may not run upon rocks? It may be that I have been misled by the credit of authors and others whom I tooke to be most true, and worthy of credit. Neither is there verily (as Pliny saith) any easier slipping from truth, then when a grave Authour warranteth an untruth. Others may be more skilfull and more exactly observe the particularities of the places where they are conversant, If they, or any other whosoever, will advertise mee wherein I am mistaken, I will amend it with manifold thankes, if I have unwitting omitted ought, I will supply it, if I have not fully explicated any point, upon their better information I will more cleere it, if it proceed from good meaning, and not from a spirit of contradiction and quarelling, which doe not befit such as are well bred, and affect the truth. Meane while let your kind courtesie, my industry, the common love of our common mother our native Country, the ancient honour of the British name obtaine so much upon their entreaty, that I may utter my judgement without prejudice to others, that I may proceed in that course that others have formerly done in the like argument, and that you would pardon my errors upon my acknowledgement, which may be as well hoped as requested, from good indifferent and reasonable men; so I passe not for the unreasonable, and worser sort which gnaw upon all at tables, carp in conventicles, envy, back-bite, slander, and detract. For I have learned of the Comicall Poet, that slander is the treasure of fooles which they carry in their tongues, and I know for certainty that Envy is seated (I will say it although Envy stood at my elbow) in none but in degenerous, unnoble, and base minds. The honest good and noble natures as they detest envy, so they cannot envy. As for my selfe, and this worke, I doe most humbly submit it to the censure of the godly honest and learned with all respective reverence of whom if it be not approved, I hope in regard of my professed love to our native Country, that it may be excused. Farwell.

CAmden unto the learned did diſcover,
What Holland to the Whol-land doth recite;
Who can but read an Engliſh Author over,
May thereby reape much profit with delight,
Viewing the manners, lawes, rites ſituation,
Of his owne native ſoile, explain'd ſo well;
With all can be deſir'd of Britiſh Nation,
That now Great Britaine hath no Parralell:
So richly deck't, that her faire beautious blaze,
By matchleſſe Art of thine induſtrious ſpirit, Adornes the World, like Phœbus golden raies.
Thou and thy workes eternall fame doe merit Anagr.
Thou Onli-homland-help in admiration,
Like that rare * Phœnix cauſe of this tranſlation.

WHat Camden wrote for profit and delight,
Of Britiſh Iſles, of bleſſings which have ſtore,
In Latian language, for each learned ſprite,
To reape ſuch fruits as paſſe Peruvian ore
This Holland hath at ſuit of learned Dame,
With paines, transfus'd into our vulgar ſpeach
His care of common good, deſerves that fame,
Which unto late poſteritie ſhall reach.
Wherefore all worthy wights which doe take pleaſure,
To know the ſtories of their Country ſweet,
Ought kindly to accept this ſo great treaſure;
And yield thoſe thankes to th' Author which are meet.
I like his Pen and judgement eke no leſſe,
For making choice of ſuch a Patroneſſe.

In honour of the Translator.

THe PEN unspoild, though worne beyond a Pen,
The HAND unwearied, though with toile oppreſt;
The HEAD diſeas'd for eaſe of Engliſhmen,
(Yet ſtill hold out) in motion heere doe reſt.
They reſt in motion; reſtleſſe neſt is that;
Yet that's the reſt thy Pen, thy Hand, thy Head
Deere HOLLAND hath; which all (untir'd) tranſlate
The greateſt Volumes, greateſt Braines have bred.
Life being ſo ſhort as from the Birth to Beere
Is but a ſpan; all times may well admire
How ſo much may be onely written here,
Where toile makes that ſhort life more ſoone expire.
Had I an Angels tongue, or elſe a Pen
Made of his Pinion (might I judge of thee)
I ſhould ſo ſpeake and write that Gods and Men Should ſee a Miracle of thee through me.
For, NATVRE workes but ſtill to hold her ſtate;
And for that worke alone neglecteth all:
But thy workes doe her power in thee abate,
For others good; that's ſupernaturall.
So th'art a Miracle of Men, for Men;
Yet if this Miracle be thought untrue
To thy good HEART, from thy Head, Hand, and Pen
Give what is right, and then all is but due.
To count the Volumes moſt voluminous,
Which thou tranſlated haſt with care (paſt care)
And Art (paſt Art) were but ſuperfluous:
For, all doe know them, ſith they famous are.
NATVRES great Secretarie thou didſt teach
To ſpeake ſuch Engliſh, as (though he be high
In cloudy-matter) Engliſh eies may reach,
His higheſt Pitch; that tries the Eagles eie.
The Roman moſt renown'd Hiſtorian
Trajans great MASTERS Moralls (boundleſſe bookes)
Smooth Tranquill, and the rugged Ammian,
Thou mad'ſt as ſmooth to ſpeake, as Venus lookes.
And, for thy laſt, (but ſo it cannot be
If life doe laſt, for ſtill thou wilt be doing)
Here is a WORKE tranſlated now by thee,
For which we long the Learned have beene wooing.
In this, through thee, wee ſee (as in a Glaſſe)
The wrinckled Face of grave ANTIQVITIE:
Thy paſſing Antor here himſelfe doth paſſe
Or'e whom thou raign'ſt while he doth ſubject lie.
Camden, whoſe Fame nor Seas, nor Lands can bound (Yet they beſt know him fartheſt from our ken;
For, Engliſh leaſt doe know his voices ſound)
Is made more famous by thy famous Pen
For, now the Engliſh knowes his worthineſſe:
His Countrimen now ſee him as he is:
Before, they at his vertue could but gueſſe;
And gueſſe by Artleſſe Aimes, that often miſſe.
Yet, Man of Art, behold! for all this All
How thou art ſubject (that deſeru'ſt to raigne
In all mens loves) to hate of great and ſmall,
That to be learn'd alone, take envious paine;
Who ſeeke for Knowledge onely to be knowne:
(,, For, who know moſt, are knowne ſtill moſt of all)
They deeme Wit, Folly; that to all is ſhowne;
And Goodneſſe, Badneſſe hold, if generall.
Who knows the voice of Ebony, theirs doe know
For, Envy ſpeakes but onely by their tongues,
Who being a devill ſpeakes (ſhe cares not how)
By borrow'd Organs which to them belongs.
Alas poore Snakes! (baſe Envies Inſtruments) Poore in your Wit, and way-ward in your Will)
Yee little learne, ſo, hate the Ornaments
Of Arte in greater Wits of leſſer skill.
Didye not doubt your owne defect of Wit
You would all Artes ſhould ſtill be ſhowne to all;
And let the beſt Wit make beſt uſe of it,
For Wits renowne, and letters liberall.
Yea, you would wiſh the Babylonian towre
Were yet to build, while all one tongue impart;
That ſo, ſole Wit might be Arts Governour,
Not tongues, that are the Eſſence of no Art.
But were yee good, and would all Good ſhould know
Who Envy this more learn'd, leſſe-envious man,
You would the frankeſt praiſe on him beſtow
That makes th'unlearn'd a learn'd Hiſtorian.
Shall Engliſh be ſo poore, and rudely-baſe
As not be able (through meere penury)
To tell what French hath ſaid with gallant grace,
And moſt tongues elſe of leſſe facunditie?
God ſhield it ſhould; and Heav'n forefend that we Should ſo debaſe our owne deere mother-tongue,
That ſhewes our thoughts (how ever high they be)
With higher tearmes, and eloquence among,
Then, let me muzzle thoſe ſo dogged mouthes
That byte and barke at what they ſhould defend:
„ They lies doe love, that hidden would have Truthes;
„ And he is Vertues foe that's Errors friend.
But, kind Philêmon, let thine active Muſe
Still mount above theſe baſe deſtracting ſpirits:
Looke not ſo low as Snakes that men abuſe,
And higheſt Fame ſhall crowne thy loweſt merits.
Goe forward (maugre backward Envies crabs,
That ſtill goe backe) thy paines give others pleaſure:
They play proud Miriams part, thou Ionadabs;
They ſkant our learnings lifts, thou giv'ſt us meaſure.
This Camdens-Britaine, that on wings of Art
Flies or'e the World, knowne leaſt where moſt it oughs,
There thy free Pen to all doth it impart,
And mak'ſt them learn'd that almoſt are untaught.
For, Camden (whoſe all time out-wearing fame, Sith he the learned hath ſo often gladded)
Hath, by thy Pen, now multipli'd his Name:
For, now to Camdens Britaine, Holland's added
Then, pregnant HOLLAND, Britaine fertile make!
With learnings compoſt; till the croppe of Art
Be ready for our neighbours Sithe, and Rake,
That have leſſe skill, than will to take our part;
So ſhall this ſoile (when thou art ſoile or ſand)
Call Camdens-Britaine, Hollands richeſt Land.

The unfained honourer of thee and thine indeavours.

BRITAINE.

BRitaine or Britannie, which alſo is Albion, named in Greeke ΒΡΕΤΑΝΙΑ, ΒΡΕΤΑΝΙΚΗ, ΠΡΕΤΑΝΙΣ, ΑΛΒΙΩΝ, ΑΛΟΤΙΩΝ, the moſt famous Iſland, without compariſon of the whole world; ſevered from the continent of Europe, by the interflowing of the Ocean, lieth againſt Germanie and France triangle-wiſe; by reaſon of three Promontories ſhooting out into divers parts: to wit, Belerium, i. the Cape of S. Burien in Corwall, Weſtward; Cantium, i. the Fore-land of Kent, into the Eaſt; and Tarvistum or Orcas, i. the point of Catneſſe in Scotland, Northward. On the Weſt ſide, whereas Ireland is ſeated, Vergivius, i. the Weſterne Ocean, breaketh in; From the North, it hath the moſt vaſt and wide Hyperborean ſea beating upon it; On the Eaſt, where it coaſteth upon Germanie, enforced ſore it is with the Germane ſea; and Southward, as it lieth oppoſite to France, with the Britiſh. Disjoyned from thoſe neighbour-countries all about by a convenient diſtance every way, fitted with commodious and open havens, for traffique with the univerſall world, and to the generall good, as it were, of mankind, thruſting it ſelfe forward with great deſire from all parts into the ſea. For betweene the ſaid Fore-land of Kent and Calais in France it ſo advanceth it ſelfe, and the ſea is ſo ſtraighted, that ſome thinke the land there was pierced through, and received the ſeas into it, which before-time had beene excluded: For the maintenance of which their conceit, they alleage both Virgil in that verſe of his, See in Kent.

Et penitus toto diviſos orbe Britannos:

And Britans people quite disjoyn'd from all the world beſides.

Becauſe Britaine, ſaith Servius Honoratus, was in times paſt joyned to the maine. And alſo Claudian, who in imitation of him wrote thus:

——Noſtra deducta Britannia mundo.

Britaine, a land, which ſevered is from this our [Roman] world.

Certes, that the outward face and faſhion of this globe of Earth hath beene with the inundation of Noahs flood, as alſo by other cauſes altered; that ſome mountaines thereby increaſed in heighth, many places higher than others, ſetled low, and became even plaines and valleys; that waterie waſhes were dried up, and drie grounds turned to be ſtanding waters; yea, and that certaine Iſlands have beene violently broken off from the firme land, carrieth ſome likelihood of truth. But whether the ſame be true indeed, or whether there were any Iſlands at all before the Deluge, it is not my purpoſe here to argue; neither take I pleaſure, without good adviſement, of Gods works to give my doome. That the providence of God hath ordained divers things to one and the ſame end, who knoweth not? and verily, that parcels of the earth diſperſed here and there within the ſea, ſerve no leſſe to adorne the world, than lakes ſpred upon the earth and hilles raiſed aloft, aſwell Divines as Philoſophers have alwaies held.

Livius and Fabius Ruſticus have likened the forme heereof unto a * long diſh or * two edged axe, and ſo is it ſhapen indeed toward the South, as ſaith Tacitus, whereupon the fame went of the whole. But Northward, that huge and enorme tract of ground ground running beyond unto the furthermoſt point, groweth narrow and ſharpe like a wedge, So large, and of ſuch exceeding greatneſſe in circuit, they in olde time tooke it to bee, that Cæſar, hee who firſt of all the Romans diſcovered it, wrote, How he had found out another world; ſuppoſing the ſame ſo great, as that it ſeemed to containe within it the Ocean, and not to be compaſſed about therewith: and Iulius Solinus Polyhiſtor hath left in writing, that for the largeneſſe thereof it deſerveth well neere the name of a ſecond world. Howbeit, this age of ours hath now at length by many and ſundry voyages, found out in ſome ſort the true dimenſion and juſt compaſſe of the whole Iſle, For, from the point Tarviſion unto the cape Belerium, the reaches and crooked turnings of the ſea-banks along the Weſt conſidered, there are reckoned much about DCCCXII miles: from thence, keeping the ſea ſide, as it bendeth Southward untill you come to the Fore-land of Kent, CCCXX miles: whence coaſting by the Germane ſea, with crooked creeks and inlets for DCCIIII miles, it reacheth to the foreſaid point Tarviſium: ſo that by this reckoning the whole Iland taketh in compaſſe MDCCCXXXVI miles. Which meaſure as it commeth farre ſhort of Plinies, ſo is it alſo ſomewhat leſſe than Cæſars. As for Schitinius Chius, I have no reaſon once to name him, who having in Apollonius among other wonders tolde us ſtrange tales of fruits growing in Britaine without kernels, and of grapes without ſtone and ſeed, hath bounded it within the precinct of CCC ſtadia and no more. Much better yet hath Dionyſius After in his Deſcription of the world, reported of the Britiſh Ilands that is to ſay, Britaine and Ireland in this wiſe,

* Bipenni. See the Annotations of Sir Hen. Savile, knight, upon this place in Tacitus.

Τάων τε μεγάθει θαυμάσσαι· ἐσὶ τις ἴδεσθαι
Νήσοις ἐν πόντῳ Βρεττανὶς ἰσοφαρίζει.

Now, for their greatneſſe verily, exceeding large they are;
And ſeeke through Ilands all, none may with Britiſh Iſles compare.

And together with him, Ariſtides and other Greeke writers accord, who by way of excellencie, have truly called Britaine for the greatneſſe thereof Μεγάλην νῆσον, that is, The great Iland.

Now, they that have more curiouſly compared the ſpaces of heaven above, together with the tracts of earth beneath, place Britaine under the 8. Climate, and include it within the 18. and 26 Parallel. They thinke alſo the longeſt day there, to be 18. Æquinoctiall houres and an halfe. But the Cape of Cornwall, reſpecting the convexitie of the earth, they deſcribe to be ſituate 16 degrees & 50 ſcruples from the furtheſt point Weſt: the longitude likewiſe of the Fore-land in Kent, to be 21. degrees; as for the latitude, in the ſouth-coaſt they meaſure it by 50 degrees, and that of Catneſſe Northward, by 59 & 40 ſcruples over. So that, according to this ſite, Britaine is ſeated aſwell for aire as ſoile, in a right fruitfull and moſt milde place. The aire ſo kinde and temperate, that not only the Summers be not exceſſive hote, by reaſon of continuall gentle windes that abate their heat (which as they refreſh the fruits of the earth, ſo they yeeld a moſt holſome and pleaſing contentment both to man and beaſt) but the Winters alſo are paſſing milde: For, the raine falling often with ſtill ſhowers, (to ſay nothing of the aire it ſelfe ſomewhat thicke and groſſe) diſſolveth the rigour of the cold ſo; and withall the ſea which compaſſeth it, with moderate warmth doth comfort the land in ſuch wiſe, as that the cold with us is much more remiſſe than in ſome parts of France and Italie. Whereupon it is, that Minutius Fœlix, proving that God by his providence hath a ſpeciall regard of the ſeverall parts of the world as well as of the whole, ſaith, That Britaine though it want other whiles the aſpect of the Sunne, yet refreſhed it is with the warmth of the ſea flowing round about it. Neither neede you to marvell at his ſpeech, concerning the warmth of the ſea. The ſeas, quoth Cicero, ſtirred to and fro with the winds, do ſo wax warme, that a man may eaſily perceive, within that world of Waters there is incloſed a certaine heat. To the temperateneſſe alſo of this Iland Ceſcenius Getulicus a very ancient Poet ſeemeth to have reſpect, when he verſified thus of Britaine;

Non Illîc Aries verno ferit æra cornu,
Gnoſia nec Gemini præcedunt cornua Tauri,
Sicca Lycaonius reſupinat plauſtra Bootes.

The Panegyricke Oration pronounced unto Cõſtantius, and untruly entitled unto Maximian.

Cæſar likewiſe writeth thus; The places in Britaine be more temperate (by reaſon that the weather is not ſo cold) than in France. Semblably Cornelius Tacitus; No extremitie there is of cold: and hee addeth moreover, and ſaith, The ſoile, ſetting aſide the Olive, the Vine, and the reſt, which are * proper to warmer countries, taketh all kind of graine, and beareth it in abundance: it ripeneth ſlowly, but commeth up quickly: the cauſe of both, is one and the ſame, to wit, the overmuch moiſture of ground and aire. For the aire, as Strabo writeth, is ſubject rather to ſhowres of raine, than to ſnow. Howbeit, the ground enriched ſo with all ſorts of corne, that Orpheus hath reported it to bee the very ſeat of Ladie Ceres: for, that which we read in his Poeme thus,

* Vſually grow in hotter countries.

——ἰδ' ἰυρὴν Δήμητρ' ἀσίστος is meant of this our Iſland: yea, and it hath beene the very barne, garner, and ſtore-houſe of victuals of the Weſt Empire; from whence the Romans were wont yearely to tranſport into Germanie, with a fleet of 800. veſſels bigger than barges, great ſtore of corne, for the maintenance of their armies, which there defended the Frontiers. But leſt I ſhould ſeeme to exceed over-much in the praiſe of my native country, heare in ſtead of me, that ancient Oratour, who with open mouth reſoundeth out the commendations thereof, in this manner: O happie Britaine, and more fortunate than all other lands beſide, which firſt ſaweſt Conſtantine Emperour! for good cauſe hath nature endowed thee with all the bleſſed gifts of aire and ſoile; wherein there is neither exceſſive cold of Winter, nor extreme heat of Summer; wherein there is ſo great plenty of graine, that it ſerveth ſufficiently both for bread and drink: wherein the forreſts are without ſavage beaſts, and the ground void of noyſome ſerpents. Contrariwiſe, an infinite multitude there is of tame cattell with udders ſtrutting full of milke, and loaden with fleeces: and verily, (that which for the uſe of our life we much eſteemed) the daies there are very long, and the nights never want ſome light, whiles thoſe utmoſt plaines by the ſea ſide caſt and raiſe no ſhadowes on high, and the aſpect both of skie and ſtarres paſſeth beyond the bound of the night, yea the very Sunne it ſelfe, which unto us ſeemeth for to ſet, appeareth there, onely to paſſe along and goe aſide.

Zoſimus. Euſtachius deſcriptione.

Panegyric to Conſtantius.

Hearken alſo, if it pleaſe you, to another Orarour ſpeaking unto Conſtantius the father of Conſtantine the Great in this wiſe: And, I aſſure you, no ſmall dammage was it to the Common-weale, as to loſe the bare name onely of Britaine, ſo to forgoe a land ſo plentifull in corne, ſo rich in paſturage, ſo full of mines and veines of mettall, ſo gainefull in tributes and revenewes ſo accommodated with many havens, and for circuit, ſo large and ſpacious.

Panegyric, to Conſtantius.

Moreover, the ſingular love and motherly affection of Nature to this Iſland, a Poet of good antiquitie hath by way of a ſpeech made unto Britaine lively expreſſed thus, in this Epigram, which ſome have judged not unworthy to be divulged.

Tu nimio nec ſtricta gelu, nec ſydere fervens,
Clementi cœlo temperiéque places,
Cùm pareret Natura parens, varióque favore
Devideret dotes omnibus una locis,
Sepoſuit potiora tibi, matréque profeſſa,
Inſula ſis fœlix, plenáque pacis, ait.
Quicquid amat luxus, quicquid deſiderat uſus,
Ex te proveniet, vel aliunde tibi.

For aire, ſo mild and temperate right pleaſing is thy ſeat;
Where reigneth neither chilling cold, nor yet exceſſive heat.
What time Dame Nature brought things forth, and of her onely grace, Beſtow'd her favours manifold and gifts on every place;

Like mother kinde, the better part aſide for thee ſhe laid;
Oh, happie Iſland maiſt thou be and full of peace, ſhe ſaid:
What ever vaine exceſſe affects, what may mans need content,
Shall come from thee, or elſe to thee, from other lands be ſent.

Fortunate Iſlands.

This plentifull abundance, theſe goodly pleaſures of Britain, have perſwaded ſome, that thoſe fortunate Iſlands, wherein all things, as Poets write, do ſtill flouriſh as in a perpetuall Spring tide, were ſometime heere with us. For, this, doth one Iſacius Tzetzes a Greek Author of no ſmall credit, affirme, and our anceſtours ſeeme to have believed the ſame as a certaine truth. For, what time as Pope Clement the ſixth, as wee read in Robert of Aevsburie, had elected Lewis of Spaine, to bee the Prince of thoſe fortunate Iſlands, and for to aid and aſſiſt him, muſtered ſouldiers in France and Italie; our countrymen were verily perſwaded, That hee was choſen Prince of Britvine, and that all the ſaid preparation was for Britaine, as one, ſaith he, of the fortunate Iſlands. Yea and even thoſe moſt prudent perſonages themſelves, our Legier Embaſſadours there, with the Pope, were ſo deeply ſetled in this opinion, that forthwith they withdrew themſelves from Rome, and haſtned with all ſpeed into England, there to certifie their conntreymen and friends of the matter. Neither will any man now judge otherwiſe, who throughly knoweth the bleſſed eſtate and happie wealth of Britaine. For Nature tooke a pleaſure in the framing thereof, and ſeemeth to have made it as a ſecond world, ſequeſtred from the other, to delight mankind withall, yea and curiouſly depainted it of purpoſe, as it were a certaine portraict, to repreſent a ſingular beautie, and for the ornament of the univerſall world: with ſo gallant and glittering variety, with ſo pleaſant a ſhew are the beholders eies delighted, which way ſoever they glance. To ſay nothing of the Inhabitants, whoſe bodies are of an excellent good conſtitution, their demeanour right courteous, their natures as gentle, and their courage moſt hardie and valiant, whoſe manhood by exploits atchieved both at home and a broad, is famouſly renowned thorow the whole world.

The firſt Inhabitants: and reaſon of the Name.

But who were the moſt ancient and the very firſt Inhabitants of this Iſle, as alſo, from whence this word Britan had the originall derivation, ſundry opinions one after another have riſen; and many we have ſeene, who being uncertaine in this point, have ſeemed to put downe the certaine reſolution thereof. Neither can we hope to attaine unto any certaintie heerein, more than all other nations, which (ſetting thoſe aſide that have their originall avouched unto them out of holy Scripture) as well as wee, touching their point, abide in great darkeneſſe, errour and ignorance. And how, to ſpeake truly, can it otherwiſe be? conſidering that the trueth, after ſo many revolutions of ages and times, could not chuſe but be deepely hidden. For the firſt inhabitours of countreys had other cares and thoughts to buſie and trouble their heads, than to deliver their beginnings unto poſteritie. And ſay, they had been moſt willing ſo to do, yet poſſibly could they not, ſeeing their life was ſo uncivill, ſo rude, ſo full of warres, and therefore void of all literature; which keeping companie with a civill life, by peace and repoſe, is onely able to preſerve the memorie of things, and to make over the ſame to the ſucceeding ages. Moreover the Druidæ, who being in the olde time the Prieſts of the Britans and Gaules, were ſuppoſed to have knowne all that was paſt; & the Bardi, that uſed to reſound in ſong all valours and noble acts, thought it not lawfull to write and booke any thing. But admit they had recorded ought; in ſo long continuance of time, in ſo many and ſo great turnings and overturnings of States, doubtleſſe the ſame had beene utterly loſt, ſeeing that the very ſtones, pyramides, obelisks, and other memorable monuments, thought to be more durable than braſſe, have yeelded long agoe to the iniquitie of time. Howbeit, in the ages ſoone after following, there wanted not ſuch as deſired gladly to ſupplie theſe defects; and when they could not declare the trueth indeed, yet at leaſt way for delectation, they laboured to bring foorth narrations, deviſed of purpoſe, with certaine pleaſant varietie to give contentment, and delivered their ſeverall opinions, each one after his owne conceit and capacitie, touching the originall of Nations and their names. Unto which, as, there were many, who neglecting further ſearch into the trueth, quickly yeelded connivence;

nivence; ſo, the moſt ſort delighted with the ſweetneſſe of the Deviſer, as readily gave credence.

But, to let paſſe all the reſt, one Geffrey Ap Arthur, of Monmouth among us (whom I would not pronounce in this behalfe liable to this ſuſpicion) in the raigne of K. Henrie the Second, publiſhed an Hiſtorie of Britaine, and that out of the Britiſh tongue, as hee ſaith himſelfe: wherein he writeth, That Brutus a Trojane borne, the ſonne of Silvius, nephew of Aſcanius, and in a third degree nephew to that great Æneas deſcended from ſupreame Jupiter, (for the goddeſſe Venus bare him) whoſe birth coſt his mother her life, and who by chance ſlew his owne father in hunting, (a thing that the wiſe Magi had foretold) fled his country and went into Greece; where he delivered out of thraldome the progenie of Helenus K. Priamus ſonne, vanquiſhed King Pandraſus, wedded his daughter, and accompanied with a remnant of Trojans, fell upon the Iſland Leogetia: where by the Oracle of Diana, he was adviſed to goe into this Weſterne Iſle. From thence through the Streights of Gebraltar, where he eſcaped the Mer-maydes, and afterward through the Tuskan ſea, hee came as farre as to * Aquitaine, in a pight battell defeated Golfarius the Pict, King of Aquitaine, together with twelve Princes of Gaul; and after he had built the citie * Tours (as witneſſeth Homer) and made ſpoile of Gaule, paſſed over ſea into this Iſland inhabited of Giants, whom when he had conquered, together with Gogmagog the hugeſt of them all, according to his owne name he called it Britaine, in the yeare of the world 2855: before the firſt Olympiad 334. yeares; and before the nativitie of Chriſt 1108. Thus farre Geffrey [of Monmouth]. Yet others there bee, that fetch the name of Britaine from ſome other cauſes. Sir Thomas Eliot, by degree a worſhipfull Knight, and a man of ſingular learning, draweth it from the Greeke fountaine, to wit, Πρυτανία, a teame that the Athenians gave to their publike Finances or Revenues. Humfrey Lhuyd, reputed by our countrymen, for knowledge of Antiquitie, to carrie, after a ſort, with him all the credit and authoritie, referreth it confidently to the Britiſh word PRID-CAIN, that is to ſay, a pure white forme. Pomponius Lætus reporteth, that the Britons out of Armorica in France, gave it that name. Goropius Becanus ſaith, that the Danes ſought heere to plant themſelves, and ſo named it BRIDANIA, that is, Free Dania. Others derive it from PRVTENIA, a region in Germanie. Bodine ſuppoſeth, that it tooke the name of BRETTA the Spaniſh word, which ſignifieth Earth: and Forcatulus, of BRITHIN, which, as wee read in Athenæus, the Greeks uſed for drinke. Others bring it from the BRVTII in Italy, whom the Græcians called Βρέττιοι. As for thoſe ſmatterers in Grammar, who keepe a babbling and prating that Britaine ſhould carry that name, of Britiſh manners, let them be packing.

Theſe are all the opinions (to my knowledge) that have beene received touching the name of Britaine. But heerein, as wee cannot but ſmile at the fictions of ſtrangers, ſo the devices coined by our owne countrymen paſſe not currant with generall allowance. And verily, in theſe and ſuch like caſes, an eaſier matter it is to impeach the falſe, than to teach and maintaine a truth. For beſides this, that it were an abſurditie to ſeeke the reaſon of this name in a forrein language; the generall conſent of all Hiſtoriographers of better note, doth confute Lætus; who with one accord deliver unto us, that thoſe Armorica Britons departed hence, and ſo from us carried the name with them. Againe, Britaine flouriſhed under this name many hundred yeares before the names of Dania and Prutenia came up. But what doth the word Britannia to doe with the Spaniards Bretta? which I doubt, whether it be Spaniſh or no: and why ſhould this Iſland be ſo termed, rather than other Land? That the drinke called Brithin was ever in uſe among our countrymen, can hardly be proved: and to give name to our nation of the Greekes drinke, were ridiculous. As for thoſe Brutii in Italy, whom as Strabo witneſſeth, the Lucans called Βρέττιοι, as one would ſay, traiterous fugitives, it can never be prooved, that they like runnagates ranne hither into Britaine. But to come now to our owne countrimens conjectures. Eliots Πρυτανία ſeemeth not probable; ſeeing that word was proper to the Athenians; and conſidering the Greeks called this Iſle Βρεττανία, not Πρεττανία, Lhuyds Prid-Cain for the Britan, ſeemeth not onely too farre fetched, but alſo over-hardly ſtreined: to ſay nothing, how that word, Cain, came from the Latines Candidum, and ſo crept into the provinciall language of the Britaines.

But as touching thoſe reports of Brutus; were they true, certaine, and undoubted, there is no cauſe why any man ſhould beſtow farther ſtudy and labor in ſearching out the beginning of the Britaines: The thing is diſpatched to our hand, and the ſearchers of Antiquitie are eaſed of their troubleſome and painfull travell. For mine owne part, it is not my intent, I aſſure you, to diſcredit and confute that ſtory which goes of him, for the upholding whereof, (I call Truth to record) I have from time to time ſtreined to the heighth, all that little wit of mine. For that were, to ſtrive with the ſtreame and currant of time; and to ſtruggle againſt an opinion commonly and long ſince received. How then may I, a man of ſo meane parts, and ſmall reckoning, be ſo bold, as to ſit in examination of a matter ſo important, and thereof definitively to determine? Well, I referre the matter full and whole to the Senate of Antiquarians, for to be decided. Let every man, for me, judge as it pleaſeth him; and of what opinion ſoever the Reader ſhall be of, verily I will not make it a point much material.

And yet I ſee (that I may tell you ſo much aforehand, beeing as I am a plaine honeſt and diligent ſearcher after the truth) how men moſt judicious and paſſing well learned, goe about divers waies to extenuate the credit of this narration; and ſo often as I ſtand in defence thereof, to come upon me fiercely with theſe and ſuch like arguments. Firſt, grounding their reaſon upon the time, they proteſt and ſay, that all is but fabulous (with reſervation onely of the Sacred Hiſtorie) whatſoever is reported to have beene done before the firſt Olympias, to wit, the yeare 770. before the birth of Chriſt: like as theſe reports of Brutus, which are before the ſaid time 300. yeares and more. And this they averre by the authoritie of Varro, the moſt learned writer of all the Romans: who as he named the firſt age immediately after mans creation unto the Deluge, Ἄδηλον, that is, uncertaine, by reaſon of the ignorance thereof, ſo he termed the ſecond, even from the ſaid Deluge unto the firſt Olympias, Μυθικὸν, that is to ſay, Fabulous: becauſe in that time there is related nothing elſe (for the moſt part) but tales, even among the Greekes and Latines, learned nations; much more then among the Barbarous and unlettered, ſuch as in thoſe daies they were in all this tract, every one. Then they alleage, that for the confirmation of this matter in queſtion, the authoritie of ſufficient writers, (which to the knowledge of things paſt maketh moſt, and is all in all) is altogether defective. Now, thoſe they call ſufficient writers, whoſe antiquitie and learning the greater it is, ſo is their credit the better accepted, who all of them, like as the ancient Britaines themſelves (by their ſaying) knew not ſo much as the name of Brutus. Cæſar, ſay they, ſixteene hundred yeares ſince, as he teſtifieth of himſelfe, *By all the enquirie that he could make, found no more but this, that the in land part of Britaine was inhabited by thoſe, who, ſaid they, were borne in the very Iſland; and the maritime coaſts by ſuch as from out of * Belgium paſſed over thither.* Tacitus alſo, a thouſand and foure hundred yeares agoe, who ſearched diligently into theſe particulars, wrote thus, What manner of men the firſt inhabitants of Britain were, borne in the land or brought in, as among barbarous people it is not certainely knowne. Gildas, being himſelfe a wiſe and learned Britaine, who lived a thouſand yeares ſince, hath not one word of this Brutus, and doubteth whether the old Britaines had any records or writings, whereby they might convey unto poſteritie, their own beginning and Hiſtorie; profeſſing that he wrote, by the relation which hee had from beyond ſea, and not by any direction out of the writings of his owne country, or any records left by writers: which if there were ever any at all, either the enemies had burnt them, or elſe they were carried away farre off in ſome fleet of exiled perſons, and ſo not extant. Ninius alſo, diſciple of Eluodugus, taking in hand to write a Chronicle, eight hundred yeares agoe, complaineth that the great Maſters and Doctors of Britaine, had no skill, and left no memoriall in writing: confeſſing, that himſelfe gathered whatſoever hee wrote out of the Annals and Chronicles of the holy Fathers. To theſe they adjoyne Beda,

The Fabulous Time or Age.

At this day called Nether-lands, or Low countries of Germanie.

William

William of Malmesburie, and as many as wrote eleven hundred and threescore years since, who seeme not once to have heard of Brutus his name; so silent are they of him in all their owne writings.

Hereupon they have noted, that the name of that Brutus was never heard of in the world, before that in a barbarous age, and amid the thickest clouds of ignorance, one Hunibald a bald writer, fabled and feined, That Francio a Trojane, King Priams sonne, was the founder of the French Nation. Hence they collect, that when our country-men heard once how the French-men their neighbours drew their line from the Trojanes, they thought it a foule dishonour, that those should outgoe them in nobilitie of Stocke, whom they matched every way in manhood and proesse. Therfore, that Geffrey Ap Arthur of Monmouth, foure hundred yeares ago, was the first, as they thinke, that to gratifie our Britans produced unto them this Brutus, descended from the gods, by birth also a Trojane, to bee the author of the British Nation. And before that time verily not one man, as they say, made any mention at all of the said Brutus.

They adde thus much moreover, that about the same time, the Scotish writers falsely devised Scota the Egyptian Pharaoes daughter to bee the Foundresse of their nation. Then also it was, that some misspending their wit and time, yea and offring violent abuse unto the truth, forged out of their owne braines, for the Irish, their Hiberus; for the Danes, their Danus; for the Brabanders, their Brabo; for the Goths, their Gothus; and for the Saxons, their Saxo; as it were the Stock-fathers of the said nations. But seeing that in this our age, which hath escaped out of those darke mists of fatall ignorance, the French have renounced their Francio as a counterfeit Progenitor: (Whereas the Frenchmen, quoth Turnibus a right learned man, stand highly upon their descent from the Trojanes, they doe it in emulation of the Romans, whom they seeing to heare themselves proud of that Pedigree and noble stocke, would needs take unto themselves also the like reputation:) And for that the Scots, such as be of the wiser sort, have cast off their Scota; and truth it selfe hath chased away Hiberus, Danus, Brabo, and the rest of these counterfeit Demi-gods, and Worthies of the same stampe: Why the Britans should so much sticke unto their Brutus, as the name-giver of their Island, and to the Trojane originall, they greatly wonder: as who would say, before the destruction of Troy, (which happened in the thousand yeare or there about after Noahs floud) there had beene no Britaines heere: and as if there had not lived many valorous men before Agamemnon.

Furthermore, they avouch, that very many out of the grave Senate of great Clerks, by name, Boccace, Vives, Hadr. Junius. Polydore, Buchanan, Vigneier, Genebrard, Molinæus, Bodine, and other men of deepe jndgement, agree joyntly in one verdict, and denie, that ever there was any such in the world as this Brutus: also, that learned men of our owne country, as many, acknowledge him not, but reject him as a meere counterfet. Among whom, they produce, first John of Weathamsted, Abbat of S. Albanes, a most judicious man; who in his Granarie wrote of this point long since in this manner: According to other histories, which in the judgment of some are of more credit, the whole Discourse of this Brutus is rather Poeticall than historicall, and, for divers reasons, built upon opinion more than truth indeede. First, because their is no where mention made in the Roman stories, either of killing the father, or of the said birth, or yet of putting away the sonne. Secondly, for that, after sundry authors, Ascanius begat no such sonne who had for his proper name Sylvius: for, according unto them, he begat but one onely sonne, and that was Iulus, from whom the house of Iulii afterwards tooke their beginning &c. And thirdly, Sylvius Posthumus, whom perhaps Geffrey meaneth, was the sonne of Aeneas by his wife Lavinia; and hee begetting his sonne Aeneas in the eight and thirtieth yeare of his reigne, ended the course of his life by naturall death. The Kingdome therefore, now called England, was not heeretofore, as many will have it, named Britaine of Brutus the sonne of Sylvius. Wherefore, it is in their opinion a vaine peice of worke, and ridiculous enough, to challenge noble blood, and yet to want a probable ground of their challenge. For it is not manhood only, that ennobleth a nation; the mind it is also with *with perfect understanding, and nothing else, that gaineth gentilitie to a man. And therefore Senecawriteth thus, in his * Epistles out of Plato, That there is no King but hee came from slaves, and no slave but hee descended of Kings. Wherefore, to conclude, let this suffice the Britaines from the beginning of their Nobilitie, that they bee courageous and valiant in fight, that they subdue their enemies on every side, and that they utterly refuse the yoke of servitude.*

* Epist. 44.

In a second rancke they place William of Newborough a writer of much greater authoritie, who too too sharply charged Geffrey the Compiler of the British history, for his untruth, so soone as ever it came forth, in these words: A certaine writer quoth he, in these our daies hath risen up, who deviseth foolish fictions and tales of the Britaines, and in a vaine humour of his owne, extolleth them farre above the valorous Macedonians and Romans both: he hath to name Geffrey, and is surnamed Arthurius, for that the tales of Arthur taken out of the Britaines old fables, and augmented by inventions of his owne, with a new colour of Latine speech laid over them, hee hath invested into the goodly title of an Historie. who also hath adventured farther, and divulged under the name of authentike propheſies, grounded upon an undoubted truth, the deceitfull conjectures and foredeemings of one Merline, whereunto hee added verily a great deale of his owne, whiles hee did the same into Latine. And a little after: Moreover, in his booke which he entituleth, The Britans Historie; how malapertly and shamelesly hee doth in manner nothing but lie, there is no man that readeth the said booke can doubt, unlesse hee have no knowledge at all of ancient histories. For, hee that hath not learned the truth of things indeede, admitteth without discretion and judgement the vanitie of fables. I forbeare to speake, what great matter that fellow hath forged of the Britans acts, before the Empire, and commiug in of Julius Cæsar, or else being by others invented, hath put them downe as authentike. In somuch, as Giraldus Cambrensis, who both lived and wrote at the same time, made no doubt to terme it, The fabulous story of Geffrey. Others there bee, who in this narration of Brutus, laugh at the fooliſh Topographie set downe by this Geffrey; as also how falsly hee hath produced Homer as a witnesse: yea, and they would perswade us, that it is wholly patched up of untunable discords and jarring absurdities. They note besides, that his writings, together with his Merlins propheſies, are (among other books prohibited) forbidden by the church of Rome to be publiſhed. Some againe doe observe thus much, how these that most of all admire Brutus, are very doubtfull and waver to and fro about their Brutus. He, say they, that taketh upon him the name and person of Gildas, and annexeth certaine briefe glosses to Ninius, deviseth first, that this Brutus was a Consul of Rome; then, that hee was the sonne of Silvius, and lastly, of one Hesticio. And there wanteth not (as I have heard say) a certaine Count-Palatine, who would needs have our Brutus to be called Brotus, because, forsooth, in his birth he was the cause of his mothers death, as if Βροτὸς sounded so much in Greeke. In the judgement of others, they should have left the Originall of Britaines as probable, if they had fathered their progenie, either upon Brito the Centaure, whom Hinginus mentioneth; or that Bretanus, of whose daughter Celtice, Parthenius Nicæus a very ancient authour, writeth that Hercules begat Celtus, the father of the Celtæ, and from whom Hesychius deriveth the word Britaine.

Eretanus.

As for these observations and judgements of other men, which I have recited, I beseech you, let no man commence action against mee, a plaine meaning man, and an ingenuous student of the truth, as though I impeached that narration of Brutus; forasmuch as it hath been alwaies (I hope) lawfull for every man in such like matters, both to thinke what he will, and also to relate what others have thought. For mine owne part, let Brutus be taken for the father, and founder of the British nation; I will not be of a contrary mind. Let the Britaines resolve still of their originall, to have proceeded from the Trojans (into which stocke, as I will hereafter prove, they may truely ingraffe themselves) I will not gain-stand it. I wot full well, that Nations in old time for their originall, had recourse unto Hercules, & in later ages, to the Trojans. Let Antiquitie herein be pardoned, if by entermingling falsities and truthes, humane matters and divine together, it make the first beginnings of nations and cities more noble, ſacred, and of greater majeſtie: ſeeing that, as Plinie writeth, Even falſely to claime and challenge deſcents from famous perſonages, implieth in ſome ſort a love of virtue. As for my ſelfe, I willingly acknowledge with Varro, the beſt learned of all Romans, ſuch originals as theſe, fetched from the gods, to be profitable; that valorous men may believe, although untruly, that they are deſcended from the gods, and thereby the mind of man aſſuredly perſwaded of ſome divine race, may preſume to enterprize great matters more boldly, act the ſame more reſolutely, and upon the very ſecuritie thereof, performe all more happily. By which words nevertheleſſe, S. Auguſtine gathereth, that the ſaid moſt learned Varro confeſſeth (although not ſtoutly nor confidently, yet covertly) that theſe opinions are altogether truthleſſe. Auguſtinus de Civitate Dei. lib. 3. cap. 4.

Foraſmuch then, as all writers are not of one and the ſame mind, as touching the very name and the firſt inhabitants of Britaine, and I feare me greatly, that no man is able to fetch out the truth, ſo deepely plunged within the winding revolutions of ſo many ages, let the Reader of his candor and humanitie, pardon mee alſo among others, if modeſtly and without the prejudice of any man, I likewiſe interpoſe my conjecture; not upon any mind I have contentiouſly to wrangle, (be that farre from mee) but in my deſire to ſearch out the truth; which hath wholly poſſeſſed me and brought to this point, that in the queſtion now in hand, I had rather aske forgiveneſſe for my fault (if there be any) than commit no fault at all. Howbeit, to the end that the reaſon of this name, may if it be poſſible, more eaſily and with better ſucceſſe appeare, I will endeavour firſt (as I may) to find out the moſt ancient Inhabitours of the Iſland, albeit they lie ſo hidden in the utmoſt nooke and ſecreteſt cloſet of Antiquitie, as it were in a moſt thicke wood, where no pathwaies are to bee ſeene, that very ſmall hope there is or none at all, to fetch thoſe things backe againe with all my diligence, which oblivion hath ſo long removed out of the ſight of our anceſtours.

But to ſeeke for this matter farther off, and to omit Cæſar, with Diodorus and others, who would have the Britans to be * borne of themſelves in the very land and meere * Aborigines; that is, Homelings and not forrein brought in: who alſo imagined, that men in the beginning ſprang out of the earth, like unto muſhroomes and todſtooles: we are taught out of the ſacred Hiſtorie penned by Moſes, that after the Deluge, Sem, Cham, and Japhet, the three ſonnes of Noe, having multiplied their iſſue in great number, departed aſunder from the mountaines of Armenia, where the Arke had reſted, into divers parts and quarters of the earth, and ſo, propagated the nations throughout the wide world. That ſome of their poſteritie came to this Iſle after the families were by little and little ſpred and diſperſed abroad, both reaſon it ſelfe, and alſo the authoritie of Theophilus Antiochenus, doe joyntly prove. When as, ſaith hee, in old time, there were few men in Arabia and Chaldea, after the diviſion of tongues they encreaſed and multiplied more and more. Hereupon ſome departed toward the Eaſt, ſome gat them to the ſpacious and open main-land: others went forward into the North, ſeeking there to ſeat themſelves: neither gave they over to poſſeſſe ground every where, untill they came as farre as to Britaine, ſituate in the Northerne Climates. And Moſes himſelfe expreſſely ſheweth the ſame, writing, that the Iſlands of the Gentiles were by the poſteritie of Japhet divided in their Regions. The Iſlands of * Gentiles the Divines call thoſe, which lie fartheſt off: and Wolfgangus Muſculus a Theologer, not of the loweſt ranke, thinketh that the nations and families which came from Japhet firſt inhabited the Iſles of Europe, ſuch as (ſaith he) be England, Sicilie, &c. Now, that Europe fell unto Japet and his progenie, not Divines onely, but Joſephus alſo and others have recorded. For Iſidorus, out of an ancient writer citeth this, The nations deſcended of Iaphet, poſſeſſe from the Mountaine Taurus Northward, the one halfe of Aſia, and all Europe ſo farre as to the Britiſh Ocean, leaving names both to places and people both: Of which very many afterward became changed, the reſt remaine as they were. And we have ſeene that bleſſing of Noe, [God enlarge Iaphet, and let him dwell in the Tents of Sem, and let Chanaan be his ſervant] fulfilled in the people of Europe. For, Europe, which, as Plinie ſaith, bred bred up a people conquerour of all nations, hath triumphed more than once over those other parts of the world which fell unto Sem and Cham: and in this part hath the off-spring of Japhet spred it selfe farre and wide. For of his sonnes, Magog begat the Massagets, Javan the Jönes, Thubal the Spaniards, and Mesech the Moschovits. But Gomer his eldest sonne, in these fartheſt and remoteſt borders of Europe, gave both beginning and name to the Gomerians, which were after called Cimbrians and Cimerians. For, the name of Cimbrians or Cimerians filled in some sort this part of the world: and not onely in Germanie, but also in Gaul spred exceeding much. They which now are the Gauls, were, as Josephus and Zonaras write, called of Gomer, Gomari, Gomerai and Gomerita. From these Gomarians or Gomeræans of Gaul, I have alwaies thought that our Britaines drew their beginning, and from thence, for a proofe of the said beginning, brought their name: the very proper and peculiar name also of the * Britans, hath perswaded mee thereunto. For even they call themselves ordinarily Kumero, Cymro and Kumeri: like as a * British woman Kumeraes, and the tongue it selfe, Kumeraeg. Neither acknowledge they any other names: although some there be not of the greateſt skill, who from hence have coined in the former age, these words, Cambri and Cambria. Yea, and that Grammarian whom Virgil in his Catalects so taunteth and termeth the Britaine Thucydides, Quintilian saith was a Cimbrian. And whence, trow yee, should wee thinke these names proceed, but from that Gomer, and the Gomerians in Gaul next adjoyning? which was the seate of the old Gomerians. That the Germans came of Aschenaz, the Turks from Togorma, sonnes of Gomer, the learned doe verily thinke, because the Jewes even at this day call these, Togormah; like as the former, Aschenas. That the Thracians Iönes, Riphæans and Moschi, &c. are the posteritie of Thirax, Javan, Riphat and Moschus, no man denieth; for that the names sound not unlike: Semblably, that the Ethiopians were the seed of Chus, and the Egyptians of Misraim, because they carry the same names in their owne languages, no man there is but granteth. Why should not we then confesse, that our Britaines or Cumerians, are the very posteritie of Gomer, and of Gomer tooke their denomination? For, the name accordeth passing well: and granted it is, that they planted themselves in the utmost borders of Europe: Which thing also, the very name of Gomer, imposed first not upon some light occasion, but even by Divine providence and inspiration, doth signifie: For Gomer in the Hebrew tongue, betokeneth utmoſt Bordering. Neither let any man by way of reproch, object unto our Cumeri or Cimbri, what Sext. Pompeius hath writen; That theeves in the French tongue are called Cimbri. For, albeit the Cimbri (among whom it is likely that our Cumeri were,) living in that couragious and bold age of the world, wherein martiall proëſſe flouriſhed, wandring (as Possidonius writeth), from these marches of Europe, warred by way of robberie, as farre as to the lake Mæotis; yet for all that, the word Cimbri no more signifieth a thiefe, than Aegyptius, one that is superstitious, or Chaldæus, an Astrologer, and Sybarita, a delicate dainty-mouth. But because those nations were so given, therefore they that are such beare their names. And in this point agreeth right with mee, that singular ornament of learning Joseph Scaliger. Neither let any man marvell, wherefore I call not Berosus heere to take my part, out of whom writers in these daies furnish themselves with so great meanes. Certes, to speake my mind at once, the edge of that Berosus his authoritie, who commonly goeth under that name, is in my account so Blunt and dull, that I together with the best learned of our age, as namely Volaterran, Vives, Antonius Augustinus, Melchior Canus, and especially Gaspar Varrerius, thinke it to be nothing else, but a ridiculous figment of some craftie foister and jugling deceiver; which Varrerius in his Censure of Berosus Printed at Rome, is soone able to remove out of the Readers minds that errour of theirs so deepely setled, concerning this writer.

This is mine opinion and conjecture rather of the Britans originall: For in things of so great Antiquitie, a man may more easily proceede by guesse, than upon grounded reason pronounce sentence either way. And verily this their beginning from Gomer and out of * Gaule ſeemeth more ſubſtantiall, ancient and true, than that from Brutus and Troy. Nay, that this ſoundeth rather to a truth, and that our Britaines are the very off-ſpring of the Gaulois, me thinkes I am able to prove, by the name, ſcite, religion, manners, and language: by all which the moſt ancient Gaules and Britaines have beene, as it were, in ſome mutuall ſocietie linked together. And that I may this doe, let me, I pray you, with favourable good leave range abroad for a while at my pleaſure. * Now France. * Now Frenchmen.

THE NAME.

As touching the name, becauſe I have ſpoken thereof before, thus much onely will I repeate, that as the ancient Gaules are called Gomeræans, Gomeritæ, Gomeri, and by contraction Cimbri: ſo likewiſe our Britaines be named Cumeri and Kimbri. Now that the Gaules were called Gomeri, Joſephus and Zonaras (as I ſaid) doe joyntly prove. That they were named alſo Cimbri, may be gathered out of Cicero and Appian. Thoſe Barbarians whom Marius defeated, Cicero plainely termeth Gauls. C. Marius, quoth he, repreſſed the armies of the Gauls, entring in great numbers into Italy. But all Hiſtoriographers witneſſe, that they were Cimbrians: and the Habergeon of their King Beleus, digged up at * Aquæ Sextiæ, where Marius put them to flight, hath ſhewed the ſame: For engraven it was with ſtrange letters thus, BELEOS CIMBROS. Likewiſe, that they who under the conduct of Brennus ſpoiled * Delphi in Greece were Gaules, all writers with one voice and mind agree: and yet, that theſe were named Cimbri, Appian in his Illyricks doth teſtifie: The Celts or Gauls, quoth he, whom they call Cimbrians. And heere will I neither cite the teſtimonie of Lucane, who calleth the hackſter, that was hired and ſent to kill Marius, a Cimbrian, whom Livie and others affirme to have beene a Gaule, nor alleage Plutarch, who nameth the Cimbrians, Gallo-ſcythians, ne yet Reinerius Reineccius an excellent Hiſtorian, who conſtantly averreth out of Plutarch in his Sertorius, that the Gaules and Cimbrians uſed the ſame language. Neither will I urge and ſtreine to my purpoſe that onely word of the Cimbrians which remaineth among authors, and is produced by Plinie out of Philemon, to wit, Morimaruſa. i. the dead Sea, although it be meere Britiſh: For Mor with the * Britans ſignifieth Sea, and Marw, dead.

Seeing therefore, that theſe people agreed in the moſt ancient name, from whence paſſed the ſaid name into this Iſle, but even with the firſt Inhabitants, out of Gaule, lying ſo neere, and by a very ſmall ſtreight of ſea ſevered from it? For the world was not altogether and at once inhabited; but grant wee muſt, that the countries neerer adjoyning unto the mountaines of Armenia, (where the Arke reſted after the flood, and from whence mankind was encreaſed) were peopled before others; and namely Aſia the leſſe, and Greece before Italy, Italy before Gaule, and Gaule before Britaine. The conſideration whereof is moſt delectable, in that the higheſt Creator, had joyned regions, and withall diſperſed the Iſlands ſo, as their is no ſuch great diſtance betweene any of them, but that even thoſe which lie fartheſt off, may from ſome one neere adjoyning, be ſeen and plainly as it were diſcerned by the eie. And for no other purpoſe was this done, but that the nations when they ſhould over-abound, might diſcover and deſcribe ſome places to paſſe unto and disburthen themſelves, ſo long, untill the univerſall world were to the glory of the Creator repleniſhed with Inhabitants every where. Wee ought therefore to bee perſwaded, that the ancient Gomerians of Gaule (now France) either chaſed away by the purſuit of others, or caſt out for leſſening of the multitude, or elſe inflamed with a deſire to travell and ſee farre countries, (a thing naturally inbred in men) croſſed the ſea and came over firſt into this Iſle, which from the continent they were able to kenne. And it ſtands to verie good reaſon alſo, that every countrie received the firſt Inhabitants from places neere bordering, rather than from ſuch as were moſt disjoyned. For, who would not thinke, that Cyprus had the firſt Inhabitors out of Aſia next unto it, * Crete and Sicilie out of Greece neereby, and Corſica out of Italy a neighbour countrie: and, not to goe farre, Zeland out of Germanie the neereſt unto it, as alſo Iſland out of Norway, rather than from the remote tracts of Tartarie and * Mauritania? Gaules their neighbours, rather than either by the Trojans or Italians, the Alabns and Brutians, ſo farre diſtant and remoove: Neither doe writers fetch the originall and infancie (as it were) of the Britaines from any other place, than their neighbour country Gaul. The inner parts of Britaine, ſaith Cæſar, is inhabited of them, whom they themſelves report out of their records to have beene borne in the Iſland: the Sea coaſt, of thoſe, who upon purpoſe to make warre had paſſed thither out of * Belgium in Gaule, who all in manner carie the names of thoſe cities and States out of which they came thither, and after they had warred, there remained. For there were in Britaine like as alſo in Gaule, people named Belgæ, Atrebatii, Pariſi, Cenomanni, &c. Semblably Tacitus, Generally, quoth he, if a man conſider all circumſtances, it is moſt likely that the Gaules beeing neighbours, peopled the land of Britaine next unto them. Yea and Beda, one that among all our writers favoureth the truth, At the firſt, ſaith hee, this Iſland had thoſe Britaines onely to inhabite it (from whom alſo it tooke the name) who, by report, having ſailed out from the tract of Armorica into Britaine, challenged unto themſelves the South coaſts thereof. Now, he calleth the tract of Armorica, the ſea coaſts of * Gaule, oppoſite unto our Iſland. This alſo ſeemeth to make for our purpoſe, that Cæſar reporteth, How Divitiacus the Gaule even in his remembrance, held a good part both of Gaule and alſo of Britannie under his government; as alſo, (that which is of greateſt moment) Plinie among the maritime people, juſt over againſt Britaine, neere unto the County of Bullen, reckoned the * Britaines: like as Dionyſius after a more ancient writer than he, in theſe verſes,

And verily, that utmoſt point and angle of this * part,
Inhabite the Iberians, people of haughtie heart:
Neere Gebraltar, at Hercules his pillars cal'd of old,
Turning up the maine in length, what way the current cold
Of Northern Ocean with ſtrong tides doth interflow and ſwell,
Where Britaines, and thoſe faire white folke, the martiall Germans dwell.

For theſe words [where Britaines] ſeeme to have reſpect unto thoſe other, [Turning upon the maine in length] and Euſtathius, who did ſet forth his Commentaries upon this author, underſtandeth it of the Britons in Gaule, in theſe words, Τῶν δὲ Βρεττανῶν τῶν παρώνυμοι ἀπὸ τῶν ἐκεῖ Βρεττανίδες νῆσοι, that is, And of theſe Britons, the Iſles of Britaine over againſt them tooke their denomination. Howbeit, Avienus and Stephen in his booke of Cities, are of a contrarie mind. Moreover the ſame Religion was of both people obſerved; Among the Britaines, ſaith Tacitus, there is to bee ſeene in their ceremonies and ſuperſtitious perſwaſions an apparant conformitie with the Gaules. The Gaules, quoth Solinus, after a deteſtable manner of ſacred rites, not to the honor but rather to the injurie of religion, offred mans fleſh in their ſacrifices. That the Britaines did the very ſame, Dio Caſſius beſide others reporteth in his Nero. Both Nations alſo had their Druidæ, as Cæſar and Tacitus very ſufficient writers doe witneſſe. Concerning which Druidæ, let not the Reader thinke much to run over this whole paſſage out of Cæſar. The Druidæ are preſent at all Divine ſervice. The overſeers they be of publike and private ſacrifices, the interpretours alſo of their religious rites and ceremonies. To theſe a great number of younge men doe flocke for to bee taught, and thoſe doe they highly eſteeme and honour. For lightly they decide and determine all controverſies, as well publike as private: And in caſe any hainous fact bee committed, if there bee a murther or man-ſlaughter, if variance ariſe about inheritance, if ſtrife about the bounds of lands, they in their diſcretion judge of the matter; they appoint remards, they award penalties, and puniſhments. If any either private perſon, or body politike ſtand not to their Decree, they put them by all ſacrifices, as excommunicate. And this among them them is the moſt grievous puniſhment. They that be thus interdicted, are reckoned as godleſſe and moſt wicked perſons: All men decline from them, they avoid both meeting and talking with them for feare of taking harme by contagion from them. Neither have they the benefits of Law though they requeſt it, nor be capable of any office, though they ſue for it. Moreover, of all theſe Druides there is one Preſident, who hath the greateſt authoritie among them. When he is dead, looke who excelleth the reſt in worth and dignitie, he ſucceedeth him: But if there be many of equall eſtimation, choſen there is one by the voices of the Druides. Sometimes alſo they fall together by the eares, and take armes about this place of precedencie. Theſe Druides at one certaine time of the yeare hold a ſolemne Seſſion within a conſecrated place, in the marches of the Carnutes,* a countrey held to be the middle of all France. Hither reſort as unto the terme from all parts, as many as have any controverſies or ſuits in law: and to their judgements and decrees they yield obedience. Their learning and profeſſion is thought to have beene firſt found and deviſed in Britaine, and ſo from thence tranſlated into France: and now alſo in theſe daies they that deſire more exact knowledge thereof, goe thither for the moſt part, to be inſtructed therein. The Druides are wont to bee freed from warfare: neither with the reſt pay they tribute. Immunitie they have in exemption, as from war-ſervice, ſo from all other charges whatſoever. Thus, many there bee who being excited with ſo great rewards, and of their owne accord meete together at Schoole for to learne, and are thither ſent by their kinsfolke, friends and parents. There by report, they learne by rote a great number of verſes. And ſo they continue ſtill ſchollars for certaine yeares together; neither doe they thinke it lawfull to commit what they learne to writing; whereas otherwiſe in every thing almoſt, in publike alſo and private dealings, they uſe Greeke letters. This order they have taken, I ſuppoſe, for two reaſons: becauſe they would not have their doctrine divulged, nor their ſcholars by truſting to their written bookes, to neglect their owne memorie a thing incident lightly to moſt ſchollars; who preſuming upon the helpe of writings, uſe leſſe diligence in learning without booke, and as little in exerciſing their memorie. This one point principally they are deſirous to perſwade their ſcholars, That our ſoules are immortall, and after death paſſe out of one man into another; and by this meanes they ſuppoſe men, ſetting behind them all feare of death, are moſt of all ſtirred up unto vertue. Furthermore, concerning the ſtarres and their motion, touching the greatneſſe of heaven and earth, of the Nature of things, of the power and might of the immortall Gods, much diſpute they make, and as many precepts they give to youth. Whereupon Lucan in this wiſe ſpeaketh unto them:

Yee Prieſts alſo hight Druidæ, your ſacrifices leaw'd
And barb'rous rites, which were forlet in wars ſurceaſſe, renew'd.
Yee onely know, or yee alone know not the gods above

An Oke alſo in the Britiſh or Welch tongue is called Derw.

By what name ſoever theſe were knowne to their Celts or Britaines, it may ſeeme that this name of Druides came from a Greeke primitive head, to wit, δρῦς, that is, an Oke, for that they held nothing more ſacred than the Miſſelto of the Oke; whereupon Ovid writeth thus:

Ad viſcum Druidæ, Druidæ, cantare ſolebant.
To Miſſelto goe Druidæ, goe Druidæ, they did ſing.

as who commonly dwelt within Oke-groves, and celebrated no ſacrifice and divine ſervice without the branches and leaves thereof. But this, will Plinie more amply declare in theſe words of his: The Druidæ (for ſo they call their Diviners, Wiſemen and eſtate of Clergie) eſteeme nothing in the world more ſacred then Miſſelto, and the tree whereupon it groweth, ſo it bee an Oke. Now this you muſt take by the way; Theſe Prieſts or Clergie men chuſe of purpoſe ſuch groves for their divine ſervice, as ſtood onely upon Okes: Nay they ſolemnize no ſacrifice, nor celebrate any ſacred ceremonies without branches and leaves thereof: ſo as they may ſeeme well enough to bee thereupon named Dryidæ in Greeke. And in very deed, whatſoever they find growing to that tree, beſide the owne fruit, they eſteeme it as a gift ſent from heaven, and a ſure ſigne, that the God himſelfe whom they ſerve, hath choſen that peculiar tree. And no marvell; for Miſſelto is paſſing geaſon, and hard to be found upon the Oke: But when they meet with it, they gather it very devoutly, and with many ceremonies. Firſt, they principally obſerve that the Moone bee juſt ſix daies old: for upon that day begin they their moneths and new yeares, yea and their ſeverall ages, which have their revolutions every thirtie yeares, becauſe ſhee is thought then to bee of great power and force ſufficient, and is not come to her halfe light or end of her firſt quarter. It they call in their Language, All-heale, [for they have an opinion, that it healeth all maladies whatſoever.] Now when they are about to gather it, after they have duely prepared their ſacrifices and feſtivall cheere under the ſaid tree, they bring thither two young bullocks milke-white, whoſe hornes are then and not before bound up. This done, the Prieſt arraied in a ſurpliſe or white veſture, climeth the tree, and with a golden bill cutteth off [the Miſſelto] and they beneath receive the ſame in a white ſouldiers caſſock. Then fall they to kill the beaſts aforeſaid for ſacrifice, mumbling many oraiſons and praying, That it would pleaſe God to bleſſe this gift of his, to their good unto whom hee had vouchſafed to give it. Now this conceite they have of Miſſelto thus gathered, that what living creature ſoever, otherwiſe barren, drinketh thereof, it will preſently thereupon become fruitfull; alſo that it is a ſoveraigne counterpoiſon and remedie againſt all venom. So ſuperſtitious are people oftentimes in ſuch frivolous and fooliſh toies as theſe. Heereto accordeth well that Diodorus Siculus in the ſame ſenſe hath termed theſe Prieſts of the Gaules Σαρωνίδας, which word, (as they all know), who have skill in the Greeke tongue, betokeneth Okes. And Maximus Tyrius writeth thus of the Celts, i. the Gaules; That they worſhip Iupiter, whoſe ſymbole or ſigne, is the higheſt Oke. Furthermore, it may ſeeme to proceede from theſe Druides, that our Saxons (as we reade in Alfricus) called a Diviner or wiſe man in their language, Dry. Of theſe if you bee willing to learne more, I referre you to Mela, Lactantius, Euſebius De Præparatione Evangelica, and the Comedie Aululariа of Pſeudo-Plautus.

Bardi.

The Frenchmen or Gaules, had likewiſe among their religious perſons, the Bardi, who to the tune of the Harpe ſung Dities in verſe, conteining the famous exploits of brave and noble men. From whence it is that the ſame Lucan before cited ſpeaketh thus unto them.

Vos quoq; qui fortes animas, belló; peremptas,

Laudibus

Laudibus in longum, vates, dimittitis ævum,
Plurima ſecuri fudiſtis carmina, Bardi.

And yee the Poets, Bardi call'd, who knights redoubted priſe Praiſe-worthie moſt, that died in the field, and them doe eterniſe;
Pour'd foorth now many a verſe in ſong, and that in careleſſe wiſe.

And even thoſe alſo doe our * Britans ſtill at this day terme by the very ſame name: For them they call Bard, who beſides the exerciſe of that function, doe eſpecially addict themſelves to the skill of Heraldry, and the drawing of Pedigrees. But whether the Britaines in like manner as the Gaules, believed, That they were deſcended from Pluto, we have no record to lead us. Whereas the Gauls did for that * cauſe, determine and end all their ſpaces of times, by reckoning nights and not daies, ſo as the day might in order follow the night, the very ſame have our Britans obſerved. For, that which the Latines call Septimana, and two Septimana, they terme with-nos, that is, eight nights, and Pimthec-nos, that is, fifteene nights.

* Welchmen.

* That is, their deſcent from Pluto.

Likewiſe both peoples ſeeme to have framed unto themſelves, one and the ſame forme of Common weale and government. For, ruled they were not by one mans ſcepter: but right as Gaul, ſo Britaine alſo had many Kings. And even as the Gauls in caſes of greater waight and danger called an aſſembly of the whole nation and elected one chiefe governour: ſo did the Britaines alſo, as it may bee gathered out of theſe words of Cæſar, The ſoveraignty of command, and managing the warre, was by a common Counſell granted to * Caſſivelaunus.

Their Republique or common wealth.

* Caſſibolinus.

Neither were theſe two Nations unlike in manners, cuſtomes and ordinances. For to let this paſſe, that both of them were moſt warlike, and exceedingly given to ſlaughter: certaine it is, that in joyning of battels, and adventuring of dangers, they were one as forward as the other: as may appeare by Strabo, Tacitus, Dio, Herodian and others. For manners and conditions, ſaith Strabo, the Britans are in part like to the Gauls: and anon he addeth, In fight for the moſt part they be fierce and cruell like unto certaine Gauls. And Tacitus according with him, The Britans, ſaith he, that were not vanquiſhed by the Romans, remaine ſuch as the ancient Gauls were. And in another place, Next neighbours to the Gauls and like unto them be the Britaines.

Their Manners.

That the Britaines fought, armed after the Gauliſh faſhion, Mela doth report. The Britaines in their wars uſe a number of Chariots as Strabo writeth, like as ſome of the Gauls.

The manner was of the one people and the other, in time of warre to range their battels apart by ſeverall nations, that the diſtinct valour of them both might more evidently appeare. That the Gauls practiſed this, Cæſar witneſſeth in theſe words: The Gauls being divided by their ſundry cities and ſtates kept the fonds and paſſages. Which alſo Tacitus affirmeth of the Britaines in the battell of Carattacus, The nations ſtood by troops and companies before the fortifications.

The Gauls, ſaith Strabo, were of a docible wit, and apt to learne: as alſo the Britaines, whoſe wits Agricola in Tacitus preferred before the ſtudets of Gaul, as being now curious to attaine the eloquence of the Roman language, whereas they lately rejected the language.

The Gauls, Strabo reporteth to have been of an ingenuous nature and ſingle hearted: which Tacitus ſeemeth to note and obſerve in the Britans, writing that they are ready and willing to endure levies of men and mony, and all other burdens impoſed by the Empire, if wrongfull inſolences herein be forborne.

Cæſar reporteth, that the Gauls upon an unconſtant and variable mind that they carried, loved evermore change and alteration in the government: The Britains likewiſe, ſaith Tacitus, were variable, given to factions and ſiding. By meanes of this inconſtancie of the Gauls, which Cæſar more mildly calleth an Infirmitie, ſo great credulitie crept into their minds, that the credulity of the Gauls grew to be a proverbe, and one Poet hath written thus thereof:

Et tumidus Gallâ credulitate fruar:
And full of this conceit will I Make uſe of Gauls Credulitie.

Neither have our Britans as yet therein degenerated from them, who moſt readily give eare even to * Mileſian fables, and either through ſuperſtitious hope or like feare doe preſently believe moſt fooliſh propheſies.

* Old wives tales.

We read in Strabo, that the Gauls grieved exceedingly and tooke to heart the abuſe which they ſaw done unto their kinred. That there is the ſame Sympathie and fellow feeling in our Britans above all other nations, it is better knowne than can be uttered, and rife in every mans mouth.

The Gauls, as Cæſar recordeth, according as every one excelled others in noble birth and wealthy eſtate, ſo kept they about them a greater traine of ſervants and dependants, whom they called Ambacti: which was the onely grace, countenance, and port they carried. Neither know our Britiſh Noblemen or gentry of Wales at this day, any other ſhew of reputation: From whom, as it is thought, the Engliſh have learned to leade after them ſo great a retinue of followers and ſerving men: in which thing they have not long ſince out-gone all other in Europe.

Ambacti.

That the Britiſh buildings were in every reſpect ſutable with thoſe in Gaul, and compaſſed round about with woods, Cæſar and Strabo doe ſhew unto us.

The Gauls, as witneſſeth Strabo, ware chaines of gold, about their necks: and Bunduica the Britiſh Lady, ſaith Xiphilinus, had likewiſe a golden chaine, and was clad in a garment of ſundry colours. And where at this day is that ornament more in uſe than in this Iſle and among our Britans?

That Britans and Gauls both, adorned their middle finger with a ring Pliny doth report.

The ſame Strabo maketh mention of the Gauls, that they nouriſhed the buſh of their heads; and Cæſar teſtifieth that the Britans went with long haire.

It appeareth in many authors, that the Gauls uſed certaine garments which in their mother tongue they termed Bracha; that theſe were alſo common to our Britaines, this verſe of Martiall doth prove;

Bracha.

Quàm veteres Bracha Britonis pauperis:
Than Brachæ old of Briton poore.

I paſſe over that which Silius Italicus writeth of the Gauls:

Quinetiam ingenio fluxi, ſed primà feroces,
Vaniloquum Celtæ genus, ac mutabile mentis.
The Gauls though fierce at firſt, ſoone yield and hold not out, by kind;
A nation given to vanitie of words and change of mind.

Becauſe theſe qualities are common to moſt nations, I might adde hereto other particulars, wherein theſe people have jumped juſt together: but I feare me leſt malitious evill-willers would wreſt them to the detraction and ſlander of the ſaid nations. Beſides, that ſaying pleaſeth me exceeding well, All in a meane and within meaſure: and the argument perhaps which is drawne from common manners, may ſeeme not of the greateſt validitie.

Now are we come to the language, in which lieth the maine ſtrength of this diſputation and the ſureſt proofe of peoples originall. For no man, I hope, will deny, that they which joyne in communitie of language, concurred alſo in one and the ſame originall. And if all the hiſtories that ever were had miſcarried and periſhed; if no writer had recorded, that we Engliſhmen are deſcended from Germans, the true and naturall Scots from the Iriſh, the Britons of Armorica in France from our Britans; the ſocietie of their tongues would eaſily confirme the ſame: yea and much more eaſily, than the authoritie of moſt ſufficient Hiſtoriographers. If therefore I ſhall prove, that the ancient Gauls and our Britans uſed one and the ſelfe ſame language, then the very truth will of force drive us to confeſſe, that they had alſo the ſame beginning. Neither paſſe I what Cæſar hath written, that the Gauls were of divers languages: ſince that Strabo ſaith, They differed only in dialect. They did not all, quoth hee, every where uſe the ſame tongue, but ſomewhat, little though it were, it varied. But that the language of the old Gauls was all one with the Britiſh (unleſſe haply in varietie of dialect), Cæſar himſelfe doth ſhew, writing that the maner was of the French or Gauls who desired further knowledge in the discipline and learning of the Druides, to goe over into Britaine unto our Druids. Now seeing that they had no use of bookes, it stands to good reason, that in teaching they spake the same tongue that the Gauls did. Which Cornelius Tacitus more plainely affirmeth; the British speech, saith he, and the French or Gallish differ not much. Whence it is that Beatus Rhenanus, Gesner, Hottoman, Peter Daniel, Picardus, and all others that have subscribed and done honour to venerable antiquitie, are all become of this opinion: except some fewe who will have the Gauls to have spoken the German language. But least any man herein should cast dust in our eies, let us out of authors gather and conferre as many words as we can out of the old Gauls, as it were ship-planks caught up from a shipwracke (seeing that the said tongue is now even drowned under the waves of oblivion.) For very many words we shall see not hardly nor violently strained, but passing easily, and in manner without any wresting, to agree with our British, both in sound and sense. I have made use in these words of William Salisburies Glossarie, and another old Manuscript.

Divona Celtarum lingua fons addite Divis:

Thou fountaine added to the Gods in Gallish Divona hight.

witnesseth, that Divona in the French language signifieth, Gods fountaine. Now doe our Britaines call God, Dyw, and a Fountaine, Vonan: of which is compounded Divonan, and by the Latine Analogie, and for the verse sake, Divona. * That is, Welchmen.

That Jupiter, whom the Greekes, of Thunder call Βροντάιος, and the Latines Tonans, that is, Thunderer was worshiped of the Gaules under the name of Taranis, there bee writers, not a few that have reported. But Taran with the Britaines betokeneth Thunder. In which signification the Germans seeme to have named Jupiter, Thonder: For Jupiters day or Thursday, they call Thonderdach, which is as much, as The Thundererś day. Taranis.

The Gauls had another God, by Lucane named Hesus, and by Lactantius Heus, whom also the Author of Queroli termed Annubis latrans, that is, Barking Annubis; for that, painted he was in the forme of a Dog; and Huad with our welch Britaines betokeneth a Dog. Hesus.

Most certaine it is that the Gauls worshipped Mercurie under the name of Teutates, as the Inventors of Arts, and guide of their journeys: And Diw Taith in the British or Welch tongue, is as much as the God of Travelling: And that Plato in his Phædrus and Philebus calleth Mercurie Theut, I am not ignorant. Howbeit I know there be some, who will have Teutates to be the same that the Germans called Tuisco in Tacitus, and is all one with Mars; as also that we the of-spring of Germans name thereupon Mars day, Tuisday. Concerning these three Gods of the Gauls, take with you, if you please, these three verses of Lucane, Teutates. Tewsday or Tuisday.

Lib. 1.

Et quibus immitis placatur sanguine diro
Teutates, horrensq; feris altaribus Hesus, Et Taranis Scythicæ non mitior ara Dianæ.

And they that use with cursed bloud their Idol-gods to please,
Teutates fell, and Hesus grim, whom nought else may appease
But sacrifice of humane flesh: and Taranis likewise, Worship'd as curst Diana is, just after Scythicke guise.

That the foule Spirits named Incubi, were of the Gauls termed Dusii, because they practise that filthy uncleanesse of theirs continually, Saint Augustine and Isidorus both doe testifie: But that which is continuall and daily, the Britains still doe expresse by the word Duth. Dusii.

Pomponius Mela writeth, That the religious women attending upon a certaine God, whom the Gauls worshipped, counted holy votaries of perpetuall virginitie, were called of the Gauls, Senæ, or Lenæ rather I would read if I durst. For, such consecrated Virgins, whom now folke name Nuns, the Britans, as it is an old Glossarie, termed Leanes: whence a most ancient Nunnery, Lean-minister, now called Lemster, drew the name. Lenæ.

Gessate. The Gaules, saith Polybius, in their owne tongue called their mercenarie souldiers Gæssata: and at this day the Welsh-Britains doe call their hired servants Gwessin.

Gessi. Valiant men were, as Servius saith, named of the Gaules Gessi: and Gwassdewr among the Britains importeth the same that in Latin, Vir fortis & strenuus, that is, a valorous and hardie man.

Gessum. Hitherto may bee referred Gessum, which was a weapon proper to the Gaules, as Pilum to the Romans, and Framea to the Germans. But of this, anon.

Caterva. As Phalanx was properly the Macedonians Legion, so was Caterva peculiar to the Gauls, as we may see in Vegetius. Neither is this word grown out of use with the Britains, who use to call a troupe Caturfa, and war Kad, and the strength of war which lieth in a Legion Kaderne, yea and Caterna, as is found in some Copies of Vegetius.

Cateia. To this Kad, may well be reduced Cateia, which was a kind of warlike weapon among the Gauls, as Isidorus reporteth.

Gessa. Gessa, a Gaulish weapon, Servius doth interpret to be a mans speare, whereunto the British Cethilou seemeth to come neere, which Ninnius expoundeth to be as much as Stakes burnt at the end, and a warlike seede or generation.

The Gauls whom Brennus marched with into Greece, named in their owne language that order of Horse-fight which consisteth of three horses [in a ranke] as saith Trimarcia. Pausanias, Trimarcia: For a horse they called Marca: which in that very signification is meere and British. For Tri signifieth three, and March an horse.

Thireos. Pausanias in the same booke recordeth, that the Gauls termed their owne country-shields Thireos: which even to this day the Britans name Tarian.

Ceios. Cæsar hath in his Journals or Day-bookes writen, as Servius saith, That he in Gaule being caught up of the enemy, and armed as he was carried upon his horse backe, one of his enemies that knew him chanced to meete him, and insulting over him said, Cedos Cæsar: which in the Gauls tongue is as much as Let goe Cæsar: now, among the Britans Geduch betokeneth as much.

Rheda. Rheda, a Gaulish word, is of the same signification, saith Quintilian, that Caruta, that is, a chariot, or waggon, among the Latins. This word the British tongue doth not now acknowledge: howbeit, that it hath been in use among the Britans, Rhediad for Rhediad. a course, Rheder to run, and Rhedecfa a race, doe plainly shew: which words that they spring from the same stocke, no man need to make doubt. And what absurditie were it from hence to derive Eporedia, a City of the Salassians, which Pliny writeth, tooke Eporedia. that name of Horse-breakers.

Covinus. Another kind of waggon a charriot there was, used of both these people, which by one name they called Covinus, and the driver Covinarius. And albeit this word together with that kind of waggon it selfe be quite growne out of use, yet the primitive thereof, as I may so say, remaineth still among the Britains: in whose language the word Cowain signifieth to carry or ride in a waggon.

Essedum. Essendum likewise was a Gaulish waggon or charriot rather, meet for the warres: which together with Cæsar, Propertius attributes to the Britans in this verse, Essedacælatis siste Britanna jugis.

Stay there your British charriots with yokes so faire engrav'n.

Circius. Circius is a wind by name passing well knowne, unto which Augustus Cæsar both vowed and also built a temple in Gallia. That the word is Gaulish, Phavorinus a Gaulois borne declareth in Agellius. Our Gauls, saith he, call the wind blowing out of their land, and which they find to be most fell and boisterous, by the name of Circius, of the whirling and whistling, I suppose, that it makes. Of all winds this is known to be most blustering and violent: now, Cyrch, with the Britans betokeneth force and violence, as may be seene in their Letany.

Penninum. The Pennine Alpes, which Cæsar calleth the highest Alpes, had this name imposed upon them, as Livie writeth, not of Annibal Pœnus, that is the Carthaginian, but of that Hill which with the highest top among the Alpes the Mountainers of Gaule consecrated and named Penninus. But Pen with the Britans even in these daies signifieth the tops of hils: whence the highest mountaines that we have, to wit, Pen-mon- mawr,

maur, Pendle, Pen Pencoh-cloud, and Pennigent gat their names. Neither have the high mountaines Apennini in Italy their name from ought els. Apennini.

The cities and States of Gaule coasting upon the Ocean, were called, as Cæsar writeth, after the custome of the Gauls, Armorica.

Aremoricæ: with whom the Britans accord in the same name for the same thing. For, with them Ar-more, is as much as by the sea, or upon the sea: And in the very same sense Strabo nameth them in Greek Αρμοριϰὴν.

In the raigne of Diocletian the Emperor, the rurall people in Gaule made a commotion. And to the crue of that faction of theirs they gave the name Bancadæ. And among the Britans, Swineheards and country gnoffs, be called Beichiad. Bancadæ.

The inborne theeves of the land, the Gauls, saith Sidonius, named Vargæ. And I have found in the Glossarie of the Cathedrall Church of Lhandaff, that theeves in the British tongue were in old time knowne by the name of Veriad. Vargæ. Lib. 4 Epist. 6.

The Allobrogæ, saith that ancient and excellent Scholiast upon Iuvenal, were so named, because Broga in French signifieth a land or Territorie, and Alla, another: As one would say, Translated out of another place. But Bro in British, is a region or country, and Allan, without, or externall: so that the Etymologie in both tongues, holdeth very well. Allobroges.

There is an herbe like to Plantain called in Gaule Glastrum, saith Plinie, wherewith the Britans died and coloured themselves, as writers testifie. This is the herbe which we terme Woad, and it giveth a blew colour: which colour at this day, the Britans terme Glasse. This was the Greeks Isatis, by the testimony of Plinie, and the Diars, vitrum, by the authority of Oribasius. Whereby, Pomponius Mela may easily be corrected, if in stead of Ultro, you put Vitro: where he saith thus, Britanni incertum ob decorem, an ob quid aliud, ultro corpora infecti, that is, whether the Britans died their bodies with woad for a beautifull shew, or in some other respect, it is uncertaine. Glastum. Woad. Isatis. Vitrum, an herbe. Lutum in Cæsar. Pomponius Mela corrected.

The Gallathians who spake the same language, as S. Hierome witnesseth, that the ancient Gauls did, had a little shrub called Coccus; of which that deep red skarlet colour was made: and this very colour the Britans usually name Coco. Coccus.

That Bracæ were garments common to French and Britains wee have shewed before. Diodorus Siculus calleth such, unshorne, or undressed and of sundry colours. And even now adaies the Britans terme foule and ragged clothes, Brati. Bracæ.

If Laina was an old Gaulish word, as Strabo seemeth to tell us, when he writeth thus, The Gauls weave them cassocks of thickned wooll which they call Lainas; the Britans are not gone far from them, who in their tongue name wooll Glawn. Laine.

Bardus in the Gauls tongue signifieth a Singer, Festus Pompeius is mine author: and this is a meere British word. Bardus.

Bardocucullus, as we are taught out of Martial and others, was the cloake that the Gaulish Bardi woore. And like as Bard, so the other part also of the foresaid word, remaineth whole among the Britans, who call such a cloake, Cucull. Bardocucullus.

Gaul, saith Plinie, yeelded a kinde of Corne of their owne, which they called Brance, and we Sandalum, a graine of the finest and neatest sort. Among the Britans likewise, meale of the whitest graine is named Guineth Urane. Brance.

The herbe which the Greekes, of five leaves doe call Pentaphyllon, was named of the Gaules Pempedula, as sheweth Apuleius. Now, Pymp in British, is five, and Deilen, a leafe. Pempedula.

As the Gaules by Pymp meant the number of five, so by Petor, foure, as wee learne out of Festus: who sheweth, that Petoritum was a chariot or wagon of the Gaules, so called of foure wheeles: and this word Pedwar in the British tongue signifieth foure. Petoritum.

Among wooden instruments, Canterium, in English a Leaver, was among the Gaules called Guvia, as Isidorus writeth: and novv the same in the British language, is named Gwif. Guvia.

Betulla, vvhich vve call Byrch, Plinie nameth a Gaulish tree. Hee vvould if he lived novv call it the British tree. For it groweth most plentifully in Britaine, and in the British tongue is named Bedw. Betulla.

Wine

Dercoma. Wine delayed with water, as we read in Athens, the Gaules called Dercoma: and among the Britans, Dwr, betokeneth water.

Ratis. And even ſo, (not to proſecute all that may be ſaid:) in Dioſcorides, the herbe Ferne, called in Latin Filix, and of the old Gauls, Ratis, is in the Britiſh tongue termed Redin. The Elder tree, in Latine Sambucus, in the old Gauliſh Scovies, is in Britiſh, Iſcaw. The herbe in Italy, Seratula, in old Gauliſh, Vetonica, the Britans and wee doe call Betany. That which in Plinie the Latines name Terræ adeps, that is, the fat of the ground, the Gaules Marga, is of the Britans called Marle. The white or bright marle, named of the Latines Candida Marga, of the Gaules Gliſcomarga, might of the Britans be termed Gluiſmarl: For Gluys, with them is as much as Bright or ſhining. A three-footed ſtoole, which the Latines name Sellula Tripes: the Gauls, as wee read in Sulpitius Severus, Tripetia, is among the Britans termed Tribet. That which the Latines meane by Centum pedes, that is, a hundred foot, the Gaules in Columella underſtand by Candetum, and the Britans by Cantreed. A Birds bill, in Latine Avis roſtrum: the Gaules, as we read in Suetonius, called Becco, and the Britans name Pic.

Scovies. Vetonica. Marga. Gliſcomarga. Tripetia. Candetum. Becco.

Neither ſhould I bee as fancy-full as Goropius, if I reduced Suetonius his Galba, which ſignifieth exceeding fat, to the Britiſh word Galuus, that betokeneth, paſsing big: or Bulga in Valerius Flaccus for a leather Budget, unto the Britiſh Butſiet: or the Soldurij in Cæſar, put for men * Devoted, unto the Britans Sowdiws: or Plinie his Planarat, for a plough, unto Arat, which in the Britiſh tongue ſignifieth a plough: or Iſidorus his Taxea for Lard, unto the Britans Tew, or Diodorus Siculus his drinke called Zithum, unto their Sider, or Cerviſia, unto Keirch, that is, Otes, whereof the Britans in many places make that drinke (or rather to Cwrwf) which we in Engliſh terme Ale.

Galba. Bulga. Soldurij. * Vowing to die and live one with another. Planarat. Taxea. Sithum. Cerviſia. Ale, a drinke.

That all theſe were the ancient words of the ancient Gaules, appeareth evidently out of thoſe Authors; and you ſee how fitly they for the moſt part agree and accord as it were in conſent with our Britiſh words, in ſound and ſenſe both.

The Terminations or Ends of places Names.

Hereunto thus much moreover may be added, that ſeeing the ancient names of places end with both people in the ſame termination, to wit, in Dunum, Briva, Ritum; Durum, Magus, &c. it may be gathered that theſe were not divers nations. And even from hence verily a ſound reaſon may be drawn, that we Engliſhmen are ſprung from the Germanes, for that the later and more moderne names of our townes end in Burrow, Berry, Ham, Steed, Ford, Thorp, and Wich, which carrie a juſt and equall correſpondence unto the terminations of the Dutch townes; Burg, Berg, Heim, Stadt, Furdt, Dorp, and Wic.

Againe, the reaſon of certaine old Gauliſh words may bee ſo fitly given out of our Britiſh tongue, the property and nature of the thing agreeing alſo thereunto, that of neceſſity we muſt confeſſe, either they were names impoſed by the Britans, or els the Britans ſpake French. But let it ſuffice to alledge one or two for all.

Celtæ. The third part of Gaul, ſaith Cæſar, they inhabite, who in their owne language be named Celtæ, and in ours Galli, but of the Greeks Gallathæ. But whence they were called Celtæ and Gallathæ the beſt learned of all the French, could never as yet tell: But let them conſider and ſee, whether it come not of the Britiſh word Gualt, which even yet among the Britans betokeneth the haire or buſh of the head, as alſo Gualtoc, that ſignifieth Comata, that is, with long haire: whereof it may ſeeme that Celtica, Gallathæ, and Galli, are termes mollified by variety of pronuntiation. Now that the Celtæ were called Comati, of their long haire which ſtudiouſly they cheriſhed, all learned men doe joyntly grant: and as for the letters, C. and K. Q. and G. how ſhould one (conſidering their force and native ſound) put a difference betweene them?

Lipſius, de Pronuntiatione. pag. 96.

* Garumna. That the famous and noble river * Carunne in France carrieth a ſwelling ſtreame, and as if the waves were angry and chaſed, whereupon Poets name it with theſe attributes, Validus, Aequoreus, and Rapidus Garumna, that is, the ſtrong, ſealike, and ſwift Garumna, it is ſo well knowne as nothing more: And all that doth Garw in the Britiſh tongue import.

* Arar. The river * Arar paſſeth marvellous gently, ſo as by the eie uneth it can be diſcerned which way the ſtreame goeth, whereupon the Poets give theſe Epithets unto it,

Araris

Araris tardior, and Lentus Arar, that is, Slow and Still Arar. But Ara with the Britans betokeneth Still and Slow.

Rhodanus, into which Arar doth fall, runneth downe amaine with an exceeding ſwift, and violent current: and therefore it is termed, Incitus, Celer, and Præceps, that is, ſwift, quicke, running headlong: Which name, Rhodanus, diſagreeth not much from the Britiſh Rhedec, that ſignifieth a ſpeedineſſe in running. Rhodanus. Rhoſne.

That the Hils * Gebenna runne out farre into Gaul, in manner of a long continued ridge, Strabo and others doe make mention. And that Keven among our Britaines ſoundeth as much as the backe or ridge of an Hill, appeareth by the Britiſh Dictionarie: and I my ſelfe have ſeene a long chaine of hils in Yorke-ſhire, which the Inhabitants there doe call the Kivin. Gebenna. * Montagnes de Avergne or Cevenna.

Conſidering that ſtones were in old time erected in Gaul by the high waies ſide, at the diſtance juſt of every * thouſand and five hundred paces: ſee it alſo that the Gaul-like Leuca, or League, containeth, as Jornandes writeth, juſt ſo many paces; and Leach in the Britiſh tongue betokeneth a Stone, I would have the learned Frenchmen ſay, whether the ſaid Leuca tooke not that name thereof. About the Sea ſide of that part of France, which was called Narbonenſis, where (as the fabulous report goeth) Hercules and Albion fought together, there lie ſo many ſtones every where all abroad, that a man would verily thinke it had rained ſtones there: whereupon writers name it, the Stonie Strond, and ſtonie field: The French in theſe daies call it Le Craux. And yet they know not the reaſon of this name. But Stones in the Britiſh tongue, be termed Craig. * Mile and halfe. Leuca. Stony Strond, or ſtonie field.

They that heretofore inhabited the maritime tract of Gaul, which is next unto us, were in their owne language called Morini: and ſeeing that the Sea is named Mor in Britiſh, it ſeemeth that thereupon they were ſo termed. For the Britans call ſuch as dwell upon the Sea coaſt Morinwyr: like as Aremorica betokeneth long ſince in Gauliſh, and now in Britiſh, By the Sea ſide. Morini.

Thus Arelate a moſt famous citie of Gaul, ſeated in a moiſt and waterie ſoile, may ſeeme to have taken that name of the very ſcite thereof: For Ar in Britiſh ſignifieth Vpon, and Laith, Moiſture, * Arles. Arelate.

Vxellodunum, ſaith Cæſar, was a towne having on every ſide a ſteepe acceſſe unto it, and ſcituate upon an high Hill. But Vchell among the Britaines is as much as ſteepe or loftie, and Dunum with the ancient Gaules, betokeneth a high place or hill: as Plutarch hath taught us out of Clitiphon, in his booke of Rivers: and the ſame was alſo in uſe among the old Britaines. * Cadenac in Quercy or Toul-dun. Vxellodunum. Dunum.

The Promontorie * Cithariſtes, Plinie placeth in Gaul neere unto Marſiles, where now is ſeene the towne Tolon: but if you aske our Welſh Britains, what is Cythara, in their language, they will tell you by and by Telen. Cythariſtes. * That is, an Harpe.

Againe, that no doubt may herein bee left behind, ſeeing it is evident that the late French tongue is come from the Latine and Germane, yet ſo as therein nevertheleſſe there remaine very many words ſtill of the old Language: I have heard of thoſe that be skilfull in both tongues, that very many of thoſe French words, which cannot be reduced, either to the Latine or German Originall (and therefore may be thought of the old Gallique) doe come as neere unto the Britiſh as is poſſible. As for example, the French men at this day uſe Guerir, and the Britans Guerif for To heale. The French ſay Guaine, the Britans Gwain, for a ſheath: The French, Derechef, the Britaines Derchefu, for againe: The French Camur, the Britaines Cam, for crooked: the French Bataeu, the Britaines Bad, for a Boat: the French Gourmand, for an over-great eater, the Britans Gormod, for Overmuch: the French Baſton, the Britans Paſtwn, for a ſtaffe or cudgill: the French Accabler, the Britans Cablu, for to oppreſſe: the French Haure, the Britans Aber, for an Haven: and Comb is ſtill uſed of both the nations for a Valley. There are of this ſort very many more, which haply the Reader may diſtaſte, although they ſerve eſpecially for this purpoſe now in hand.

But whereas Tacitus writeth, that the people of the Aeſtii, uſed the faſhions and habit of the Suevians, but in language came neerer to the Britans, that maketh nothing againſt

my

my Aſſertion. For the Languages moſt remote, in ſome points agree. And of late Augerius Busbequius, Embabſſadour from the Emperour to the great Turke, hath obſerved many Dutch and Engliſh words in the Biland Taurica Cherſoneſſus.

Epiſt. 4.

Hereupon it may be concluded, that the ancient Gauls Inhabitants of the country now named France, and Britaines of this Iſle ſpake one and the ſame language: and by neceſſary conſequence the originall of the Britaines is to bee reduced unto the Gauls. For we muſt confeſſe, as I ſaid before, that France or Gaul was peopled before Britain, as lying neerer unto Armenia: and as it was plentifull in corne, ſo, by the teſtimony of Strabo, more fruitfull of men: Seeing alſo, that the Gauls ſent out and planted their colonies all abroad, in Italy, Spaine, Germanie, Thracia and Aſia: much more then by all reaſon and congruitie in Britan ſo neere, and no leſſe plenteous than the reſt. Neither can it chuſe but make for the Britaines reputation even in the higheſt degree, to have derived their beginning from the ancient Gauls, who in martiall proweſſe have ſurpaſſed all others: with whom the Romans for many years maintained war, not about ſuperioritie in glory, but for the very main-chance of life and living: and who (to uſe the Poets words rather than mine owne)

And grew there to a nation new, extending cloſe unto

Neither muſt we here paſſe over in ſilence thoſe reaſons which others have alleaged to prove the Britans firſt riſing from the Gauls. George Buc, a man both well deſcended and well learned, obſerveth out of Mekercus, that the Germans call a French man Wallon: And when the Saxons of Germany came hither, and heard the Britaines ſpeake Gaul-like, they termed them Walli; that is, Galli, that is to ſay, Gaules. Buchananus ſaith moreover, that [Walch] doth not ſimply among the Germans ſignifie a ſtranger, but rather in a better ſenſe, a Gaul. And withall, he noteth thus much, that the French at this day doe name that country Galles, which we call Wales: alſo, that the ancient Scots divided all the Britiſh nations into Gaol, and Galle, that is to ſay, after his Interpretation, into the Gallæci and the Galli.

But if our Britans will needs be deſcended from the Trojanes, they ſhall not verily have me to gaineſay them: and yet ſhall they in mine opinion aſcribe their originall to the Trojanes beſt of all, by the old Gauls. For ſome ſay, as we reade in Ammianus, that ſome few who after the deſtruction of Troy fled, poſſeſſed themſelves of Gaul at that time void and unpeopled. But when wee thus conſider theſe languages, we cannot but highly admire and ſet forth, the divine goodneſſe of the moſt high Creatour toward our Britaines, the poſteritie of that ancient Gomer: who although the Romans, Saxons and Normans have ſubdued them and triumphed over them, yet hitherto have they they preſerved their old name and originall language ſafe and ſound: notwithſtanding the Normans ſought to aboliſh the ſame even by their lawes enacted for that purpoſe. Inſomuch as an old Britan, one of their nobilitie being demanded of Henry the ſecond, King of England, what he thought of the Britans power and the Kings warlike preparation made againſt them, anſwered not impertinently after this manner; This Nation, qnoth he, O King, may now by the aſſaults of your ſelfe and others be moleſted, and for the moſt part deſtroied or weakned, like as heretofore and oftentimes it hath been. But, be the diſpleaſure of man what it will, unleſſe the wrath of God concur withall, it will never bee utterly waſted and conſumed. Neither ſhall any other nation or language elſe, (as I ſuppoſe) anſwer in the ſtraight day of judgement before that ſupreame Iudge (for this angle of the World) what ever may happen furthermore, than the Welſh, that is, the Britiſh nation. Giraldus in his Topography of Wales.

THE NAME OF BRITAINE.

BVt you will ſay, If Cumero be the primitive name of the Inhabitants, whence comes Albion, whence comes Britaine? which name hath ſo growne in ure that in ſome ſort it hath cauſed the other to be quite forgotten. But heare, I pray you, that, whereof I am moſt aſſured, becauſe it is moſt true. As the ſelfe ſame things, may be conſidered by divers circumſtances, ſo they may be called alſo by ſundry appellations, as Plato teacheth in his Cratylus: if you run over all particulars ſeverally both new and old; you ſhall find, that every nation was of others called by divers names, from thoſe that they themſelves uſed. Thus they that in their native tongue had Iſraelites to their name, according to the Greeks were called Hebrewes and Jewes, and by the Egyptians Hueſi, as witneſſeth Manetho; becauſe they had Heardmen for their governours. So the Greeks named them Syrians, who, as Joſephus writeth, calleth themſelves Aramæans. They that named themſelves Chuſians, were by the Grecians of their blacke faces called Ethiopians. Thoſe which after their owne ſpeech were named Celtæ, the Greekes termed Galatæ, of their milke-white colour, as ſome would have it, or of their long buſh of haire, as I ſaid erewhile. So, they that nominated themſelves after their own language Teutſch, Numidians and Hellenes, by the Romans were named Germans, Mauri and Grecians. Even ſo in thoſe daies, (not to ſpeake of many other), they which in their owne Idiome are called Muſelmans, Magier, Czecchi and Beſermans, are by all nations in Europe named Turkes, Hungarians, Bohemians, and Tartarians. And even wee our ſelves in England, called in our naturall ſpeech Engliſhmen, are named by the * Britaines, Iriſhmen and the high-land Scots, Saſſon, that is to ſay, Saxons. By the ſame reaſon we are to deeme, that our anceſtours, which termed themſelves Cumero, were upon ſome other cauſe either by themſelves or others, named Britaines: From whence the Greekes framed their Βρεττία, and delivered the ſame as it were from hand to hand unto the Romans. This ground being laid let us enquire now into the names of our Iſland. * Welchmen.

As for the name Albion I paſſe not much, conſidering that the Greekes gave it to this Iſle for difference ſake, ſeeing that all the Iſlands bordering round about it were called Britaniſh and Britaines. The Iſland Britaine ſaith Plinie, renowned in the Greek records and ours both, lieth betwixt North and Weſt over againſt Germanie, France and Spaine, but with a great diſtance betweene them, they being the greateſt parts by far of all Europe. Albion it had to name when all the Iſles adjacent were called Britannies. Whereupon Catullus writing againſt Cæſar ſaid thus; Albion. Britannia.

Him Gaule doth feare, him Britaine dreads.

Who alſo in the ſame traine of verſes, calleth it the utmoſt Iſle of the Weſt. And it may ſeeme that this name Albion, ſprung from the vanitie, the fabulous inventions, and that unconſtant levity of the Greeks in coining of names, which they themſelves termed ἀπὸ τοῦ παρόντος. For ſeeing they have in fabulous wiſe named Italy Heſperia of Heſperus Vide Ioſeph. Scalig. in Catul.

Heſperus the ſonne of Atlas; France Gallatia of a ſonne of Polyphemus: I cannot otherwiſe believe, but that in the ſame veine alſo of fabling they called this Iſland Albion, of Albion Neptunes ſonne: which thing Perottus and Lilius Giraldus have put downe in writing. Unleſſe a man would derive it rather of Ἀλφὸς, which, as Feſtus witneſſeth, in Greeke ſignifieth White, whereupon the Alpes alſo have their appellation. For environed it is with white rocks, which Cicero termeth Mirificas moles, that is, wondrous Piles: and hereof it is that upon the coined pieces bearing the ſtampe of Antoninus Pius and Severus, Britaine is pourtraied ſitting upon rockes in womans habit. And the Britiſh Poets themſelves name it Inis wen, that is, The white Iſle. To ſay nothing of Orpheus in his Argonauticks, (if ſo be they be his), who called the Iſland next unto Hibernia or Irënis, that is, Ireland, which muſt needs be this of ours, Ἀλβιήϊον χθόνα that is, the white land: and which a few verſes before, he may ſeeme to have named Νῆσον ἀλβιήνατον, for ἀλβιήνατον. Fracaſtorius alſo writing how that peſtilent day-fever in Britaine, which commonly we call the Britiſh or Engliſh ſwet, hapned by occaſion of the ſoile, as if the ſame had ſtood much upon plaiſter, ſuppoſeth that this Iſland gat the name Albion of the ſaid plaiſteriſh ſoile. As for that pretty tale, how Albion was alſo called of Albina, one of thoſe thirtie daughters of Diocleſian the King of Syria, which at their very wedding ſolemnitie, ſlew their husbands, and being brought hither by ſhip without rower tooke poſſeſſion of this Iſland firſt, and conceived by ſpirits, brought forth a breede of giants, who can abide to heare it without indignation, as the moſt loud lie of ſome leaud loſſell?

The ſhape or pourtraicture of Britaine.

De morbis lan-guentibus lib. 1. Sweating ſickneſſe.

Neither is there any cauſe wherefore I ſhould ſo curiouſly ſearch, why Britaine, in that ancient * Parodia againſt Ventidius Baſſus, is named Inſula Cæruli, conſidering that it is compaſſed round about with the Ocean, which the Poets call Cærulus, and Cærulum. Whereupon Claudian of Britaine, writeth thus:

* A Canticle or Sonet, Inſula Cæruli.

——Cujus veſtigia verrit Cærulus——
——Whoſe feet the Azure Sea
Doth ſweepe.——

ROMANIA.

I paſſe over to ſpeake of Ariſtides, who named it The great, and the furtheſt Iſland. That it was called alſo Romania, Gildas after a ſort doth intimate, who writeth, that ſubdued it was of the Romans ſo, as that the name of Roman ſervitude ſtuck to the ſoile thereof: and by and by after, ſo as it might not be counted BRITANIA, but ROMANIA: and one or two pages after, ſpeaking of the ſame, The Iſland, quoth he, keeping indeed the Roman name, but neither their cuſtome nor law. And proſper Aquitanus in expreſſe words called it the Roman Iſland: heereto may bee referred alſo thus much, that when the Statutes of Tacitus and Florianus the Emperors were by lightning overthrowne, the Soothſayers anſwered out of their learning, that an Emperour ſhould ariſe out of their family, who among other things was to ſet preſidents over Taprobane, and to ſend a Proconſull to the Roman Iſland, which the learned underſtand of our Britaine, that was a Province * Præſidiall, and never Proconſular, as afterwards wee will declare. But that ſometime it was named Samothea of Samothes the ſixth Sonne of Iaphet, believe it who that will, for me. Out of whoſe ſhop and forge this comes, I wote full well: even from Annius Viturbienſis forſooth, who under a goodly title, as the manner is of craftie retailers, hath in the name of Berоſus publiſhed, and thruſt upon credulous perſons his owne fictions, and vaine inventions.

Vopiſcus in Florianum.

* Haply, governed by Preſidents. Samothea.

But touching the name and originall of Britaine, the truth by reaſon of the divers and ſundry wits of men is very doubtfull and wavering. In which point, that I may lawfully interpoſe mine owne conjecture, I will by way of Preface, beſeech our Britains to ſpeake and think favorably of me, that while they are deſirous to learne, they would be willing to pardon, and not debarre me of that courſe, which Eliot, Leland, Lhuid, and the reſt have taken. For if it was lawfull for Humfrey Lhuid a moſt learned Britain, without any prejudice at all to Brutus, (nay if hee were commended rather for it,) to derive the name of Britaine otherwiſe, than from Brutus; let it not bee imputed as a hainous offence unto me, who am unwilling to impugne the Storie of Brutus, Brutus, to deduce it from ſomewhat elſe, if I can. And that out of the very Britiſh tongue, and from nothing elſe, which as it is leaſt mingled with other languages, and withall moſt ancient, ſo in this ſearch it ſeemeth greatly to helpe and further us. For, ancient tongues are reputed paſſing neceſſarie, for the ſearching out of Originals: and Plato teacheth us, That the firſt names being through the long continuance of time growne out of uſe, are preſerved in barbarous tongues, as being more ancient than others. And although thoſe things ſo farre remote from all memory, are over-caſt with ſuch miſts and darkeneſſe, that the truth ſeemes rather to bee wiſhed than hoped for: yet for all that, will I doe my beſt to trace out the truth, and declare as briefly as I can, what my judgement is: not minding to put downe ought prejudiciall to any man, but moſt willing, if any one ſhall bring more probable matter to welcome and embrace the ſame. For I affect and love the truth not in my ſelfe more than in another, and in whom ſoever I ſhall ſee it, I will moſt willingly and gladly entertaine it. In his Cratylus.

Firſt, by the Readers good leave, I will take this for granted and proved, that ancient Nations in the beginning, had names of their owne: and that afterwards, from theſe, the Greeks and Latines, by wreſting them to the analogie or proportion of their ſpeech, impoſed names upon regions and countreys: to ſpeake more plainely, That people were knowne by their names, before regions and places, and that the ſaid regions had their denominations of the people.

Who can deny that the names of the Jewes, Medes, Perſians, Scythians, Almans French or Gauls, Betulians, Saxons, Engliſhmen, Scots, &c. were before Jewry, Media, Perſia, Scythia, Alamaine, France or Gaule, Betulia, Saxonie, England, Scotland, &c. And who ſees not, that theſe words ſprang out of the other? Of the Samnites, Inſubres and Belgæ, we reade that Livie and Cæſar firſt named the countreys themſelves * Samnitium, Inſubrium, and Belgium. * Or Sannitii.

Of the Franci in the time of Conſtantinus Maximus, as is to be ſeene in his coines, the place where they were ſeated took the name of Francia firſt: & from the Burgundi Sidonius Appolinaris firſt framed Burgundie. In the ſame ſort we muſt of neceſſitie think, that this our Iſland Britaine, tooke denomination from the Inhabitants, or from the Gaules their neighbours: That theſe firſt Inhabitants were called Brit or Brith, ſome things induce me to thinke: Firſt and formoſt, that verſe which goeth about, under the name of Sybilla: Brit.

Moreover, the authoritie of Martial, Juvenal and Auſonius. Procopius alſo, who nameth this Iſle Britta. In like manner the old Inſcriptions ſet up by the Britaines themſelves, wherein are read, Brito, Britones, Brittus. Coh. Britton. Ordinis Britton: and at Rome in the Church of Saint Mary the round Natione Britto: as alſo in this which is ſeene at Amerbachium in Germanie, which I will put downe here underneath becauſe it maketh mention of Triputium, a place in Britaine, not knowne.

* Centuriones.

BRIT. The Saxons alſo themſelves called the Britans in their language Bpitʒ, and Witichindas the Saxon every where namedth the Britans Britæ: ſo that the word BRIT is doubtleſſe the primitive, from whence Brito is derived, and from whence the firſt glympſe of light leading to the word Britaine, ſeemeth to appeare.

Conſidering now that Nations deviſed their names of that, wherein they either excelled others or were knowne from others: whether in regard of their firſt founders honour; as the Iönes of Javan, the Iſraelites of Iſraël, the Chananites of Chanaan the ſonne of Cham: or whether in reſpect of their nature, conditions, and inclinations; as the Iberi, after the Hebrew Etymologie, becauſe they were miners; the Heneti, for that they were ſtraglers; the Nomades, becauſe they gave themſelves to the breeding and feeding of Cattell; the Alemans or Germanes, for that they were eſteemed valiant men; the French or Frankners, for beeing free; the Pannonians, for wearing coats with cloth-ſleeves, as Dio conceiteth it: the Ethiopians of their black hue; and the Albanes, becauſe they were borne with white haire: whereupon, (marke I pray you) as Solinus ſaith, The colour of the haire upon the head gave name unto a people: Seeing alſo that our countrey men, who were (by a name common to them and their neighbours) called Cimbri and Cumeri, had no marke whereby they might bee diſtinguiſhed and knowne from the borderers, better than by that manner of theirs to paint their bodies: for the moſt ſufficient Authors that be, as Cæſar, Mela, Plinie, and the reſt doe ſhew, that the Britaines coloured themſelves with woade, called in Latine Glaſtum, (and Glaſſ at this day with them ſignifieth Blew.) What if I ſhould conjecture, that they were called Britans of their depainted bodies? For, whatſoever is thus painted and coloured, in their ancient countrey ſpeech, they call Brith. Neither is there cauſe why any man ſhould thinke this Etymologie of Britaines to be harſh and abſurd; ſeeing the very words ſound alike, and the name alſo as an expreſſe image repreſenteth the thing, which in Etymologies are chiefly required. For Brith and Brit, doe paſſing well accord: and that word Brith among the Britans, implieth that which the Britans were indeed, to wit, painted, depainted, died, and coloured, as the Latine Poets deſcribe them; and Ἀνάκυκλον, that is, having their backs pide, or medly coloured, as Oppianus termeth them.

Brith, what it is.

Cynegetic. lib. 1.

Neither will it be impertinent, (as ſmall a matter as it is) to note here, that as I have obſerved, in the names, of well neere all the moſt ancient Britaines, there appeareth ſome ſignification of a colour: which no doubt, aroſe from this kind of painting. The red colour is of the Britaines called Coch and Goch, which in my judgement lieth couched in theſe names, Cogidunus, Argentocoxus, and Segonax. The ſame Britaines call the blacke colour, Du, which after a ſort ſheweth it ſelfe in Mandubratius, Cartimandua, Togodumnus, Bunduica, Cogidunus. The white colour is with them named Gwin, the very prints, as it were, and expreſſe tokens of which word, me thinkes I ſee in Venutius and Immanuentius. Gwellw among them ſignifieth that, which Color aqueus among the Latines doth, that is to ſay, a wan or wateriſh colour: and this appeareth evidently in the names of Vellocatus, Caruillius and Suella. Glaſſ in the Britiſh tongue, is as much as Blew, which is ſeene in the name of King Cuniglaſius. For Gildas interpreteth it to be all one with Fulvus, or as ſome copies have Furvus Lanio, that is, a Lion tawnie, or coale blacke Butcher. Aure, which betokeneth a faire yellow or golden colour, bewraieth it ſelfe in Cungetorius and Arviragus. A lively and gallant colour is with them called Teg, which maketh ſome little ſhew in Praſutagus and Carattacus. But if we be perſwaded, that the Britans borrowed the names of mingled colours, together with the very ſimple colours themſelves of the Romans; for certaine it is that they tooke from the Romans, Werith, for Viridis, that is, Greene: Melin, for Melinus, that is a Quince yellow colour; then if I thinke that there lyeth cloſe ſome note of the colour Praſinus, that is, Leeke-blade-greene, in Praſutagus; and of the red vermillon or Sinopre colour, called of the Latins Minium, in the name of Acliminius, King Cinobelinus his ſonne, no man I hope will ſtand againſt mee. Moreover Rufina, that moſt learned Britiſh Lady, tooke that name of the colour Rufus, that is, ſad red: like as Albane the firſt martyr in Britaine of Albus, that is, White. And if any any one that is skilfull in the old Britiſh tongue, would examine the reſt of Britiſh names, which in the ancient Writers are not paſt foure or five more in all, wee may well ſuppoſe, that he ſhall find in thoſe names, as few as they be, ſome ſignification of a colour. Neither muſt we omit this obſervation, that the commoneſt names at this day among the Britans, Gwin, Du, Goch, Lhuid, were impoſed upon them, from the white, blacke, red, ruſſet, or tawny colour. So that now it may bee thought no ſuch wonder, that the whole nation it ſelfe, drew the denomination from painting: conſidering verily, that they in generall painted themſelves: and the very Inhabitants, both in times paſt, and alſo in theſe our daies impoſed upon themſelves their names, of Colours. But now to the matter, if haply, all this hath beene beſide the matter.

* That is, Welchmen.

This alſo is certaine, that in ſtories a Britaine is called in the Britiſh tongue Brithon. I care not for the note of aſpiration, ſeeing that the Britaines (who, as Chryſoſtome ſaith, had a hiſſing or liſping pronuntiation) delight in aſpirations, which the Latines have carefully avoided. Now, as Brito came of Brith, ſo did Britannia alſo in my opinion. Britannia, ſaith Iſidore, tooke that name from a word of the owne nation. For what time as the moſt ancient Greeks (and theſe were they that firſt gave the Iſland that name) ſailing ſtill along the ſhore, as Eratoſthenes ſaith, either as rovers, or as merchants, travailed unto nations moſt remote and disjoyned farre aſunder, and learned either from the Inhabitants themſelves, or elſe of the Gaules, who ſpake the ſame tongue, that this nation was called Brith, and Brithon; then they unto the word BRITH added TANIA: which, as we find in the Greek Gloſſaries, betokeneth in Greek, a region: and thereof they made a compound name Βριτανία, that is, the Britons-land, for which they have written falſe, Βρεττανία: But Lucretius and Cæſar, the firſt Latines that made mention thereof, more truely Britannia. That this is ſo, I doe the more firmely believe, becauſe that beſides our Britaine, a man ſhall not find, over the face of the whole earth above three countries of any account and largeneſſe, which end in the termination TANIA: and thoſe verily lying in this weſt part of the world, namely, MAVRITANIA, LVSITANIA, and AQVITANIA. Which names, I doubt not but the Greeks made and delivered to the Latines, as who firſt diſcovered and ſurveied theſe lands. For, of Mauri they framed Mauritania, as one would ſay, the countrey of the Mauri, which the home-bred people of that land, as Strabo witneſſeth, called Numidia: of Luſus the ſonne of * Liber, Luſitania, as it were, the land of Luſius: and Aquitania, perhaps ab aquis, that is, of waters, as Ivo Carnotenſis is of opinion, being a region ſeated upon waters: in which ſenſe, as Plinie writeth, it was before time named Armorica, that is, coaſting upon the ſea. As for Turditania and Baſtitania, names of ſmaller countries, they may hereto alſo be reduced, which likewiſe were in this weſterne tract, to wit, in Spaine, and may ſeeme to ſignifie as much as the regions of the Turdi and the Baſti. Neither is it a ſtrange and new thing, that a denomination ſhould be compounded, of a forrein and a Greek word, put together. Names are compounded, ſaith Quintilian, either of our own, that is, Latine, and of a ſtrange word put together, as Biclinium, that is, a roome with two beds or two tables: and contrariwiſe, as Epitogium, that is, a garment worne upon a gowne; Anticato, that is, a book written againſt Cato: or of two forrein words joyned in one, as Epirrhedium, a kind of wagon. And this maner of compoſition is moſt uſuall in the names of countries. Came not Ireland by compoſition of the Iriſh word Erin, and the Engliſh word Land? Did not Angleterre, that is, England, grow together of an Engliſh and of a French word? and did not Franclond (for ſo our Saxons named Francia or France) proceed from a French and Saxon word? Came not Poleland likewiſe from a Polonian word, which among them betokeneth a plaine, and a Germane? Laſtly, was not Danmarch compounded of a Daniſh word, and the Dutch March, which ſignifieth a bound or limit? But in ſo plaine and evident a matter I will not uſe any more words. Neither have we cauſe to wonder at this Greeke addition TANIA, ſeeing that S. Hierome in his queſtions upon Geneſis, proveth out of moſt ancient authors, that the Greeks inhabited along the ſea coaſts and Iſles of Europe throughout, as far as to this our Iſland. Let us read, ſaith he,

he, Varroes bookes of Antiquities, and those of Sisimus Capito, as also the Greeke writer Phlegon, with the rest of the great learned men, and we shall see, all the Islands well neere and all the sea coasts of the whole world, yea and the lands neere unto the sea, to have beene taken up with Greeke Inhabitants, who, as I said before, from the mountaines Amanus and Taurus even to the British Ocean, possessed all the parts along the sea side.

That the Greeks came to Britaine.

And verily, that the Greeks arrived in this our region, viewed and considered well the scite and nature thereof, there will be no doubt and question made; if we observe what Athenæus hath written concerning Phileas Taurominites (of whom more anon) who was in Britaine in the clx. yeare before Cæsars comming: if we call to remembrance the Altar with an Inscription, Vnto Vlysses, in Greek letters; and lastly, if we marke what Pytheas before the time of the Romans time, hath delivered in writing as touching the distance of Thule from Britaine. For who had ever discovered unto the Greeks, Britaine, Thule, the * Belgicke countries, and their sea coasts especially, if the Greeks ships had not entred the British and German Ocean, yea and related the description thereof unto their Geographers? Had Pytheas, thinke you, come to the knowledge of sixe daies sailing beyond Britaine, unlesse some of the Greeks had shewed the same? Who ever told them of Scandia, Burgos, and Nerigon, out of which men may saile into Thule? And these names seeme to have been better knowne unto the most ancient Greeks, than either to Plinie or to any Roman. Whereupon Mela testifieth, That Thule was much mentioned and renowned in Greek letters: and Plinie likewise writeth thus; Britaine an Island famous in the monuments and records both of the Greeks and of us. By this meanes therefore, so many Greek words have crept into the British, French, & withall, into the Belgicke or low-Dutch language. And if Lazarus Bayfius, and Budæus, do make their vant and glory in this, that their Frenchmen have beene of old φιλελληνες, that is, Lovers and Studious of the Greekes, grounding their reason upon few (French) words of that Idiome, which retaine some markes and tokens of the Greek tongue: if Hadrian Junius joyeth no lesse, because in the Belgicke words there ly covertly Greek Etymologies: then may the Britaines make their boast, in whose language many words there be derived from the Greeks. Howbeit, Sir Thomas Smith Knight, sometime Secretary to Queene Elizabeth, a man most learned every way, thinketh verily, that this hapned thereupon, for that when all Europe besides was much troubled and shaken with wars, very many of the Greeks flocked hither for refuge, as it were into a sanctuary.

Thus have you, as touching the Originall and name of Britaine mine error or conjecture, whether you wil, which if it swerve from the truth, I wish it were by the truth it selfe reformed. In this intricate and obscure study of antiquitie, it is thought praiseworthy, somewhat to erre: and remember we should withall, that such things as at the first sight being slightly thought upon are deemed false, after a better review and further consideration oftentimes seeme true. Now if any man should summon me to appeare before the Tribunall of Verity, I have no other answer at all to make. And as for our countrimen the Britans, such as be of the learneder sort, I doe most earnestly beseech and desire them to employ all their labour, industry, wit, and understanding in the searching out hereof, so lgog, untill at last, the truth with her owne cleare bright beames, may scatter and dissolve all mists of conjectures whatsoever.

THE MANERS AND CVSTOMES OF THE BRITAINES.

The Manners of Britaines.

AS concerning the Britaines, what Acts at the first they exploited, what forme of common-wealth they used, after what orders and lawes they lived, M. Daniel Rogers, a very good man, excellently well learned, and my especiall friend, promised in his writings to informe us: but for that he beeing cut off by untimelie death, hath performed nothing, take here these few notes as touching their ancient maners and customes collected word for word out of ancient authors.

Cæsar.

Cæſar. *The Britans uſe for their money, brazen pieces, or * rings of iron duly weighed and tried to a certaine juſt poize. To taſte of hare, hen, and gooſe, they thinke it unlawfull: howbeit, theſe they keepe for their delight and pleaſure. Of them all, theſe are moſt civill and curteous by far, that dwell in Kent, which is a country altogether lying upon the ſea coaſt: neither doe theſe Inhabitants differ much in cuſtome from the Gaules. The Inlanders for the moſt part ſow no corne, but live of milke and fleſh; and clad themſelves in skins. But the Britans all in generall depaint themſelves with * woad, that maketh a blew colour; and hereby they are the more terrible to their enemies in fight. The haire of their heads they weare long, and ſhave all parts of the body, ſaving the head and upper lip. Ten or twelve of them together uſe their wives in common, and eſpecially brethren partake with brethren, and parents with their children: but looke what children they beare, theirs they are reputed who firſt married them virgins. In battell for the moſt part,* they were wont to employ their chariotiers. Firſt theſe ride about into all parts of the battell, and fling darts: and with the very fearefull ſight of horſe, and with the ratling noiſe of the wheeles, they doe moſt part breake the rankes and put them in diſarray, and when they have once wound themſelves within the troopes of the horſemen, they alight from their chariots, and fight on foot. The chariot-guiders in the meane time depart a little out of the medly, and beſtow themſelves ſo, that if the other be overcharged with the multitude of enemies, they may readily and without let retyre in ſafetie. Thus in their battels, they performe the nimble motion of horſemen, and ſteadineſſe of footmen: by daily practiſe and experience ſo ready in their ſervice, that they were wont to ſtay in the declivity of a ſteepe hill their horſes being in their full carriere, quickly turne ſhort and moderate their pace, runne along the ſpirepole and beame of the chariot, reſt upon the yoke of and harneſſe of their ſteeds, and from thence leape againe into the chariots moſt ſpeedily at their pleaſure. Theſe charietiers would retire alſo many times of purpoſe, and when they had trained and drawne our men a little way off from their legions, diſmount from their chariots and encounter them on foot, having thereby the vantage of them in flight. Furthermore, they never fought thicke and cloſe together, but thinne and with great diſtance betweene, having ſet ſtations or wards of purpoſe, ſo as one might ſuccour another, receiving the wearied, and putting forth new and freſh ſupplies.

* Annulis. Some read, Laminis, that is, thinne plates.

* Luteo.

Eſſedarii.

The manner of their Eſſedaries or Charitiers fight.

Strabo. The Britans be taller of ſtature than the Gauls: their haire not ſo yellow, nor their bodies ſo well knit and firme. For proofe of their taleneſſe, I ſaw my ſelfe at Rome very youths and ſpringals, higher by halfe a foote than the talleſt man. Mary, they had but bad feet to ſupport them. As for all other lineaments of the body, they ſhewed good making and proportionable feature. For diſpoſition of nature they partly reſemble the Gauls: partly they be more plaine, more rude and barbarous; inſomuch that ſome of them for want of skill, can make no cheeſes, albeit they have plenty of milke: others againe, are altogether ignorant in gardening and planting of orchyards, yea and in other points of husbandry. Many Lords and Potentates they hove among them. In their warres they uſe a number of chariots, like as ſome of the Gauls. Woods ſtand them in ſtead of Cities and townes: for when they have by felling of trees, mounded and fenſed therewith a ſpacious round plot of ground, there they build for themſelves halles and cottages, and for their cattell ſet up ſtals and folds: but thoſe verily for the preſent uſe, and not to ſerve long.

Cæſar likewiſe. A towne, the Britaines call ſome thicke wood, which they have encloſed and fortified with a ditch and rampier, and made for a place of refuge and retrait, to avoid the incurſions of the borderers.

Diodorus Siculus. The Britans live after the manner of the old world. They uſe chariots in fight, as the report goes of the ancient Greeks at the Trojane war. Their houſes are for the moſt part of reed or wood. Their corne they inne and houſe with eare and all: threſhing out thereof from hand to mouth as their need requires. Faire conditioned people they are, plaine and of upright dealing, far from the ſubtiltie and craft of our men. Their food whereupon they live is ſimple, and nothing daintie nor like the full fare of rich men. Their Iſland is repleniſhed with people.

Pomponius Mela. Britaine bringeth forth nations and Kings of Nations, but they be all uncivill, and the farther they are from the continent, the leſſe acquainted they be with other kind of riches: onely in cattell and lands they be wealthy. Their bodies are died with woad, whether it bee for to make a gallant shew, or for what else, it is uncertaine. They pick quarels of warre at their pleasure to satisfie their owne wills, and so oftentimes molest one another: but principally upon an ambitious desire of rule and soveraigntie, and an encroaching mind they have to enlarge their owne possessions. Their fight is not only with horse or footmen, but also with wagons and chariots harnessed and armed after the Gaul-like manner, such as they call Covinos: and in those they use axeltrees armed at both ends with hookes and sithes.

Glaſto vel vitro. See before.

* France.

Cornelius Tacitus. *The Britans neerest unto * Gallia resemble likewise the Gaules: either because they retaine still somewhat of the race from which they descended, or that in countries butting one against another the same aspects of the heavens doe yield the same complexion of bodies. But generally, if a man consider all, it is most likely, the Gaules which lay neerest peopled the land unto them. In their ceremonies and superstitious perswations, there is to bee seene an apparant conformitie: The language differeth not much: Like boldnesse to challenge and set into dangers: when dangers are come, like feare in refusing: Saving that the Britans make more shew of courage, as beeing not mollified yet with long peace. For the Gaules also were once, as we read, redoubted in war, till such time as giving themselves over to ease and idlenesse, cowardise crept in, and shipwrack was made both of manhood and libertie together. And so is it also befallen to those of the Britans which were subdued of old: The rest remaine such as the Gaules were before. Their strength in the field consisteth of footmen. Yet some countries there, make war in wagons also. The greater personage guideth the wagon, his waiters and followers fight out of the same. Heretofore they were governed by Kings, now they are drawne by petty Princes into Partialities and Factions: and this is the greatest helpe wee Romans have, against those puissant Nations, that they have no common counsell. Seldome it chanceth that two or three States meete together and concur to repulse the common danger: So, whilst one by one fighteth, all are subdued.*

In another place. An usuall manner it was with the Britans to seeke for the direction of the Gods, by looking into the inwards of beasts: and to make warre under the conduct of women; neither mattereth it whether sex beare rule over them. Whereupon learned men thinke Aristotle spake of the Britaines, where he writeth, That certaine warlike nations beyond the Celtes, were subject to the government of women.

Politic. lib. 2. cap. 7.

Dio Nicæus, out of the Epitome of Xiphilinus, as touching the Britans in the North part of the Island. They till no ground: They live upon prey, venison and fruits. For of fish, although there is exceeding great plenty thereof, they will not taste: their abode is in tents, naked and unshod: Wives they use in common, and the children borne of them they all doe foster among them: the Comminaltie for the most part doth governe: most willing they bee to practise robbing. In warre, their service is out of Chariots: the horses they have be little and swift of pace: their footmen runne most speedily: whiles they stand, they bee strongest: the armour and weapons that they use, are a shield and short speare, in the neather part whereof, there hangeth a round bell of brasse like an apple, that when it is shaken, they might with the sound terrifie and maskre the enemies: they have daggers also. But principally, they can endure hunger, cold, and any labour whatsoever. For, sticking fast in the bogs up to the head many daies together, they will live without food; and within the woods they feed upon the barks and roots of trees. A certaine kind of meat they provide ready for all occasions, whereof if they take but the quantitie of a Beane, they are not wont either to be hungrie or thirstie.

Herodian. They know no use at all of garments, but about their belly onely and necke, they weare yron; supposing that to be a goodly ornament, and a proofe of their wealth, like as all other Barbarians esteeme of gold. For why? their very bare bodies they marke with sundry pictures, representing all manner of living creatures; and therefore it is verily, that they will not be clad, for hiding (forsooth) that painting of their bodies. Now they are a most warlike nation, and very greedy of slaughter, content to bee armed onely with a narrow shield and a speare, with a sword besides hanging downe by their naked bodies. Vnskilfull altogether how to use either corslet or helmet, supposing the same to be an hinderance unto them, as they passe over the bogs and marish grounds:

through the hot vapours ariſing, from whence the skie and aire is there moſt part foggie.

The reſt of the particulars, which are very few, I will lightly gather, and crop here and there. Plinie writing of Magicke: But what ſhould I (quoth he) rehearſe theſe things, in an art that hath paſſed over the Ocean alſo, ſo far, as beyond which, nothing is to be diſcovered but aire and water? And even at this day verily, it is in Britaine highly honoured, where the people are ſo wholly devoted unto it, and that with all compliments of ceremonies, as a man would thinke the Perſian learned all their Magicke from them. The Britans Art Magicke.

The ſame Plinie. There groweth an hearbe in Gaule like unto Plantine, named Glaſtum, that is, Woad, with the juce whereof, the women of Britaine, as well married wives, as their young daughters annoint and die their bodies all over; reſembling by that tincture the colour of Aethiopians, in which manner they uſe at ſome ſolemne feaſts and ſacrifices to goe all naked. Againe, Their is not a daintier diſh of meate known in Britain, than are the Chenerotes, fowles leſſe than wild geeſe. Alſo, The Britaines wore rings on their middle finger. Likewiſe, The Britaines manured their grounds with Marle in ſtead of dung. Glaſtum. Chenerotes. Brants or Soland geeſe.

That they inammelled or branded themſelves (as it were) with certain marks which Tertullian termeth Britannorum ſtigmata, that is, The Britans marks, Solinus ſheweth: The Countrey (ſaith he) is partly peopled with Barbarians, who by the meanes of artificiall inciſions of ſundry formes, have from their childhood divers ſhapes of beaſts incorporate upon them: and thus having theſe their markes deepely imprinted within their bodies, looke how a man groweth more and more, ſo doe theſe pictured characters likewiſe waxe. Neither doe theſe ſavage Nations repute any thing to ſignifie their patience, more than by ſuch durable skars to cauſe their limbs to drinke in much painting and colour. Their manner of painting.

Dio. The Britaines worſhipped as their Goddeſſes, Andate, that is, Victorie and Adraſte. Andates.

Cæſar and Lucan. Ships they had, of which the Keeles, the footſtocks alſo, or upright ſtandards were made of light timber: the reſt of the body framed of windings and Oyſier was covered over with leather. The Britans Navigation.

Solinus. How long ſoever they held on their courſe under ſayle, ſo long the Saylors forbare to eat. They uſed a drinke made of barley: and ſo doe wee at this day, as Dioſcorides writeth, who nameth Curmi wrong for Kwrw, for ſo the Britaines call that, which we terme Ale. Curmi.

Many of them together had but one wife among them, as Euſebius recordeth in Evangelica Præparatione 6.

Plutarch reporteth, That they lived one hundred and twenty yeares, for that the cold and frozen countrey wherein they dwelt, kept in their naturall heat.

But what thoſe ancient times of cruell Tyrants were, whereof Gildas writeth, I know not, unleſſe he meaneth them that in this countrey tooke upon them the ſway of government againſt the Romans, and were at that time called Tyrants: for ſoone after, he addeth thus much out of S. Hierome: Porphyrie raging in the Eaſt-parts as a mad dog againſt the Church, annexed thus much to his furious and vaine ſtile: Britaine (ſaith he) a Province plentifull of tyrants. Neither will I ſpeake of their ancient religion, which is not verily to be counted religion, but a moſt lamentable and confuſed Chaos of Superſtitions: For when Satan had drowned the true doctrine in thicke miſts of darkeneſſe, The ugly ſpectres of Britaine (ſaith that Gildas) were meere Diabolicall, exceeding well neere in number thoſe of Egypt: whereof ſome we doe ſee within or without deſert walles, with deformed lineaments ſtill, carrying ſterne and grim lookes after their wonted manner. The Tyrants of Britaine. The religion of the Britans.

But, whereas it is gathered, that the Britaines were together with Hercules at the rape of Heſione, and that, out of theſe verſes which they take to bee made by Cornelius Nepos, whiles he deſcribeth the marriage of Telamon and Heſione:

That is altogether poeticall, and I can cleerely by good evidences, as it were, under hand and seale prove, that the author thereof, was not, as the Germans would have it, Cornelius Nepos, but one Ioseph of Excester: who hath made mention of our King Henrie the second, and Thomas, Archbishop of Canterburie.

Brodæus Miscellan. lib. 3. cap. 4. Vlysses never in Britaine.

Whether Ulysses entred thus farre, whose arrivall in Caledonia, a certaine altar engraven with Greeke letters, as Solinus saith, hath testified, Brodæus maketh doubt: and I would judge, that erected it was rather in the honour of Ulysses, than by Ulysses himselfe: although they avouch Ulysses to bee the very same Elizza, that was Japhets sonne. For, apparant it is out of Histories, and alreadie I have said as much, that the most ancient Greeks undertooke long voyages by sea and land: no marvell then it ought to seeme, if their be also some names and monuments of theirs found in divers places. And often times they derived those names, not so much from their owne denominations, as from Worthies, who were held in as much reverence, if not more, among them, as were either Confessors or Martyrs among Christians. Like as therefore the names of Saint John, Saint Dominicke, Saint Francis, and infinite other Saints departed, are imposed upon new-found places, so also that it hapned time out of mind with the Greeks, who will denie? but who among all the worthies, made either more wandring voyages, or of longer continuance at Sea, than did Vlysses? No marvell then, if Sailers made vowes very often unto him above all others; and unto those places where they arrived and landed, did consecrate according to their vowes, names from him. Thus * Vlyssippo upon the mouth of the river Tagus tooke the name: and thus elsewhere other monuments of Vlisses, Laertes and their companions; which are not properly to be referred unto Vlysses as the founder: but wee must think, that by the Greeks who discovered strange and forraine coasts, they were dedicated in the honour of that Worthy, who of all others had travelled and seene most.

Whereas John Tzetzes in his Treatise intituled, Varietie of Stories, hath written, that our British Kings bestowed upon that renowned Cato the elder, who had perpetuall conflict with the manners of the Roman people, certaine presents for his vertues sake; let him make good and save his owne credit himselfe: yet thus much all the world knoweth, how that Writer is full fraught with fables.

King Alexander the Great, never in Britaine.

Neither would I have you believe, that Alexander the Great came out of the East Indies, to Gades, and so forward to Britaine, howsoever Cedrenus, maugre all other Historiographers, writeth thus: Ἐκεῖθεν δὲ ἐλθὼν Ἀραξιν καὶ τὰ Φᾶσιν καὶ τὰ Βρεττανικὰ ἔθνη καταλαβών, χελάνδια ὁλκάδας κατασκευασάμενος: that is, And from thence being come unto Phasis, Gades, and the British nation, and having furnished himselfe with a thousand hulkes &c. Of the same stampe is that also which Trithemius reporteth out of Hunnibald, that King Bassianus put away his wife, the King of the Orkneys daughter, in the 284. yeare before the birth of Christ, and thereupon he with the aid of the Britaines Kings, made warre upon Bassianus.

Hannibal never in Britaine.

Nor let any man thinke that Hanniball ever warred in Britaine, becaus wee read thus in Polybius in the Eclogues of his tenth Booke τοῦτο μὲν ἴσην, ὡς ὀλίγα, συλλελεμμένα τὰ Βρεττανικὰ εἰς πάνυ βραχεῖς τόπους ἐστίν. Thus much in briefe; now that Hanniball was encloſed within the streights of Britaine.

For the place is corrupt, and for Βρεττανικὰς it should bee read Βρεττανικὸς, as it is in Dio, booke 42. For in both places there is a speech of the Brutii in Italie. And yet I may not deny, but that about this time the Greeks came to our Iland. For, Athenæus in describing out of Moschion a most ancient author, that ship of Hiero, at the hugenesse and workemanship whereof all men wondred, reporteth, that the maine mast thereof was with much adoe found by a certaine swineheard in the mountaines of Britaine, and by Phileas Taurominites the Mechanick conveied into Sicilie. But I feare, lest the Criticks judge that the true reading here also should bee Βρεττανικὸς for Βρεττανικὰς, and likewise understand it of the Brutian mountaine in Italy.

Britaines with the Cimbri in their expeditions.

But it seemeth, that the Britaines were entermingled with the Cimbri and the Gaules in those expeditions which were made into Italy and Greece. For, besides the the name common to them both, it is recorded in a moſt ancient Britiſh Booke entituled Triadum, wherein mention is made of three mightie hoſts leavied from among the Britans, That a certaine forrain captaine leavied a marvellous puiſſant army from hence, which having waſted a great part of Europe, at the laſt ſat him downe and abode hard by the Greekiſh ſea (meaning perhaps Gallatia). That Brennus a King ſo famous in Greek and Latine writers both, was a Britan, there be that thinke they can eaſily prove. For mine owne part, thus much onely I know, that his name is not yet growne out of uſe with the Britans, who in their language call a King Brennin, whether in honorable memory of him I dare not determine. Certes, that Britomarus the militare captaine among them, of whom Florus and Appian ſpeake, was a Britan, the verꝛ name doth evince, which ſignifieth as much, as A great Britan. Neither will I wrey to my purpoſe for to make the ſaid Brennus a Britan borne, that place of Strabo, wherein he writeth, That Brennus was by birth a Prauſian. Ne yet dare I (whereas Ottho Friſingenſis writeth, That the Briones, a generation of the Cimbri, ſeated themſelves at the head of the river Dravus,) change Briones into Britones. And yet what dare not our Criticks doe now adaies?

Lib. 2. cap. 13.

But yet truely, to ſpeake my mind once for all: As the Romans for all they grew to that greatneſſe above others, were not for a long time knowne, either to Herodotus or to the Greeks; the Gaules alſo and the Spaniards for many yeares utterly unknowne to the old Hiſtoriographers: ſo, of this mind I have alwaies beene, that late it was ere the Greeks and Romans heard of the Britans name. For, that little booke, Of the World, which commonly goeth abroad under the name of Ariſtotle, and maketh mention of the Britans, of Albion and Hierne, is not ſo ancient as the time wherein Ariſtotle lived, but of later daies by far, as the beſt learned men have judged. Polybius verily, the famous Hiſtorian, who accompanying that noble Scipio travelled over a great part of Europe ccclxx. yeares or there about before Chriſts nativitie, is the ancient author, as far as I remember, that mentioneth the Britan Iſles, where hee writeth: Of the utmoſt Ocean, the Britan Iſles, the plenty of tynne, gold and ſilver in Spaine, old writers with different opinions, have reported much. But they ſeeme to have beene little more than by name may bee gathered by this hee writeth before in the ſame booke. Whatſoever, ſaith he, betweene Tanis and Narbo bendeth Northward, to this day there is no man knoweth: and whoever they be, that either ſpeake or write any thing thereof, they doe but dreame. And no leſſe may they ſeeme to do in theſe daies, who in a prodigall humour of credulitie are perſwaded, that Himilco beeing commanded by the State of Carthage to diſcover the Weſterne ſea-coaſt of Europe, entred into this Iſle many yeares before that time, ſeeing we have no records of the ſaid navigation, but onely a verſe or two in Feſtus Avienus. But why it was ſo late ere Britaine was knowne, the reaſon may ſeeme to be, partly the ſcite of the Iſland ſo remote and diſjoyned from the continent: and in part, for that thoſe old Britans, then barbarous as all other people in theſe parts, and living cloſe to themſelves, had no great commerce and traffique with other nations. And ſurely in this point Dio is of the ſame opinion. The ancienteſt, ſaith he, as well of Greeks as Romans knew not for certaine ſo much as that there was any Britaine at all: and thoſe of later times after them, made queſtion whether it were the maine or an Iſland: and much writing there was pro & contrà of both opinions, by thoſe who verily had no aſſured knowledge thereof (as who had neither ſeene the countrey nor learned of the native Inhabitants of what nature it was) but relied onely upon bare conjectures every one according to his time and diligence employed that way. But the firſt Latine writer to my knowledge, that made mention of Britaine, was Lucretius in theſe verſes concerning the difference of aire:

Late ere Britaine was knowne to the Greeks.

Lib. 3.

Nam quid Britannum cælum differre putamus,
Et quod in Aegypto eſt, quà mundi claudicat axis?

moſt mightie Prince of all Gaule governed Britaine. But this is to bee underſtood of maritime coaſts. For Cæſar himſelfe witneſſeth, that no part of Britaine, ſave onely the ſea-ſide, and thoſe countreys which lie againſt Gaule, was knowne unto the Gauls. Howbeit, Diodorus Siculus writeth, that Britaine had experience of no forreiners rule: for neither * Dionyſius, nor Hercules, nor any other Worthy or Demigod have we heard to have attempted war upon that people. Now Cæſar, who for his noble Acts is called Divus, was the firſt that ſubdued the Britans, and forced them to pay a certaine tribute.

Hiſtoricall.

From this time and no further off, muſt the writer of our Hiſtorie fetch his beginning, of his worke, if he throughly weigh with judgement what the learned Varro hath in times paſt written, and my ſelfe already heretofore ſignified: Namely, that there bee of times three differences: the firſt from the creation of man unto the Floud or Deluge, which for the ignorance of thoſe daies is called ΑΔΗΛΟΝ, that is, Obſcure & uncertaine: the ſecond from the Floud to the firſt Olympias, (being 3189. years after the Creation, and 774. before Chriſt) which in regard of many fabulous narrations reported in that time, is named ΜΥΘΙΚΟΝ, that is, Fabulous: the third from the firſt Olympias unto our daies, and that is termed ΙΣΤΟΡΙΚΟΝ, that is, Hiſtoricall, becauſe the Acts therein done, are contained in true Hiſtories. And yet I am not ignorant, that albeit the learned nations (ſetting aſide the Hebrews) have attained to the knowledge of nothing before this age, yet the Britiſh Hiſtory of Geffrey, tooke beginning three hundred and thirtie yeares before the firſt Olympias, being a very rude and ignorant age in theſe parts, which he called Fabulous. And even from hence, for feare leaſt the ground-worke being ill laid, the reſt of the building would goe on no better, becauſe both the preſent place ſeemeth to require it, and alſo from it the chiefe light may ariſe to the traine of the narration enſuing; let mee ſummarily gathering matter heere and there briefly deliver the acts of the Romans in Britaine, not out of feined fables, which were vanitie to recite, and meere folly to beleeve, but out of the incorrupt and ancient monuments: wherein, I will not intercept matter of glory and commendation from them, who ſhall take in hand to purſue this argument in more ample manner.

ROMANS IN BRITAINE.

Hen Fortitude and Fortune were ſo agreed, or Gods appointment rather had thus decreed, that Rome ſhould ſubdue all the earth, Caius Julius Cæſar, having now by conqueſts over-run * Gaule, to the end, that by a ſucceſſive traine of victories atchieved both by land and ſea, he might joyne thoſe Lands together which nature had ſevered, (as if the Roman world would not ſuffice) caſt an eye unto the Ocean; and in the foure and fiftieth yeare before the incarnation of Chriſt, endeavoured to make a journey into Britaine; either for that in all his Gauliſh warre, there came under-hand aid from thence, or becauſe the Britaines had received the * Bellovaci that were runne from him, or as Suetonius writeth, allured with hope of the Britiſh pearles, the bigneſſe and weight whereof hee was wont to peize and trie by his hand; or rather upon an ardent deſire of glorie: which wee muſt moſt eaſily believe, conſidering that he rejected the Embaſſadors of the Britaines, who having intelligence of his deſignement, repaired unto him, and promiſed to put in hoſtages, and to become obedient to the Roman Empire.

Iulius Cæſar.

But his entrance into the Iſland, I wil compendiouſly ſet down, even in his own very words: Conſidering the coaſts, ports, and landing places of Britaine, were not well knowne unto Cæſar, he ſent C. Voluſenus before with a galley, to diſcover what he might; who, having taken what view of the countrey hee could in five daies ſpace, returned. In the meane time, the reſolution of Cæſar being made knowne unto the Britans by merchants, many particular States ſent their Embaſſadours to him into Gallia, promiſing both to put in pledges, and also to submit themselves unto the Roman Empire. Having them exhorted these to continue in that mind still, he sent them home backe againe, and together with them Comius of * Arras, a man in those countreys of great authoritie, (for the * Attrebates had before time departed out of Gaule, and planted themselves there) to persuade the said Cities and States to accept of the friendship and protection of the people of Rome. No sooner was hee set a shore, but the Britaines cast him into prison and hung irons upon him. Meane while, Cæsar having gotten together and put in readinesse about fourescore ships of burden, for the transporting of two Legions, and eighteene others besides, which hee appointed for the horsemen, put out to sea from the countrey of the * Morini at the third watch, and about the fourth houre of the day arrived upon the coast, at an unfit landing place. For the hilles lay so steepe over the sea, that from the higher ground a dart or javelin might easily be cast upon the shore beneath. Having therefore at one time both wind and tide with him, hee weighed anchor, and sailed eight miles from that place unto a plaine and open shore, and there hee rid at anchor. But the Britaines perceiving the Romans determination, sent their horse and chariots before, and there kept the Romans from landing. Here the Romans were exceeding much distressed; For, the ships were so great, that they could not ride neere unto the shore, where the sea was ebbe: the souldiers in strange and unknowne places, being loden with heavie armour, were at one instant to leape downe of necessitie from those tall ships, withall to stand amid the very billowes, and to fight with their enemies: whereas contrariwise the Britaines were perfect in the knowledge of those places, lightly appointed, as having all parts of their bodies at libertie, fought either from the dry shore where they had sure footing, or wading not farre into the water. Hereupon the Romans being terrified, behaved not themselves with the like courage and alacritie as before time. But after that Cæsar had caused the Gallies to be removed from those hulkes, to bee rowed and laid against the open side of the Britaines, and so from thence the enemie to be beaten backe, and displaced with slings, ordinance, and shot of arrowes, the Britans being troubled with the strange forme of those Gallies, the stirring of the Oares, and the unusuall kind of their engines, reculed. Then the Eagle-bearer of the tenth Legion, earnestly beseeching the Gods, that it might fall out happily for the Legion: Leape downe, quoth he, my fellow souldiers, unlesse ye will forsake your standerd and betray it into the enemies hands: For mine owne part, I will bee sure to doe my devoir both to the common-weale and also to my Generall: so forthwith hee cast himselfe into the sea, and began to advance the * Eagle against the enemie: then, all the rest followed hard at his heeles (But if we believe * Julian, Cæsar himselfe was the first that came downe from his ship). The fight on both parts was very eager. But the Romans encombred with their heavie armor and weapons; tossed with the waves, not able to get any firme footing, and put out of array, were wonderfully troubled; untill such time as Cæsar had caused the ship-boats, pinnaces and smaller vessels to bee manned with souldiers; and when he saw need of helpe sent them to rescue such as were overcharged. As soone as the Romans got footing on the dry land, they made head together, charged the Britaines and put them to flight: but they were not able to follow them in chase, for want of the horsemen, that were not arrived in the Island. The Britains being overthrowne in battell, presently dispatched Embassadors unto Cæsar to treat of peace, and together with them the foresaid Comius of Arras, whom they had detained bound in prison: and withall, laid the fault upon the multitude, and excused all by their owne ignorance. Cæsar soone pardoned them, and commanded hostages to be delivered unto him: which they presently performed in part, and gave their word to bring in the rest. Thus was peace concluded foure daies after that Cæsar was landed in Britaine.

At the same time, those eighteene ships which transported the horsemen, approching so neare the coast of Britanny that they were within view, by reason of a suddaine tempest that arose, were cast upon the west part of the Island: from whence with much adoe they recovered the continent of France. In the same night also it hapned, that the Moone being in the full, and the tides very high, both the Gallies which were drawne up to the shore, were filled with the tide, and the ships of burden also that lay at anchor, so shaken with the tempest, that they became altogether unserviceable. This being knowne to the Princes of Britaine, when they understood also, that the Romans now wanted horsemen, shipping, and proviſion of corne, they rebelled and reſolved to cut off their proviſion of graine. Cæſar ſuſpecting that which fell out indeed, brought corne daily out of the fields into his campe, and with the timber and other ſtuffe of thoſe twelve ſhips which were moſt weather beaten and diſmembred, repaired the reſt. While theſe things were in action, the ſeventh Legion, being ſent out to fetch in corne, and buſie in reaping, the Britains ſuddenly ſet upon, and ſo with their horſemen and chariots all at once, encompaſſed them round about.

Eſſedarii, Chariotiers.

*The manner of their fight from out of theſe chariots, is thus, as I related a little before: Firſt, they ride up and downe into all parts, and caſt their darts; and with the very terrour of the horſes, and ratling of the wheeles, often times diſorder the rankes, and when they have wound themſelves betweene any troups of horſemen, they forſake their chariots, and fight on foot. In the meane time the guiders of the chariots, drive a little a ſide out of the battell, and place their chariots ſo, as that if the other chance to bee overcharged with the multitude of enemies, they might have an eaſie paſſage unto them againe. Thus they performed in all their fights the nimble motion of horſemen, and the firme ſtabilitie of footmen: ſo ready with daily practiſe & exerciſe, that in the declivity of a ſteepe hill, they could ſtay their horſes in the very full cariere, quickly turn ſhort, & moderate their pace, run along the beame or ſpire of the Chariot, ſtand upon the yoke and harneſſe of the horſes, yea, and from thence whip in a trice into their chariots again. But by the cõming of Cæſar to reſcue them in ſo good time, the Romans took heart afreſh, and the Britans ſtood ſtill, who having conceived good hope to free themſelves for ever, preſuming upon the ſmall number of the Roman forces, together with the ſcarcitie of corne among them, had aſſembled a great power, and were come to the campe of Cæſar. Bnt he received them even before the campe with a battell, put them to rout, ſlew many of them, and burnt their houſes far and neare. The ſame day came meſſengers from the Britans to Cæſar, intreating peace, which they obtained: upon condition, that they ſhould double the number of their hoſtages, whom he commanded to be brought into Gaule. And ſtreight after, becauſe the * Aequinox was at hand, hee put to ſea, hoiſed ſaile from Britaine, and brought all his ſhips ſafe unto the continent of France. And thither, two onely of all the States of Britaine ſent hoſtages unto him, the reſt neglected it. Theſe exploits thus performed, upon the relation of Cæſars Letters, the Senate decreed a ſolemne proceſſion for the ſpace of twentie daies: although he gained nothing to himſelfe, nor to Rome, but the glorie onely of an expedition enterprized.*

* In Autumne or September, when daies and nights are equall.

Dio. lib. 39.

*The yeare next enſuing, Cæſar having gotten together a great fleet, for what with ſhips for convoy of corne and victuals, and what with other private veſſels that every man had built for to ſerve his owne turne, there was 800. ſaile and above, and the ſame manned with five Legions, and 2000. horſemen, he launched from the port called * Iccius, and landed his forces in that part of the Iſle, where hee did the yeare before. Neither was there an enemie to be ſeene in the place. For albeit the Britans had beene there aſſembled with a great power, yet terrified with ſo huge a number of ſhips, they had ſecretly withdrawne themſelves into the upland countrey. Here Cæſar encamped in a place convenient, and left two cohorts, and three hundred horſemen as a garriſon or guard for his ſhips. Himſelfe having by night marched forward twelve miles, eſpied the enemies: who having gone forward as farre as to the river, began to give battell: but beaten backe by the cavallery, they conveighed themſelves into a wood, and there lay hid, as lodging in a place ſtrongly fortified, both by nature and mans hand. But the Romans with a Teſtudo, or targuet-roofe, which they made, and mount that they raiſed againſt their fortifications, tooke the place, and drave them out of the woods; neither followed they them with any long purſuit, for they were to fortifie the campe in that very place.*

* Neere Calais.

The next day, Cæſar divided his forces into three regiments, and ſent them out to purſue the Britaines: but ſtraightwaies called them back againe, for that hee had intelligence by meſſengers of ſuch a tempeſt at ſea the night before, that his navie was ſore beaten, run one againſt another, and caſt on ſhore. And thereupon himſelfe in perſon returned to the ſhips, and with the labour of ten daies haled them all up to land, and cloſed them and his campe together within one and the ſame fortification, and ſo goeth to the place from whence he was returned. Thither alſo had the Britaines aſſembled themſelves with greater forces, under the conduct of Caſſivellaunus or Caſſibelinus, unto whom, in a publike counſell of all the Britains, the Caſſibelinus.

A the whole government and managing of the warre was committed; whoſe cavallery and charioteirs together, gave the Romanes a ſharpe conflict in their march, wherein many of both ſides loſt their lives: But the Britans after ſome intermiſſion of time, whiles the Romans were buſie in fortifying their campe, charged fiercely upon thoſe that kept ward before the campe; unto whom when Cæſar had ſent for reſcue two cohorts, and thoſe the principall and choyſeſt of two legions, they moſt boldly, and with full reſolution, brake through the thickeſt of the enemies, and from thence retired in ſafety. The next morrow, the Britans ſhewed themſelves here and there in ſmall companies from the hils; but about noone they made an aſſault upon three legions, and all the horſemen ſent out for to forage; yet beaten
B backe they were, and a great number of them ſlaine. Now by this time were all their auxiliarie forces that had met together, departed; neither encountred they afterward the Romans with their maine power. Cæſar then marched with his army to the river Thames, and ſo to the confines of Caſſivelaunus: Vpon the farther banke of this river, yea and under the water, they had covertly ſtucke ſharpe ſtakes, and embattelled themſelves with a great power. But the Romans went and waded over with ſuch violence, notwithſtanding they had but their heads cleere above the water, that the enemy was not able to endure the charge, but left the banke, and betooke themſelves to flight: not skared, as Polyænus writeth, at the ſight of an
C Elephant with a turret upon his backe. The river Thames.

Caſſivellaunus having now no courage to contend any longer, retained onely foure thouſand Charioters with him, and obſerved the Romanes journeys: and ſo often as their horſemen went foorth and ſtraied out in the fields for forage or booty, he ſent out his chariots, and kept them from ranging all abroad. Meane while, the * Trinobantes ſubmit themſelves unto Cæſar, and intreated that he would defend Mandubratius (whom Eutropius and Beda out of the Fragments of Suetonius now loſt, call Androgorius, and our Britans Androgeus) from the oppreſſion of Caſſivellaunus, and ſend him unto them to be their ſoveraign. Of them Cæſar required and received forty hoſtages, and corne for his army, and therewith ſent Mandubratius. Then the * Cenimagni * Segontiaci, * Ancalites, * Bibroci and * Caſſi, following the example of the Trinobantes yeeld unto Cæſar: By whom he underſtood, that
D Caſſivellaunus his towne was not far off, fortified with woods and bogs: which as he aſſaulted in two ſeverall places, the Britans flung out at a back-way: but many of them in their flight were taken and put to the ſword. Trinobantes. * Where now Eſſex and Middleſex lie. Mandubatius, who alſo is named Androgeus. Now Suffolk, Norfolke, Cambridge, Huntingdonſhires. * About Holeſhot and Sileceſter. * The Hundred of Henly upon Thames. * The hundred of Bray and Caiſhow

Whiles theſe things were a doing, foure pety Kings that ruled Kent, to wit Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus and Segonax, by a mandate from Caſſivellaunus did ſet upon the campe where the Romanes navy was kept, but by a ſally that the Romanes made, they were driven backe: and Cingetorix one of the ſaid Kings was taken priſoner. Then Caſſivellaunus, having received ſo many loſſes, and troubled moſt of all with the revolt of the ſtates, ſent Embaſſadour to Cæſar by Conius of * Arras, tending unto him a ſurrendry. Whereupon Cæſar, being determined to winter in the continent of France, commanded pledges to * Atrebat.
E be brought unto him, and impoſed a yeerly tribute that Britaine ſhould pay unto the people of Rome. But withall he inhibited Caſſivellaunus and commanded him to doe no harme either to Mandubratius or the Trinobants. And thus with a great number of captives he embarked his army, and tranſported it backe at two ſeverall paſſages. Thus much Cæſar of his owne warre in Britain.

But Eutropius out of ſome writings of Suetonius now not extant, addeth thus much moreover. Scæva one of Cæſars ſouldiers, with foure other fellow ſervitours, croſſed over ſea before, in a ſmall barke unto a rocke neere the Iland, and by the reflow or ebbe of the Ocean the while, was there left. The Britans many in number ſet upon the Romanes being but few: howbeit the reſt who here and there had been his companions returned in a ſhip: Scæva tarieth behind ſtill undanted, notwithſtanding he was overlaid with darts from every F ſide: Firſt he made reſiſtance with his pike or maſſie ſpeare: and at length tooke him to his ſword and fought alone with many of them. When he was weary and wounded, and had withall loſt his helmet and target after many a ſtroke, with two habergeons he ſwum unto Cæſars campe, and craved pardon of his Generall for his fool-hardy raſhneſſe: whom Cæſar advanced to the honor and degree of a Centurion. Scæva.

When Cæſar came firſt into this Iſle, (as Cotas, one who then in the campe had Athenæus. the ſecond place, hath put downe in a Greeke Commentary of his, concerning the Romane Common-wealth) of ſuch temperance he was, and ſo far ſhort of the pompe of our age, that he had no more ſervants and attendants ordinarily in his domeſticall retinue, but three. A

What time as Cæſar, ſaith Seneca, travelled into Britaine, and could not containe his owne felicitie within the Ocean, he heard that his daughter was departed this life, drawing with her a traine of publike calamities, But he paſſed over this griefe of heart as lightly as he was wont all things elſe. Being returned with conqueſt out of Britaine, he dedicated unto Venus genitrix in her temple, a breaſt-plate made of Britiſh pearles. Some of his Britiſh priſoners, he appointed for ſervices in the Theatre, and about theſe rich hangings of Tapeſtrie there, wherein he had woven in colours his victories in Britaine. Of this victorie of Cæſar, an old Poet hath thus written: C

In Ocean rhode it reſted not, nor put to ſea for nought,
But Britans in their otherworld, for conqueſt ſake it ſought. D

Moreover Cicero in a certaine Poeme now loſt, which hee entituled Quadrigas, caried Cæſar in poeticall Chariots of triumph, through the midſt of all praiſe and commendation, for his acts atchieved in Britaine, as Ferrerius of Piemont perſwadeth us: for thus he writeth, Pingam Britannias coloribus tuis, penecillo autem meo, that is, I will depaint Britaine in your colours, but with mine owne pencill. Howbeit in the judgement of others, he terrified onely the Britans with a fortunate fight, or as Lucane (who nothing favoured the houſe of the Cæſars) wrote;

Territa quæſitis oſtendit terga Britannis.

He ſought the Britans, and for feare to them his backe he ſhew'd.

And Tacitus a right grave and ſubſtantiall author, writeth, That he diſcovered onely, but delivered not unto the Romanes, Britaine: and Horace implieth, that he ſcant touched them at all, when to flatter Auguſtus, hee ſaith, That the Britaine was not medled withall, in theſe words: E

Intactus Britannus ut deſcenderet
Sacrâ catenatus viâ:

Or that the Britans heretofore not dealt withall in fight,
Might, chained now, the ſacred ſtreet deſcend, in all mens ſight.

And Propertius,

Te manet invictus Romano Marte Britannus.

The Britans yet unconquered by Romanes, ſtay for thee.

So farre it is off, that it ſhould be true which Velleius Paterculus, a flattering Hiſtorian of the Emperours Court wrote, Bis penetrata Britannia à Cæſare, that is, twiſe Cæſar paſſed through Britaine, when as hee ſcarce made entry into it: For, many yeeres after this entrance of Cæſar, this Iſland was left to the free government of their owne Kings, and uſed their owne Lawes. F

Auguſtus

Auguſtus ſeemeth of purpoſe, and with good adviſe to have neglected Britaine, when as he called that * Conſilium, as Tacitus ſaith, that is, Policie, or a point of ſtate, haply becauſe it was thought the beſt pollicie, and ſafeſt for the State, That the Romane Empire ſhould be kept, and held within bounds, to wit, the Ocean, the rivers Iſter and Euphrates limits ſet by nature, to the end it might be a State Adamantine, (for ſo Auguſtus himſelfe ſpeaketh in Iulian,) that is, invincible; and leſt, as a ſhip of exceeding great bulke, it might not poſſibly bee well governed and managed, but endangered through the owne unweldy hugeneſſe ſinke anone, and fall downe at once, which uſually befalleth unto over-great States: or, as Strabo is of opinion, he deſpiſed it, ſeeing neither any cauſe at all of feare, nor hope of much profit from the Britans; and yet it ſeemed, that no ſmall dammage would be preſented from other nations, lying round about the ſaid Iſland. But what cauſe ſo ever it was, certes, after Iulius, and the edge of Romane armes turned upon the Common-wealth it ſelfe, Britaine was a long time forgotten, even in time of peace. Nevertheleſſe at laſt Auguſtus departed from Rome, with a purpoſe to transferre the warre into Britaine: At which verie time Horatius framed this kinde of prayer unto the Goddeſſe Fortune at Antium.

Serves iturum Cæſarem in ultimos
Orbis Britannos.

Save Cæſar now that readie is, a journey long to take,
Againſt the Britans moſt remote, a conqueſt there to make.

But after he was come into Gaule, the Britans ſent Embaſſadors unto him to crave peace: and verily the Britiſh Princes and Potentates, having by Embaſſages and dutifull ſervices obtained his amity, dedicated preſents and oblations in the Capitol: and brought the whole Iland in a manner to be familiar unto the Romanes, and as it were their owne: ſo as they could endure taxes and impoſts, which now are nothing grievous unto them, raiſed out of ſuch merchandiſe and commodities as are ſhipped to and from out of Gaule and Britannie: and thoſe be Ivory workes, Bits and bridles, chaines and wreathes, * veſſels of the mettall * Electrum and of glaſſe, with other baſe and common wares of like ſort. And therefore there needes no garriſon for that Iland. For it would require one Legion at the leaſt, and ſome horſemen, if tributes were to be levied from thence: and the ſaid tributes would but countervaile the charges of maintaining a garriſon there: for of neceſsity by impoſing a tribute, the revenewes comming by tollage and poundage and ſuch like impoſts, would be leſſe: and if any violent courſe were uſed, ſome perill or other muſt be looked for. The yeare following likewiſe, Auguſtus intended a ſecond expedition into Britain, becauſe there was ſome variance about the Covenants: but by occaſion of ſome inſurrection made in Spaine by the Cantabri and others, that journey was ſtaied. Neither hath any man reaſon to beleeve Landinus, or Servius, or Philargyrus, who have recorded that Auguſtus triumph over the Britans, and that out of theſe verſes of Maro.

Strabo.

* Electrina.
* A pale and whitiſh gold.

Et duo rapta manu diverſo ex hoſte trophæa,
Bisq; triumphatas utroq; a littore gentes.

And trophees twaine caught by ſtrong hand from divers enemies hoaſts,
And nations twice triumphed of likewiſe from both the * coaſts.

* Of Eaſt and Weſt.

Surely, in regard of that ſurrendry of the Britans, Horace wrote thus;

Cælo tonantem credimus Iovem
Regnare: Preſens Divus habebitur
Auguſtus, adjectis Britannis
Imperio, gravibusq; Perſis.

We thought before, that Iupiter in heaven above doth raigne
For thundring there: but now ſhall be on earth Auguſtus here Reputed God, becauſe he did to Romanes Empire gaine
Both Britans and fierce Perſians, of whom they ſtood in feare.

Tiberius.

Tiberius nothing tranſported with an inordinate deſire of extending the Empire, ſeemeth to have reſted in that Counſell of Auguſtus; For hee brought out a booke written with Auguſtus his owne hand, wherein was contained the whole wealth and eſtate of the common-weale, what number as well of Romane Citizens as Allies were in armes, how many Navies, Kingdomes and Provinces, what tributes and impoſts [belonged to the ſtate] with a reſolution annexed thereto of containing the Empire within the bounds. Which A adviſe and reſolution of Auguſtus contented him ſo well, as Tacitus reporteth, that he would attempt nothing in Britaine, nor maintaine any garriſon or deputies there. For whereas Tacitus reckoneth up the number of Legions, and what coaſts or countries they defended at that time, he maketh no mention at all of Britain. And yet it ſeemeth that the Britans entertained amity with the Romans. For when as at the ſame time Germanicas ſailed the Ocean, ſome of his company by force of tempeſt driven to this Iland, were by the Princes thereof ſent backe againe. B

C. Caligula. That Caius Cæſar caſt in his mind to enter this Iland, it is certaine: but that by his ſhittle braine, ſudden repentance, and wonderfull attempts againſt Germany, it came to nothing. For to the end that he might terrifie Britain and Germany (over which he hovered) with the fame of ſome mighty piece of worke, he made a bridge be-Suetonius in Caligula, tween Baie and the Piles of Puteoli, three miles, and 600. paces in length. But having Adminius. atchieved no greater exploit, than taken to his mercy Adminius the ſonne of Cinobellinus King of the Britans, who being by his father baniſhed had fled over ſea with a ſmall power and traine about him, he ſent magnificent and glorious letters to Rome, as if the whole Ile had beene yielded up into his hands: warning and wiſhing the poſts ever and anon, to ride forward in their wagon, directly into the market place and the Curia: and in no wiſe to deliver the ſaid miſsives unto the Conſuls, but in the temple of Mars, and that in a frequent aſſembly of the Senate. C

After this to the Ocean he marcheth, as if he minded to tranſlate the warre over into Britaine: Where even upon the very ſhore he embattelled his ſouldiers: himſelfe tooke ſea in a Galley, and after he had lanched out a little way from the land, returned again (and then mounting up an high pulpit, ſate him downe, gave his ſouldiers the ſignall of battell, and commanded the trumpets to ſound: and ſoon a ſudden charged them to gather cockles, muskles, and other ſmall ſhell-fiſhes, Having gotten theſe ſpoiles (as one indeed wanting enemies ſpoiles for to adorne a Trophye) he waxed proud as if he had conquered the Ocean: and having rewarded D
Dio. his ſouldiers, he brought ſome of thoſe cockles, and the other ſhell-fiſh to Rome, that there alſo he might ſhew the bootie which he had gotten. In token and memoriall of this brave victory he raiſed an high turret, out of which, as from a watch-tower, there might blaze all night long, lights and fires for the better direction of ſhips at ſea in their courſe. The ruines whereof are ſometimes ſeene at a low water in the ſhore of Holland, and by the people there inhabiting is called Britenhuis. Who alſo finde oftentimes ſtones engraven with letters: of which one had theſe Characters, C. C. P. Claudius. Afterwards, the inland parts of Britaine, waſted rather with Civill warres and factions, than by the force of the Romans, after ſundry overthrowes and ſlaughters of both ſides, came at the length by little and little under the ſubjection of the Romans. For, while the States fought ſeverally one by one, they were all vanquiſhed: running ſo one upon anothers deſtruction, that untill they fell to utter confuſion, they had not in groſſe, a feeling of the particular loſſes that each one ſuſtained. And thus farre forth alſo wrought ambition in them, that many became falſe and diſloiall, yea, and F ſome fled from their countrey-men, making choiſe of the Romans protection, ſwearing alleageance unto them, and practiſing by all meanes to ſubject their native coun-

A time in length with many delaies. But when * Narciſſus ſent from Claudius, began to mount up into the Tribunall of Plautius, and to make a ſpeech unto the hoſt the ſouldiers more incenſed with indignation ſtreightwaies cried all at once, Io. Saturnalia (for the manner is of Slaves, during the Saturnalia, to celebrate that feſtivall time in the habit of their Maſters) and ſo preſently with willing hearts followed Plautius. The forces being divided into three parts, for feare leſt if they arrived all in one place, they might be put by their landing; carried backe by a gale of wind, found ſome trouble in their paſſage: yet taking heart againe, becauſe as they ſailed along, there was ſeene a fire-drake in the Element ſhooting from the Eaſt the Weſt, they were conveied over into the Iſland, and no man ſtopped
B them. For the Britans ſuppoſing verily, in regard of thoſe things which I have related, that they would not come, had not aſſembled themſelves: and therefore without any conflict, they lay hidden within bogs, mariſhes, and woods, in hope by lingring delaies to wearie the Romans, that they ſhould be forced without any ſervice exploited to retire hence, like as it had befallen unto Iulius Cæſar. Wherefore, Plautius tooke great paines in ſeeking of them out. After he had found them (now they were not free States, but ruled under divers Kings) firſt he diſcomfited Caractacus, afterward Togodumnus, the ſonnes of Cunobellinus, for their father was deceaſed. When theſe were fled, part of the * Bodunni, who were ſubject to the C * Catuellani, he received into his protection: and having left a garriſon there, hee went forward to a certaine river: but becauſe the Britans thought the Romans could not poſſibly paſſe over without a bridge, they lay encamped more careleſly on the farther ſide thereof. Plautius therefore, ſet the Germanes, who were wont to wade through the moſt ſwift and violent rivers, even in their very armour. Theſe comming upon the enemies at unawares, hurt not a man of them, but wounded the horſes onely that drew their chariots, who when they were troubled and diſordered, the men were not able to ſit them. Then ſent hee Flavius Veſpaſianus, (who afterwards became Emperour) and his brother Sabinus with him as Lieutenant, who likewiſe having paſſed over the river, ſurpriſed very many of the Barbarians, and ſlew them. Neither fled the reſt away, but the morrow after joyned battell, wherein the victorie remained doubtfull: untill ſuch time as C. Sidius Geta, at the very point to have beene taken priſoner by the enemies, vanquiſhed them ſo, as that for his good ſervice, D triumphall honours were granted unto him, although he had not been Conſull. From thence the Barbarians retired themſelves to the river Thames, where it diſchargeth it ſelfe into the ſea, and with the flowe thereof riſeth high.

This river they ſoone paſſed over, as being skilfull of ſuch places as would affoord them firme footing, and were paſſable fords. And the Romans in purſuing them were in danger. Soone after, when the Germanes had ſwum over a ſecond time whiles ſome of them, paſſed over at a bridge, higher up the river, environing the Barbarians on every ſide, they made a great ſlaughter of them: but when unadviſedly they followed after the reſt, they fell upon blind bogs and loſt many of their men. Hereupon, and for that the Britans by occaſion of Togodumnus his death abated not their courage one whit, but rather prepared them-E ſelves to fight the more fiercely in revenge of his death, Plautius for feare went no farther: but ſetting a guard to keep what he had gotten, ſent for Claudius, having a warrant and commandement ſo to doe, in caſe he were overlaid with any extraordinary violence, Elephants. For which expedition among much other Equipage, Elephants alſo were gotten together and prepared. Claudius advertiſed of theſe newes, committed the affaires of the City, and the ſouldiers likewiſe to the charge of Vitellius (upon whom, as alſo upon himſelfe, he had conferred a Conſulſhip for ſix moneths). Then went he downe in perſon by water from Rome to Oſtra, and ſo from thence ſailed to Marſhils: and travelling the reſt of the way partly by land and partly by ſea came to the Ocean, embarked, croſſed the channell into Britaine, and went directly forward to his forces expecting him by the Thames ſide. When he had re-
F ceived them into his owne charge, and paſſed over the river, he fought a ſet battell with the Barbarians, aſſembled againſt his comming, and obtained victory. Then tooke he in * Camalodunum the roiall ſeat of Cunobellinus, and many thence he drave, others upon their yeelding he tooke to mercy. For theſe acts performed, divers times he was ſtiled Imperator, a thing directly againſt the Romanes cuſtome; for, lawfull it is not in one war to aſſume that name of mer than once. Furthermore, Claudius diſarmed the Britans, and committed as Howbeit Suetonius reporteth, that part of the Iland he tooke into his hands upon ſubmiſſion without any battell or bloodſhed. Sixteene daies or thereabout himſelfe ſtayed in Britain: in which time he remitted unto the Gentry and Nobility of the Britans the confiſcation of their goods: For which benefit of his, they frequented his temple and adored him as a God. Thus returned he to Rome, in the ſixt moneth after that he went forth from thence.

So great a matter it was and of ſuch conſequence to have conquered even ſo ſmall a parcell of Britain, that the Senate thereupon decreed in the honor of Claudius, yearly Games, triumphall Arches both in Rome and alſo at * Geſſoriacum in Gaul, and a moſt honorable and ſtately triumph: to the beholding whereof the governors of Provinces alſo, yea and certaine baniſhed perſons were permitted to come into Rome: a Navall coronet was fixed upon the looure of the Palace, as it were the enſigne of the Britiſh ſea ſubdued by him: the Provinces brought in Crownes of gold, and * Gallia Comata one above the reſt, waighing 9. pounds: and the hither part of Spaine another of 7. pound weight. He mounted up into the Capitoll by the ſtaires on his knees, ſupported and heaued up by his ſonnes in Law on either ſide. He entred in triumphing wiſe the * Adriaticke ſea, embarqued in a veſſell more like to ſome exceeding great houſe than a ſhip. Unto his wife Meſſalina was allowed by the Senate the higheſt place to ſit in, as alſo to ride in a Carroch, or hanging coach. After this, he ſet forth triumphall plaies and games, having taken upon him for that purpoſe the Conſular office and authoritie. The ſolemnities were exhibited at once in two Theatres, and many times when hee was gone aſide from the ſight, others had the charge thereof. Horſe runnings for the prize hee promiſed as many as thoſe daies would admit: Howbeit above ten there were not: for betweene every courſe of horſes, Beares were killed, champions performed their devoirs, and choyce boies ſent for out of Aſia danced the warlike dance in armor. Moreover, upon Valerius Aſiaticus, Julius Silanus, Sidius Geta, and others, in regard of this conqueſt, hee heaped Triumphall ornaments. He ſuffered Licinius Craſſus Frugi to follow after himſelfe in this triumph, mounted upon a trapped courſer with a rich capariſon, and arraied in a roabe of Date tree worke. Upon Poſidius the Eunuch hee beſtowed a ſpeare ſtaffe without an head: upon C. Gavius, cheines, bracelets, horſe-trappings, and a coronet of gold, as is to be ſeene in an ancient marble at Taurinum.

In the meane time Aulus Plautius went on with the reliques of this war, and ſped ſo well in his battels, that Claudius paſſed a decree, that he ſhould ride in pety triumph ovant: and when he was entred into the City, himſelfe went to meet him, giving him the right hand all the way both going and comming. And Veſpaſian even then ſhewed by the deſtinies, whom Claudius aſſumed unto him to beare a part of this Britiſh war, partly under the conduct of Claudius himſelfe, and partly of Plautius, fought thirty battels with the enemy: two moſt mighty nations, and above twenty townes together, with the Iſle of * Wight he ſubdued. For which worthy exploits, he received triumphall ornaments, and within a ſhort ſpace two ſacerdotall dignities, with a Conſulſhip beſide which hee bare the two laſt moneths of the yeare. Titus alſo ſerved here in quality of a Tribune under his father, with exceeding commendation for his induſtry and valour, (for valiantly he delivered his father when he was beſieged): and no leſſe report of his modeſt carriage: as appeareth by a number of his Images and titles to them annexed, thorowout the Provinces of Germanie and Britaine. The reſt of the Occurrences which hapned in Britaine afterward unto the very latter end of Domitian, Tacitus, who beſt can do it, will declare by his owne words to this effect.

P. Oſtorius Propretor.

P. Oſtorius Propretor in Britan was welcomed at his firſt landing with troubles and tumults. The enemies ranged all over the Allies country, and uſed ſo much the greater violence, for that they thought the new captaine was unacquainted with the army, (the winter

A ter alſo being now began) would not come foorth to encounter. But he knowing well that the firſt ſucceſſes alwaies breed either feare or confidence, gathered with all ſpeed his readieſt cohorts, advanced toward the enemy; and having ſlaine thoſe which made head againſt him, purſued the reſt that were diſperſed for feare they ſhould joine againe: and leſt an hatefull and faithleſſe peace might give neither captaine nor ſouldier any reſt, he went about to diſarme as many of them as he ſuſpected, and by raiſing forts and ſetting garriſons upon the two rivers * Auſona and the * Severn to reſtrain and hem in the Britons. Which the Iceni firſt of all refuſed, a ſtrong nation and unſhaken with battels, becauſe of their owne motion they had ſought our alliance and amity. And at their inſtigation, the people adjoyning choſe a place to fight
B in, compaſſed about with a rude and ruſticall rampire, having a narrow entrance of purpoſe to hinder the comming in of horſemen. This ſenſe the Romane captaine, albeit he had under his conduct the power of his allies, alone without the maine forces of the Legion aſſaieth to breake thorow: And having beſtowed his cohorts in rankes ſetteth the troupes of horſemen in like readineſſe to performe their ſervice. Then after the ſignall given, they broke open the ſaid rampire, and diſordered the enemies encombred and penned within their owne hold. And they knowing in their owne conſcience they were no better than rebels, and ſeeing all paſſages for eſcape ſtopped up, ſhewed great valour and courage in defending themſelves. In which fight M. Oſtorius the lieutenants ſonne deſerved the honor of ſaving a Citizen.

C Vpon the diſcomfiture and ſlaughter of theſe Iceni, they that wavered betweene warre and peace became ſetled and were quiet: and ſo the army was led againſt the* Cangi. Whoſe territory they waſted, harried and ſpoiled all over: whiles the enemies durſt not ſhew themſelves in the field, or if privily by ſtealth they attempted to cut off the taile of our armie as they marched, they paid for their craft and deceit. Now by this time were the Romanes come well neere to the ſea coaſt that looketh toward Ireland, when certaine troubles and diſcords ſprung up among the* the Brigantes, brought their leader backe, being certainly reſolved to attempt no new matters, before he had ſetled the old. But as for the Brigantes, ſome few being put to death that began firſt to take armes, he pardoned the reſidue, and all were quieted. The* Silures could neither by cruelty nor faire meanes bee reclaimed but they would needs war; and
D therefore no remedy there was but to keepe them under with garriſons of Legionary ſouldiers. Which to performe more eaſily, the colonie called Camalodunum conſiſting of a ſtrong company of old ſouldiers was brought into the countries by conqueſt ſubdued, for ſuccour and savegard againſt Rebels, and an inducement to traine the Aſſociats to obſerve the lawes. Certaine Cities and States were granted by way of Donation to King Cogidunus, according to the ancient cuſtome of the people of Rome, that they might have even Kings to be inſtruments of ſervitude and thraldome.

Then went the Romanes from thence againſt the Silures, who beſides their owne ſtoutneſſe truſted much in the ſtrength of Caractacus, a man whom many dangerous adventures which
E he had waded thorow, and as many proſperous exploits by him atchieved, had ſo lifted up, that he carried the reputation and præheminence above all the Britiſh Commanders. But he in ſubtill craft, and knowledge of the deceitfull waies, having the advantage of us, though otherwiſe weaker in ſtrength of ſouldiers, tranſlateth the warre into the country of the * Ordovices: and there, joyning to him as many as feared our peace, reſolveth to hazard the laſt chance, having choſen a place for the battell, where the comming in, and going forth, with all things elſe might be incommodious to us, but for his very advantageous. Then, againſt the high hilles, and whereſoever there was any eaſie paſſage, & gentle acceſſe, he ſtopped up the way with heaps of ſtones raiſed in manner of a rampier: withall, there ranne hard by a river having a doubtful foord, and the ſeverall companies of his * beſt ſouldiers had taken their ſtanding before the fortifications. Beſides all this, the leaders of every nation went about, exhorted and encouraged
F their men, by making leſſe all cauſes of feare, and kindling in them good conceits of hope, with all other motives and inducements to war. And verily Caractacus beſtirring himſelf, and courſing from place to place, proteſted, That this was the day, this the battell, which ſhould begin either the recovery of their liberties for ever, or elſe perpetuall bondage. And here, he called upon his anceſtors by name, who had chaſed Cæſar the Dictator from hence, through whoſe valour they were freed from the Romane axes, and tributes, and enjoyed ſtill the bodies of their

As he uttered these and such like speeches, the generall multitude of the souldiers made a noise about him, and bound themselves by oath every one according to the religion of his countrey, that they would not give way and yeeld for any weapons or wounds whatsoever. This couragious and cheerefull alacritie of theirs, astonied the Romane captaine, considering the river just before his face, the rampier beside which they had cast up, the high hils over their heads, nothing but terrible, and full of defendants, put him into a wondrous fright. Nevertheless the souldiers called hard for battell, crying still, that there was nothing which valour could not overcome. The Præfects and Tribunes also with like words, much enforced the ardour and courage of the whole armie. Then Ostorius having viewed round about what places were unpassable, and what yeelded passage, advanceth forward his men in boiling heat of choler, and easily wadeth over the river. Being come to the banke and rampier aforesaid, so long as the volley of darts continued on both sides, our men received more wounds, and in greater number were slaine. But after that by making of a targnet roofe of fence, those rude and ill fashioned joynts of stones were plucked asunder, and the fronts of both armies came close to hand-strokes, without ods; the Barbarians fled to the hill tops. But thither also, as well the heavie corselets, as the light armed souldiers brake in: whiles these shot their darts and javelins at them, the other preassed thicke and close together upon them: Contrariwise the Britans rankes were broken and disordered, as who had neither head peece nor coat of fence. If they thought to resist our auxiliarie forces, they were beaten downe with the arming swords & massie pikes of the Legionarie souldiers: if they turned to make head against them, they were slaine with the Speares, and bastard swords of the auxiliaries. A noble and renowned victorie this was. The wife and daughter both of Caractacus, were taken prisoners, his brethren also yeelded themselves. Himselfe, as generally there is no trusting to succour in adversitie, craving defence and protection of Cartismandua Queene of the Brigantes, was by her taken, bound with yrons, and delivered to the Conquerours, nine yeeres after the warre began in Britaine. Whereupon the fame of him being carried over into the Islands, and spread abrode thorowout the Provinces adjoyning, was famous also in Italie: in so much as they desired to see who he was that so many yeeres had defied and contemned our forces. Neither was the name of Caractacus meanly esteemed of at Rome. And Cæsar whiles he extolled his one worth and honour, made the conquered Prince more glorious. For why, the people also was assembled and called, as to see a notable spectacle. The cohorts of the Emperours guard stood all armed in good order within an open plaine lying before their campe. Then as King Caractacus his vassals and dependants marched before, the caparisons, chaines, and whatsoever he had wonne in wars against strangers, were brought in a shew: then, his brethren, wife and daughter: and last of all himselfe was shewed to the people. The prayers of all the rest were by reason of feare, base, and nothing savouring of nobilitie: but Caractacus, neither hanging downe his head, nor with words craving any mercy, when he stood before the Emperours tribunall, spake in this wise.

If my moderation in prosperity had beene as great as my nobility and fortune was, I had come rather as a friend into this City, than a Captive: neither would you have disdained to receive me with covenants of peace, being a Prince descended of Noble Progenitors, and a commander over many nations. My present state, as it is to me dishonorable, so to you it is magnificent. I have had horses, men, armour and wealth: what marvell if against my will I have forgone them all? For if yee will be rulers over all men, it followeth that all men must abide servitude. If presently I had yeelded and been delivered into your hands; neither had my fortune nor your glorie been renowned: and oblivion would have followed my punishment. But if you save me alive, I shall be an example of your clemencie for ever.

Upon these words Cæsar pardoned him, his wife and brethren. And they being all unbound, did their reverence likewise unto Agrippina, (who sat a loft not far off in another high seat to be seene) giving her the like praises and in the same degrees of stile as they did the Emperor himselfe. Surely a strange and unexampled precedent among all our ancestors, that a woman should sit and command the Romane ensignes. But shee carried her selfe as a fellow and associate in the Empire, gotten by her progenitors. After this, the Lords of the Senate were called together, who made long and glorious discourses as touching the captivity of Caractacus. Neither was this, as they affirmed, lesse honorable, than when Pub. Scipio

Theſe conqueſts of Britain, writers have numbred among the moſt famous monuments and teſtimonies of the Romans proweſſe. And thereupon Seneca writeth thus; Claudius might make his boaſt that he firſt vanquiſhed the Britans: for Iulius Cæſar did but ſhew them only to the Romans. And in another place, writing of the ſame Claudius,

Ille Britannos

C And Brigants with blew-painted ſhields, he forced with his hoaſt,
To yeeld their necks in Romane chaines as captive to be led,
And even the Ocean this new power of Romane axe to dread.

And Seneca the Tragicke poet in his Octavia, verſified in this manner concerning Claudius,

Cuiq; Britanni
Terga dedere, ducibus noſtris
Antè ignoti juriſq; ſui.

And nnto whom the Britans ſhew'd their backs, who er'ſt unknowne
To all our Captaines liv'd by lawes and cuſtoms of their owne.

D And in the ſame tragedie, for that he had paſſed over the Thames,

En qui oræ Tamiſis primus poſuit jugum
Ignota tantis claſſibus texit freta:
Interque gentes barbaras tutus fuit,
Et ſæva maria; conjugis ſcelere---Occidit.

Behold, who firſt the mouth and coaſt of Thamis, did ſubdew
And ſpread with mightie fleets thoſe Firths, the like that never never knew:
With nations rude, in raging ſeas, who lived ſafe and ſound,
By wicked hand of curſed wife his death at home he found.

E Semblably Egeſippus, ſaith thus of Claudius, Witneſſe here is Britaine, which living without the world, is by the might of Romans reduced into the world. Whom the former age knew not, the Romans victory hath diſcovered: and even they now are become ſervants, who knew not what ſervitude was: being born only for themſelves, and alwaies free unto themſelves: even they who being by the interflow of the ſea divided frō the power of their ſuperiors, could not ſtand in feare of them whom they knew not. A greater matter therfore it was, to have paſſed over to the Britans, than to have triumphed over the Britans. And in another place, Britaine alſo, which lieth hid amidſt the waves, he gained to the Roman Empire by force of armes: by the triumph over which Iſland, Rome was thought to be more welthy, Claudius reputed more
I wary and politick, and Nero eſteemed more fortunate. Alſo in another paſſage, which deſerveth
F moſt of all to be put downe here, The very Elements alſo, have done homage to the name of the Romans: to whom likewiſe even the round world hath ſworne alleageance already, which is encloſed and bounded with the Romane Empire: and in one word is of many called the Romane World. For if we ſearch into the truth, the whole army it ſelfe is compriſed within the Empire of the Romans: upon which the Roman valour, having gone forward ſtill beyond the Ocean, hath ſought for it ſelfe another world, and in Britaine an Iſland remote from the confines of Lands hath found out for a ſelfe another poſſeſſion. To conclude, they who are denied the benefit, not onely of the free burgesie of Rome, but in manner also of all converse with men, are directed and awarded thither, there to dwell as persons banished out of the world. The Ocean now hath reined up his bounds: For the Romans know how to seeke into his inward secret parts. And Iosephus in the person of Titus, speaketh thus to the Iewes: What greater wall and barre than the Ocean? wherewith the Britans being fenced and inclosed, doe yet adore the Romans forces. A

Moreover, as touching this argument, that renowned Ioseph Scaliger, in his Catalects, hath saved and freed from rust and mouldinesse certaine verses of a most learned Poet though unknown: which, because they are not every where to bee found, I will not thinke much of my paints to put down: for they are as good as good may be. B Now, that they be sundry Epigrams, and therefore distinctly to be considered, Iohn Obsopæus the German, a passing learned young man, hath out of ancient (manuscripts) parchments very lately, enformed me:

Now

Now let Tacitus proceed in his Story. Vntill this time all went well with Oſtorius: but A ſoone after, his fortune ſtood in dolefull termes: either for that upon the diſplacing of Caractacus as if thereby all had beene ſubdued and the warre ended, the Romans intended not ſo carefully their militarie ſervice: or becauſe the enemies in compaſſion of ſo puiſſant a king, were more fervently enflamed to revenge. For they environed the Camp-maſter and thoſe Legionary cohorts which were left behind to build fortreſſes in the Silures country: And if the villages and forts next adjoyning had not ſpeedily come to reſcue, they had beene put to the ſword every man. Nevertheleſſe the Camp-Maſter, with eight Centurions and all the forwardeſt maniples of common ſouldiers were ſlaine; and not long after, they put to flight our forragers, and the very troupes of horſemen that were ſent out to ſuccour them. Then B Oſtorius ſetteth out certaine companies lightly appointed, and yet thereby could not ſtay their flight, had not the Legions come in and undertooke the battell. By their ſtrength they fought with ſmall ods on either hand, but afterward wee had the better of it, and the enemie betooke himſelfe to his heeles and eſcaped with ſmall loſſe, becauſe the day was farre ſpent. After this, they had many skirmiſhes, and for the moſt part in manner of rodes and robberies; in woods, on mariſhes, raſhly or with foreſight it skilled not: according as it fell out, either as occaſion by chance, or their owne hearts ſerved them: one while for anger, another while for booty: ſometime by commandement from their Captaines, and ſometimes againe without C their warrant and privitie: but principally through the wilfull obſtinacie of the Silures, who were exaſperated with a ſpeech of the Roman Generalls, that was bruted abroad and came to their eares: which was this, That as the Sugambri were rooted out and tranſported over into Gaul, ſo the name of the Silures ſhould utterly be extinguiſhed. And in this heat they intercepted two auxiliary bands, as they through the avarice of their Prefects forraied and ſpoiled without adviſed circumſpection. Alſo by large giving away of ſpoiles and priſoners, they drew the reſt of the Nations to revolt. And then Oſtorius wearied with care and griefe of heart yielded up his vitall breath. Whereat the enemies rejoyced, as at the death of a Captaine not to be deſpiſed, who though he died not in battell, yet was toiled out and ſpent by reaſon of the warres.

A. Didius Avitus Gallus Propretor.

But Cæſar having intelligence of his Lieutenants death, leſt the Province ſhould bee de- D ſtitute of a governour, appointed A. Didius in his place. He beeing thither come with great ſpeed, yet found not all in good ſtate. For in the meane ſpace, the Legion whereof Manlius Valens had the charge, met with an unlucky and diſaſterous fight. The fame whereof the enemies had made greater than it was, to terrifie the captaine which was comming: who alſo in the like policie multiplied all that he heard, to win more praiſe by appeaſing thoſe troubles, or to purchaſe pardon more eaſily, if they continued ſtill. The Silures were they that wrought us this diſpleaſure and damage, whereupon they overran the province far and nere, untill ſuch time as by Didius his comming they were driven backe.

Nero.

About this time Claudius departed this life: and Nero ſucceeded him in the Empire, one E who had no heart at all to attempt any thing in warfare: nay he was minded once to withdraw the forces out of Britain: Neither gave he over that intent of his but onely for ſhame, leſt he might have been thought to deprave the glory of Claudius. After that Caractacus was taken, Venutius a very expert man above the reſt in military affaires, borne under the ſtate of the Iugantes*, long time truſty to us, and defended by the Romanes power, having to wife Queene Cartiſmandua, by occaſion ſoone after of a divorce, and then of open war beween them, rebelled alſo againſt us, and proceeded to plaine hoſtility. At the firſt, the quarrell was onely between them two: untill Cartiſmandua by pollicie and craft had intercepted the brother, and neere kinſmen of Venutius. Whereupon our enemies kindled with rage, and pricked forward with an ignominous indignity, leſt they ſhould be brought under the yoke of a womans government, with a ſtrong power of choiſe youth, by force of armes invaded her kingdome, which was foreſeen by us: and thereupon were cohorts ſent* F to aid her, and they fought a hot battell: The beginning whereof was doubtfull, but the end more joifull. The Legion alſo which Ceſius Naſica commanded, fought with like ſucceſſe. For, Didius [yee muſt thinke] being ſtrucken in yeeres, and having many honours heaped upon him, thought it ſufficient to execute his charge and keep off the enemy by the miniſtery of others. For what was woon by others he held: onely a few fortreſſes he built forward farther

A farther into the country: whereby he might purchase the name of enlarging his office. These exploits although they were atchieved by two Propretors Osterius and Didius in many years, yet I thought good to joyne together, lest beeing severed, they should not so well have beene remembred.

After Didius Avicus, there succeeded Verannius, who having with small rodes spoiled the Silures, was hindered by death, for warring any farther: a man while he lived carrying a great name of precise severitie, but in his last will he shewed himselfe manifestly ambitious. For after much flattering of Nero, he added this, That he would have subdued the Province unto his obedience, if he had lived the next two yeares. Verannius Propretor.

B But then Suetonius Paulinus governed the Britans, one in martiall skill, and opinion of the people (which suffereth no man without a concurrent) striving to match Corbulo; desirous to equall the honour which he won in recovering Armenia, by subduing the enemies that stood out in this country. And therefore hee maketh all the preparation hee can to invade the Isle of * Mona, peopled with strong Inhabitants, and a receptacle of traiterous fugitives. To this purpose hee buildeth flat-botom-vessels, for the shalowes and uncertaine landing places. Thus the footmen passed over: and then followed the horsemen by the foord, or if the waters were any thing high, by swimming they put the horses over. Against them C the enemies stood upon the shore in divers places embattelled thicke in array, well appointed with men and weapons; with women also running among: who all in blacke and mournefull array, with their haire about their eares, carried firebrands before them in their hands like the Furies of hell. The Druide likewise round about them, lifting up their hands to heaven, and pouring out deadly and cursing praiers, with this so strange and uncouth sight, amazed the souldiers so, as they stood still as stockes and stirred not a foot, as if they would expose their bodies to receive all wounds presented unto them. But afterwards, having encouraged by their Captaine, and animating one another, that they should not feare a flocke of women and franticke people, they displaied their ensignes and advanced forward. Downe they went with such as encountred them and thrust them within their owne fires. This done they planted garrisons in their townes, and cut downe their woods and groves consecrated to their execrable superstitions. For they accounted it lawfull, to offer sacrifice upD on their altars with the bloud of captives, and to aske counsell of their Gods by inspection of mens fibres and entrailes. Paulus Suetonius Propretor. * Angleſey. Druides. * Vsi ali victis, that is, over the vanquished.

As Suetonius was busie in these actions, newes came unto him that the Province was suddenly revolted. Prasutagus King of the Iceni, in wealth surpassing all others, had set downe in his will Cæsar with two of his daughters to be his heires; supposing by this kind of flattery to curry favour, and to make his kingdome and house most secured from all injuries. Which fell out farre otherwise: in so much as his kingdome by Centurions, his house by slaves were spoiled and reputed lawfull booties. And to beginne withall, his wife Boudicia was whipped, and his daughters defloured. The chiefest of the Iceni, as if the whole country had beene given them by way of gift, are turned out of their ancient inheritances, and the Kings kinsE folke reputed as slaves. By reason of which contumelious indignitie, and for feare of worse, considering they had beene reduced into the forme of a province, the Britaines began among themselves to cast and thinke upon the miseries of servitude, to lay together their wrongs and oppressions, in ripping of them up to aggravate them by constructions to the highest, in these tearmes: that no other good was to be looked for by sufferance, but that more grievous burdens should be imposed upon them still, as men ready to beare all willingly. That whereas in times past, their states had but one King a piece, now there were two thrust upon them: the Lieutenant, cruelly to suck their bloud, and the Procurator as greedy to preie upon that substance: That the variance of these rulers was the torments, and their agreement the undoing of the poore subjects: the one vexing by souldiers and Centurions, the oF ther by extortions and reprochfull abuses: so that now there was nothing safe from their unsatiable avarice, nothing freed from their unbridled lust. In warre and battell yet, the stronger man commonly is hee that maketh spoile; but now cowards for the most part, and weaklings are they that dispossesse them of their dwelling houses, bereave them of their children, enjoyne them to master, as if they were men that knew not to doe any thing else save only to die for their country. For otherwise, what a small handfull thinke yee of souldiers have Prasutagus. Boodicia, who also is named Boaducia Boudicia, Voadica, and Bunduica.

come over to ſerve, if the Britaines would fall to reckon themſelves? Thus Germany had ſhaken off the yoke of obedience, and yet were defended by a river only, and not by the Ocean: as for theſe Romans, what motives have they of warre but their owne covetouſneſſe, riot, and wanton luſt? whereas we have our native country, our wives and children to provoke us thereto. Surely they would retire and bee gone as ſometime Iulius, their canonized God, went his waies. if wee would endeavour to follow the valour and proëſſe of our anceſtors, and not be diſmaied with the doubtfull event of one skirmiſh or two: and commonly in ſuch as are diſtreſſed and in miſerie, there is more ſtomacke to attempt, and greater reſolution to continue. And even now the Gods alſo take pittie of the Britaines poore eſtate, who keepe the Roman Generall out of the way, and confine the Lieutenant with his hands full in another Iſland: and themſelves being aſſembled to adviſe together, had attained to the hardeſt points of all in an action of that nature, wherein without queſtion it is more dangerous to bee taken conſulting, than in the very action.

With theſe and ſuch inducements, inciting and quickning one another, they take armes under the conduct of Boodicia a Ladie of the roiall bloud (for in matter of government in chiefe the Britaines make no diſtinction of ſex) *having ſtirred up the Trinobants to Rebellion, and as many as yet, not broken to the yoke of ſervitude, had in ſecret conſpiracies vowed to recover and reſume their libertie, bearing a moſt bitter hatred againſt the old ſouldiers. For thoſe who newly brought into the Colonie Camalodunum, thruſt the ancient Inhabitants out of their houſes, diſſeized them of their Lands, Livings, calling them captives and ſlaves, whiles the new ſouldiers favoured & maintained the inſolent outrages of the old, in regard of conformitie in life & hope of like licenciouſneſſe. Beſides, a Temple erected in the honour of Claudius of ſacred memorie, as an Altar of perpetuall dominion over them, was an eieſore, & the Prieſts choſen under colour of religion, waſted & conſumed all their wealth. Now, it was not thought any hard piece of work to raze & deſtroy that Colonie, not fenſed with any fortifications: a thing not circumſpectly foreſeene of our captaines, whiles they had greater care of pleaſure, than profit. Amid theſe occurrences, the image of victory ſet up in Camalodunum, fell downe without any apparant cauſes, and turned backward, as if it would give place to the enemies. And certaine women diſtempered with ſome fanaticall furie, went ſinging by way of propheſie, that deſtruction was at hand. And ſtrange noiſes abroad were heard into their Counſell houſe, their Theatre reſounded with hideous howlings, and a ſtrange ſpectre, or apparition was ſeen in the arme of the ſea * there, a ſigne foretelling the ſubverſion of that Colonie. Furthermore, the Ocean bloudy in ſhew, and the ſhapes of mens bodies left after an ebbe, as the Britans conſtrued favourably to feed their owne hopes, ſo the old ſouldiers interpreted to the increaſe of their feare. But becauſe Suetonius was far off, they craved help of Catus Derianus the Procurator: who ſent unto them not paſſing two hundred, and thoſe but badly armed: and within the towne the number of ſouldiers which was not great, truſted to the fence of the Temple. And by reaſon that thoſe among them, which being privy to the ſecret cõſpiracie aforeſaid, troubled their deſignments, hindred them, they had neither made trench or rampier before the town, nor ſent away their old folke, and women, keeping the luſtie young men only, and ſo being ſecure, as it had been in the time of perfect peace, ſurprized they were at unawares, & encloſed round about with a multitude of barbarous people. And verily all other things were violently ſacked or conſumed with fire: the Temple only excepted, wherein the ſouldiers had gathered themſelves round together, which alſo was two daies together beſieged and ſo forced. Alſo, the Britans it their train of victory, encountring Petelius Cerealis Lieutenant of the ninth Legion, as he was comming with aid, put the legion to flight, & ſlew all the footmen. Cerealis himſelfe with the Cavallery eſcaped to the campe, & ſaved himſelfe within the fortifications. Vpon which overthrow, & in regard of the provinciall peoples hatred, driven through the avarice of the Romans to take armes, Catus the Procurator paſſed over in great haſte for feare, into Gaul. But Suetonius with conſtant reſolution, paſſing through the midſt of his enemies, went to Londinium, a towne verily by the name that it carried of a Colony, nothing famous, but for concourſe of merchants, & * proviſion of neceſſaries moſt of all other frequented. Being thither come, he ſtood doubtfull whether to chuſe it for the ſeat of war or no. And conſidering well the ſmall number of ſouldiers that he had, & by good proofs taught how Petilius paid for his raſhneſſe, he determined with the damage of one towne to ſave all the reſt whole.*

Neither

A *Neither could he bee won by the weeping and pitifull teares of thoſe that beſought his aide, but he would needs put out the ſignall of a remove, and receive all followers, as part of his armie to march along with him. As many therefore as weakneſſe of ſex, wearieſomneſſe of age, or pleaſantneſſe of the place held back, were all put to the ſword by the enemie. The like calamitie befell unto the free towne * Verulamium: becauſe the Barbarians leaving the caſtles & forts of garriſon ſouldiers, made ſpoile of the richeſt and fatteſt: and carrying their pillage into ſome place of ſafetie, as men glad of bootie, went on ſtill to ſuch as were of note and mark above the reſt. And thus to the number of ſeventie thouſand Roman citizens and aſſociats together, by*

B true report, were knowne to have been ſlaine in thoſe places before named. For there was no taking of priſoners, no ſelling of them, nor any other commerce and traffique of war, but killing, hanging, burning and crucifying, ſuch haſte they made to make havocke of all, as if they were to requite the meaſure they had ſuffered, and antiſipate in the meane while all revenge.

Now by this time Suetonius having with him the fourteenth Legion with the old ſouldiers, of the twentieth & the auxiliaries from the parts next adjoyning, was well neere ten thouſand ſtrong, when he reſolved to lay aſide all further delaies, and to trie the chance of a main battel. And ſo he chooſeth a place with a narrow entrance like a gullet, and encloſed behind with a wood: being well aſſured, that he had no enemies but in front, and that the plain lay open without feare of ambuſh. The Legionarie ſouldiers therefore, being marſhalled in thick rankes, and

C cloſe together, with the light armours about them, the horſemen were placed on either hand like wings. But the Britaine forces came leaping forth all abroad by troupes and companies, in ſuch a multitude as never the like elſe where at any other time, and with ſo fierce courage, as that they would needs bring their very wives with them, and place them in carts which they had beſtowed in the utmoſt parts of the plaine, to be witneſſes of the victorie.

Boodicia, having her daughters before her in a chariot, ever as ſhe came to any ſeverall nation (for it was the cuſtome verily of the Britans to make warre under the conduct of women) proteſted & told them, that ſhe was come then, not as a Lady deſcended of ſo noble progenitors, to make either Kingdome or riches her quarrell, but as one of the common people, in revenge of her libertie loſt, her body ſore whipped, and her daughters chaſtitie aſſailed by uncleane

D handling: That the Romans luſt and concupiſcence, was growne to ſuch a paſſe, that they ſpared no body, no not aged perſons, nor left their Virgins undefiled. Howbe it, the Gods (ſaith ſhe) are with us, and favor juſt revenge. For, the legion that came into the field, and durſt hazard a battell, was cut in pieces: the reſt are either hidden within campe and hold, or elſe ſeek meanes to eſcape by flight: ſo that they will never abide ſo much as the noiſe and crie of ſo many thouſands, much leſſe then their violent charge, and cloſe hand fight. If then they would weigh with her the power of their armed forces, and with all the motives of war, reſolve they ſhould either to vanquiſh in that battell, or to die: for her owne part, being but a woman, this was her reſolution: the men might live if they pleaſed, and ſerve as ſlaves.

Neither could Suetonius himſelfe, in ſo great an extremitie, hold his tongue: For although hee preſumed and truſted much upon valour, yet enterlaced hee exhortations & praiers. That

E *they ſhould contemne the lowd and vaine threats of the Barbarians. Among whom there were more women to be ſeene, than luſty young men. Unwarlike as they were and unarmed, they would preſently give ground, when they came once to feele & acknowledge the weapons & valour of thoſe cõquerors, by whom ſo often they had bin put to flight. For even in many legions, a few they bee that carry away the honour of the battell: and to their greater glory it would turne, if with a ſmall power they won the fame of a whole armie. Only this they muſt remember, marſhalled cloſe together as they ſtood, firſt with launcing ther Iavelins, and afterwards with the boſſes and pikes of their bucklers, and with their ſwords to continue in beating downe and killing them, and never to think all the while of any booty: for after victory ovce gotten, all would come to their ſhare. And firſt of all, the legion not ſtirring one foot, but keeping the ſtreights of the place aforeſaid, as a ſure defence, after that the enemies approching neerer within the juſt reach of ſhot, had ſpent all their darts, ſallied out, as it were, in pointed battels. was in their way, and made head againſt them. The reſidue ſhewed their backs, and had much adoe to flie and eſcape, by reaſon of the carts and waggons placed round about the plaine, which had blocked up the paſſages on every ſide. And the ſouldiers forbare not the execution ſo much as of the women: the very horſes and draught beaſts, were thruſt through with darts, which made the heape of dead bodies the greater. This was a day of great honour and renowne, comparable to the victories of old time: for, ſome report, that there were ſlaine few leſſe in number, than foureſcore thouſand Britans: but of our ſouldiers, there died not all out foure hundred, and not many more hurt. Boodicia ended her life with poiſon. And Pœnius Poſthumus campe-Maſter of the ſecond Legion, underſtanding of this proſperous ſucceſſe of the fourteenth, and twentieth Legions, becauſe he had defrauded his owne Legion of the like glorie, and, contrary to the order of ſervice, refuſed to obey the Captaines commandement, thruſt himſelfe through with his owne ſword. A B

After this, the whole armie being rallied together, kept the field ſtill, and lay encamped for to end the reſidue of the warre: and Cæſar augmented their forces by ſending out of Germanie two thouſand Legionarie ſouldiers, eight cohorts of auxiliaries, and a thouſand horſemen: by whoſe comming, they of the ninth Legion, had their companies ſupplied, and made up with the Legioners. The cohorts and cornets of horſe, were appointed to lodge in new wintering places: and all thoſe nations of the enemies, which were either doubtfull or knowne adverſaries, were waſted with fire and ſword. But nothing diſtreſſed them ſo much as famine, being negligent in ſowing of corne, by reaſon that of all ages they were given to warre: for that alſo they made full account to live of our proviſion, and as all other fierce and ſtout nations, ſlowly give eare to peace, becauſe Iulius Cliaſicianus, being ſent to ſucceed Catus, and at variance with Suetonius, hindred the common good with private grudges, and had given it out abroad, that they were to expect and tarrie for a new Lieutenant, who without any hoſtile rancour and pride of a Conqueror, would gently entreat and uſe with all clemencie ſuch as yielded unto him. Withall, he ſent word to Rome, that they ſhould looke for no end of warre, unleſſe ſome one or other ſucceeded Suetonius, upon whoſe overthwartneſſe, he laid all his ill proceedings, and attributed all fortunate ſucceſſe to the happy fortune of the common weale. C

To ſee therefore in what ſtate Britaine ſtood, Polycletus one of Neroes freed men was ſent: for, good hope he had, that by his authoritie there ſhould not onely be wrought a perfect agreement betweene the Lieutenant and the Procurator, but alſo that the rebellious minds of the Barbarians would be won to peace. Neither failed Polycletus, being with his mightie hoaſt burdenſome to Italie and Gaul, after he had paſſed the Ocean ſea, to ſhew himſelfe terrible even to our ſouldiers alſo. But to the enemies he was but a laughing ſtocke: who, whiles libertie was ſtill freſh on foot among them, knew not what the power of theſe freed men was: and they made a marvell of it that a Captaine and an armie, which had atchieved ſo great a war, ſhould yield to obey ſlaves. But of all theſe things the beſt was made to the Emperor. And Suetonius being buſied ſtill in theſe affaires, for that he had loſt afterwards ſome few Gallies upon the ſhore and the gallie ſlaves in them, as if the warre continued ſtill, was commanded to deliver up the armie to Petronius Turpilianus, who now was newly out of his Conſulſhip, as unto a man more exorable-unacquainted with the delinquencies of the enemies, and therefore more ready to accept of their repentance: who neither, incenſing the enemie, nor provoked by him, colouring a lazie and idle life with the honeſt name of peace, after hee had dared and done no more. but compoſed former troubles and debates, delivered the charge of the province unto Trebellius Maximus. D E

Petronius Turpilianus, Propretor.

Trebellius Maximus Propretor.

But he, a man unfit for action, and altogether unexpert in war-ſervice, by a kind of courteous and mild regiment entertained the country in quiet. For now the Britaines alſo had learned the good manners, not rudely to repulſe the ſugred aſſaults of flattering vices; and the diſturbance of civill diſſentions comming between, miniſtred a lawfull excuſe for his doing nothing. But much diſcord aroſe among them whiles the ſouldier, accuſtomed to warfare, waxt wanton with eaſe, and grew to be mutinous: and he for his niggardly ſparing and baſe taking of bribes, was both deſpiſed and hated of the armie. This hatred of theirs againſt him, was enflamed by Roſcius Cælius Lieutenant of the twentieth Legion, an ancient enemie of his, but now by occaſion of civill diſſentions, they were fallen out farther, and brake into more heinous tearmes. Trebellius objected ever and anon to Cælius, and charged him F

A him with factious behaviour, and confounding the order of disciplive: Cælius againe, that Trebellius had spoiled and beggered the Legions. But in the meane time, whiles the Lieutenants thus jarred, the modest cariage of the armie was marred: and the discord at length grew so great, that Trebellius was driven away with the railing of the Auxiliaries also, in cohorts and wings sorting themselves to Cælius side, was glad, as a man forsaken, to give place and flie to Vitellius. The Province although the Consular Lieutenant Generall was absent remained in quiet: whiles the Lieutenants of the Legions supplied the charge in right of equall authoritie: But Cælius indeed bare the greater stroke, because he was of more boldnesse.

B Whiles the Civill war betweene Galba, Otho and Vitellius grew hot, Vectius Bolanus was by Vitellius sent to succeed him. Neither troubled he Britanny with any discipline. The same default continued still against the enimies, and the like licentiousnesse in the campe: saving only that Bolanus a good honest harmelesse man, and not odious for committing any crime, had wonne himselfe love and good will in lieu of obedience: and albeit Vitellius sent for aids out of Britanny, yet Bolanus made no hast, for that Britain was never quiet enough. As for the Iland, that great favour and reputation in warlike affaires, which Vespasian had gotten, being Lieutenant there of the second Legion under Claudius, did easily win it unto him, yet not without some stir of the other Legions: wherein many centurions and souldiers who had bin advanced by Vitellius were loth to change that Prince whom they had proved already. And besides, the souldiers of the fourteenth Legion, called the subduers of Britain, removed from thence by Nero to the Caspian wars, and in the quarrell of Otho vanquished, were by Vitellius sent backe into Britanny, and called away againe by Mutianus letters. Vectius Bolanus Proprætor.

C For all this civill warre, no quarrell nor mutinies there were in the Britaine armie. And to say a truth, during all the troubles of civill warres, no Legions behaved themselves more harmelesse, either because they were farre off and severed by the Ocean, or for that they were taught by continuall service and soulderie, to hate the rather all hostility and dealing with enemies. Howbeit by meanes of these dissentions and rumours still of civill war, the Britaines tooke heart and rebelled, through the procurement of Venusius: who besides a naturall fiercenesse of courage, and hatred of the Roman name, was incensed particularly by pri-

D vate unkindnesses between him and his wife Queene Carthismandua. This Carthismandua was Queene of the Brigantes, of high and noble linag, who upon the delivery of King Caractacus whom shee tooke by fraud and sent to furnish and set out the triumph of Claudius (that glorious spectacle, I meane in manner of a triumph, wherein Caractacus was shewed) had woon favour with the Romans and greatly increased her strength. Whereupon ensued wealth: of wealth and prosperitie riotous and incontinent life: in so much, that casting off Venusius her husband, and intercepting his kinsfolke, shee joyned her selfe in marriage with Vellocatus his harnesse-bearer, and crowned him King: which foule fact was the overthrow immediately of her house. The good will of the country went generally with the lawfull husband: but the Queenes intemperate affections were peremptory and violent in maintaining Cartismandua.

E her minion the adulterer. Whereupon Venutius, by the helpe of friends which he procured, and the revolt of the Brigantes themselves, made warre upon Carthismandua, and brought her into great extremities. Then upon her instant praier unto the Romans for aid, our garrisons, cohorts and wings were sent to defend her: which after sundry skirmishes with divers event, delivered the Queenes person out of perill, but the kingdome remained to Venutius, and the warre unto us.

Now when as the state of Rome Citie, was for Vespasian governed by Mutianus, hee made Iulius Agricola who was gone to side with Vespasian, and had behaved himselfe with great integritie and courage, Lieutenant of the two and twentieth Legion in Britanny, a Le-

F gion which slowly had sworne allegiance to Vespasian, In which province his predecessour by report seditiously demeaned himselfe. For the said Legion was out of awe, or rather it overawed even Lieutenants generall that had beene Consuls. Neither was the ordinarie Legions Lieutenant, who had beene but Prætor, of power sufficient to restrain and keepe it under, whether it were through his owne weaknesse, or the stubborne disposition of the souldiers, it is not certaine. Thus being elected both to succeede and revenge, hee shewed an example of most rare moderation in making choice to bee thought rather to have found them, than to have Vespasian Emperor. Jul. Agricola Lieutenant over the twentieth Legion.

made them dutifull ſouldiers. And albeit that Vectius Bolanus Lieutenant Generall of Britannie for the time being, governed in a gentler and milder manner, than was fit for ſo fierce a Province: Yet under him Agricola cunningly conforming himſelfe to that humor, and not unlearned to joyne profitable counſels with honeſt, tempered the heat of his owne nature that it might not grow upon him ſtill. A

But when as Veſpaſian recovered together with the reſt of the world, Britanny alſo, brave captaines, good ſouldiers were ſent, and the enemies hope was greatly abated. For ſtraightwaies Petilius Cerialis ſtrooke a terror into them, by invading at his firſt entry the Brigantes, thought to be the moſt populous ſtate of the whole Province. Many battels were fought, and ſome bloudy: And the greateſt of the Brigantes he either conquered or waſted. B

Petilius Cerealis Proprætor.

And whereas Cerialis would doubtleſſe have dimmed the diligence and fame of another ſucceſſor, Iulius Frontinus a great man ſuſtained alſo as hee might, after ſuch a predeceſſor that waightie charge with reputation and credit: who ſubdued the puiſſant and warlike people of the Silures, where he had beſide the vertue of the enemie, ſtruggled with the ſtreights and difficult places.

Julius Frontinus Proprætor.

In this eſtate Agricola found the Province, and the wars thus far proceeded in, when as about the middeſt of ſummer he paſſed the ſeas: at what time the ſouldiers, as if the ſeaſon were paſt, attended an end for that yeare of their ſervice, and the enemie occaſions to begin for to hurt. The Ordovices a little before he entred the land, had hewed almoſt wholly in pieces a wing which lay in their borders. Vpon which beginning the countrey being awaked, as men deſirous of warre allowed the example: and ſome ſtaied to ſee how the new Lieutenant would take it. C

Jul. Agricola Proprætor.

Then Agricola, although the Summer was ſpent, and the bands lay diſperſed in the Province, and his ſouldiers had fully preſumed of reſt for that yeare, which hindred much, and croſſed directly his undertaking of warre, moſt men alſo being of opinion, rather to keepe and aſſure the places ſuſpected, all this notwithſtanding, reſolved fully to encounter the danger: having gathered therefore the enſignes of the Legions, and ſome few Auxiliaries, becauſe the Ordovices durſt not deſcend into indifferent ground, himſelfe before the voward, to give others like courage in the like danger, led up in battell-ray to encounter the enemie. And having ſlaughtered almoſt the whole nation, knowing full well that fame muſt with inſtance be followed, and as the firſt fell out, ſo the reſt would ſucceede, hee deliberated to conquer the Iſland * Mona, from the poſſeſſion whereof, as before I have rehearſed, Paullinus was revoked by the generall rebellion of Britannie: But as in purpoſes not reſolved on before, ſhips being wanting, the pollicie and reſoluteneſſe of the captaine deviſed a paſſage over. For he commanded the moſt choiſe of the Aid-ſouldiers, to whom all the foords and ſhallowes were knowne, and who after the uſuall practiſe of their countrie, were able in ſwimming to governe all at once themſelves, their armour and horſes, laying aſide their carriage, to put over at once, and ſuddenly invade them. Which thing ſo amazed the enemie, attending for a fleet, for ſhipping, for tide, that they ſurely believed nothing could bee hard or invincible to men that came ſo minded to war. Whereupon they humbly intreated for peace, and yielded the Iſland. Thus Agricola at his firſt entry into this province (which time other conſume in vaine oſtentation or ambitious ſeeking of complements) entring withall into labors and dangers, became famous indeed and of great reputation. D E

* Angleſey.

Neither abuſed Agricola the proſperous proceeding of his affaires to vanity or braving in ſpeeches, as to tearme it an exploit or a conqueſt, thus to have kept in order perſons ſubdued before: or to bedeck with lawrell his letters of advertiſement, but by ſtopping and ſuppreſſing the fame he augmented it the more: whiles men began to diſcourſe, upon what great preſumptions of future ſucceſſe, hee ſhould make ſo light an account of ſuch great actions already performed, as not to ſpeake a word of them.

Now as touching civill government: Agricola knowing right well the diſpoſition and mind of the Province, taught alſo by the experience of others, that armes availe little to ſettle a new conquered State, if injuries and wrongs bee permitted, determined to cut off all cauſes of warres. And beginning at home, his owne houſe firſt of all he reformed and reſtrained, a point of as much hardneſſe with many, as to governe a province. He committed no manner of publike affaires to bond men or freed; hee admitted no ſouldier about his perſon either F upon

A upon private affection of partiall suiters; or upon the commendation and intreatie of Centurions, but elected simply the best, presuming the same to be the most faithfull. He would see into all things, but not exact all things to the rigor: Light faults he would pardon, and the great severely correct: not alwaies proceeding to punish, but often content with repentance: thusing rather not to preferre unto office and charge such as were like to offend, than after offence to condemne them. The augmentation of corne and tributes, he mollified with equall dividing of charge and burthen, cutting away those petty extortions, which grieved the subject more than the tribute it selfe. For, the poore people were constained in a mockery to waite at the barnes fast locked against them, and first to buy the corne, then after to sell it at a price. B Severall waies were enioyned, and far distant places by the purveiors commandement: that the country should carry from the neereſt standing-camps to those which were far off & out of the way, till that which lay open to all, and at hand, was turned in fine to the gaine of a few. By repressing these abuses presently in his first yeare, a good opinion was conceived from him of peace, which either by the negligence or connivence of former Lieutenants was now no lesse feared than warre.

At this time died Vespasian, unto whom for these victories of the leaders, and his owne vertue under Claudius, Valerius Flaccus before his Poeme thus speaketh;

C Tuq; ô pelagi cui major aperti
Fama, Caledonius post quam tua carbasa vexit

Vpon which kind of proceeding, many states that stood upon termes of equalitie before that day, gave hostages and meekely submitted themselves, receiving garrison, and permitting to fortifie, which he so wisely and with such great foresight and reason performed that nothing was ever attempted against them: whereas before, no new fortified place in all Britanny escaped unassailed.*

The winter ensuing was spent in most profitable and politicke devises. For, whereas the Britaines were rude and dispersed, and therefore prone upon every occasion to warre, hee to induce them by pleasures unto quietnesse and rest, exhorted them in private, and helpt them in E common to build temples, houses and places of publique resort, commending the forward and checking the slow: imposing thereby a kind of necessitie upon them whiles each man contended to gaine honour and reputation thereby. And now by this time the Noble mens sonnes he tooke and instructed in the liberall sciences, preferring the wits of the Britaines before the students of France, as being now curious to attaine the eloquence of the Roman language, whereas they lately rejected their speech. After that, our attire grew to be in account and the Gowne much used among them. So, by little and little they fell to these provocations of vices, to sumptuous galleries & bathes, yea and exquisite banquettings: which things the ignorant termed civility being indeed a part of their bondage. In the third yeare of his wars, he discovered new countries, wasting along till he came to the firth of Taus. Which thing so terrified the enemies;* Tau Firth. Twede as some thinke. They which were skilfull that way, observed, that never any Captaine did more advisedly chuse his places. No Castle planted by Agricola ever was, either forced by strength, or upon conditions surrendred, or as not defensible, forsaken. Many times they issued forth: for, against a long siege, they were stored with a whole yeares provision. So, they wintered there without feare, every garrison guarding it selfe*

and needing no helpe of their neighbours, the enemies aſſaulting ſometimes, but in vaine, without ſucceſſe, and driven thereupon to deſpaire. For, the loſſes of Summer they were commonly wont before, to repaire with winter events: but now, ſummer and winter alike they went to the worſe. In all theſe actions, Agricola never ſought to draw unto himſelfe, the glory of any exploit done by another: but were it Centurion, or of other degree, hee would faithfully witneſſe the fact, and yield him alwaies his due commendation. By ſome, hee is ſaid to have beene ſomewhat bitter in checks and rebukes: and indeed, the man was, as toward the good of a moſt ſweet diſpoſition, ſo to the bad and lewd perſons unpleaſant and ſower enough. But this choler paſſed away with his words: cloſeneſſe in him and ſilence you needed not to feare: hee eſteemed it more honeſt to offend, then to hate. A B

The fourth ſummer was ſpent in peruſing, and ordering that which he had over-run. And if the valiant minds of the armies, and glory of the Roman name, could have permitted or accepted it ſo, they needed not to have ſought other limit of Britaine. For, Glotta and Bodotria two armes of two contrary ſeas, ſhooting a mightie way into the land, are onely divided aſunder by a narrow partition of ground: which paſſage was guarded and fortified then with garriſon and caſtle: ſo that the Romans were abſolute Lords of all on this ſide, having caſt out the enemie, as it were, into another Iſland.

The fifth yeare of the warre, Agricola firſt taking ſea there, went over, and ſubdued with many and proſperous conflicts nations before that time unknowne: and he furniſhed with forces, that part of Britannie, which lieth againſt Ireland, more in hope, than for feare. For Ireland, if it might have beene wonne, lying between Britannie and Spaine, and fitly alſo for the French ſea, would aptly have united, to the great advantage of the one and the other, theſe ſtrongeſt members of the Empire together. In bigneſſe it is inferiour to Britannie: howbeit, bigger than the Iſlands of our ſea. The ſoile, and temperature of the aire, the nature and faſhions differ not much from the Britiſh. The ports and places of acceſſe, are better knowne by reaſon of more commerce and frequenting of merchants. Agricola had received before, a Prince of that country driven out by civill diſſention, whom under colour of courteſie and friendſhip, he retained till occaſion ſhould ſerve. I have heard him oftentimes ſay, that with one Legion, and ſome few Aides, Ireland might bee wonne and poſſeſſed: that it were alſo a ſtrength for our Britiſh affaires, If the Roman forces were planted each-where, and libertie baniſht, as it were, quite out of ſight.

Ireland. C D

About this time died Titus, who for theſe valiant Acts exploited by Agricola, was the fifteenth time named Imperator, as Xiphilinus writeth, and an ancient piece of coine witneſſeth with him. Then Agricola under Domitian in the ſummer which began the ſixth yeare of his office, becauſe a generall riſing in armes of all the farther Nations, beyond Bodotria was feared, & paſſages were all beſet with a power of the enemies, manned a fleet to ſearch the Creeks and Harboroughes of that ample region, which lieth beyond it. Which being by Agricola then firſt taken, and emploied as a part of his ſtrength, followed after a long, and made a goodly brave ſhew, while at one time warre both by ſea and land went forward. And oft it ſo chanced, that the horſeman, footman, and ſea-ſouldier met, and made merrie in the ſame campe one with another, extolling and magnifying, each their owne proweſſe and adventures: making their vaunts & compariſons ſouldier-like, the one of the woods & high mountaines, the other of dangerous tempeſts and billowes: the one, of the land and enemie conquered, the other of the Ocean ſubdued. The Britains, as by the priſoners was underſtood, were amazed alſo at the ſight of the navie, as though now the ſecrets of their ſea were diſcloſed, and no refuge remained if they were overcome. Whereupon the Caledonians arming with great preparation, and greater bruit thereof, as the manner is of matters unknowne, having of themſelves firſt ſet in hand to aſſault our Caſtles, braved our men, and put them in feare as Chalengers: inſo much that ſome of our ſide, who would ſeeme to be wiſe, but were daſtards indeed, counſelled the Generall to retire on this ſide Bodotria, and that the beſt courſe was to depart of their own accord, rather than to be repelled with ſhame: in the mean while Agricola takes knowledge, that the enemies meant to divide themſelves, and to give the onſet in ſeverall Companies: whereupon leſt hee ſhould bee encloſed about, and entrapped by their multitude, and skill in the country, he alſo marched with his armie divided in three. Which when it was knowne to the enemie, they on a ſodaine changing adviſe, and uniting their forces together, joyntly aſ- E F

A saulted by night the ninth Legion, as being of weakeſt reſiſtance: and having ſlaine the watch, partly aſleep, and partly amazed with feare, brake into the campe. And now were they fighting within the very trenches, when Agricola having intelligence given him by Spies, what way the enemies had taken and following withall their footſteps, commanded the lighteſt horſemen and footmen to play on their backs, and maintaine the skirmiſh, and the whole armie anone, to ſecond them with a ſhout. And when it drew neere to day, the glittering of the enſignes was ſeene. So the Britaines were quailed with a duple danger: but the Romans recovered courage againe, and being paſt perill of their perſons, fought now for their honour, freſhly aſſailing
B their late aſſailers. And verily within the ſtreights of the gates, the conflict was ſharpe and cruell, till in the end the enemies were forced to flie; whileſt both our armies contended: the one would ſeeme to have helped their fellows, the other to have needed none other to help them: and if the bogs and wood had not covered their flight, that one victory had ended the warre. Vpon this battell ſo manfully fought, ſo famouſly wonne, the armie preſuming, that to their proweſſe all things were eaſie and open, cried, To lead into Caledonia, and to find out the limit of Britan with a courſe of a continued Conqueſts: and even thoſe who ere while were ſo warie and wiſe, waxt forward enough after the event, and grew to ſpeak bigly: ſuch is the hard condition of warres; If ought fall out well, all challenge a part, misfortunes are ever imputed to
C one. Contrariwiſe, the Britans preſuppoſing that not valour, but the cunning of the Generall, by uſing the occaſion had carried it away, abated no whit of their ſtomacke; but armed their youth, tranſported their children and wives into places of ſafetie, and ſought by aſſemblies and religious rites, to eſtabliſh an aſſociation of their Cities and States together. And ſo for that yeare both parties departed away incenſed.

The ſame ſummer, a cohort of Vſipians, levied in Germanie, and ſent over into Britan, committed a hainous and memorable Act. For having ſlaine a Centurion, and certaine ſouldiers intermingled among other manciples, and ſet over them for direction of diſcipline, they fled and embarqued themſelves in three pinnaces, compelling by force the Maſters of the ſaid veſſels, to execute their charge: and only one doing his office, the other two being ſuſpected, and thereupon ſlaine, this ſtrange going out, and putting to ſea, the fact as yet not noiſed abroade, was gazed and wondred at: afterwards being driven uncertainly hither and thither, and ha-D ving skirmiſhed with the Britains ſtanding in defence of their owne, often prevailing and ſometimes repulſed, they came at laſt to that miſerie, that they were enforced to eat one another, firſt the weakeſt, then as the lot lighted. Thus after they had floated round about Britain, and loſt their veſſels for lacke of government, they were intercepted firſt by the Suevians, then by Friſians, as Pirats and Rovers. Now, ſome of them there were, that being bought by merchants as ſlaves, and by change of Maſters brought to our ſide of the river grew into a name by giving firſt notice of ſo great and ſo rare an adventure.

* Thoſe about Zutphen.

* Britaine is ſailed round about.

In the beginning of Summer, Agricola was deepely touched with a grievous miſchance that happened in his owne houſe: for, he loſt his owne Sonne about a yeare old. Which infortunate hap, he neither bare out, as moſt of theſe great men do in the like caſe, vaine-glorioufly, nor E tooke it againe ſo impatiently with ſorrow and lamentation, as women are wont: and amidſt his mourning, uſed the warre as one of his remedies. Therefore having ſent his fleete afore, which by ſpoiling in ſundry places, ſhould induce a greater and more uncertaine terrour upon his enemies, hee made ready, and followed after with his armie, joyning thereto ſome of the valianteſt Britaines, whom by long experience in peace, he had found moſt faithfull, and ſo came as farre as to the mount Grampias, where the enemies were lodged before. For the Britans nothing danted with the event of the former battell, and attending for nothing elſe but revenge or ſervitude, and being taught at length, that common danger muſt bee repelled with concord, by embaſſages and league made, had raiſed the power of all their Cities and States together. And now by this time there were entred into the field, the view being taken, above
F thirty thouſand armed men: beſides an endleſſe number of youth, which daily flocked to them ſtill, yea, and luſty old men renowned in warr, and bearing every one the badge due to their honour: at what time, among many other leaders, Galgacus for his valour & birth the principall man, ſeeing the multitude thus aſſembled hotly to demand battell, is ſaid to have uſed this ſpeech unto them: When I view and conſider the cauſes of this warre, and our preſent neceſſitie, I have reaſon, me ſeemes, to preſume, that this day, and this your agreeing conſent, will give a happy beginning to the freedome of the whole Iſland. For, both have we all hitherto lived in liberty; & beſides, no land remaineth beyond, no, nor ſo much as ſea for our ſafegard: The Romane navie, thus as you ſee, hoovering upon our coaſts: ſo that Combat and armes, which valiant men deſire for honour, the doſtard muſt alſo uſe for his beſt ſecuritie: the former battels which have with divers events been fought againſt the Romanes, had their hope and refuge reſting in our hands: Becauſe we, the flower of the Britiſh Nobilitie, and ſeated therefore the furthermoſt in, never ſeeing the coaſts of the countries which ſerve in ſlaverie, have kept even our eies unpolluted, and free from all contagion of tyrannie. Beyond us is no land, beſide us none are free; us hitherto this very corner, and the inward receſſe, as it were, of fame hath defended. Now the uttermoſt point of Britannie is laid open: & things, the leſſe they have bin within knowledge, the greater is the glory to atchive them. But no nation now is there beyond us; nothing but water, nothing but rockes, and the Romans even among them, more infeſt than all beſides. Whoſe intolerable pride in vaine ſhall a man ſeeke to avoide with any obſequious ſervice, and humble behaviour: Fobbers as they be of the world, who having now left no more land to ſpoile, ſearch alſo the ſea. If their enemies be rich, they covet their wealth: if poore, they ſeeke to gaine glorie: Whom neither the Eaſt nor the Weſt, is ever able to ſatisfie: the onely men of all memorie, that ſeeke out all places, be they wealthy, or be they poore with like affection. To take away by maine force, to kill and to ſpoile, they faſly terme Empire and government: when they lay all waſte as a wilderneſſe, that they call peace. That every man ſhould hold his owne children and bloud moſt deare, Nature hath ordeined: and even thoſe are preſſed for ſouldiers, and carried away to ſerve as ſlaves elſwhere. Our wives and ſiſters, if they be not violently forced as in open hoſtilitie, are in the meane time under the colour and title of friends, and gueſts often abuſed. Our goods and ſubſtance, they draw from us for tribute, our corne for proviſion. Our verie bodies and hands they weare out and conſume, in paving of bogs; and ridding of woods, with a thouſand ſtripes and reproachfull indignities beſides. Slaves yet, which be borne to bondage, are bought and ſold once for all, aud afterwards fedde and found at their owners expences. But Britannie daily buyeth, dayly feedeth, and is at daily charge with her owne bondage. And as in a private retinue of houſhold ſervants, the freſh man and laſt commer, is laughed and ſcoffed at by his very fellowes: even ſo, in this old ſervitude of the whole world, our deſtruction only is ſought, as being the lateſt and vileſt in account of all other. For, fields we have none to manure, no mines to be digged, no ports to trade in, for which purpoſes and emploiments we ſhould be reſerved alive. And as for the manhood and fierce courage of the ſubject, it pleaſeth not much the jelous Soveraign. And this very corner being ſo ſecret and far out of the way, the more ſecurity it yeeldeth to us, in them it works the greater ſuſpicion. So ſeeing all hope of pardon is paſt, at the length take courage, to defend and maintaine your ſafety as well as your honor, things moſt deere and pretious unto you. The Trinobantes, led by a woman fired a Colonie, forced campe and caſtle; and if ſuch a lucky beginning had not ended in ſloth and ſecurity, they might with eaſe have ſhaken off the yoke. We as yet were never touched, never foiled nor ſubdued: as men therefore that mind to maintain their freedome, not for the preſent but for ever, let us ſhew ſtraitwaies in the firſt joining, what manner of men Caledonia reſerved in ſtore for her ſelfe. Or do yee thinke the Romanes to be as valiant in war, as they are wanton in peace? No, it is not by their owne vertue, but by our jarrings and diſcords they are grown into fame, and the faults of their enemies they abuſe to the glory of their owne armie, compoſed of moſt divers nations, and therefore as by preſent proſperity holden together, ſo if fortune once frowne it doubtleſſe will diſſolve: unleſſe ye ſuppoſe, the Frenchmen and Germanes, and (to our ſhame be it ſpoken) many of our owne Nation which now lend their lives to eſtabliſh a forrain uſurper, and yet have beene enemies longer than ſervants, to be led and induced with any true harted and loyall affection. Nay, it is feare and terror, weake links and bounds of love: Remove them once, thoſe which ſhall ceaſe to feare, will ſoone begin to hate. All things to incite unto victory are on our ſide. No wife to encourage the Romanes, no parents to upbraid them if they flee: moſt have either no country at all, or els ſome other. A the vaine ſhew and glittering of gold and ſilver terrifie us, which neither defendeth nor offendeth. And even amongſt our enemies in the field we ſhall find of our ſide. The Britaines will agnize their owne cauſe. The French will call to remembrance their freedome and former eſtate: the reſt of the Germans will leave and forſake them as of late the Vſipians did. And what elſe then have we to feare? the Caſtles are emptie, the colonies peopled with aged and impotent perſons: the free Cities diſcontent and in factions, whiles thoſe which are under, obey with ill will, and they that doe governe, rule againſt right. Here is the Generall, and here is the armie: There are the tributes, there be the mettall mines, and other miſeries inſeperably following them that live under the ſubjection of others: which either to continue and endure

B for ever, or ſtraight to revenge, it lieth this day in this field. Wherefore, as yee are going to battell, beare in your minds both the freedome of your anceſtors, and the bondage of your poſteritie.

This ſpeech they cheerefully received, as well with a ſong after their barbarous manner, as with confuſed acclamations and diſſonant noiſes. And as the companies cluſtered together and glittering armour appeared, whiles the boldeſt advanced forward, and withall, the rankes were putting themſelves in array; Agricola, albeit his ſouldiers were glad of that day, and ſcarce with words could be with-holden, ſuppoſing it beſt to ſay ſomewhat, encouraged them
C in this wiſe.

Fellow ſouldiers and companions in armes: Your faithfull ſervice and diligence theſe 8. yeares ſo painfully ſhewed, by the vertue and fortune of the Roman Empire, hath conquered red Britanny. In ſo many journies, in ſo many battells, we were of neceſsitie to ſhew our ſelves either valiant againſt the enemie, or patient and laborious almoſt above and againſt nature it ſelfe. In which exploits wee have hitherto borne our ſelves both, ſo that neither deſired I better ſouldiers, nor you other Captaine. Inſomuch as we have exceeded the limits, I, of my predeceſſor, and you of yours. To the end of Britannie wee have found, not by fame and report, but we are with our armes and pavillions really inveſted thereof. Britain I ſay, is found and ſubdued. In marching, when the paſſage over bogs, mountaines and rivers toiled you out, how oft have I heard every valiant ſouldier ſay, when will the enemie preſent himſelfe? when ſhall wee fight? Loe, they are now put up out of their holes, and hither they are come.
D Your wiſh, loe, is here, and place for your vertue: yea and all things to follow in an eaſie and expedite courſe if you win: but all againſt you, if you leeſe. For, as to have gone ſo much ground, eſcaped through the woods, paſſed over the friths, is honourable forward: ſo, if we doe flee, the vantages wee have this day will become our greateſt diſadvantage. For wee are not skilled ſo well in the country, we have not the like ſtore of proviſion: but hands wee have and weapons, and therein all things included. For my part, I am long ſince reſolved, that it is not ſafetie either for ſouldier or Generall to ſhew their backs, and therefore a commendable death is better than life with reproach, and commonly, ſafetie and honour are dwelling together: or if ought ſhould miſhappen, even this will bee a glory, to have died in the uttermoſt end of the world and nature. If new nations and ſouldiers unknowne were in the field, I would
E by the example of other armies embolden and encourage you: now, recount you your owne victorious exploits, and aske your owne eies. Theſe are the ſame men, which the laſt yeare aſſailed one legion by ſtealth in the night, and were by a blaſt of your mouth overthrowne: Theſe of all other Britans, have been the moſt nimble in running away, and therefore have ſcaped the longeſt alive. For, as in forreſts and woods, the ſtrongeſt beaſts are chaſed away by main force, the cowardly and fearefull are ſcared with the very noiſe of the hunters: ſo the moſt valiant of the Britiſh nation, long ſince have been by you diſpatched and ſlaine, the raſcall herd of daſtardly cowards only remaineth: whom at length we have found, not as having intended to ſtay and make head, but at laſt overtaken, and by extreme paſſion of feare ſtanding as ſtocks, preſenting occaſion to us in this place of a worthy and memorable victory. Make an end there-
F fore once for all of your warfare: and to fiftie yeares travells let this day impoſe a glorious concluſion: Approve to your country, that the Armie could never juſtly be charged, either with protracting the warre, or pretences for not accompliſhing the conqueſt.

As Agricola was yet ſpeaking, the ſouldiers gave great tokens of fervencie, and when hee had ended, ſeconded the ſpeech with a joyfull applauſe, and ran ſtraightwaies to their weapons. Agricola ſeeing them ſufficiently animated, and ruſhing furiouſly forward, ordered his men in this manner. With the auxiliary footmen being eight thousand, he fortified the middle battell: three thousand of their horse he put on both sides in the wings: commanding the Legions to stand behind before the trench of the camp to the greater glory of the victory, if it were obtained without shedding any Roman bloud, otherwise for assistance and succour, if the vantgard should be repelled. The Britans were marshalled on the higher ground, fitly both for shew, and also to terrifie: The first battalion standing on the plaine, the rest in the assent of the hill knit and rising, as it were, one over another. The middle of the field was filled with the clattering of chariots and horsemen. Then Agricola perceiving the enemy to exceed him in number, and fearing left hee should be assailed on the front and flancks both at one instant: displaied his army in length: and although by that meanes his battell would become disproportionably long, and many advised him to take in the Legions, Yet being more forward to hope, than yeelding to feare, he rejected the counsell, and leaving his horse avanced himselfe before the ensignes on foot.

In the first encounter before the joining, both sides discharged and threw: Wherein the Britans both employing art, and shewing resolution with their great swords and little targuets a voided our shot, or shooke them off; darting withall great store of theirs against us: till at length Agricola spying his vantage, exhorted three Batavian cohorts, and two of the Tungrians to presse forward and bring the matter to handy strokes and dint of sword: a thing, which they in respect of long service were able readily to performe: and contrariwise to the enemy prejudiciall and hurtfull, by reason of their small bucklers and huge swords, For the swords of the Britans being blunt pointed were no way for the close or for the open fight. Now as the Batavians began to deale blowes and lay about them, to strike with the pikes of their bucklers, to mangle their faces, and having overborne in the plaine all that resisted, to march up the hill, the rest of the cohorts gathering heart upon emulation, violently beat downe all about them, and many halfe dead or wholly untouched were left, for hast of winning the victory.

In the meane time, the troups of the horsemen began to flee: and the charriotters mingled themselves with the battell of the footmen: who albeit they had lately terrified others, were now distressed themselves, by the unevennesse of the ground, and thicke rankes of their enemies. Neither was the forme of this fight, like a loose skirmish of horsemen to and fro. But standing still, and maintaining their places, they sought withall by maine weight of horses to breake in and beare downe one another. The wandring waggons also and masterlesse horses affrighted, as feare caried them, over-bare many times, those which met them, or thwarted their way. Now, the Britans, which stood aloofe from the battell, on the heigth of the hils, and at their good leasure disdained our fewnesse, began to come downe by little and little, and to wheele about the backs of our men that were now in traine of winning the field; but that Agricola suspecting as much, opposed against them foure wings of horsemen purposely retained about him, for sudden dispatch, and all chances of war; and so, by repulsing them backe, as sharply as they ran fiercely to assaile, put them in rout. Thus the counsell of the Britans turned upon their owne heads, and the wing, by commandement of the leader turning quite from the battell in front, followed the enemy at the back, and pursued the chase. Then might you have seen in the open fields a grievous and pitifull spectacle, coursing, wounding, taking, and killing of them that were taken, when others were offred. Now whole regiments of the enemies according to their severall dispositions, armed though they were, and more in number, turned their backs to the fewer: others unarmed sought their own death, offring themselves voluntarily to the slaughter. Every where there lay scattered, weapons, bodies, and mangled limbs, and the ground was every where embrued with bloud: and sometime even in them that were overcome, appeared both anger and valour: For, when they approached the woods, uniting themselves; they entrapped unawares some of the formost of our men which unadvisedly followed, not knowing the country. And but that Agricola with his presence every where assisted at need, setting about them certain cohorts of his bravest and most ready footmen, as it were in forme of a toile, and commanding some of his horsemen to forego their horses where the passes were narrow, and others, where the wood was thin to enter on horseback, no doubt we had taken some blow by our overmuch boldnesse. But after they saw our men again in strong array and good order to follow the chase, they fled, not in troupes

A troupes as before, and attending each other, but utterly disbanded and ſingle, and eſchuing all company, toward the farre remote and deſart places. The night and our ſatietie of blood made an end of the chaſe. Of the enemies ſide ten thouſand were ſlaine: three hundred and forty of ours. Amongſt whom was Aulus Atticus Captaine of a cohort, upon a youthfull heat of his owne, and through the fierce ſpirit of his horſe, being carried into the midſt of his enemies. That night, the winners for their parts ſolaced themſelves with the victorie and ſpoile: and the Britans ſcattering out of order, crying and howling, (men and women together) take and draw with them their hurt perſons, call unto them that were not hurt, forſake their owne houſes, and in deſpight alſo ſet them on fire themſelves: chuſe out holes for to lurke

The day following diſcovered more plainely the greatneſſe of the victorie. Every where deſolation and ſilence: no ſtirring in the mountaines: the houſes fired and ſmoaking a far off: no man to meet with our ſpies; who being ſent abroad into all quarters found by their footſteps the flight was uncertaine, and that they were no where in companies together. This ſtate of affaires in Britaine Agricola ſignified by letter without any amplifying termes, to Domitian: who after his manner, with a cheerefull countenance and grieved heart, received the newes: being inwardly pricked, to think that his late counterfeit triumph of Germany, wherein certaine ſlaves bought*
E for mony were attired, and their haire dreſſed as captives of that country, was had in deriſion and juſtly ſkorned abroad: whereas now, a true and great victorie, ſo many thouſands of enemies being ſlaine, was famous and currant in every mans mouth: that it were indeed a moſt perilous point if a private mans name ſhould bee exalted above the name of the Prince. Mary then in vaine had he ſuppreſſed the ſtudy of Oratory, and all other worthy politick arts, if he ſhould in military glory be deſpiſed by another: For other matters might more eaſily be paſſed over; but to be a good commander of an army was a vertue above private eſtate; and peculiar for a Prince. Wherefore he commanded that all the honours of triumphall ornaments, image triumphall and what elſe uſually was conferred in lieu of triumph, ſhould in Senate bee awarded unto him in moſt ample and honourable termes: and ſending a ſucceſſor, cauſed withall a bruit to be ſpred, that the province of Syria then lying void by the death of Atilius Rufus a conſular Lieutenant, and reſerved for men of great qualitie, was purpoſed unto him. And a common opinion went, that Domitian ſending one of his moſt ſecret and truſty ſervants to Agricola, ſent withall the patent of Syria with inſtruction, that if he were in Britaine it ſhould be delivered: and that the ſame man meeting Agricola as he croſſed the ſeas, without ſpeaking unto him or doing his meſſage, returned againe to Domitian. Whether this were true or fained and ſurmiſed probably, as correſpondent to the Princes diſpoſition, I cannot affirme: But in the meane ſeaſon Agricola had delivered to his ſucceſſor the Province in good and peaceable ſtate. And leſt his arrivall at Rome ſhould bee noted, by reaſon of the multitudes of people, which would goe out to ſee & to meet him, cutting off that courteſie of his friends, he entred the City by night,

Saluſtius Lucullus Lieutenant Generall over Britaine.

Agricola had for his ſucceſſor, as others thinke, Cn. Trebellius, but, as I take it, Saluſtius Lucullus, whom Domitian ſtraight after ſlew, becauſe he ſuffered certain ſpears of a new faſhion to be called Luculleæ. At which time alſo, Arviragus flouriſhed in this Iſland, and not in the daies of Claudius, as Geffrey of Monmouth dreameth. For theſe verſes of Juvenall are to bee underſtood of Domitian:

Arviragus the Britaine.

——Omen habes magni clarió triumphi:

Or elſe Arviragus ſhall loſe his Britiſh royall ſeat.

Rufina, a Britiſh dame.

There flouriſhed likewiſe at Rome Claudia Rufina, a Britiſh dame, paſſing well learned, and withall as beautifull, whom Martiall commendeth in theſe verſes;

Claudia cæruleis cum ſit Rufina Britannis
Edita, cur Latiæ pectora plebis habet?*
Quale decus formæ? Romanam credere matres C
Italides poſſunt, Atthides eſſe ſuam.

* By the like phraſe in another Epigram he ſaith, Abderitanæ pectora plebis habet; ſpeaking of a doltiſh and groſſe headed fellow.

Sith from blew Britans Claudia Rufina doth deſcend,
How comes a learned Latian breſt her perſon to commend?
How beautifull! Italian dames may her a Roman make:
And Attick wives againe full well, her for their daughter take.

This was, as John Bale and Matthew Parker Archbiſhop of Canterburie have written, the very ſame woman, of whom S. Paul maketh mention in his latter Epiſtle to Timothy) neither is the computation of times repugnant, howſoever others be of a contrary opinion.

Britaine become a Province.

Thus under the Empire of Domitian, when that farther part therof, as being rough and unfruitfull, was left unto the barbarous Britans, this hither ſide was reduced full and whole into the forme of a province: Which was not governed by any Conſular or Proconſular deputy, but was counted * Præſidialis, and appropriate to the Cæſars: as being a prouince annexed unto the Roman Empire after the diviſion of Provinces ordained by Auguſtus, and had Propretors of their owne. Afterwards when as Conſtantinus Maximus had ſet downe a new forme of Common-weale, under a Prefect or Provoſt of Pretors degree of Gaule, there was ſet over it a vicegerent, and together with him in matters of war the * Count or Earle of Britan, an Earle or Count of the Saxony coaſt by Britan: and a Duke or Generall of Britan, beſides Preſidents, Auditors or Receivers & ſuch others. Moreover out of thoſe 29. Legions, which the Romans had appointed through their Imperial government, three of them lay in garriſon to reſtraine that Province, to wit, the ſecond Legion Auguſta, the ſixt Legion victrix, & the twentith victrix. But this is meant of the time of Severus: For before, we learn out of Authors, that other Legions there were, and more in number. And although Strabo writeth that there was neede of no more than one band of ſouldiers, to the keeping of Britaine in ſubjection, yet in the raigne of Claudius there were placed here, the ſecond Legion Auguſta, the ninth Legion Hiſpanienſis, & the fourteenth named Gemina Martia victrix. Yea and about the time of Veſpaſian, Joſephus ſheweth, that foure Legions ſerved in this Iſland: Britaine, ſaith hee, is compaſſed about with the Ocean, and almoſt as big as our world. The Romans there inhabiting, have brought it under their dominion, and foure Legions doe keepe in ſubjection an Iſland peopled with ſo great a multitude. And doubtleſſe, the ſtanding guards and Camps of Legions and Roman ſouldiers, were many times the Seminaries, as it were, and Seed-plots of Cities and townes, as in other provinces, ſo alſo in this our Britan. Thus was the yoke of ſubjection laid upon the Britans, firſt by a garriſon of ſouldiers, which alwaies with terror were ready to command the Inhabitants, afterwards by tribute and impoſts: and in that

The beginning of Cities. The Roman yoke.

A that reſpect forced they were to have Publicans, that is to ſay, greedy cormorants and horſleeches, who ſucked their bloud, confiſcated their goods and exacted tributes in the name of the dead: Neither were they permitted to uſe the ancient lawes of their country, but magiſtrates were ſent from the people of Rome, with abſolute power and commiſſion to miniſter jùſtice even in capital matters. For, Provinces had Propretors, Lieutenants, Preſidents, Pretors and Proconſuls. Every citie alſo and State had their municipall magiſtrates. The Pretor proclaimed yearely ſolemne ſeſſions and Aſſizes, at which he determined the waightier cauſes ſitting aloft upon a high Tribunall ſeat, and guarded with his Lictors about him proudly executed he his juriſdiction: rods and whipping cheere were preſented to the backs, the axe and heading to the B necks of the common people, and every yeare they were forced to receive one new ruler or other allotted unto them. Neither was this ſufficient: they maintained diſcord and diſſcention among them, ſome alſo they favoured among the reſt, that they might have them to be the inſtruments of this their ſervitude. Rowardus in Protribunal.

This yoak of the Romans although it were grievous, yet comfortable it proved and a ſaving health unto them: for that healthſome light of Ieſus Chriſt ſhone withall upon the Britans, whereof more hereafter, and the brightneſſe of that moſt glorious Empire, chaſed away all ſavage barbariſme from the Britans minds, like as from other nations whom it had ſubdued. For Rome, as ſaith Rutilius.

C ——Legiferis mundum complexa triumphis
Fœdere communi vivere cuncta facit:
Compaſſed the world with triumphs bringing lawes;
And all to live in common league doth cauſe.

And in another place ſpeaking unto the ſame Rome moſt truly and in right elegant verſes;

Feciſti patriam diverſis gentibus unam.
Profuit injuſtis te dominante capi.
Dumq; offers victis proprii conſortia juris,
Vrbem feciſti quod prius orbis erat.

D Thou haſt of divers nations one entire country framed,
Happy it was for lawleſſe folke, that they by thee were tamed.
For offering uſe, to them ſubdu'd, of thine owne proper lore,
One civill ſtate thou mad'ſt of that, which was wild world before.

For, to ſay nothing of the reſt of the Provinces, the Romans having brought over Colonies hither, and reduced the naturall inhabitants of the Iſland unto the ſocietie of civill life, by training them up in the liberall Arts, and by ſending them into Gaule for to learne perfectly the lawes of the Romans (whereupon Juvenal

Gallia cauſidicos docui facunda Britannos, Gaule eloquent of Britans hath good pleading lawyers made.)

E governed them with their lawes, and framed them to good manners and behaviour, ſo as in their diet and apparell they were not inferior to any other Provinces: they furniſhed them alſo with goodly houſes and ſtately buildings, in ſuch ſort, that the reliques and rubbiſh of their ruines doe cauſe the beholders now, exceedingly to admire the fame: and the common ſort of people doe plainely ſay, theſe Roman workes were made by Giants, whom in the North parts they uſe to call in their vulgar tongue Eatons, for Heathens (if I be not deceived) or Ethnicks. Certes, they are works of exceeding great admiration, and ſumptuous magnificence: but eſpecially the Picts wall, whereof I will write more in due place: and thoſe Cauſeies throughout the whole land, a wonderfull piece of worke, what with dreining and drying up the meres in F ſome places, and what with caſting up banks where low vallies were, in others: ſo fenſed and paved with ſtone, and withall of that breadth, that they can well receive and with roome enough, waines meeting one the other. Now what manner of Cauſeies theſe were, let Gallene tel you. The Romans workes in Britaine. The Picts wall. Highwaies made by the Romans.

The waies, quoth he, Trajanus repaired, by paving with ſtone, or raiſing with bankes caſt up ſuch pieces of them as were moiſt and myrie; by ſtocking up and ridding ſuch as were rough Galen lib. 9. cap. 8. Method. medend.

and overgrowne with buſhes and briers: by making bridges over rivers that could not bee waded through: where the way ſeemed longer then needed, by cutting out another ſhorter: if any where by reaſon of ſome ſteepe hill, the paſſage were hard and uneaſie, by turning it aſide through eaſier places: now in caſe it were haunted with wild beaſts, or lay waſt and deſert, by drawing it from thence thoough places inhabited, and withall, by laying levell all uneven and rugged grounds. But now adaies theſe of ours, being diſmembred, as it were, and cut one piece from another in ſome places, by reaſon that the country people digge out gravell from thence, and ſcarcely to bee ſeene; yet elſewhere, leading through paſtures and by-grouuds out of the rode way, the bankes are ſo high, that evidently they ſhew themſelves. A B

Theſe cauſeies or Street-waies, the Romans called Vias Conſulares, Regias, Prætorias, Militares, Publicas, curſus publicos, and Actus, as it is to be ſeene in Ulpian and Julius Frontinus. Ammianus Marcellinus termeth them Aggeres itinerarios & publicos: Sidonius Apollinaris, Aggeres, and Tellures inaggeratas: Beda and the latter writers, Stratas, that is Streets.

Our Chronicles, doubtleſſe herein deceived, doe hold, that there were but onely foure ſuch cauſeies as theſe: of which, the firſt was Watling-ſtreete, ſo called of one Vitellian, I wote not what he was,) who had the charge thereof (and indeed the Britans named Vitellian, in their tongue Guetalin) and Werlam-ſtreet, for that it went through Verolamium, which elſewhere alſo, the people dwelling neere unto it, named, High dike, High ridge, Fortie-foot-way, and Ridge-way. The ſecond they commonly call Ikemild-ſtreet, becauſe it began in the Icenes country: The third, the Foſſe, for that (as men thinke) it was fenſed on both ſides with a ditch: and the fourth Ermin-ſtreet, by a German word, of Mercurie (whom as I am informed by Iohn obſopæus) a great learned man) under the name of Ermiſul, that is, the Columne of Mercurie, the Germans our ancient progenitors, worſhipped. C

Now, that Mercurie had the charge of waies, his name Ἑρμῆς among the Greekes, may ſhew ſufficiently: as alſo his Statues with foure ſides, called in old time Hermæ, which were ſet every where upon high waies. It hath been generally thought, that one Mulmutius (I know not what he ſhould be) many hundred yeares before the birth of Chriſt, made theſe cauſeys: but ſo far am I from believing it, that I dare confidently avouch, the Romans by little and little founded and raiſed them up. Whileſt Agricola, ſaith Tacitus, governed Britaine, ſeverall waies were enjoyned, and farre diſtant places (by the purveyors commandement) that the country ſhould carry from the neareſt ſtanding camps, or wintering places, to thoſe that were farre off, and out of the way: And the Britans complained, as the ſame Tacitus writeth, That the Romans wore out, and conſumed their bodies and hands, in cleering of woods, and paving the Fens, with a thouſand ſtripes & reprochfull indignities. And ſo we read in ancient records, That in the daies of Honorius and Arcadius, there were made in Britaine certain beaten high waies from ſea to ſea. That this was the Romans worke, Beda witneſſeth: The Romans inhabited (ſaith he) within the wall (which, as I rehearſed before, Severus had made overthwart the Iſland) toward the ſoutherne ſide, which the Cities, Churches, and ſtreet waies there made doe witneſſe at this day. About the making of ſuch cauſeys and high waies, the Romans were wont to exerciſe their ſouldiers, and the common multitude, leſt being idle, they ſhould grow factious, and affect alteration in the Sate. The Romans, as Iſodorus writeth, made Cauſeys in ſundry places, almoſt through the world, both for the direction of journeys, and alſo becauſe the people ſhould not be idle: and to the making and paving of ſuch cauſeys, priſoners were many times condemned, as may be gathered out of Suetonius, in the life of Caius. And there are to be ſeene in Spaine, the Cauſeys called Salamantica or Argentea, as alſo in France certaine Rode waies, called Viæ militares, paved by the Romans; to ſay nothing, of the way Appia, Pompeia, Valeria, and others in Italie. D E F

Under the raigne of Nerva, the writers have diſcontinued the Storie of Britannie. But in the time of Trajane, the Britans may ſeem to have revolted and rebelled: and evident it is out of Spartianus, that ſubdued then they were. Moreover, while Adrian D was Emperour, Julius Severus ruled the Iſland: and when he was called away againſt the Jewes, who then were in an uprore, the Britans could not have beene kept in their allegiance to the Romans, had not Adrianus come among them in perſon: who being then Conſull the third time, in the yeare of Chriſt 124. ſeemeth by the prowеſſe of his armie to have diſcomfited his enemies. For I have ſeene in one piece of mony of his coining, the ſtampe of an Emperour with three ſouldiers, whom I judge to repreſent three Legions, with this Inſcription, EXER. BRITANNICUS: and another bearing this Inſcription RESTITUTOR BRITANNY. This Prince reformed many things throughout the Iſland: and was the firſt that built a wall between the barbarous Britans, and the Romans foureſcore miles in length: laying the foundation thereof within
E the ground of huge piles or ſtakes, and faſtning them together, in manner of a ſtrong hedge or mound. For which expedition of his, Florus the Poet plaied upon him, thus: Nerva Trajanus. Adrianus, Emperour. Jul. Severus, Proprætor. Spartianus.

Ego nolo Cæſar eſſe Ambulare per Britannos,
Scythicas pati pruinas.

I will in no wiſe Cæſar be,
To walke along in Britanie
The Scythicke froſts to feele and ſee.

Unto whom, Adrianus wrote back in this wiſe:

F Ego nolo Florus eſſe,
Ambulare per tabernas,
Latitare per popinas,
Culices pati rotundas.

And I will never Florus be,
To walke from ſhop to ſhop, as he;
To lurke in Tavernes ſecretly,

And there to feele the round wine fly. A Antoninus Pius, Emperor.

Under Antoninus Pius (by whoſe ordinance as many as were in the Roman world, became Citizens of Rome) this warre brake out againe into a light fire, which hee ſo quenched by driving the barbarous Britans further off, under the conduct of Lollius Vrbicus Lieutenant, and by making another wall of turfe, that thereupon he was ſurnamed BRITANNICUS: and hee deſerved ſingular commendation, for that hee had fined the Brigates with the loſſe of one part of their Lands, who had infeſted with roades Genounia, a neighbour province under the protection and allegiance of the Romans. And at this time, as we collect out of Jabolenus, Sejus Saturnius was Archigubernus of the Navie in Britannie: But whether by this title, hee were an Admirall of the ſaid Navie, or a principall Pilot, or the Maſter of a ſhip, I would have the Lawyers to tell. But the Britans, giving occaſions ſtill of quarrels and warres, one after another began a commotion under Antoninus Philoſophus: for the appeaſing whereof, Calphurnius Agricola was ſent, and ſeemeth to have ended the ſame with fortunate ſucceſſe. Which commendation for the diſpatching of this warre, Fronto, for Roman eloquence comparable to the beſt, and ſecond to none, would needs give unto Antoninus the Emperour. For albeit he ſitting ſtill, and holding his Court in the very palace of Rome, gave out only his commiſſion and warrant for to make this warre, yet he proteſteth, that like unto the Pilot ſitting at the helme to ſteere a galley, he deſerved the glory of the whole courſe and ſailing in that voyage. At the ſame time there ſerved alſo in the wars of Britannie, Helvius Pertinax brought hither out of the Parthian warre, and here ſtaied. E Commodus Emperor.

Vlpius Marcellus Propretor.

Xiphilinus out of Dio.

Whiles Commodus was Emperour, Britannie, was all of a Garboile, full of warres, and ſeditious troubles. For the barbarous Britans, having paſſed over the wall, made great waſte, and hewed in pieces the Romans, both Captaine and Souldier. For the repreſſing of which rebels, Vlpius Marcellus was ſent: who had ſo fortunate an hand in taming their audacious ſtomacks, that his proweſſe was ſoone defaced, and depraved with envie, and himſelfe called backe. This Captaine was of all others moſt vigilant: and being deſirous that the reſt about him might be as watchfull, he wrote every evening xij. tables throughout, ſuch as commonly are made of the Linden-tree wood: and commanded one of his attendants about him, to carry the ſame unto divers of the ſouldiers, ſome at one houre of the night, and ſome at another, whereby they might thinke their Generall was ever awake, and ſo themſelves might ſleepe the leſſe. F

Of whoſe temperance thus much alſo is reported: And albeit otherwiſe his nature was able to reſiſt ſleepe, yet that he might doe it the better, he brought to paſſe by faſting and abſtinence,

A ſtinence. For to the end that he would not feed of bread to the full, hee cauſed it to be brought from Rome to him into the campe; that by reaſon of the ſtaleneſſe of it, hee could not eat any whit more than was needfull. But when he, I ſay, was called backe, all licentious wantonneſſe brake into the Campe, and the forces in Britanny, letting the raines looſe of militarie diſcipline, became unruly, and refuſed the command & government of Commodus, although by ſome of his flatterers he was ſtiled Britannicus. Moreover, they that ſerved in Britanny ſuborned and ſent a thouſand and five hundred of their owne ranke into Italy againſt Perrennius, a man that not onely carried an outward ſhew and countenance, but of all the Emperors minions could indeed do moſt with him: accu-
B ſing him that he had made captaines over ſouldiers certain of the gentlemens degree, and put Senators out of place, and withall, that he had laid wait to take away the Emperors life. Commodus gave eare to this information, and believed it, whereupon he delivered the man into their hands: who after he had with many indignities beene whipped, loſt his head, and was proclaimed a traitor to his country. Howbeit theſe ſeditious ſtirs Helvius Pertinax repreſſed, not without great danger, being himſelfe almoſt ſlaine, and for certaine, left for dead among thoſe that were ſlaine.

Helvius Pertinax Propretor.

Now when Britanny was in peaceable eſtate, Clodius Albinus received it from Commodus, and withall, afterwards for his worthy exploits in Britanny the name of Cæſareus: but ſoone after, becauſe in a publike aſſembly he had made an invective a-
C gainſt the government of the Emperors, Junius Severus was placed in his rome.

Clodius Albinus Propretor. Capitolinus. Junius Severus Propretor.

At which very time, the thicke miſts of ſuperſtition being ſcattered (not under M. Aurelius and L. Verus Emperors, as Beda writeth but under Commodus, when Eleutherus was Biſhop of Rome) the heavenly light & brightneſſe of Chriſtianitie, by the meanes of King Lucius ſhone upon this Iſland. Which Prince, (as we find in the ancient * reports and lives of Martyrs, uſually read in the Church) admiring the integritie and holy life of the Chriſtians, made petition unto Eleutherus the Pope, by the mediation of Elvan & Meduan, two Britans, that both himſelfe and his ſubjects might be inſtructed in chriſtian religion. Then ſent he hither forthwith, Fugatius and Donaitanus, two holy men, with letters, which at this day be extant, & (as very many are per-D ſwaded) are not forged but authenticall, as bearing date, when L. Aurelius Commodus was ſecond time Conſull with Veſpronius: Which holy men inſtructed the King and others in the myſteries of chriſtian religion. Hereupon it is, that Ninnius writeth thus of this King, King Lucius quoth he, is ſurnamed Lever Maur, that is, [a Prince] of great glory, for the Faith which in his time came. Now for thoſe that call theſe matters of King Lucius into queſtion (as many doe in theſe daies) as if there had beene at that time no King in Britanny, which they ſuppoſe was full and whole reduced into a province before, I wiſh them to call to remembrance thus much, That the Romans by ancient cuſtome had in their provinces Kings as the inſtruments of bondage; that the Britans even then, refuſed to obey Commodus; and that themſelves poſſeſſed and
E held freely, thoſe parts of the Iſland which were beyond the foreſaid wall, had their Kings of their owne, and that Antoninus Pius a few yeares before, *having ended warre, permitted Kingdomes to by ruled by their own Kings, and provinces by their own * Comites.* What ſhould let then, but that Lucius might be King over that part of the Iſland, unto which the Romans forces never came? And verily, that which Tertullian hath put downe, who wrote much about thoſe daies, if we throughly weigh his words, and the time, may very aptly be referred to the Britans converſion unto Chriſt: Thoſe places, quoth he, among the Britans, which yielded the Romans no acceſſe, are now ſubdued unto Chriſt: and ſomewhat after, Britanny is encloſed within the compaſſe of the Ocean. The nation of the Mauri, and the barbarous Getulians are beſet by the Romans, for feare they
F might paſſe beyond the limits of their countries. What ſhould I ſpeake of the Romans, who with garriſons of their Legions fortifie their Empire? neither are they able to extend the power of their dominion, beyond thoſe very nations. But the Kingdome and name of Chriſt reacheth farther ſtill, it is believed in every place, and is worſhipped of all thoſe people above named, &c.

But our Eccleſiaſticall writers who have emploied both time and diligence in the conſideration consideration of this point endeavor and labour to prove, and that out of ancient authors of credit, that before this time, in the very dawning and infancie of the Church, Britanny had received christian religion: and namely that Joseph of Arimathea a noble Senator, sailed out of Gaule into Britanny, and that Claudia Rufina the wife of Aulus Pudens, which woman, as it is credibly thought, S. Paul nameth in his latter Epistle to Timothy, and whom the Poet Martiall so highly commendeth, was a Britan borne. They cite also the testimony of Dorotheus, who commonly goeth under the name of the Bishop of Tyre, who in his Synopsis hath recorded, that Simon Zelotes, after he had travailed through Mauritania, was at last slaine and buried in Britanny: as also that Aristobulus, whom S. Paul mentioneth in his Epistle to the Romans, was made Bishop of Britanny: (whereto Nicephorus inclineth) notwithstanding he speaketh of Britiana and not of Britannia: they report likewise upon the authoritie of Simeon that great Metaphrast, and of the Greeks * Menology, that S. Peter came hither and spread abroad the light of Gods word: out of Sophronius also and Theodoret that S. Paul after his second imprisonment in Rome, visited this our country. Whereupon Venantius Fortunatus if he may be beleeved as a Poet, writeth thus of him, unlesse he speaketh of his doctrine.

But to this purpose maketh especially that which erewhile I alleaged out of Tertullian; as also that which Origen recordeth, How the Britans with one consent embraced the Faith, and made way themselves unto God by meanes of the Druidæ, who alwaies did beat upon this article of beliefe, That there was but one God. And verily of great moment and importance is that with me, that Gildas writeth, after hee had mentioned the rebellion of Boodicia, and treated of the revenge thereof, Meane while, quoth he, Christ, that true Sun, shining with his most glittering brightnesse upon the universall world, not from the temporall skie and firmament, but even from the highest cope of heaven, exceeding all times, vouchsafed first, his beames, that is to say, his precepts and doctrine in the time as wee know of Tiberius Cæsar, unto this frozen Island full of Ice, and lying out as it were in a long tract of earth remote from the visible sunne. Chrysostome likewise, (to note so much by the way) writeth of the Christian religion in this Iland, as followeth: The British Ilands seated without this sea, and within the very Ocean, have felt the power of the word (for even there also be Churches founded, and altars erected) of that word, I say, which is planted in the soules, and now also in the lips of all people. And the same Chrysostome in another place: How often have folke in Britanny fed of mans flesh? but now with fasting they refresh the soule. Likewise S. Hierome; The Britan divided from our world, if he proceed in religion, leaving the westerne parts toward the Suns setting, will seeke Hierusalem, a Citie known unto him by fame only, and relation of scriptures. But now passe we forward from the Church to the Empire.

Epitaph, of Marcella, Widow.

When Commodus was slaine, Pertinax being called to the Empire, sent presently Albinus againe over into Britanny. But after that Pertinax within eight hundred and two daies was made away, Didius Iulianus, (who likewise was within a while killed) at Rome, Pescennius Niger in Syria, Clodius Albinus in Britanny, and Septimius Severus in Pannonia, all together at once take upon them the soverainty of the Empire. Severus being next unto Rome, hasteneth first to Rome, and, with consent of the souldiers and Senate, proclaimed Emperor, straightwaies (because he would not leave an enemie behind at his backe) craftily createth Albinus, Cæsar: this Albinus, chiefe commander of the forces in Britanny and Gaule, and having stamped mony with his image upon it, set up his statutes, and conferred upon him the honorable dignitie of a Consull, wisely with good foresight dulceth and kindly intreateth the men. Then maketh he an expedition into the East against Niger, whom in plaine field hee gave battell unto, vanquished and slew. The City * Bizantium after 3. yeares siege he forced and wonne: the Adiabenes, Arabians and other nations hee brought to his subjection.

A jection. Being now puffed up with pride, for theſe fortunate victories, and impatient of a companion in government, he ſent under-hand murderers of purpoſe to diſpatch Albinus: but ſeeing his ſecret practiſes tooke not effect, hee openly proclaimeth him Traitor, and an enemie to the State, and with all the ſpeede he could make, haſteneth into Gaule againſt him: where Albinus with the choice and chiefe ſtrength of the Britiſh armie made head neere unto * Lyons. The Albinians fought moſt valiantly, in ſo much as Severus himſelfe, throwing from him his purple robe, began with his men to flie. But when the ſaid Britiſh forces, as if now the victorie had beene in their hands, diſplaied their rankes in thinner arraies, and ran furiouſly upon their enemies backs, diſcomfited and in rout, Lætus, one of Severus his Captaines; who with his B freſh and unfoiled troupes, waited untill then, for to ſee the iſſue of the battell (having heard withall that Severus was ſlaine) with a purpoſe and reſolution now to take the Empire upon him, charged upon them, and put them to flight. And Severus, having by this time rallied his men, and reſumed the purple Roabe aforeſaid, followed likewiſe fiercely upon them, and having ſlain Albinus with a number of other, obtained a moſt fortunate victorie.

* Lugdunum.

Upon this, Severus (having alone the Soveraigntie of the whole world) ſent firſt Heraclianus to ſeize upon Britaine, and to rule it: when Virius Lupus, as Proprætor and Lieutenant (whom Vlpian the Civill Lawyer nameth Præſident of Britaine) who, C as we ſhall relate in place convenient, built many new Caſtles there: howbeit, driven hee was in the end to redeeme his owne peace, at the hands of the Meatæ, with a great ſumme of money, after hee had recovered ſome few priſoners, conſidering that the Caledonians kept not their word, who had promiſed to keepe under the ſaid Meatæ. And being not able after many loſſes and calamities ſuſtained, to repreſſe the ſudden rodes, and aſſaults made by the enemies, of neceſſitie hee ſent for Severus himſelfe: who gladly and thankefully taking hold of this good occaſion, to withdraw and weane his ſonnes (given to licentious rioting) from the delightſome pleaſures of Rome-Citie, and therewith to augment his owne ſtile with the addition of Britannicus: albeit, he was above threeſcore yeares of age, and gowtie beſides, fully D reſolveth with his two ſons, Baſſianus (whom he had named Antoninus, & Auguſtus) Geta Cæſar, and the Legions, to enter Britaine. The Britans forthwith ſent Embaſſadours unto him for peace. Whom after he had of purpoſe detained with him a good while, till he might prepare all things meet for warre, hee ſent away, as they came without obtaining their ſuit: and leaving his ſonne Geta, (whom hee created Auguſtus at his firſt arrivall in Britaine) in the hither part of the Province which continued in obedience to the Romans, for the civill juriſdiction and adminiſtration of the affaires there: himſelfe with Antoninus went into the farther parts, where being occupied in cutting down woods, making bridges, and drying up the meres, he fought no battell: howbeit, what with the ambuſcadoes of enemies, and what with ſick-E neſſe, hee loſt fiftie thouſand of his men: Thus writeth Dio. But Herodian hath recorded, that in certaine light skirmiſhes, whiles the barbarous Britaines kept the fennie bogs, and moſt thick woods, out of which they might more ſafely aſſaile the Romans he had the upper-hand. Yet he enforced them in the end to a league, with this condition, that they ſhould yield unto him a good part of their Countrey. And that which is the greateſt honour and ornament of his Empire, he fenſed it with a wall over thwart the Iſland, from one coaſt of the Ocean to another. For theſe victories, he ſtamped certaine pieces of money with this Inſcription, VICTORIA BRITANNICA, aſſumed the ſurname of BRITANNICVS MAXIMVS; and his ſonne Geta named Britannicus bare it, as appeareth by his coines. Howbeit, the Britans afterward (having F broken covenant) began to rebell, and make alteration in the State, whereupon his wrathfull indignation againſt them brake out into ſuch termes, as that in an aſſembly of his ſouldiers, he gave them in charge to make a generall maſſacre of them all, uſing theſe verſes out of Homer, to this effect:

The Apotheoſis, or Deification of the Emperour.

Herodian. For, after the Princes death, they burie the bodie honourably, and with ſumptuous funerals, according to the manner of other men: But withall, they frame an image of waxe, reſembling in all points the party deceaſed, and lay the ſame openly at the entry of the palace, upon a moſt ample and ſtately bed of Ivorie, erected on high, and covered with cloth of gold. And verily, that image lieth with a paliſh and wan colour like unto a ſicke man: About the bed on both ſides, there ſit a great part of the day, the whole bodie of the Senate on the right hand, arraied in their blacks: and on the left hand certaine Dames and Ladies, who are by the place and dignity of the husbands, or parents worſhipfull. And there is not one of them ſeene to weare any gold about them, nor to be adorned with jewels, but clad in white and ſlender garments, they repreſent mourners. This do they for ſeven daies together: during which D time, the Phyſitians reſort daily into him to touch his pulſe, and conſider of his diſeaſe, and thereupon as of their patient, judicially pronounce, that he groweth worſe and worſe. Thus after a ſevenight, when it ſeemed that he was departed, certaine of the nobleſt, and moſt choice young gentlemen, as wel of the Senators as Knights degree, take up the foreſaid bed upon their ſhoulders, and carrie it thorow the high ſtreet, called Sacra, into the old Forum, where the Roman Magiſtrates had wont to lay down their rule and government. Here, on both ſides were certaine greeſes or ſteps in maner of ſtaires raiſed; upon which, on the one hand was placed a quire of boies of nobleſt birth, and of the Patritian degree, and on the other, a company of women likewiſe of noble parentage, ſinging in commendation of the dead Prince, hymnes and ſonets, entuned in a ſolemne, and mournfull note. Which done, they take up the ſaid bed E or hearſe againe, and carrie it out of the Citie into Campus Martius: where, in the broadeſt place of the ſaid field, a frame or turret foure ſquare with equall ſides was raiſed, and the ſame made in manner of a tabernacle, of no other matter than main great pieces of timber. And verily within it was all over filled with dry fewell: but without, adorned with rich hangings woven with gold wire between, with divers ivory portraicts of imagerie, and ſundry curi-
*Fa. *ous pictures. Over this frame there ſtood another ſomewhat leſſe: howbeit, in forme and furniture very like unto the former, with windowes and dores ſtanding open. And ſo a third and fourth turret, ſmaller every one than that next beneath it, and others likewiſe ſtill one after another, untill you come to the laſt and utmoſt, which is the leaſt and higheſt of all the reſt. The manner of this whole building a man may well compare to theſe F lanternes or light-towers ſtanding by haven ſides, and are commonly called Phari, which give light by fire in the night time, and direct ſhips at ſea in their courſe to ſafe harbours. The hearſe then being mounted up into the ſecond tabernacle, they get together ſpices and odours of all ſorts, likewiſe all the ſweet ſmelling fruits, hearbs juices and liquors, that the whole world can yield, and thereon poure the ſame forth

by

A by heape-meale. For their is not a nation, citie or ſtate, nor any perſon of worth and marke above the reſt, but ſtrive a vie every one to beſtow in honor of the Prince, thoſe laſt gifts and preſents. Now when there is a mightie heape of the ſaid ſpiceries gotten together, ſo that the whole roome is filled therewith, then all the Gentlemen of the Knights order, firſt ride about that edifice, marching in a certaine meaſure: and therewith in their courſes and recourſes obſerve a warlike kind of motion round, in juſt meaſure and number. The open chariots likewiſe are driven about by courtiers in purple roabes of honor ſitting thereupon to guide and direct them with vizards on their faces reſembling all the redoubted captaines and renowned Emperors of Rome.

B Theſe ceremonies thus performed, the Prince that next ſucceedeth in the Empire, takes a torch, and firſt himſelfe ſets it to the tabernacle aforeſaid: then, all the reſt from every ſide put fire under, ſo that forthwith every place being full of the ſaid dry fuell and odors, kindle and catch fire mightily. Then ſtraightwaies from the higheſt and leaſt tabernacle, as it were out of ſome lower or high turret together with the fire put underneath, an Eagle was let flie, and the ſame was ſuppoſed to carry up the Princes ſoule into heaven. And ſo from that time forward was the Emperor reputed and by the Romans adored among the reſt of the Gods. Thus much by way of digreſſion and beſide the matter: now let us returne.

Antoninus Caracalla the ſonne of Severus, purſued the reliques of the war by his

C Captaines for a while in Britaine: but ſoone after he made peace, ſurrendring to the enemie their territories and caſtles. Howbeit in a ſpirit of ambition hee aſſumed to himſelfe in his ſtile the name of BRITANNICVS, yea and of BRITANNICVS MAXIMVS. His brother Geta likewiſe, took upon him the title and addition of BRITANNICVS. For we have ſeen his mony coined with this Inſcription, IMP. CÆS. P. SEPT. GETA PIVS. AVG. BRIT. PONTIF. TRI. P. III. Nonius Philippus Propretor.

From this time forward, writers have in long ſilence paſſed over the affaires of Britaine: For Alexander Severus was not ſlaine, as ſome would have it, in Sicila a town of Britaine, but in Gaule. This certaine evidence onely have wee out of an antique ſtone, that Nonnius Philippus was here Propretor under Gordianus the yonger.

Gallienus Emperour.

D Whiles Gallienus the Emperor gave himſelfe over to all manner of riotouſneſſe, the State of Rome either through the careleſſe managing of affaires, or by ſome inclination of the Deſtinies lay diſmembred as it were, and maimed in all parts: and a heavie rent there was and revolt of this Province from the Roman Captaine. For thirty tyrants there were who in divers places uſurped rule and dominion: among whom Lollianus Victorinus, Poſthumus, the Tetrici and Marius bare ſoveraigne ſway, as I ſuppoſe, in this Iſland: For their coines are here in great abundance digged up daily.

Carus and Carinus Emperours. After this, Carus Auguſtus the Emperor allotted by decree this our country, together with Gaule, Spaine and Illyricum unto his ſon Carinus. That he warred here, ſome there be that ſlightly indeed, but how truly I wot not, gather out of theſe verſes of Nemeſianus;

Nec taceam quæ nuper bella ſub Arcto,

Diocleſian and Maximian Emperors. Bononium Galliæ. Under Diocleſian, Carauſius a Menapian borne, a man of very baſe parentage, howbeit inventive and active withall, who for his valour ſhewed in battels at ſea became renowned, was ordained Captaine of * Bologne in Gaule to put backe and drive away the Saxons and Frankners that troubled the ſeas. This Carauſius having at firſt from time to time taken many of the Barbarians priſoners, and yet neither brought in all the bootie and pillage into the Emperors treaſury, nor made reſtitution of goods unto C the Provincials: afterwards when as hee vanquiſhed and ſubdued but few of them, began deepely to be ſuſpected, that of ſet purpoſe he admitted the Barbarians to enter, to the end in their paſſage by he might intercept them with booty, and ſo by this occaſion enrich himſelfe: whereupon Maximian Auguſtus the Emperour gave commandement that he ſhould be killed. Whereof he having certaine intelligence, tooke upon him the Imperiall enſignes, and ſeized Britan into his own hands, withdrew the Navy that lay in defence of Gaule, built many ſhips after the Roman manner, adjoyned to himſelfe the Roman Legion, kept out the companies of forreine ſouldiers, aſſembled and drew together the French Merchants to muſter, fortified Bologne with a garriſon, conveied away, and tooke to his owne uſe the publike revenewes of Britan D and Batavia, allured by the ſpoiles of whole provinces no ſmall power of Barbarian forces to be his aſſociates, and the Franks eſpecially, whom he trained to ſea-ſervice, and in one word, made all the ſea coaſts every way dangerous for paſſage. To the vanquiſhing of him, Maximianus ſet forward with a puiſſant army, out of which *ſom there were who in the very voyage ſuffered death glorioufly for Chriſts ſake: but when he was come to the ſea-ſide, being skared partly for want of ſea-ſouldiers, and partly with the rage of the Britiſh Ocean, ſtaied there; and having made a fained peace with Carauſius, yielded unto him the rule of the Iſland, conſidering he was taken to bee the meeter man, both to command, and alſo to defend the Inhabitants againſt the warlike nations. Hereupon it is, that wee have ſeene in the ſilver coines of E Carauſius two Emperours joyning hands, with this circumſcription, CONCORDIA AVG. G. But Maximian turned his forces upon the Frankners, who then held *Batavia, and had ſecretly under hand ſent aide unto Carauſius: whom he ſurprized on ſuch a ſudden, that he forced them to ſubmiſſion. In this meane while, Carauſius governed Britain with incorrupt and unſtained reputation, and in exceeding great peace: againſt the Barbarians, as writeth Ninnius the diſciple of Elvodugus, hee reedified the wall betweene the mouthes of Clnda and Carunus, and fortified the ſame with 7. caſtles, and built a round houſe of poliſhed ſtone upon the banke of the river Carun, which tooke name of him, erecting therewith a triumphall arch in remembrance of victory. Howbeit Buchanan thinketh verily it was the Temple of Terminus, as we will write in Scotland. When Diocleſian and Maximian, as well to keepe that which was won, as to recover what was loſt, had taken to them Conſtantius Chlorus, and Maximianus Galerius to bee Cæſars: Conſtantius having levied and enrolled an armie, came with great ſpeed, and ſooner then all men thought to Bologne in France, which alſo is called Geſſoriacum, a towne that Carauſius had fortified with ſtrong garriſon; and they laid

A laid ſiege unto it round about: by pitching logs faſt into the earth at the very entry, and piling huge ſtones one upon another in manner of a rampire, he excluded the ſea, and tooke from the towne the benefit of their haven: which damme, the ſtrong and violent current of the Ocean beating againſt it forcibly for many daies together, could not breake, and beare downe: no ſooner was the place yielded, but the firſt tide that roſe made ſuch a breach into the ſaid rampire that it was wholly diſ-joyned, and broken in ſunder. And whiles he rigged and prepared both heere and elſewhere an Armada for the recoverie of Britaine, he rid Batavia which was held by the Francks, from all enemies, and tranſlated many of them into the Roman nations, for to till their waſte and deſert territories. The Panegyrick of Eumenius.

B In this meane time Allectus a familiar friend of Carauſius, who under him had the government of the State, ſlew him by a treacherous wile, and put upon himſelfe the Imperiall purple roabe. Which when Conſtantius heard, he having manned & armed divers fleets, drave Allectus to ſuch doubtfull termes, as being altogether void of counſell, and to ſeek what to doe, he found then, and never before, that he was not fenced with the Ocean, but encloſed within it. And withall, hoyzing up ſaile in a tempeſtuous weather, and troubled ſea, by meanes of a miſt which over-ſpread the ſea, hee paſſed by the enemies fleet unawares to them, which was placed at the Iſle of Wight, in eſpiall and ambuſh to diſcoved, and intercept him: and no ſooner were his forces C landed upon the coaſt of Britaine, but he ſet all his owne ſhips on fire, that his Souldiers might repoſe no truſt in ſaving themſelves by flight. Allectus himſelfe, when he eſpied the Navy of Conſtantius under ſaile, & approaching toward him, forſooke the ſea-ſide, which he kept, and as he fled, lighted upon Aſclepiodotus Grand Seneſchal of the Prætorium: but in ſo fearful a fit, & like a mad man, he haſtned his own death, that he neither put his footmen in battell ray, nor marſhalled thoſe troopes which he drew along with him in good order, but caſting off his purple garment, that he might not be knowne, ruſhed in with the mercenary Barbarians, and ſo in a tumultuary skirmiſh was ſlaine, and hardly by the diſcovery of one man found among the dead carcaſes of the Barbarians, which lay thick ſpread every where over all the plaines and hils. C. Allectus, Emperour.

D But the Frankners, and others of the barbarous ſouldiers, which remained alive after the battell, thought to ſacke London, and to take their flight and be gone: at which very inſtant, as good hap was, the ſouldiers of Conſtantius, which by reaſon of a miſty and foggy aire, were ſevered from the reſt, came to London, and made a ſlaughter of them in all places throughout the citie, and procured not only ſafetie to the citizens in the execution of their enemies, but alſo a pleaſure in the ſight thereof.

By this victory was the Province recovered, after it had beene, by uſurpation, held ſeven yeares or there about, under Carauſius, and three under Allectus. Whereupon Eumenius unto Conſtantius, writeth thus; O brave victorie of much importance, E and great conſequence; yea, and worthy of manifold triumphs, whereby Britaine is reſtored, whereby the nation of the Frankners is utterly deſtroyed, and whereby upon many people beſide, found acceſſarie to that wicked conſpiracie, there is impoſed a neceſsitie of obedience, and allegiance, and in one word, whereby, for aſſurance of perpetuall quietneſſe, the ſeas are ſcoured and cleanſed. And as for thee, ô invincible Cæſar, make thy boaſt and ſpare not, that thou haſt found out a new world, and by reſtoring unto the Roman puiſſance, their glorie for proweſſe at ſea, haſt augmented the Empire with an element, greater than all Lands. And a little after, unto the ſame Conſtantius: Britaine is recovered ſo, as that thoſe nations alſo which adjoyne unto the bounds of the ſame Iſland, become obedient to your will and pleaſure.

In the laſt yeares of Diocleſian and Maximian, when as the Eaſt Church had beene Perſecution in Britaine.
F for many years already polluted with the bloud of martyrs, the violence of that furious perſecution went on, and paſſed even hither alſo into the Weſt, and many Chriſtians ſuffered martyrdome. Among whom, the principall were * Albanus of * Uerlam; Julius and Aaron of Iſca, a citie called otherwiſe Caër Leon, &c.* of whom I will write in their proper place. For then the Church obtained victorie with moſt honourable, and happy triumph, when as with ten yeares maſſacres it could not be vanquiſhed.

Constantius Chlorus, Emperour.

When Diocleſian and Maximinian gave over their Empire, they elected that Conſtantius Chlorus for Emperour, who untill that time had ruled the State, under the title of Cæſar: and to him befell Italie, Africke, Spaine, France, and Britaine: but Italy and Africke became the Provinces of Galerius; and Conſtantius ſtood contented with the reſt. This Conſtantius, what time as hee ſerved in Britaine under Aurelian, tooke to wife Helena daughter of Cœlus, or Cœlius a Britiſh Prince, on whom he begat that noble Conſtantine the Great, in Britaine. For ſo, together with that great Hiſtoriographer Baronius, the common opinion of all other writers with one conſent, beareth witneſſe: unleſſe it be one or two Greeke authors of late time, and thoſe diſſenting one from the other, and a right learned man, grounding upon a corrupt place of Iul. Firmicus. Howbeit, compelled he was by Maximian to put her away, for to mary Theodora his daughter. This is that Helena, which in antike Inſcription is called * VENERABILIS and PIISSIMA AVGVSTA, and for Chriſtian pietie, for cleanſing Ieruſalem of Idols, for building a goodly Church in the place where our Lord ſuffered, and for finding the Saving Croſſe of Chriſt, is ſo highly commended of Eccleſiaſticall writers. And yet both Iewes and Gentiles termed her by way of ignominy and reproach * Stabularia; becauſe ſhee (a moſt godly Princeſſe) ſought out the crib or manger wherein Chriſt was borne, and in the place where ſtood that hoſtelry, founded a Church. Hereupon S. Ambroſe: They ſay that this Lady was at firſt an Inholder or Hoſteſſe, &c. Well, this good hoſteſſe Helena, haſtned to Ieruſalem and ſought out the place of our Lords paſſion, and made ſo diligent ſearch for the Lords crib: This good hoſteſſe was not ignorant of that hoſt, which cured the wayfaring mans hurts that was wounded by theeves: This good hoſteſſe choſe to be reputed a dung-farmer, that ſhe might thereby gaine Chriſt. And verily no leſſe praiſe and commendation goeth of her husband Conſtantius for his piety and moderation; A man, who having utterly rejected the ſuperſtition of the ungodly, in worſhipping divers gods, willingly of himſelfe acknowledged one God, the Ruler of all things. Whereupon, to try the faith and beleefe in God of his owne Courtiers, hee put it to their free choice, either to ſacrifice unto thoſe gods, and ſo to ſtay with him, or els to refuſe and depart: But thoſe that would depart rather than renounce and forſake their faith to God, hee kept with him ſtill: caſting off all the reſt, who he ſuppoſed would prove diſloiall unto him, ſeeing they had abandoned their beleefe in the true God. This moſt noble and worthy Emperor, in his laſt Britiſh expedition againſt the * Caledonians and the Picts died at Yorke, leaving behind him his ſonne Conſtantine Emperor, his ſucceſſor and Cæſar elect.

* Thoſe in Albanie, in the North of Scotland.

Some few daies before the death of Conſtantius, his ſonne Conſtantius rode from Rome to Yorke on poſt horſes: and the reſt which were kept at the charges of the State, hee maimed and lamed all the way as hee went, becauſe no man ſhould purſue him, and there he received his fathers laſt breath. Whereupon an ancient Orator ſpake thus unto him: Thou entredſt this ſacred place not as a competitor of the Empire, but as heire apparant and ordained already, and forthwith that fathers houſe of thine ſaw thee, the lawfull ſucceſſor. For, there was no doubt but that the inheritance duly belonged unto him, whom the deſtinies had ordained the firſt begotten ſonne unto the Emperor. Yet for all that, conſtrained in maner by the ſouldiers, and eſpecially by the meanes of Erocus King of the Almanes, (who by way of aid accompanied him) advanced hee was to the Imperiall dignity. The ſouldiers regarding rather the publike good of the common-wealth, than following his affections, inveſted him in the purple roabe, weeping and ſetting ſpurs to his horſe, becauſe hee would avoid the endeavor of the armie that called ſo inſtantly upon him, &c: but the felicity of the common-wealth overcame his modeſty. And hereof it is, that the Panegyriſt crieth out in theſe words; O fortunate Britaine and more happy now than all other lands, that haſt the firſt ſight of Conſtantine Cæſar!

See Suidas, why he was called Poore.

Conſtantine the Great, Emperour.

Panegyrick oration unto Conſtantine the Great.

And now Cæſar at his very entrance, having firſt purſued the reliques of that war, which his father had begun againſt the Caledonians and other Picts, and ſet upon thoſe Britans more remote, and the Inhabitants of the Ilands lying there, the witneſſes as one ſaid of the Suns ſetting, ſome of them hee ſubdued by force and armes, others

A others (for you muſt thinke he aſpired to Rome and higher matters) by offering fees and ſtipends he allured and drew to be aſſociates: and there were beſides of them, whom of open enemies he made his friends, and of old adverſaries his very familiars. Afterwards, having vanquiſhed the Frankners in Batavia, and that with ſo great glory, that he ſtamped certaine golden pieces of coine, (whereof I have ſeene one) with the Image of a woman ſitting under a Trophee, and leaning with one hand upon a croſſe-bow or a brake, with this ſubſcription, FRANCIA: and this writing about it, GAVDIVM ROMANORVM: Having alſo overthrowne the Barbarians in Germany, won unto him the German and French Nations: and levied ſouldiers out of Britaine, B France, and Germany, to the number in all of 90000. foot, and 8000. horſemen, hee departed into Italie, overcame Maxentius, who at Rome had challenged to himſelfe the Empire, and having conquered Italy, and vanquiſhed the Tyrant, he reſtored unto the whole world the bleſſed gifts of ſecure libertie, and as we find in the Inſcription of an Antiquitie, INSTINCTV DIVINITATIS, MENTIS MAGNITVDINE, CVM EXERCITV SVO, TAM DE TYRANNO QVAM DE OMNI EIVS FACTIONE, VNO TEMPORE IVSTIS REMP. VLTVS EST ARMIS, that is, By inſtinct of the divine power, with great magnanimitie, and the helpe of his owne armie, at one time in the behalfe of the Common wealth, he was by lawfull warre revenged as well of the Tyrant himſelfe, as of his whole faction. Gelaſius Ciziceus lib. 1. Act. concil. Nicen. cap. 3.

C Howbeit, that he returned againe into Italy, Euſebius implieth in theſe words: Conſtantine, quoth he, paſſed over to the Britans encloſed on every ſide within the bankes of the Ocean: whom when hee had overcome, hee began to compaſſe in his mind other parts of the world, to the end he might come in time to ſuccour thoſe that wanted helpe. And in another place: After he had furniſhed his armie with mild and modeſt inſtructions of pietie, he invaded Britaine, that he might likewiſe inſtruct thoſe who dwell environed round about with the waves of the Ocean bounding the Suns ſetting, as it were with his coaſts. And of Britan are theſe verſes of Optatianus Porphyrius unto Conſtantine, to be underſtood:

Omnis ab Arctois plaga finibus horrida Cauro,
Pacis amat cana & comperta perennia jura,
D Et tibi fida tuis ſemper bene mitis at armis;
Reſq; gerit virtute tuas, populoſq; feroces
Propellit, cediq; lubens tibi debita rata,
Et tua victores ſors accipit hinc tibi fortes,

About this time as evidently appeareth by the Code of Theodoſius, Pacatianus was the Vicarius of Britaine: for by this time the Province had no more Proprætors nor Lieutenants, but in ſtead thereof was a Vicar ſubſtituted. Pacatianus Vicegerent of Britaine, in the thirteenth yeare of Conſtantine the Great.

This Emperor Conſtantine, was right happy for very many praiſes, & thoſe (I aſſure you) moſt juſtly deſerved: for he not onely ſet the Roman Empire in free eſtate, but alſo having ſcattered the thicke cloud of Superſtition, let in the true light of Chriſt, by ſetting open the Temples to the true God, and ſhutting them againſt the falſe.

F For now no ſooner was the bluſtering tempeſt and ſtorme of perſecution blowne over, but the faithfull Chriſtians, who in the time of trouble and danger had hidden themſelves in woods, deſarts, and ſecret caves, being come abroad in open ſight, reedifie the Churches ruinate to the very ground, the Temple of holy Martyrs they found, build, finiſh, and erect, as it were, the banners of victorie in every place, celebrate feſtivall holy-daies, and with pure heart and mouth alſo, performe their ſacred ſolemnities. And thereupon he is renow- Gildas.

Although I know full well, that Diocleſian was the firſt after Caligula, who ſuffered himſelfe openly to be called LORD.

Howbeit, in this ſo worthy an Emperour, his politike wiſedome was wanting in this point, that he made the way for barbarous people, into Britaine, Germanie, and Gaule. For when he had ſubdued the northerne Nations, ſo, as that now he ſtood in no feare of them, and for to equall the power of the Perſians, who in the Eaſt parts threatned the Roman Empire, had built Conſtantinople a new Citie: thoſe Legions that lay in defence of the Marches, he partly tranſlated into the Eaſt, and in their ſtead built forts and holds, and partly withdrew into Cities more remote from the ſaid marches: ſo that ſoone after his death, the Barbarians forcing the townes and fortreſſes, brake into the Provinces. And in this reſpect there goeth a very bad report of him in Zoſimus, as being the main, and firſt ſubverter of a moſt flouriſhing Empire.

The Roman civill government in Britaine, under the latter Emperors. AS L L. chiefe Juſtices, Grand Seneſchals, or high Stewards.

Seeing moreover, that Conſtantine altered the forme of the Roman government, it ſhall not be impertinent in this very place to note ſummarily, in what ſort Britaine was ruled under him, and afterward in the next ſucceeding ages. He ordained foure Præfects of the Prætorium, to wit, of the Eaſt, of Illyricum, of Italie, and of Gaule: two * Leaders or Commanders of the Forces, the one of footmen, the other of horſemen in the Weſt, whom they termed Præſentales.

* Magiſtros Militum.

For civill government there ruled Britaine, the Præfect of the Prætorium, or Grand Seneſchall in Gaule, and under him the Vicar Generall of Britaine, who was his Vicegerent, and honoured with the title Spectabilis, that is, notable or remarkable. Him obeied reſpectively to the number of the Provinces, two Conſular Deputies, and three Preſidents, who had the hearing of civill, and criminall cauſes.

For militarie affaires, there ruled the Leader, or Commander of the footmen in the Weſt: at whoſe diſpoſition, were the * Count or Lieutenant of Britaine; the Count or Lieutenant of the Saxon-coaſt along Britaine, and the Duke of Britaine, ſtiled every one, Spectabiles, that is, Remarkable.

* Comes.

* Spectabiles.

The Count Lieutenant of Britaine, ſeemeth to have ruled the in-land parts of the Iſland: who had with him ſeven companies of footmen, and nine cornets or troups of horſemen.

Comes of Britaine.

The Count or Lieutenant of the Saxon coaſt, namely, who defended the maritime parts, againſt the Saxons, and is named by Ammianus, Comes maritimi tractus, that is, Lieutenant of the Maritime tract, for defence of the Sea coaſt, had ſeven companies of footmen, two guidons of horſemen, the ſecond Legion, and one cohort.

Comes of the Saxon ſhore.

The Generall of Britan, who defended the Marches or Frontiers againſt the Barbarians, had the command of eight and thirty garriſon forts, wherein kept their Stations 14000. foot, and 900. horſemen. So that in thoſe daies, (if Pancirolus have kept juſt computation) Britaine maintained 19200. footemen, and 1700 horſemen, or much there about, in ordinarie.

A Beſides all theſe, Comes ſacrarum Largitionum, that is, The Receiver of the Emperours Finances or publike revenues, had under him in Britaine, the Rationall or Auditor of the ſummes and revenues of Britaine: the * Provoſt of the Auguſtian, that is, Emperours Treaſures in Britaine, and the Procurator of the Gynegium or Draperie in Britaine, in which the clothes of the Prince, and ſouldiers were woven. The * Count alſo of private Revenues had his Rationall, or Auditour of private State in Britaine: to ſay nothing of the ſword, Fence Schoole, Procurator in Britaine, (whereof an old Inſcription maketh mention,) and of other officers of an inferiour degree.

When Conſtantine was dead, Britaine fell unto his Sonne Conſtantine: who upon an ambitious humour, and deſire of rule, breaking into the poſſeſſions of other men, was ſlaine by his brother Conſtans. With which victory hee was ſo puffed up, that he ſeized Britaine, and the reſt of the Provinces into his owne hands, and with his brother Conſtantius came into this Iſland. And thereupon Julius Firmicus, not that Pagane the Aſtrologer, but the Chriſtian, ſpeaketh in this wiſe unto them: Yee have in Winter time (a thing that never was done before, nor ſhall be againe) ſubdued under your oares the ſwelling and raging billowes of the Britiſh Ocean. The waves now of the ſea, unto this time well neere unknowne unto us, have trembled, and the Britaines were ſore afraid to ſee the unexpected face of the Emperour. What would ye more? the very Elements as vanquiſhed, have given place unto your vertues.

Conſtantine the Emperor.

Conſtans, Emperour.

C This Conſtans it was that called a Councell to Sardica, againſt the Arians: unto which there aſſembled three hundred Biſhops, aud among them the Biſhops of Britaine; who having condemned the Heretikes, and eſtabliſhed the Nicæne Creed, by their voices and judgements, approved the innocencie of Athanaſius. But this Prince being youthfull, caſt behind him all care of the Empire, and became drowned in pleaſures: and thereby growing grievous to the Provincials, and nothing acceptable to his ſouldiers, was by Magnentius, * captaine of the Iovij and Herculij, as he hunted, beſet in a towne called Saint Helens, and there killed; fulfilling thereby a propheſie, which was, That he ſhould end his life in his grandmothers lap, of whom that towne indeed tooke the name.

Magnentius called alſo Taporus.

* Comitem.

This Magnentius having a Britan to his Father, but borne among the Læti, a people in France, when he had now ſlaine Conſtans, inveſted himſelfe in France into the Imperiall dignitie, and wonne Britaine unto him to take his part: but having been for three yeares together courſed by his brother Conſtantius, who ſharply made war upon him, laid violent hands on himſelfe: a fortunate Prince as ever any was, for ſeaſonable temperature of the weather, for plentie of fruits, and ſecuritie from dangers of Barbarians, points which are by the vulgar people reputed to make eſpecially for the glorie of Princes. But why this Magnentius ſhould be called Taporus in an old antiquitie of ſtone, digged up long ſince at Rome, let other men enquire: For thus it is read, ſpeaking of the Obeliske, erected in the birque or ſhew-place.

* The Emperours.

At this time, the Generall of all the warre-forces throughout Britaine, was Gratianus ſurnamed Funarius, the father of Ualentinian the Emperour. And called hee was Funarius, for that being yet but a ſtripling, or young ſpringall, as he went about with a rope to ſell, he gaue not ground to five ſoldiers that did ſet upon him, and aſſaied with all their force to ſnatch the ſame from him. This Gratianus being returned to his owne home, and diſcharged of his military oath, was fined by Conſtantius in the confiſcation, and loſſe of his goods, becauſe he was reported to have lodged Magnentius, and given him entertainment.

When Magnentius was dead and gone, Britaine ſubmitted it ſelfe to the government of Conſtantius: and forthwith was hither ſent Paulus the Notarie a Spaniard borne, one verily under a ſmooth countenance lying ſecret and cloſe, but exceeding ſubtill to deviſe and find out all the caſts and wylie meanes to endanger men: That hee might bring certaine martiall and military men within danger who had conſpired with Magnentius, when as they could not chuſe nor make reſiſtance, after he had outragiouſly come over them in manner of a floud hee ſuddenly ſeiſed upon the fortunes and eſtates of many. Thus went he on ſtill making ſpoile, yea, and undoing a great number, impriſoning ſuch as were free borne, and grieving their bodies with bonds, yea, & bruiſing ſome of them with manacles, and all, by patching and piecing many crimes together laid to their charge, which were as falſe as might be. Whereupon was committed ſo wicked an act as branded the daies of Conſtantius with a perpetuall note of infamie. There was one Martin that ruled thoſe provinces as Vicar or Vicegerent; who grievouſly lamenting the miſeries, and calamities of the innocent, and beſeeching the ſaid Paulus oftentimes, that the guiltleſſe might be ſpared, when hee ſaw that hee could not prevaile, threatned to depart, to the end, that this malicious inquiſitor, and perſecutor, at leaſtwiſe for feare thereof, might give over at length, to enveagle and induce into open dangers, men bred and nuzzeled in quiet peace.

Ammianus Marcellinus, lib. 14.

Martin, Vicar of Britaine.

Paulus, ſuppoſing heereby, that his trade decaied, (as hee was a vengible fellow in linking matters together, whereupon he came to be ſurnamed Catena, that is, a Chaine) drew in the ſaid Vicar himſelfe, (who ſtill maintained the defence of thoſe whom he had tendred and ſpared,) to have his part in common perils: And hee went very neere to bring him alſo priſoner bound, with tribunes, and many others, before the Emperours privie Counſell. At which extremitie of miſchiefe ſo imminent, he being throughly provoked, caught up a dagger, and aſſaulteth the ſame Paulus: but becauſe his right hand failed him, ſo that he was not able to give him a deadly wound, hee ſtabbed himſelfe into the ſide with the ſaid weapon drawne as it was. And ſo by this foule kind of death departed hee this life; (a right juſt man) after he had aſſaied to ſtay, and delay the woefull and pitious caſes of many. Which wicked parts thus committed, Paulus, all embrued with bloud, returned into the Princes Court: bringing many with him over-laden with chaines, as being men dejected, and plunged into miſerable calamitie, and heavie plight. At whoſe comming the rackes were made ready: the executioner prepared drags and tortures: and of them many were proſcribed, and outlawed, ſome baniſhed, and other ſuffred puniſhment by ſword. At length himſelfe alſo under Julian being burnt quicke, by the judgement of God the Revenger of ſuch outragious crueltie, paide moſt juſtly for his deſerts.

After this when as in Britaine, Ammianus Marcellinus is mine Author,) upon the breach of peace, by the rodes of Scots and Picts, (ſavage nations) the places neere bordering upon them, appointed for the Frontiers, were forraied, and the provinces wearied with calamities paſt, that came ſo thicke one in the necke of another, and put in frightfull perplexitie. Julian whom Conſtantius had declared to be Cæſar, and collegue in the Empire, wintering about Paris, and diſtracted with ſundry cares, feared to goe and aid the provinciall people beyond-ſea, as we reported that Conſtantius beforetime had done, leſt he ſhould leave Gaule without a governour: conſidering withall, that the Alamans were even then alſo incited, and ſet upon crueltie and hoſtilitie; thought good therefore it was to ſend over into theſe parts, for to compoſe and ſettle all matters, one Lupicinus, * Maſter at that time of the Armour: a warlike Knight, I aſſure you, and skilfull in military affaires; but a man of a haughtie ſpirit, and ſetting up his eie-browes aloft like hornes, and withall ſpeaking bigge, and (as folke ſay) in a tragicke Key upon the ſtage: concerning whom, the queſtion was a long time, whether he were more covetous than cruell. Having raiſed therefore an aid of light appointed men, to wit, the Heruleans, Batavians, and many companies of the * Mæſians, the foreſaid Generall in the heart of Winter, came to Bologne: and there having gotten ſhipping, and embarqued all his ſouldiers, obſerving a good gale of a forewind, arrived at Rhutupiæ, a place over againſt Bologne, and ſo ſet forward to London: that, from thence after counſell taken, according to the qualitie of his buſineſſe, he might haſten the ſooner to give battell.

After this, when Conſtantius was departed this world, Julianus that Apoſtata, who had taken upon him the title of Auguſtus againſt Conſtantius, firſt drave out Palladius, who had been maſter of Offices, into Britaine, and ſent away Alphius, who had governed Britan as Deputy Lieutenant, to reedifie Jeruſalem: but fearefull round balles of flaming fire breaking forth neere unto the foundations, skarred him from that enterprize, and many a thouſand of Jewes who wreſtled in vaine againſt the decree of God, were overwhelmed with the ruines. This diſſolute * Auguſtus, and in his beard

When Valentinian the Emperour ſteered the helme of the Roman Empire, what time as through the whole world the trumpets reſounded nothing but the warlike Al, Arme, the Picts, Saxons, Scots and Attacots vexed the Britans with continuall troubles and annoyances. Fraomarius then King of the Almanes was tranſlated hither, and by commiſſion made Tribune or Marſhall over a band of the Almanes, for number and power in thoſe daies highly renowned, to repreſſe the incurſions of thoſe barba-
D rous nations. *Neverthelеſſe Britaine was through the generall conſpiracie of thoſe Barbarians afflicted and brought to extreme diſtreſſe, Nectaridius Comes or Lieutenant of the maritime tract ſlaine, and Bucholbaudes the Generall by an ambuſh of the enemies circumvented. The intelligence of which occurrences when it was brought unto Rome with great horror, the Emperour ſent Severus, being even then Lord High Steward of his houſhold, to redreſſe what was done amiſſe, in caſe his hap had beene to have ſeene the wiſhed end: who being within a while after called away, Iovinius went to the ſame parts, * ſent backe Proventuſides in poſt, minding to crave the puiſſant helpe of an armie. At the ſame time the Picts divided into two nations the Dicalidones and Vecturiones, the Attacots likewiſe a warlike people, and the Scots, ranging in divers parts did much miſchiefe where they went. As for the cohorts of Gaule, the Frankners and Saxons confining upon them, brake out and made rodes where ever they could either by land or ſea, and what with driving booties, with firing towns, and killing poore captives, made foule worke there. and power who followed) were come, hee departed: and marching toward London, an old towne, which the posteritie called Augusta, having divided his troopes into sundry parts hee set upon those companies of roving and robbing enemies, even when they were heavy loaden with bootie and pillage. And having quickly discomfited those that drave before them their prisoners bound, and cattell, he forced them to forgoe the prey, which the most miserable tributaries had lost. In the end, after full restitution made of all, save onely some small parcels bestowed upon his wearied souldiers, he entred most joyfully into the citie, over set before with distresses and calamities, but now suddenly refreshed; so far forth as hope of recovery, and safetie might effect: and there being raised up with this luckie hand, to adventure greater exploits, and yet casting with himselfe projects promising securitie, he staied doubtfull of the future event; as having learned by the information of revolting fugitives and confession of captives, that so great a multitude of sundry nations, and a stiffe-necked people of so fell and fierce a disposition, could not possibly be vanquished but by secret wiles, and sudden excursions. Finally, after proclamations published, and promises made of impunitie, he summoned as well the traiterous runagates as many others that went with free pasport dispersed sundry waies, to present themselves ready for service. Vpon which summons given, so soone as most of them were returned, he as one pricked forward with so good a motive, and yet held backe by heavie cares, called for Civilis by name, (who was to rule Britaine as Deputie,) to bee sent unto him; a man of a very quicke hastie nature, but a precise keeper of Iustice and righteousnesse: likewise for Dulcitius, a redoubted Captaine, and right skilfull in feates of armes. Afterwards, having gotten heart, and courage to him, he went from Augusta, which in old time they called Londinum, well appointed with industrious, and considerate souldiers, and so brought exceeding great succour to the ruinate, and troubled estate of the Britaines, gaining before hand all places every where for his advantage to forelay the Barbarians in ambush, and giving commandement of no service to the very common souldiers, but hee would himselfe cheerefully take the first assay thereof. In this sort performing as well the offices of an active and hardie souldier, as the carefull charge of a right noble Generall, having discomfited and put to flight divers nations, whom insolent pride fed with securitie incited, and set on fire to assaile and invade the Roman Empire, he having laid the foundation of quiet peace for a long time, restored both Cities and Castles, which verily had received manifold dammages, to as good a passe as ever they were at. Now there had hapned whiles he atchieved these exploits, an horrible act like to have bred some great danger, but that in the very first enterprize it was quenched and suppressed. There was one Valentinus of Valeria Pannonia, a man of a proud spirit, brother to the wife of that pestilent Maximinus, first Deputie Lieutenant, & after President, for some notable offence banished into Britaine; who being impatient of rest like a noisom beast rose up in cõmotion against Theodosius, practising mischievous plots and an insurrection, upon a certaine swelling pride and envie, for that hee perceived him alone able to withstand his horrible designes. Howbeit, casting all about for many meanes both secret and apert, whiles the puffing humour of his infinite, and unsatiable desire still encreased, he solicited as well the banished persons as souldiers, when he espied his opportunity, promising reward, for to allure and draw them on to some actuall attempt. And now as the time drew neere when these enterprizes should bee put in execution, and take effect, the Generall being advertised of all these projects, and forwarder of the twaine to adventure, resolute also upon an high mind to take revenge of such as were attaint and convict, committed verily Valentinus with some few of his inward complices unto Captaine Dulcitius, for to bee put to death: but forecasting withall, the future events, (as hee was a man in militarie skill surpassing all others of his time) he would not suffer any farther inquisition and examination to be had of the conspirators, for feare lest by striking a terrour among so many, the tempestuous troubles of the provinces which were well appeased, might revive againe. Turning himselfe therefore from this businesse to the reforming of many enormities, which of necessitie were to be regarded, and having cleared all dangers (for evidently seene it was that fortune was so propitious and good unto him, as that she never forsooke but sped his enterprizes) he reedified the Cities, and those garrison forts whereof we spake; he fortified also the frontiers with standing watches and strong fore-fenses. Thus having recovered the province which had yielded ſubjection to the enemies, hee ſo brought it to the former ancient ſtate, that upon his owne motion to have it ſo, it both had a lawfull governour to rule it, and afterward alſo was called VALENTIA, for the Princes will and pleaſure. The Areani a kind of men inſtituted by thoſe of ancient times (concerning whom I have related in the Acts of Conſtans the Emperor) fallen by little and little unto vices, he removed from their ſtations, as being openly convict that they were allured by great receits, or promiſe at leaſt waies of much reward, to have divers times diſcovered unto the Barbarians whatſoever was done or debated among us. For, this indeed was their charge, to run to and fro by long journeies, to intimate and make knowne unto our Captaines all ſturs that the people neere adjoyning were about to make. Thus, after he had with very great approoſe exploited theſe acts above rehearſed, and others the like; he was ſent for to the Princes-court, and leaving the Provinces in much jollitie, no leſſe honoured was he for his many and important victories, than either Furius Camillus or Papirius Curſor. And ſo being honorably accompanied and attended upon with the love and favour of all men as far as to the narrow ſeas, with a gentle gale of wind he paſſed over and came to the Princes camp, where with joy and praiſe hee was received. For theſe deeds of his ſo bravely atchieved, in honor of him, there was an image ſet up, reſembling a man of armes on horſebacke, as Symmachus giveth us to underſtand, ſpeaking to his ſon Theodoſius the Emperor in this wiſe. The author, quoth he, of your kindred and ſtock, Captaine Generall ſometime in Afrik and Britaine both, was among other ancient titles conſecrated by the moſt honorable order with Images of Knighthood: And Claudian in his commendation with full pen wrote poetically thus;

Gratianus Emperour.

&c. After him, Gratian took upon him the Empire, who alſo proclaimed Theodoſius, the ſon of that Theodoſius (of whom we have ſpoken already) Emperor: Whereat Maximus a Spaniard borne, his concurrent, and withall deſcended in right line from Cõſtantinus the Great, who alſo had before time been Generall over the armie in Britan, was ſo highly diſcontented, that he took upon him the purple roabe: or as Oroſius reporteth, was againſt his will by the ſouldiers ſaluted Emperor; a valiant man, vertuous, & worthy of the title of * Auguſtus, but that againſt his allegiance, he had by way of tyranny & uſurpation attained to the place. Who at the firſt couragiouſly vanquiſhed the Picts & Scots, that uſed to make many inrodes into the Province: afterwards with all the flower and ſtrength well neere of Britiſh forces, arrived in the mouth of Rhene, and procured unto himſelfe the whole puiſſance of the German armies: ordained the Royall ſeat of the Empire to be at * Triers (whereupon ſtiled he was by the name of Trevericus Imperator) & ſpreading, as Gildas ſaith, his wings the one as far as to Spaine, the other into Italy, with the terror only of his name, levied tributes and penſions for ſouldiers pay, of the moſt fell and ſavage nations in Germanie. Againſt whom Gratianus having led an armie, after five daies skirmiſhing, being forſaken of his owne ſouldiers, and put to flight, ſent Saint Ambroſe Embaſſadour to treat for peace: which he obtained indeed; but the ſame full of treacherous guile. For, Maximus ſuborned, and ſent under-hand one Andragathius, riding in a cloſe litter or carroch, with a rumour ſpread abroad, that therein rode the wife of Gratian. Unto which when Gratian was come for love of his wife, and had opened the ſaid litter, forth leapes Andragathius, with his companie, and ſlew him outright in the place. Whoſe body for to demand, was Ambroſe ſent a ſecond time: howbeit, not admitted, becauſe he refuſed to communicate with thoſe Biſhops, that ſided with Maximus. Who being lifted up, and proud of thoſe things hapning to his mind, appointed his ſonne Victor to be Cæſar, dealt cruelly with Gratians Captaines, and ſetled the State in France. Theodoſius Auguſtus, who governed in the Eaſt, at the requeſts or mandates rather of his Embaſſadours, acknowledged him Emperour, and exhibited his Image unto the Alexandrines for to be ſeene in publike place. And now having by violence, and extortion entred upon the eſtates of all men, with the utter undoing of the common-wealth, hee fulfilled his owne greedie avarice. Hee made the defence of Catholike Religion his pretences to colour his tyrannie; Priſcillian, and certaine of his Sectaries convict of hereticall, and falſe doctrine in the Synode, or Councell of Burdeaux, and appealing unto him, hee condemned to death; although Martin that moſt holy Biſhop of * Tourain or Tours, moſt humbly beſought to forbeare ſhedding the bloud of thoſe poore wretches: avouching that it was ſufficient to deprive ſuch as were judged heretikes, and put them out of their Churches, by the definitive ſentence of Biſhops: and that it was a ſtrange and unexampled hainous deed, that a ſecular Judge ſhould determine cauſes of the Church. And theſe were the firſt, that being executed by the civill ſword, left a foule and dangerous preſident to poſteritie. After this he entred Italie with ſo great terrour, that Ualentinian, together with his mother, were glad to flie unto Theodoſius, the cities of Italie received him, and did him all the honour that might be: but the Bononians above the reſt, among whom this Inſcription is yet to be ſeene,

To our Great Lords, C. Maximus & Fl, Victor, Pious, Happie, Alwaies Auguſti, borne for the good of the Common-wealth.

Meane while Nannius and Quintinus, Maſters in militarie skill, unto whom Maximus had committed the infancie of his ſonne, and the cuſtodie of Gaule, gave the Frankners, who annoied Gaule with their incurſions, a mightie great overthrow, and forced them to give hoſtages, and deliver into their hands the Authors of the warre. As for Valentinian, he earneſtly beſought Theodoſius, to ſuccour him diſpoiled of his Empire

Sulpitius Alexander.

A Empire by a Tyrant, from whom for a good while, he could have none other anſwer, but this, That no marvel it is, if a ſeditious ſervant became ſuperiour to that Lord, who caſteth off the true Lord indeed. For Valentinian was corrupted with Arianiſme. Howbeit, wearied at length with his importunate praiers, he ſetteth forward in warlike manner againſt Maximus, who in the ſame time abode in Aquileia, very ſecure & fearleſſe. For he had before-hand fortified the ſtreits between the mountains with garriſons, and the havens with ſhipping, ſo that with great alacritie, and much confidence at the firſt hee welcomed Theodoſius with one battel before Syſcia in Pannonia: & afterwards moſt valiantly received him with another, under the leading of his brother Marcellus; but B in both of them he ſped ſo badly, that he withdrew himſelfe ſecretly into Aquileia, where by his owne ſouldiers, as he dealt money among them, taken he was, and deveſted of his Imperiall ornaments, brought before Theodoſius, who immediatly delivered him into the hangmans hand to be executed, after that he had now worne the purple roabe five yeares. Whereupon Auſonius writeth thus in praiſe of Aquileia:

Non erat iſte locus: meritò tamen aucta recenti,
Nona inter claras Aquileia cieberis urbes

Andragathus, whoſe ſtate was now moſt deſperate, caſt himſelfe from ſhipboard headlong into the Sea. Victor the ſonne of Maximus, was in France defeated, taken priſoner, and ſlaine. But thoſe Britans, who tooke part with Maximus, as ſome writers doe record, forcibly invaded Armorica in France, and there planted themſelves. Now Theodoſius preſently after his victorie, entred Rome with his Sonne Honorius in triumph, and publiſhed an Edict to this effect: No man ſo hardy, as to challenge or claime that honour, which the bold Tyrant had granted: but that ſuch preſumption E ſhould bee condemned, and reduced to the former eſtate. And Valentinian, in theſe words; All judgements and awards whatſoever, that Maximus the moſt wicked and deteſtable Tyrant that ever was, hath given forth to be promulged and enacted, we reverſe and condemne. But Saint Ambroſe in his funerall Sermon of Theodoſius, crieth out in theſe termes: That Eugenius and Maximus, by their wofull example, doe teſtifie in hell, what a heavie thing it is to beare armes againſt their naturall Princes. To ſpeake in a word, this victory was held to be ſo worthy and memorable, that the Romans from thence forward, ſolemnized that day every yeare, as feſtivall.

Procopius.

There ſucceeded Theodoſius in the Weſt Empire his ſonne Honorius, a child ten yeares old; over whom was ordained as Tutor and Protector Flavius Stilicho, a man paſſing famous for a long time, as who being an inward companion of Theodoſius in all his warres and victories, and by degrees of militarie ſervice, advanced unto high authoritie, and the Princes affinitie, in the end cloied and glutted with proſperitie, and carried away through ambition, miſerably loſt his life. What time the Scots all Ireland mov'd, offenſive armes to take,
And with the ſtroke of enemies ores, the Sea much fome did make.

Should feare no more, nor dread the Picts, ne yet ken from a farre, (Along the ſhore whiles I looke ſtill when wavering winds will turne)

And thus for that time Britaine ſeemed ſafe enough from any danger of enemies. For in another place, that Poet writeth thus:

What either ſeas more quiet now, that Saxons conquer'd are,
Or Britaine become ſecure, ſince Picts ſubdued were.

And when Alaricus King of the Gothes, hovered about Rome, ſeeking meanes to aſſault and ſpoile it, that Legion which in the marches kept Station againſt the Barbarians was called from hence, as Claudian ſignifieth, when he reckoneth up the aids ſent for from all parts.

of all matters within Spaine to Gerontius, came ſpeedily without intermiſſion of journey to his father. When they had met together, after many daies, Conſtantinus ſeeing no feare of any danger from Italy, gave himſelfe wholly to gluttony and bellicheere, and ſo adviſeth his ſonne to returne into Spaine. But when he had ſent his forces to march before, whiles he abode ſtill with his father, newes came out of Spaine, that Maximus one of his vaſſals and followers was by Gerontius ſet up and advanced to the Empire; and having about him a ſtrong power and retinue of barbarous nations prepared to come againſt them. Whereat they being affrighted, Conſtans and Decimius Ruſticus, who of the Maſter of Offices was now become the Prefect, ha-D ving diſpatched Edobeccus before unto the German Nations, together with the Frankners, Almans & all the militarie forces, went into France, intending out of hand to returne unto Couſtantinus. But as for Conſtans, Gerontius intercepted him by the way at Vienna in France, and killed him: Conſtantine himſelfe he beſieged within Arles: to raiſe this ſiege and to aſſaile him in hoſtile manner, when one Conſtantius ſent from Honorius made haſt with an armie, Gerontius fearefully fled: whereupon his ſouldiers for anger and indignation beſet his houſe round about, and drave him to thoſe hard ſtreits, that firſt he cut off Alanus his moſt truſty friends head, then he laid violent hands upon Nunnichia the ſaid Alanus wife, who earneſtly deſired to die with

And yet as if in mids thereof it were, he did it guide.
The greater priſe and praiſe it is to ſeeke there for to pleaſe,

When Rome was forced by Alaricus, Honorius calleth Victorinus home with his army: and forthwith the Britans took armes, and engaging themſelves into danger for the ſafety of themſelves, freed their own cities and States from the barbarous people, that waited all opportunities to annoy them. Semblably, that whole maritime tract of * Armorica, and the reſt of the Gaulois Provinces, accompanied the Britans, and in like manner delivered themſelves, caſting out the Roman Preſidents, and ſetting up a certain proper common-wealth at their owne pleaſure. This revolt and rebellion of Britaine, together with the French Provinces hapned in the time that Conſtantine uſurped the Kingdome, conſidering that the Barbarians, taking advantage of his negligence in government, boldly, and without reſtraint overcame thoſe Provinces. Howbeit within a while after, the States of Britan importuned Honorius for ſuccor: whom he without ſending any aid at all, adviſed by his Letters to ſtand upon their owne guard, & look to themſelves. The Britans upon the receit of Honorius Letters, were ſtirred up, and put themſelves in armes to defend their owne cities: but being not able to match the Barbarians that came upon them ſo on every ſide, they beſought Honorius what they could, and obtained at his hands, that a Legion ſhould bee ſent to their reſcue and ſuccour. Which being come over hither, defeated and overthrew a great number of the enemies, chaſed the reſt out of the marches of the Province, and took order for a wall or rampier of turfe to be made, from the Firth of Edenburgh, unto Cluid, which ſtood them in ſmall or no ſtead. For by occaſion that the ſaid Legion was called backe to the defence of France, the barbarous enemies returne, breake downe with eaſe the frontier bounds, and in all kind of outrage and crueltie in every place carry, harrie, and make havocke of all. Then were diſpatched a ſecond time in lamentable ſort Embaſſadours, with their garments rent, and heads covered with ſand (marke the manner of it) for to crave aid of the Romans: unto whom, by the commandement of Valentinian the Third, were appointed certaine regiments of ſouldiers, conducted by Gallio of Ravenna, which moſt valiantly vanquiſhed the Barbarians, and in ſome ſort gave comfort to the poore diſtreſſed and afflicted Province. They made a wall directly by a ſtraight line, and that of ſtone (not as the other) at the publike charges of the State, and with private mens purſes together, joyning with them the miſerable Inhabitants, after the wonted manner of building, to wit, traverſing along the land * from one Sea to another, betweene thoſe cities which haply were placed there for feare of enemies; to the fearefull people they gave good inſtructions, and exhortations to play the men, and left unto them paternes, ſhewing them how to make armour and weapons. Vpon the coaſt alſo of the Ocean, in the tract of the South countrey, what way they had ſhips (becauſe even from that ſide alſo they ſtood in feare of thoſe barbarous and ſavage beaſts) they planted turrets, and bulwarkes with convenient ſpaces diſtant one from another, yielding farre and faire proſpect into the ſea: and ſo the Romans gave them a finall farewell, never to returne againe.

Now alſo was the Roman Empire in Britaine, come to her full and finall period, to wit, the foure hundreth, ſeventie, and ſixth yeare after Cæſars firſt entrie: what time, in the raigne of Valentinian the Third, the Romans having tranſported their forces with the foreſaid Gallion, for the defence of France, and buried their treaſure within the ground, left Britaine bereft of her youth, waſted with ſo many muſters and B levies, diſpoiled of all ſuccour and defence of garriſon, unto the cruell rage of Picts and Scots. Hence it is, that Proſper Aquitanus wrote thus, and that right truely: At this time, by reaſon of the Romans weakeneſſe, the ſtrength of Britaine was utterly ſpent, and brought to nought. And our Hiſtoriographer of Malmesburie: When the Tyrants had left none in the countrey, but halfe Barbarians; none in the cities and townes, but ſuch as wholly gave themſelves to belly-cheere: Britaine deſtitute of all protection by her vigorous young men, bereaved of all exerciſe and practiſe of good arts, became expoſed, for a long time, to the greedy, and gaping jawes of Nations confining upon her. For, ſtraightwaies, by the incurſions of Scots and Picts, many a man was ſlaine, villages burnt, cities undermined and ſubverted, and throughout all laid waſt with fire and ſword. The Iſlanders in great C trouble and perplexitie, thinking all other meanes ſafer, than triall by battell; partly betooke them to their heeles, and for their ſafetie fled unto the mountaine-Countrey: partly, after they had buried their treaſure within the ground, whereof much is digged up in theſe daies, purpoſed to goe to Rome for to crave aide. But as Nicephorus truely wrote, Valentinian the Third, was not onely unable to recover Britaine, Spaine, and France, provinces plucked away from his Empire already, but alſo loſt Africke beſide. Not without juſt cauſe therefore Gildas in this age cried out thus: Britaine was diſpoiled of all her armed men, her militarie forces, her Rulers (cruell though they were,) and of a mightie number of her ſtout and couragious youths. For, beſides thoſe whom that Uſurper Maximus, and the laſt Conſtantine led away with them, it appeareth evidently by antike Inſcriptions, D and the booke named Notitia Provinciarum, that theſe companies underwritten ſerved the Romans in war, here and there diſperſed over their Provinces, which alſo were from time to time evermore ſupplied out of Britaine.

Hereupon, no maruaile it is, if Britaine exhauſted daily with ſo many, and ſo great levies of ſouldiers, lay expoſed unto the Barbarians, and heereby proveth that ſentence of Tacitus true; There is no ſtrength in the Roman armies, but it is of forraine ſtrangers.

In writing of theſe matters, concerning the Romans government in Britaine, which F continued (as I ſaid) CCCCLXXVI. yeares, or much there about, whiles I conſider and think otherwhiles with my ſelfe, how many Colonies of Romans were in ſo long a time brought hither, how many ſouldiers continually tranſported over hither from Rome to lie in garriſon, how many ſent hither to negotiate either their own buſines, or the affaires of the Empire, who joyning in mariage with Britans, both planted themſelves, and alſo begat children here (For, Whereſoever the Roman winneth, ſaith Seneca,

Neither can we thinke you ſo unreaſonable, as to wiſh us for to kill our parents, brethren, and children.* If the Ubij and Romans in ſo ſmall a time became parents, brethren, and children Ammian. Marcellin. lib. 28. one to another, what ſhould we judge of Britans and Romans linked and conjoyned ſo many yeares together? What alſo may we ſay of the Burgundians, who for that C they mingled their bloud with the Romans, whiles they held for a ſmall time the Romans Provinces, called themſelves a Roman off-ſpring: not to rehearſe againe what I have ſaid before, That this Iſland hath beene named Romania, and Inſula Romana, that is, The Roman Iſle.

Thus much have I ſet downe ſummarily, and in compendious manner gathered out of the ancient monuments of Antiquitie, rejecting all fabulous fictions, as touching

But ſeeing it is agreed upon among all learned men, that there ariſeth very much light to the illuſtration of ancient Hiſtories, out of ancient Coines, I have thought good in this place to exhibite unto the Reader certaine pieces of money, as well of thoſe Britaines, who firſt came under ſubjection of the Romans, as of Roman Emperours; ſuch eſpecially as appurtaine to Britaine, and thoſe out of the Cabinet of the right Worſhipfull Sir Robert Cotton of Conington Knight, who hath from all E places with curious and chargeable ſearch, gotten them together, and of his courteſie with heart and good will, imparted the ſame unto me.

CONIECTVRES AS TOVCHING the Britiſh Coines.

TO the Britans Coines, the portracts whereof I have here ſhewed, you looke haply, that I ſhould adjoyne ſome briefe notes alſo. But what to adjoyne of ſuch things as the revolution of ſo many ages paſt, hath altogether overcaſt with darkeneſſe, to profeſſe plainely, I ſee not: and your ſelfe, when you ſhall read theſe ſlender gueſſes of mine, will avouch with me, that I walke in a mirke and miſtie night of ignorance.

That the old Britans uſed braſſe money, or rings, or elſe plates of yron tried to a certaine juſt weight, I have declared already before, out of Cæſar: and there be, who averre, that they have ſeen ſome of theſe found in little pitchers. Beſides theſe, found there are otherwhiles in this Iſland, pieces of gold, ſilver, and braſſe of ſundry faſhions, and as different in poize: all for the moſt part of the one ſide hollow: ſome without letters, others with expreſſe Inſcriptions of letters; of which ſort, I could never here that any have been digged up elſewhere, untill ſuch time as Nicolaus Fabricius Pireſcius, a right noble young Gentleman of Provance in France, one for ſuch antiquities, & old Medals or pieces of money, paſsing skilfull, and of judicious inſight, very lately had ſhewed me the like found in France.

But to come unto theſe of ours, which I have here propoſed.

The firſt, is a coine of Cunobelinus, who flouriſhed in the daies of Auguſtus and Tiberius: wherein, if I deceive not my ſelfe, are engraven the heads of two-faced Ianus: peradventure, becauſe even at that time Britaine began to caſt off, and leave their barbarous rudeneſſe. For we reade, how Ianus was the firſt, that changed barbarous manners into civill behaviour, and therefore was depainted with two fore-heads, to ſignifie, that he had of one ſhape made another.

E

The ſecond alſo is Cunobelinus Coine, ſhewing his face, and Inſcription [of the one ſide] and the Coiner or Mint-maſter on the other, with this word TASCIA ſet to it, which word among the Britans, betokeneth a Tribute Penye, as Maſter David Powell, a man moſt skilfull in the Britiſh language hath informed me: and is derived perhaps of the Latine, Taxatio. For, the Britans acknowledge not X. for their letter. And by the ſame reaſon the Inſcription of MONETA, is ſeene oft times in pieces of Roman money. TASCIA.

In like manner, the third is a Coine of the ſame Cunobelinus, with an horſe and CVNO. with a corne eare alſo, and CAMV, (as it ſhould ſeeme) for Camalodunum, which was the Royall citie and ſeat of Cunobelinus. See in Eſſex.

F

The fourth with VER, may be thought a coine of the Verlamians. See in Hartford-ſhire.

The

The fifth againe, is one of Cunobelinus his pieces. A

The ſixth, becauſe it giveth no light by letters, I wot not what to make of it.

The ſeventh, a Coine of Cunobelinus, having this Inſcription, TASC. NOVANEL, with a womans head; whether it ſhould imply a tribute piece of the Trinovants, over whom he was ruler, I cannot avow: on the other ſide, Apollo with his Harpe, and Cunobelin putteth me in remẽbrance of that, which elſewhere I have obſerved as concerning the God Belinus: namely, that the * Gauls in old time worſhipped Apollo under the name of Belinus: which Dioſcorides alſo doth confirme, writing in plain & expreſſe termes, that the herbe * Apollinaris, with the juce whereof the Gaules were wont to annoint their arrowes, is in the Gaules tongue, called Belinuntia. So that, upon this I may be bold in ſome ſort to conject, that the name of Cunobelinus, as alſo of Caßibelinus, is drawn from the worſhip of Apollo, like as the names of Phœbitius and Delphidius. If not rather, like as Apollo for his buſh of yellow haire, is named in Greeke, ξανθὸς, in Latin, Flavus, that is, yellow: ſo likewiſe among the Britans, and Gaules, Belin. For that which is yellow, in * Britiſh ſpeech they call, Melin, Belin, and Felin: and for the ſame cauſe, that ancient Belinus, Cunobelinus, and Caßibelinus, who alſo goeth under the name of Caſſivelaunus, may ſeeme to be ſo named, as one would ſay, Yellow Princes. For that Cuno is a name of dignitie, the * Britans confeſſe, and a thing which is eſpeciall and principall, they terme at this day, Cynoc. Certes, it hath been a name of honour, Cungetorix, Cunobelinus, Cuneglaſus, * Cuneda, and Cunedagius, Princes names among the Britans; like as Cyngetorix, Convictolitanus, and Conetodunus, among the ancient Gaules, doe after a ſort make good and declare. Neither am I ignorant that Gildas hath tranſlated Cuneglaſus, in Latine, Lanionem fulvum vel furvum, that is, A Lion tawney, or darke hued Butcher: whom others have interpreted, Principem Cæruleum, ſive vitrei coloris, that is, A Prince blew, or of a blewiſh, or woad-colour: like as Cuneda, Principem bonum, that is, A good Prince. That the Germans Koning, and our King, came from Cuno, I dare not yet ſuppoſe. Let it ſuffice, by theſe my ſundry gueſſes, to have thus dallied, leſt I lay open my ſelfe to the ſcorne of others.

The eighth, with a chariot horſe, and a wheele or ſhield underneath, having in the reverſe BODVO; may ſeeme to be a Coine of the Nation called * Boduni: or elſe of the Queene Bodicia, who is diverſly named Voadicia, and Bunduica.

* Or Dobuni, Glocester-ſhire, and Oxford-ſhire.

The ninth, wherein is repreſented an horſeman, with ſpeare and ſhield, and theſe letters in ſcattering wiſe, CAERATIC. I would deeme to be a Coine of that warlike Prince Caratacus, whoſe praiſes Tacitus highly extolleth. F

The

A The tenth, upon the one ſide whereof, under an horſeman, is the Inſcription R E X, and on the other C O M, both I and ſome others are pleaſed with this conceit, that it was a coin of Connius * Attrebatenſis whom Cæſar mentioneth. Of Atras.

The eleventh, which doth repreſent a little halfe moon with this Inſcription, R E X C A L L E, is not much unlike the name of that moſt famous and frequented Citie, Callena. * Or Gallena, that is, Wallengford.

B The twelfth hath a winged head with this word A T E V L A: and in the reverſe a Lion, and this Inſcription, V L A T O S. What the meaning might be of theſe words, I ſeeke and ſeek, but in vaine. Indeed by this very ſame portrature and image, I have ſeene upon pieces of Roman mony the Goddeſſe Victorie expreſſed. But, that Victorie ſhould bee in the Britiſh tongue called Ateula, I never yet could find. Mary, that they named Victorie, Andata, I have out of Dio reported already: and whether the ſame were Andrata, worſhipped C of the * Vocontij in Gaule, let ſome other ſay, for I dare not. Victoria Andate. * Thoſe of the County of Beaufort.

Here alſo may you behold the thirteenth, with this word D I A S, in an eight-angled figure, & an horſe on the contrary ſide: the fourteenth with a ſwine, and theſe letters V A N O C, the head alſo of a goddeſſe, haply Venus; or elſe Venutius whom Tacitus ſpeaketh of. The fifteenth, with an head and helmet upon it; and this Inſcription, D V R N A C O: and whether that were Dumnacus a Prince of the Andes whom Cæſar doth mention, I wot not. The ſixteenth with an horſe, & this word O R C E T I. The ſeventeenth with the image of Auguſtus and T A S C I A, & on the reverſe a bull boaking with D his hornes: The eighteenth, with C V N O within a laurell garland; and upon the back part an horſe, with the Inſcription T A S C E. * In Oſtageno. * People of Anjou or Angiers.

We have ſeen beſides one other coine with the flying horſe Pegaſus, and C A M V: on the backe part whereof, the forme of a man with an helmet and ſhield, within ſtanding corne, and C V N O: another, with an horſe ill favouredly portraied, and E I S V, peradventure for I S V R I I, and on the back ſide, an eare of corne: alſo another with a ſouldier carying a ſpeare, and on the other ſide, within E a wreath or chein, S O L I D V. That it ſhould be the piece of mony called Solidus, I doe not believe; becauſe the ſaid piece was in that age alwaies of gold, whereas this was of ſilver. More probable it is, that it ſhould have a reference to Solidurij. For ſo the ancient French named men devoted to die in behalfe of others: Whoſe condition was this, that look unto whoſe friendſhip they had betaken themſelves, they ſhould together with them enjoy all the comforts and F commodities of this life. If any violent accident hapned unto them, they were either to ſuſtaine the ſame chance together with them, or elſe to kill themſelves: neither hath ever any one of them bin found, who after the party was ſlain, unto whoſe friendſhip he had devoted himſelfe, Solidurij. Cæſar Comment.

Soldiers. himſelfe, would refuſe to die. Now whether from theſe, thoſe ſouldiers tooke their name, who being ſworne penſioners to any one Prince or State, take a certaine penſion, and with moſt nations of Europe carry almoſt the very ſame name, to wit Soldiers, Soldates, Soldados, &c. I had rather others ſhould thinke than my ſelfe determine: although for mine owne part, I would more willingly ſubſcribe to this opinion, that in theſe later and more moderne times, they were termed Solidarij, for diſtinction ſake, for thoſe, who ſerved in the wars in regard of their tenours, without pay of mony.

Whether all theſe kinds of coine went commonly currant as money, from one to another and in ordinary trafficke and exchange, or were ſtamped at the firſt apart, for ſome ſpeciall uſe and purpoſe, is a queſtion debated among the learned. But in few words, take here my conjecture, if I may be ſo bold to interpoſe the ſame. Conſidering that Cæſar had appointed what Cuſtome or Impoſt the Britans ſhould pay yearely, and whereas under Auguſtus they endured thoſe paiments for portage, or toll, as well in carrying forth as bringing in commodities: by little and little other tributes alſo were impoſed upon them: to wit, for * Corne-grounds, Plant-plots, Groves or Parks, Paſturage of greater and ſmaller beaſts: as being ſubdued now to obey as ſubjects, and not to ſerve as ſlaves: I have been of opinion, that thoſe pieces of mony were ſtamped at firſt for that uſe; namely, for greater beaſts, with an horſe; for ſmaller with a ſwine; for woods with a tree; for * corne-fields with an eare of corne: as in that piece of the Verlamians, which carieth the Inſcription V E R V. As for thoſe with the head of a man or woman, they may ſeeme ſtamped for the Tribute * Capitatio, which was perſonall and impoſed upon the poll or perſon of every one: of women from the twelfth, of men, from the fourteenth yeare of their age. Which impoſition Bunduica or Bodicia a Queene of the Britans complaineth of unto her people in theſe words; Yee doe both graze and alſo plough for the Romans, yea, ye pay an yearly tribute in reſpect of your very bodies. For this purpoſe I have thought there was in old time one certaine kind of mony ſtamped, ſeeing that in the ſcripture it is plainly called Numiſma Cenſus, and Heſichius expoundeth Κῆνσος εἶδος νομίσματος ἐπικεφαλαίου Cenſus, is a kind of perſonall mony paid for every poll. And the more ſtedfaſtly believe I this, for that in ſome there is expreſſed the Mint-maſter marking mony with T A S C I A, which among the Britans betokeneth a Tribute-Denier. Howbeit I denie not, but that afterwards theſe paſſed promiſcuouſly as mony from one to another. Neither am I yet of the ſame mind with thoſe, that would have the Swine, the Horſe, the Corne eare, Ianus, &c. to have beene the peculiar badges of nations, families, or Princes: conſidering, we may ſee in theſe, that one and the ſame Prince and nation uſed ſundry badges, badges, as Cunobelinus, who ſtamped in his mony a ſwine, an horſe, a corne eare, and other things.

Now, whether theſe tribute pieces were coined by the Romans, or the Provinciall people, or their Kings, ſeing that the whole world was taxed by Auguſtus, I may not eaſily affirme. Conjecture I may that they were ſtamped by the Britiſh Kings, conſidering that Britaine from the time of Iulius Cæſar unto Claudius daies, uſed their owne lawes, and was committed to the government of their owne Kings, as Dio writeth: and withall, ſeeing that they repreſent the images and titles of Britiſh Princes. For, the Romans by a received cuſtome had Kings in their Provinces as inſtruments to bring the people into ſervitude: who being now become, as it were, the Romans fellowes and aſſociates, by little & little were framed, (a thing uſuall with perſons conquered) to their faſhions, & ſo, as it ſeemeth, began after the Roman manner both to ſtamp mony at a certaine poize, and alſo to imprint a name upon the pieces. But contrariwiſe in Iurie, as may be collected by the anſwer of Chriſt, marked they were with Cæſars face and ſuperſcription, and that in all likelihood by the Romans themſelves. Which Cardinall Baronius a painefull Eccleſiaſticall Hiſtorian, ſheweth in theſe words: The manner, ſaith he, among the Romans was, that mony ſhould be coined by the Emperours, in regard of Tribute or Taxe, and not to remaine alwaies the ſame, and after one ſort, but according to the riſe and fall of the ſaid tributes, differ from other pieces of uſuall mony in this point, for that the value of theſe ordinarie pieces is alwaies one and the ſame, but thoſe of Tax or tribute, ever as the qualitie of Tribute changed, were made proportionable to the ſaid tribute. But divers learned men accord not in this point with Baronius.

NOTES VPON THE ROMAN COINES.

THE firſt Roman Emperour after [Iulius] Cæſar, that earneſtly ſet his mind upon the conqueſt of Britaine, was Claudius: and he having put over ſea hither with an armie, brought the South-part thereof into the forme of a Province: At which very time, this firſt piece of mony may ſeeme to bee ſtamped, which carrieth this abbreviated Inſcription, TI CLAVD: CAES. AVG. P. M. TR. P. VIIII. IMP. XVI. that is to ſay, Tiberius Claudius Cæſar, Auguſtus Pontifex Maximus, that is, High Prieſt, Dio. Caſſius. Tribunitia poteſtate IX. that is, In Tribunes authoritie the ninth time, Imperator XVI. that is, fixteene times Imperator. But to explaine theſe titles once for all ye ſhall underſtand, That after Iulius Cæſar, who who laid the foundation of the Roman Monarchie, and Octavius who was honoured with the name of Auguſtus, all their ſucceſſors in honour of them would be called Cæſares, and Auguſti, as though they far ſurpaſſed the nature of men. For ſuch things as be of ſacred Majeſtie, are named Auguſtæ: alſo, termed they were Pontifices Maximi, or High Prieſts, for that they were conſecrated in all kinds of Prieſthood, and overſeers of all Sacrifices and religious ceremonies. They uſurped likewiſe the Tribunitian power and authoritie (for Tribunes in no wiſe would they be termed) to the end, that they might have protection thereby and be inviolable. For, being once inveſted in this authoritie, if any man either gave curſed language or offered violence unto them, hee might without proceſſe of condemnation be killed as a ſacrilegious perſon: and this Tribunitian power they renewed every yeare, and thereby were reckoned the yeares of their Empire. Laſt of all they were ſtiled, Imperatores, becauſe their command and rule was moſt large, & under that name the power of Kings and Dictators was contained. Now, they were entituled, Imperatores, ſo oft as they had atchieved any worthy exploit in battell, either in their owne perſons, or by their Captaines. But whereas in the reverſe of this piece of mony, there is to be ſeene a triumphall Arch, with the portrait of an horſeman betweene two trophees, and this title, DE BRITAN. I would judge, that therby is meant a twofold victorie obtained, in the ninth yeare of Claudius his Empire, according to the number, that ſheweth his Tribunitian authoritie renewed.

II. In the ſecond piece, which alſo is a coine of Claudius * Auguſtus, out of this Inſcription, TI. CLAVD. CAES. AVG. GER. TR. P. XII. IMP. XIIX. we are taught, that in the twelfth yeare of his raigne, he, for a victorie won in Britan was with joyfull acclamations ſaluted, Imperator, the eighteenth time: and at the ſame inſtant that the Colonie Camalodunum was thither brought, which is ſignified expreſſely by an * husbandman imprinted upon it, with a Cow and a Bull. The Romans (ſaith Servius) when they were about to found and build cities, being girt and clad after the Gabine faſhion, that is to ſay, with one part of their gowne covering the head, and the other tucked up, yoked on the right hand, a Bull, and within forth a Cow, and held the crooked plough taile bending inward, ſo as all the clods of the earth might fall inward. And thus having made a furrow, they did ſet out the places for wals, holding up the plough frō the ground, wher the gates ſhould be.

* The Emperour.

III. The Son of Claudius, whoſe piece of coine the third is with Greek Characters, was by vertue of an act of Senate, adorned with the ſurname of BRITANNICVS, in regard of his fathers fortunate wars, that he might uſe the ſame as his owne proper addition. He it was, for whom Seneca praied in this wiſe, That he might appeaſe Germanie,

A manie, make way into Britaine, and ſolemnize both his Fathers triumphs, and alſo new [of his owne.] But what ſhould bee the meaning of an halfe ſhip in this coine, with this Inſcription, Metropolis Etiminij Regis? Certes, I cannot for certaine affirme who that Etiminius was, unleſſe a man liſt to imagine him to have beene the very ſame Adiminius, King Cunobelinus ſon, of whom Suetonius reporteth, That he ran away unto C. Caligula.

B That which you ſee in the fourth place, is a piece of Hadrians mony, with this writing upon it, HADRIANVS AVG. CONSVL III. PATER PATRIAE. And in the other ſide, EXERCITVS BRITANNICVS, that is, The Armie in Britaine repreſented by three ſouldiers. I would deeme, that it betokened the three Legions, to wit, Secunda Auguſta, Sexta victrix, and Viceßima Victrix, which ſerved in Britaine, Anno Chriſti 120. For then was he Conſul the third time. IIII.

The fifth and ſixth, which are the coines of Antoninus Pius, car- V. VI.
C rying this Inſcription, Antoninus Pius, Pater Patriæ, Tribunitia poteſtate, Conſul tertium: and in their reverſe, the one having Britaine ſitting upon rocks with a militarie Enſigne, a ſpeare and a ſhield; the other, the ſelfe ſame Britaine, ſitting upon a globe; ſeeme to have beene ſtamped by the Province Britaine, in honour of Antoninus Pius, when he began his Empire in the yeare of Chriſt 140. As for that militarie habit of the Province Britan, it ſignifieth, That Britan in thoſe daies flouriſhed in glory of martiall proweſſe: like as that D piece of mony, which at the ſame time Italie ſtamped for the honor of him, hath ſuch another figure ſitting upon a globe, with Cornu-copiæ, betokening plentie of all things: that alſo which Sicilie coined, hath the like figure with an eare of corne, in token of fruitfulneſſe: ſemblably that which Mauritania ſtamped hath a portraict or perſonage, holding two ſpeares with an horſe, to ſhew the glory of that Province in good horſemanſhip and chivalrie. Hitherto alſo is IX.

more, but that he for a victorie againſt the Britans, aſſumed into his ſtile the name of BRITANNICVS: for in the other ſide thereof is to be ſeen, Victory, with a branch of the Date-tree, holding a ſhield, and ſitting upon the ſhield of the Britans vanquiſhed, with this inſcription, VICTORIA BRITANNICA.

The eighth, which is a coine of Caracalla, and ſet here not in the VIII.

XIII. Who this Aebianus was, I am not yet fully resolved. Some reckon
* Or Vsurpers. him to be A. Pomponius Aelianus, one of the 30. * Tyrants. Others will him to be Cl. Aelianus, one of the sixe Tyrants under Diocletian. C
* Or Vsurper. There are also that thinke he was the very same * Tyrant in Britain, under the Emperour Probus, of whom Zosimus made mention, but suppressed his name, and of whom I have written before. Surely, in what time soever he lived, we suppose that in Britaine hee was named Augustus, considering his pieces of money bee found in this Others read Lelianus. Island onely, carrying this Inscription, IMPERATOR CL. AELIANVS PIVS FOELIX AVGVSTVS. In the reverse, there is to be read, VICTORIA AVGVSTI, which D betokeneth, that he subdued some Barbarians.

XIIII. The coine of Carausius, with this Inscription, Imperator Caius Carausius Pius Fœlix Augustus, and in the backside thereof, PAX AVGVSTI, seemeth to have beene stamped at the very time when hee had quieted the British Sea, which by reason of rovers was so dangerous.

XV. When Allectus, who made away Carausius, had put on the Imperiall purple, and fought manfully against the Barbarians, he stamped this piece with VIRTVS AVGVSTI. As for the Letters E
* A kind of coine. Q. L. some would have them to signifie a * Quartarius, stamped at London; others, The Questor, that is, Treasurer of London.

XVI. When as Constantius Chlorus, being departed this life at Yorke, was now solemnly consecrated, and after the Pagan manner deified, in honour and memoriall of him was this piece of money stamped: which appeaeth evidently by the Inscription, and a Temple betweene two Eagles. these letters underneath P. LON. doe F plainely imply Pecuniam Londini, that is, that the said money was stamped at London.

XVII. His wife Flavia Helena, a British Ladie borne, as our histories report, and as that most excellent Historiographer Baronius doth confirme,

A confirme, what time as her Sonne Conſtantius Maximus had diſcomfited the Tyrant Maxentius, and received theſe Titles, Fundator quietis, that is, The founder of quietneſſe: and Liberator Orbis, that is, The Deliverer of the world, having procured ſecuritie to the State and common-weale, had this piece ſtamped in honour of him at Triers, as appeareth by the Letters S. T R. that is, Signata Treviris, that is to ſay, coined at Triers. * Treveris.

B Flavius Canſtantinus Maximus Auguſtus, the great ornament of Britaine, ſtamped this coine at Conſtantinople, as we are taught by theſe characters underneath, CONS. with this, GLORIA EXERCITVS, that is, The glory of the Armie, to currie favour with the ſouldiers, in whoſe choice in thoſe daies, and not at the diſpoſe of the Emperour, was the ſoveraigne rule and government. XVIII.

C Conſtantinus the younger, Son of that Conſtantinus Maximus, unto whom with other countries the Province Britaine befell; ſtamped this piece while his Father lived. For he is called only Nobilis Cæſar, a title that was wont to be given to the Heires apparant, or elect Succeſſours of the Empire. By the edifice thereon, and theſe words, PROVIDENTIAE CAESS. we underſtand, that he together with his brother, built ſome publike worke, like as by theſe letters P. LON. that this piece of mony was coined at London. XIX.

D This coine carrying the Inſcription, Dominus noſter Magnentius Pius Fœlix Auguſtus, may ſeeme to have beene ſtamped by Magnentius, who had a Britan to his father: as alſo to win the favour of Conſtantius, after hee had put to flight ſome publike enemie. For, theſe Characters DD. NN. AVGG. that is, Our LORDS AVGVSTI, doe argue there were then two Auguſti, or Emperours. And as for that Inſcription, VOTIS V. MVLTIS X. it betokeneth, that the people at that time did nuncupate their vowes in theſe termes, That the Emperour might flouriſh 5. yeares, and by dupling the ſaid number of 5. with lucky acclamations praied for many 10. yeares. And hereto accordeth that ſpeech in the Panegyrick oration of Nazarus, as followeth: The * Quinquennall feaſts and ſolemnities of the moſt bleſſed and happy Cæſars, hold us wholly poſſeſſed with joyes; but in the appointed revolutions of ten yeares, our haſtning vowes and ſwift hopes have now reſted. The letters P. AR. doe ſhew that this denier was ſtamped at * Arelate. * Solemnized every fifth yeare. * Arles.

F Conſtantius having defeated Magnentius, and recovered Britaine, in honour of his armie, cauſed this to be ſtamped. The letter R. in the baſis thereof importeth haply, that it came out of the mint which was at Rome. XXI.

In honour of Valentinian, when hee had ſet upright againe the ſtate of Britaine which was falling to ruine, and called that part of it by him thus recovered after his own name Valentia, this piece XXII.

was coined at Antiochia, as may be gathered out of the ſmall letters underneath. A

XXIII. Vnto the Denier of Gratianus, I can think of nothing to ſay more, ſave only that which erewhile I noted upon that of Magnentius.

XXIIII. What time as Magnus Maximus was by the Britiſh armie created Auguſtus, and his ſon likewiſe Flavius Victor named Cæſar, to grace

XXV. and glorifie the ſouldiers were theſe pieces coined: and Theodoſius having ſubdued and made them away, for the very ſame cauſe, B

XXVI. ſtamped that with this, VIRTVTE EXERCITVS.

XXVII. Vpon that golden piece of Honorius, I have nothing to obſerve, but that by this Inſcription, AVGGG. there were at the ſame time

* Emperours. three * Auguſti: namely after the yeare of Grace 420. when as Honorius ruled as Emperour in the weſt, Theodoſius the younger in the Eaſt, and with them Conſtantius, by Honorius nominated Auguſtus, who had vanquiſhed our Conſtantine, elected in hope of that fortunate name. As for that Inſcription CONOB, it ſignifieth, that it C was fine and pure gold, ſtamped at Conſtantinople. For that ſame CONOB, is no where read, ſo farre as ever I could hitherto obſerve, but in pieces of Gold, for CONSTANTINOPOLI OBRIZVM.

D. 1 c. de auri pub. proſcut. L. 12, 13. C. The de ſuſcept. præpoſ.

I could annex hereunto many more pieces of Roman mony, for infinite ſtore of them is every where found among us in the ruines of cities and townes ſubverted, in treaſure coffers, or vaults hidden in that age, as alſo in funerall-pots and pitchers. And how it came D to paſſe, that there ſhould remaine ſtill ſo great plenty of them, I much marvelled, untill I had read in the Conſtitutions of Princes, that it was forbidden to melt ſuch ancient coines.

Having now already repreſented theſe antike pieces, as well of Britiſh as Roman mony in their owne formes, I thinke it alſo profitable for the Reader to inſert in this very place a chorographicall table or mappe of Britaine, (ſeeing it hath ſometime beene a Province of the Romans) with the ancient names of places: and al- E though the ſame be not exact and abſolute, (for who is able to performe that?) yet thereby a man may learne thus much, if nothing elſe, that in this round Globe of the earth, there is daily ſome change: new foundations of townes and cities are laid; new names of people and nations ariſe, and the former utterly be aboliſhed: and, as that Poet ſaid,

Non indignemur mortalia corpora ſolvi, F
Cernimus exemplis oppida poſſe mori.

Why fret ſhould we that mortall men to death doe ſubject lie?
Examples daily ſhew that townes and cities great may die.

THE DOVVN-FALL OR DESTRVCTION OF BRITAINE.

WHen as Britaine now was abandoned of the Roman garrisons, there ensued an universall and utter confusion, full of woefull miseries and calamities, what with barbarous nations of the one side making incursions and invasions, what with the native Inhabitants raising tumultuous uprores on the other, whiles every man catcheth at the government of State. Thus, as Ninnius writeth, They lived in feare 40. yeares or thereabout. For, Vortigern then King, stood in great dread of the Picts and Scots: Troubled sore also he was with the violence of Romans, that remained heere, and no lesse stood he in feare of Ambrosius Aurelius or Aureleanus, who during the conflict of these tempestuous troubles, wherein his parents that had worne the Imperiall purple roabe, were slaine, survived them. Hereupon, the Saxons, whom Vortigern had called forth of Germany to aid him, made bloudy and deadly warre against those friends that invited and entertained them: insomuch as after many variable and doubtfull events of warre they wholly disseised the poore wretched Britaines of the more fruitfull part of the Island, and their ancient native seat and habitation. Gildas. Saxons called forth into Britaine.

But this most lamentable ruine and downfall of Britaine, Gildas the Britaine, who lived within a little while after, all full of teares shall with his piteous pen depaint or deplore rather unto you. As the Romans were returning, quoth he, *to their owne home, there shew themselves avie, out of their carroghes, wherein they passed over the * Scitticke vale, and as it were, at high noone-Sunne. and in fervent heat, issuing from out of most narrow holes and caves, whole swarmes of duskish vermin, to wit, a number of hideous highland Scots and Picts in flocks, for manners and conditions in some respect different; but sorting well enough in one and the same greedy desire of bloud-shed: Who having intelligence that the Roman associats and Maintainers of the Britans were returned home, with utter disclaiming and renouncing of all return, more confidently than their usuall manner had beene, seize into their hands all the Northern and utmost part of the land, and hold the same, (as naturall inborne Inhabitants) even as far as to the wall. Against these attempts opposed there was and placed upon an high fort and castle along the wall a garrison, nothing war-like, unfit for fight, with quaking hearts and altogether unmeet for service: which warding there day and night became lazie with doing nothing. Meane while, no stay there was, but those bare naked enemies approached the forts and wall with hooked weapons and engines, wherewith the most miserable people were plucked from the walles and dashed against the hard ground. This good yet did this manner of hasting untimely death, unto those that by such meanes were speedily rid out of the world, in that by so quick a dispatch they escaped and avoided the wofull imminent calamities of their brethren and deare children. To bee short, having abandoned their Cities and quit that high-wall, once againe they tooke them to flight, and were dispersed anew, in more desperate manner than before time. Semblably, the enemies follow hard in chase, and hasten to make fouler havocke and more cruell butcherie of them. Like therefore as Lambs by bloudy butchers, so are these wofull Inhabitants quartred and mangled by their enemies: insomuch as their abode among them might well be compared to the ravening of wild and savage beasts. For not only the poore and wretched people themselves forbeare not to rob one another, for their short sustenance of small food, but also those hostile outward miseries and calamities were augmented with inward tumults and troubles: in that by these and such like pillages and spoiles practised so thicke, the whole country was exhaust of victuals the staffe and strength of life, save onely the small comfort that came by hunting. Whereupon the distressed remaines of them send their missive letters againe unto Aetius a power-able man in the Roman state, in this tune;* Carroghes. Scitick vale. * The Irish sea. This Gildas here in the Manuscript Copies of France is named Querulus, as the right worthy Barnabas Brisonius hath reported unto me.

daies) it ſeemed that contempt was poured forth upon the Princes, and the people were ſeduced by their vanities and errour in by paths and not led the right way. In the meane time, when God was minded to purge his family and to recure it thus infected with ſo great corruption of ſinnes, by heare ſay onely of tribulation, the winged flight (as one would ſay) of an headleſſe rumour, pierceth the attentive eares of all men, giving notice of ancient enemies ready to arrive, and upon their comming fully minded to deſtroy them utterly, and after their wonted manner to poſſeſſe and inhabite the countrey from one end to another. Yet for all this were they never the better, but like unto fooliſh and ſenſeleſſe horſes, reſiſting the bridle of reaſon, and refuſing to admit the bit (as they ſay) into their cloſe-ſhut mouth, leaving the way to ſalvation, narrow though it were, ran up and downe at randum all in the broad way of all wickedneſſe which leadeth directly and readily to death. Whiles therefore, as Salomon ſaith, the obſtinate and ſtubborne ſervant is not amended with words, ſcourged hee is for a foole, and feeleth not the whip. For loe, a peſtilent contagion bringing much mortalitie falleth heavily upon the fooliſh people; which in a ſhort ſpace, when the enemies ſword was gone deſtroied ſo great a multitude of them, as that the living were not able to bury the dead. Neither verily were they the better for it, that the ſaying of Eſay the Prophet might in them alſo bee fulfilled: And God calleth them, quoth he, to ſorrow and mourning, to baldneſſe and ſackcloth; but behold, they fell to killing of calves, to ſlaying of rams: Lo, they went to eating and drinking, and ſaid withall, Let us eate and drinke, for to morrow wee ſhall die. And why? the time drew neere wherein their iniquities, like as thoſe in times paſt of the Amorites, ſhould come to the fulneſſe. For, they fall to conſult what was the beſt and moſt convenient courſe to be taken, for to repreſſe ſo cruell, and ſo many invaſions of the forenamed nations, with the booties which they raiſed. Then, all the Counſellors together with the proud tyrant become blinded and bewitched, deviſing ſuch a protection, nay a deſtruction rather of their country as this; namely, that thoſe moſt fierce Saxons, a people foully infamous, odious both to God and man, ſhould be let into this Iſland, as one would ſay, wolves into the ſheep-folds, to repulſe, forſooth, and beat backe the Northern nations. Than which, I aſſure you, nothing was ever deviſed and practiſed more pernicious, nothing more unhappy unto this land. O miſt of ſenſe and groſſeſt underſtanding that ever was! O deſperate dulneſſe and blind blockiſhneſſe of mind! Thoſe whom in their abſence they were inclined and given to dread more than very death, now of their owne record theſe fooliſh Princes of Egypt entertained, as I may ſay, under the roofe of one houſe, giving (as hath beene ſaid) fond-fooliſh counſell unto Pharao.

Peſtilence.

Saxons received into Britaine.

Then ruſhed forth out of the barbarous *Lioneſſes den a Kennell of whelps in three Veſſels, called in her language Cyulæ, that is, Keeles, and in our Latine tongue, Longæ naves, under full ſaile, carried with the wind of lucky ſure preſaging auguries, whereby forepropheſied it was unto them, that for 300. yeares they ſhould poſſeſſe and hold that land as their countrey, unto which they directed their courſe: and for an hundred and twentie, that is, the one moity of the ſaid ſpace, oftentimes waſte and depopulate the ſame. Theſe being put on ſhore, firſt in the Eaſt-part of the Iſland, and that by commandement of this infortunate tyrant, ſet faſt their terrible pawes and clawes there, pretending unto the Iſlanders defence of their countrey, but more truely intending the offence thereof: unto which whelpes, the foreſaid dam, * the Lioneſſe, finding that their firſt ſetting foote and marching forward ſped well, ſends likewiſe a greater rabble of worrying freebooters, which being arrived here in Flotes conjoyned themſelves with the former misbegotten crew. From hence it is, that the ſhoot-grifts of iniquitie, the root of bitterneſſe, and virulent plants due to our deſerts ſprout and put forth in our ſoile, proudly bud, branch & leafe. Well, theſe barbarous Saxons thus admitted into the Iſland, obtaine allowance of victuals and wages, as for douty ſouldiers, and ſuch as would endure hard ſervice and much hazard (for ſo they falſly beare men in hand) in defence of their good hoſts and friends for their kind entertainment. Which being given unto them a long time ſtopped (as wee ſay) the dogs mouth. Howbeit afterward they complaine that their * monthly wages was not well paid them, deviſing of purpoſe colourable occaſions of quarrell, proteſting and threatning, that unleſſe they might feele more munificence powred and heaped upon them, they would with the breach of covenant ſpoile and waſte the whole Iſland throughout. And without further delay they ſecond theſe threats with very deeds;

When we ſhall read theſe reports, let vs not be offended and diſpleaſed with good Gildas, for his bitter invectives againſt either the vices of his owne countrey-men the Britans, or the inhumane outrages of the barbarous enemies, or the infatiable cruel- C tie of our Fore-fathers the Saxons. But ſince that for ſo many ages ſucceſſively enſuing, we are all now by a certaine engraffing or commixtion become one nation, mollified and civilized with Religion, and good Arts, let us meditate and conſider, both what they were, and alſo what wee ought to be: leſt that for our ſinnes likewiſe, the ſupreame Ruler of the world, either tranſlate other nations hither, when wee are firſt rooted out, or incorporate them into us, after we are by them ſubdued.

„ ſtantine gave commandement in this wiſe: Let the old ſouldiers according to our Precept „ enter upon the vacant lands, and hold them for ever freely. Ninnius likewiſe: Maximus
„ the Emperor who ſlew Gratian, would not ſend home again thoſe ſouldiers which he had „ levied out of Britaine, but gave unto them many countries, even from the poole or Mere,
„ which lieth above Mount-Iovis unto the Citie that is called Cantguic, & unto Cruc-occhidiin I cannot in any wiſe contradict; yet I am of opinion rather, that the children of thoſe old ſouldiers gladly afterward received theſe Britans that fled out of their countrey. Nevertheleſſe, the name of Britans in this tract, I find not in all the writers of that age, before ſuch time that the Saxons came into our Britain, unleſſe it bee of thoſe whom Plinie ſeemeth to place in Picardie, and who in ſome copies are named Brina- ni. For if any man out of the fourth booke of Strabo his Geographie, doe with Volaterane thinke, that Britaine was a citie of Gaule, let him but looke into the Greeke Booke, and he will ſoone informe himſelfe, that he ſpake of the Iſland Britaine, and not of a citie. As for that verſe out of Dionyſius, which before I have alleaged, ſome would rather underſtand it with Stephanus of our Britans, than with Euſtathius of the Armoricans, eſpecially ſeeing that Feſtus Avienus, a writer verily of good antiquitie, hath tranſlated it thus:

Cauris nimium vicina Britannis,* * Britaine.
Flavaq; cæſariem Germania porrigit ora.
Britaine the North-weſt winds too neare,
And yellow haired Germanie her front doth forward beare.

Out of which verſes, I wot not whether Aegidius Maſerius hath made ſome collection, when he wrote, That the Britans were ſervants under the Armoricans and againſt them erected a freedome. The firſt mention to my knowledge of Britans in Armorica, was in the yeare of our ſalvation 461. about the thirtith yeare after that the Anglo-Saxons were called out of Germany into our Britan. For then, Manſuetus a Biſhop of the Britans, among other Biſhops of France and Armórica, ſubſcribed to the firſt Councell of Tours. In the ninth yeare after, theſe new Inhabitants of France, ſeeing the Weſt-Gothes to ſeize into their hands the moſt fertile territories of Anjou and Poictou, encountred them, and were a barre that the Gothes poſſeſſed not themſelves of all France. For they ſided with Anthemius the Roman Emperour againſt the Gothes, ſo far forth that Aruandus was condemned for treaſon, becauſe in his letters ſent unto the King of the Gothes, he had given counſell to ſet upon the Britans dwelling over the river * Loire, and to divide France betweene the Gothes and Burgundians. Theſe Britans were a kind of people witty and ſubtile, warlike, tumultuous, and in regard of their valour, number, and aſſociation, ſtubborne: in which termes Sidonius Apollinaris complaineth of them unto Riothimus his friend, for ſo himſelfe calleth him (but Jornandes nameth him King of the Britans) who afterward being ſent for by Anthemius, came with a power of 12. thouſand men to aid the Romans, but before that they joyned with them, being with his owne forces vanquiſhed in open field by the Gothes, hee fled unto the Burgundians confederate with the Romans. From that time the native Armoricans being by little and little ſubdued, the name of the Britans in theſe parts, where they were newly ſeated, grew ſo great, that generally all the Inhabitants there, paſſed by little and little into the name of Britans: like as this whole tract was called Britannia Armorica, and of the * Frankners Britannia Ciſmarina, that is, Britan on this ſide the ſea: and thereupon, I. Scaliger verſified thus:

Vicit Aremoricas animoſa Britannia gentes,
Et dedit impoſito nomina priſca jugo.

The nations Aremorican ſtout Britan overcame,
And with the yoke of ſervitude gave them her ancient name.

For, they turned the edge of their weapons upon thoſe their friends that gave them entertainement, as appeareth evidently both by other teſtimonies, and alſo by theſe words of Regalis Biſhop of Vennes as touching himſelf and his: We living, ſaith he, in captivitie under the Britans are ſubject to a grievous and heavie yoke. Moreover, in the times ſucceeding, they couragiouſly maintained themſelves and their eſtates: Firſt under petty Kings, afterwards under Counts and Dukes againſt the French; albeit as Glaber Rodolphus writeth; Their only wealth was immunitie from paiments to the publique Treaſurie, and plentie of milke: Alſo 500. yeares ſince, William of Malmesbury wrote thus of them: A kind of people they are needy and poore in their owne country; otherwiſe alſo with foraine mony waged, and purchaſing a laborious and painfull life. If they be well paid, they refuſe not ſo much as to ſerve in civill war one againſt another without all regard of right or kindred, but according to the quantitie of mony readie with their ſervice for what part ſoever you would have them.

BRITANS OF VVALES AND CORNWALES.

THe reſt of the Britans, who pitifully diſtreſſed in their own native countrey were put to ſeeke for their countrey, were overlaied with ſo great calamities, as no man is able ſufficiently to expreſſe acccording to the nature of ſuch horrible particulars; as being not only moleſted grievouſly by the Saxons, Picts, & Scots, who made cruel war upon them far & neere, but alſo oppreſſed under the proud and intollerable rule of wicked tyrants, in all places. Now who

A who those tyrants were and of what quality about the yeare of our Lord 500. have here in few words out of Gildas, who then lived and was an eie witnesse. Constantine a Tyrant among the * Dammonij, albeit he had sworne in expresse words before God and the companie of holy Saints, that he would performe the office of a good Prince, yet in two Churches under the sacred vesture of an Abbat, slew two children of the blood royall, together with their Fosters, two right valiant men: and many yeares before having put away his lawfull wife, was foulie defiled with a number of foule filthie adulteries.

Aurelius Conanus, wallowing in the mire of Parricidies and adulteries, hating the peace of his countrie, is left alone as a tree withering in the open field: whose father and brethren
B were with a wild, youthfull, and overweening phantasie carried away, and by untimely death, surprized.

*Vortiporius tyrant of the * Dimetæ, the ungratious sonne of a good father, like to a Panther in manners, so variably spotted with vices of divers sorts: when his head was now waxen hoary and gray, sitting in his throne full of craft and guile, and the same defiled with Parricidies, or murthers of his owne kinred, and with adulteries beside, cast off his owne wife, (and filthily abused her daughter unawares, and unwitting) yea, and he tooke also her life away.*

Cuneglasus, in the Roman tongue, Lanio fulvus, that is, the Lyon tawney Butcher, a Beare sitting and riding upon many, the driver of that chariot which holdeth the Beare, a contemner of God, an oppressor of the Clergie, fighting against God with grievous sinnes, and warring upon man with materiall armour, and weapons, turned away his wife, provoked the
C Saints and holy men with manifold injuries, proudly conceited of his owne wisedome, and setting his hope in the uncertaintie of riches.

Maglocunus, Dragon of the Isles, the deposer of many Tyrants out of Kingdome and life both, the most forward in all mischiefe: for power and malicious wickednesse together, greater then many more: a large giver, but a more prodigall, and profuse sinner: stronger in armes, higher also than all the Potentates of Britaine, as well in royall dominion, as in the stature and lineaments of his person. In his youthfull daies with sword and fire, he brought to destruction his Uncle by the mothers side, (being then King) together with many right hardy and redoubted servitours. After that phantasie of a violent course of rule according to his desire was gone, upon a remorse of conscience for his sinnes, vowed to bee a professed
D Monke: but soone after returning to his vomit, breaking the said vow of Monkes profession, he despised his first marriage, and became enamoured upon the wife of his brothers sonne, whiles he was living; the said brothers sonne, and his owne wife, (after hee had kept her for a certaine time) hee murthered, and then maried that brothers sonnes wife, whom hee before had loved. But I must leave the report of these things to History writers, who hitherto have falsly set downe, that these Tyrants succeeded one after a nother: whereas in truth as we may perceive by Gildas, who speaketh unto them severally, and personally one by one, they all at once, and the very same time usurped tyranny in divers quarters of the Island.

E And now to returne: The residue of Britans remaining alive, withdrew themselves into the westerne parts of the Island, naturally fenced with mountaines, and inlets of the sea, to those parts (I meane) which now we call Wales, and Cornwall. The Inhabitants of the one the Saxons named Bpitpealer, of the other Cornpealer, like as those in Gaule, Galweales; For Walsh with them signifieth strange and forraine: whence also the Wallons in the low Countries, and the Vallachians upon the river * Dunow had their names.

The Britwales, or Welshmen, a very warlike nation, for many yeares defended their libertie under pettie-kings: and albeit they were secluded from the English-Saxons by a Ditch or Trench which King Offa cast, (a wonderfull piece of worke) yet
F otherwhiles by fire and sword they spoiled their cities, and in like sort suffered at their hands all extremities of hostilitie whatsoever. At the length in the raigne of Edward the First, as he writeth of himselfe, The Divine providence which in the owne disposé is never deceived, among other good gifts dispenced by it, and with which it hath vouchsafed our Kingdome of England to bee adorned, hath converted now full, wholly, and entirely (of her good grace) the Land of Wales with the Inhabitants thereof (subject before time un-

Howbeit in the age next enſuing, they could no way bee induced to undergoe the yoke of ſubjection, neither could the quarrels by any means poſſibly be taken up, nor the moſt deadly hatred betweene the two nations extinguiſhed, untill that King Henry the ſeventh, who deſcended of them, aſſiſted the oppreſſed * Britans with his gracious hand, and King Henry the Eighth, admitted them unto the ſame condition of Lawes and Liberties, that the Engliſh enjoy. Since which time, yea and very often alſo before, the Kings of England have had triall of their conſtant fidelitie, and loyall allegiance. As for thoſe Cornwallians, although they ſtoutly bent all their force together in defence of their Country, yet ſoone became they ſubject to the Saxons, as who neither matched them in number, neither was their Countrey ſufficiently fenced by nature to defend them.

* Welchmen.

Let this ſuffice that hath beene ſaid, touching the Britans and Romans: but ſince we treat of the Inhabitants, we may not in this place omit, (although wee have heretofore ſpoken thereof already) that which * Zoſimus reporteth; How that Probus the Emperour, ſent over into Britaine the Vandals and Burgundians, whom he had overcome, who having ſeated themſelves here, ſtood the Romans in good ſtead, as oft as any one raiſed tumult and ſedition. But where they were planted, I know not, unleſſe it were in Cambridge-ſhire. For, Gervaſe of Tilbury maketh mention of an ancient rampier or hold in that ſhire, which he calleth Vandelsbury, and ſaith, it was the worke of the Vandals.

* Lib. 1.

Neither let any man ſurmize, that in the daies of Conſtantius the Pæni had their abode here, grounding upon theſe words of Eumenius the Rhetorician: [Except perhaps no greater ruine had fallen upon Britaine, and borne it downe, than if it had beene drenched throughout, and overwhelmed with the over-flowing of the Ocean: which being delivered from the moſt deepe gulfe [Pœnorum] began to appeare and ſhew it ſelfe at the view and ſight of the Romans.] For, in the old Copie belonging ſometime to Humfrey Duke of Gloceſter, and afterwards to the right honourable Baron Burghly, Lord high Treaſurer of England, we reade [Pœnarum gurgitibus] that is, The gulfes of puniſhments, and not Pœnorum gurgitib. For he ſeemeth to ſpeake of the calamities and miſeries wherewith Britaine was afflicted under Carauſius.

Whereas Agathias in the ſecond booke of his Hiſtories, hath theſe words, Hunnica natio Britones ſunt, that is, The Britons are a nation of the Hunnes: I would have no man hereby raiſe a ſlander upon the Britans, or thinke them to bee iſſued from the ſavage cruell Hunnes. For, long ſince Francis Pithæus a very learned man, hath averred unto mee, and now of late I. Lewenclaius, a right worthy Hiſtorian, publiſhed in writing, that in a Greeke Copie it is read, Βίσσους, and not Britones.

PICTS.

PICTS.

NOw let us come to the other Inhabitants of Britaine, and firſt unto the Picts, whom for Antiquitie next unto Britains, the Hiſtoriographers have accounted the ſecond. Hector Boetius deriveth theſe from the Agathyrſti: Pomponius Lætus, Aventinus and others from the Germans: ſome from the Pictones in France, and Beda from the Scythians. It hapned, ſaith hee, that the nations of the Picts came in long * ſhips, and thoſe not many, out of Scythia, (as the report goeth) into Ireland: and of the Scots whom they found there, requeſted (but in vaine) a place of habitation: by whoſe perſwaſion they went into Britaine, and inhabited the Northerne parts thereof, and that was about the yeare of our Redemption, (as many would have it) 78. I for my part, in ſo great a varietie of opinions, know not which I ſhould follow: yet, (that I may ſpeake what I ſuppoſe to be true, and deliver mine owne judgement) were it not that in this point the authoritie of venerable Beda, did over-weigh all the conjectures of all others,

* Gallies or Keeles.

A others, I would thinke that the Picts came from no other place at all, but were very naturall Britaines themſelves, even the right progenie of the moſt ancient Britaines: thoſe Britans, I meane, and none other, who before the comming in of the Romans, were ſeated in the North part of the Iſland, and of thoſe who afterwards, caſting off the yoke of bondage (as they are a nation moſt impatient of ſervilitie) repaired unto theſe in the North. Like as when the Saxons over-ran the Iſle, thoſe Britaines which would not forgoe their libertie, conveied themſelves into the Weſterne parts of the Iſland, full of craggie hils, as Wales and Cornwall: even ſo, doubtleſſe, when the Roman warre grew hot, the Britaines leſt they ſhould undergoe ſervitude, (which is
B of all the miſeries the extreameſt) gat them into theſe Northerne parts, frozen with the bitter cold of the aire full of rough and rugged paſſages, and full of waſhes and ſtanding meeres. Where being armed not ſo much with weapons, as with a ſharpe aire and climate of their owne, they grew up together with the native Inhabitants whom there they found, unto a mightie and populous nation. For, Tacitus reporteth, that the enemies of the Romans were by his wives father Agricola, driven into this part, as it were, into another Iſland: and no man doubteth, but Britans they where which inhabited theſe remoteſt parts of the Iſland. For, ſhall we dreame that all thoſe Britans, enemies to the Romans, which brought out thirtie thouſand armed men into the field againſt Agricola, who gave unto Severus ſo great overthrowes,
C that of Romans and Aſſociats he loſt in one expedition and journey 70000. were killed up every mothers ſonne, and none left for ſeed, and procreation, that they might give roome unto forrainers out of Scythia and Thracia? So farre am I from beleeving this, although Beda hath written ſo much by relation from others, that I would rather affirme, they were ſo multiplied, that the very ſoile was not able either to relieve or receive them, and were enforced therefore to over-flow, and over-whelme, as it were, the Roman Province, which came to paſſe wee know afterwards, when the Scots came in unto them. But becauſe Beda hath ſo written, as others in that time reported, may eaſily bee brought to believe, that ſome alſo out of Scandia, called in times paſt Scythia, (as all the Northerne tract beſide) came by the Iſles, that by a
D continued ranke lie betweene, unto thoſe Northerne Britaines. Yet leſt any man ſhould imagine, that I ſeeke to countenance a lie, carrying likelihood and probabilitie of a truth, me thinkes I am able to prove, that the Picts were very Britans indeed, by the demeanor, name, and language of the Picts, wherein wee ſhall ſee they agreed paſſing well with Britaines. Their manners and demeanour.

And to let paſſe among other reaſons, that neither the Picts, according to Beda, nor the Britans, as Tacitus writeth, made by any diſtinction of ſex for government in chiefe, or excluded women from bearing ſcepter, that cuſtome of painting, and ſtaining themſelves with colours, was common to both nations. As touching the Britans, wee have prooved it before: and for the Picts, Claudian proveth it for us, who E writeth thus:

——Nec falſo nomine Pictos
Edomuit.——
The Picts hee tam'd
So truely nam'd.

And in another place, ——Ferroq; notatas
Perlegit exanimes Picto moriente figuras:
——And doth peruſe with eie
Thoſe iron-brent marks in Picts well ſeene all bloudleſſe, as they die.

Which Iſidore doth ſhew more plainly: The Nation of the Picts (ſaith he) have a name Their name.
F drawne even from their bodies, for that by the artificiall pricking therein of ſmall holes with a needle, the workman wringing out the juce of greene graſſe, encloſeth the ſame within, that their Nobilitie and Gentry thus ſpotted, may carry theſe skarres about them, in their painted pounced limbes, as badges to be knowne by. Shall we thinke now, that theſe Picts were Germans, who never uſed this manner of painting? or the Agathyrſi of Thracia, ſo farre diſtant from hence; or rather the very Britans themſelves: ſeeing they were in the ſelfe ſame Iſle, and retained the ſame guiſe, and faſhion of painting.

Neither are thoſe barbarous people, who ſo long time made ſuch incurſions out of the Forreſt Caledonia, and from that fartheſt Northerne coaſt found the Romans worke, otherwiſe called than Britans, of the ancient writers, Dio, Herodian, Vopiſcus, and others. Semblably, Tacitus who deſcribeth at large the warres of Agricola, his wives Father, in this vtmoſt coaſt of Britaine, calleth the Inhabitants by no other name than Britans, and Britans of Caledonia*: whereas notwithſtanding, our later Writers have recorded, that the Picts, new comers hither, were arrived there tenne yeares before; a thing that I would have you to note, conſidering that Tacitus in that age knew not of them at all. Neither would thoſe Roman Emperors, who warred fortunatly againſt them, to wit, Commodus, Severus, with Baſſianus and Geta his ſonnes, have aſſumed into their Stile that addition of BRITANNICVS, after they had vanquiſhed them, unleſſe they had beene Britans. Certes, if the Romans, for whoſe magnificence every thing made that was ſtrange, had ſubdued any other nation there beſide the Britans, and the ſame before time unknowne, (were they called Picts or Scots) they would (no doubt) have been knowne by the titles of PICTICVS and SCOTICVS in their coines and inſcriptions. Tacitus gueſſeth by their deep yellow buſh of haire, and their large limbes, that they had their beginning out of Germanie: but ſtraightwaies after, and more truely he attributeth all to the climate, and poſiture of the heaven, which yieldeth vnto bodies their complection and feature. Whereupon, Vitruvius alſo writeth thus: Vnder the North Pole are nations bred and foſtered, bigge and tall of bodie, of colour browne, with haire of head even, and ſtreight, and the ſame ruddie. In like manner, that the Caledones, (without all queſtion Britans) were the ſelfe ſame nation of the Picts, the Panegyrick Author after a ſort doth intimate, writing thus: The woods of the Caledones, and of other Picts, &c. as if the Caledones alſo, had beene none other but the Picts. And that thoſe Caledonians were Britans borne. Martiall in this verſe of his, implieth:

Quinte Caledonios Ouidi viſure Britnnos:
Quint Ovide, Britans Caledon, thou that doſt mind to ſee.

Auſonius likewiſe, who ſheweth withall that they were painted, while hee compareth their colour unto green moſſe, diſtinguiſhed with gravell between, in this wiſe:

——Viridem diſtinguit glarea muſcum;
Tota Caledonijs talis pictura Britannis:
——Like to greene moſſe with gravell rewes between,
The Britans Caledonian are all be painted ſeen.

But, as theſe for a long time were no otherwiſe known than by the name of Britans, and that, by reaſon of their depainted bodies: ſo afterwards, about the time of Maximian and Diocleſian, (neither before that, find wee the name of Picts in any writers) when Britaine had ſo long beene a Province, that the Inhabitants had learned the provinciall Latine tongue, then (it ſeemeth) began they to bee called Picts, for diſtinction ſake, that they might be known from them that were confederate with the Romanes, and called Britans. And whence ſhould they bee called Picts, if it were not becauſe they depainted themſelves? Now if any one there be, who beleeveth not, that our Britans uſed the prouincial Latin tongue, little knoweth he certainly how earneſtly the Romans laboured, that the Provinces might ſpeake Latin, neither ſeeth he what a number of Latine words is crept into the Britiſh language: that I may not urge the authoritie of Tacitus, who ſaith, that in the Domitians time the Britans affected very much the eloquence of the Latine tongue. And as touching the name of Picts, the authoritie of Flavius Vegetius may ſoone cleare this doubt, who ſheweth (after a ſort) that the Britans uſed the word [Pict] in the very ſame ſenſe, for a thing that is coloured, as the Latines doe. For, he writeth, that the Britans called theſe light Pinnaces of eſpiall, PICTAS; the ſailes, gables, and other tacklings whereof were died with a blew or watchet colour, like as the mariners, and ſouldiers to them belonging, who were clad in blew apparell. Surely if the Britans called Ships, for their ſailes and tacklings ſtained with the ſaid blew colour, PICTAS, what letteth but that they

* Now Albanie.

Lib. 4. cap. 37.

A they ſhould call the people PICTI, who were painted with ſundry colours, and with blew eſpecially, for that is the colour that woad giveth?

This alſo maketh for us, that the Northerne Picts, whom Saint Columbane by preaching the word, and by his good example brought unto Chriſtianitie, as in the ancient Engliſh Annals, named, Bpitcar Peohpar, as one would ſay, Britan Picts.

The cauſe whereof we draw not many proofes from the language, is this, for that of the Picts tongue, there can ſcarce one word be gathered out of Authors: yet it ſeemeth to be the ſame that the Britiſh. Beda wrote, that the Roman wall made againſt the incurſions of the Picts, beganne in a place, which in the Picts Language is called, B Penuahel: and Pengwall, among the Britans expreſly ſignifieth, The beginning or head of the wall. Moreover, throughout all that tract of the Iſland, which the Picts held longeſt (and that was the Eaſt part of Scotland) the names of moſt places doe ſavour of a Britiſh originall: as for example, Morria, Marnia, for that they be countries adjoyning to the ſea, comming of the Britiſh word Mor, that is, Sea. Aberden, Aberlothnet, Aberdore, Aberneith, that is, the mouth of Den, of Lothnet, of Dore and Neith, from the Britiſh word, Aber, which ſignifieth the mouth of a river. Strathbolgi, Strathdee, Strathearn, that is, The Dale or Vale of Bolgi, Dee, and Earne, comming of Strath, which in the Britiſh tongue betokeneth, a Valley. Yea, and the chiefe ſeat of the Picts, doth acknowledge no other original than a Britiſh, I meane Edenburgh, which Ptolomy calleth Caſtrum alatum, that is, the winged Caſtle. For Aden, in Britiſh is, a Wing. Neither will I (by way of proofe) take hold of this argument, that ſome of the Britiſh pettie Kings, were called Baidij, which is as much in the Britan language (as I have often ſaid) as Depainted. Out of theſe premiſes verily, we may without any abſurditie conclude, That the Picts Language, and the Britiſh differed not, and therefore the nations were not divers; howſoever Beda ſpeaketh of the Picts and Britans tongues, as if they were diſtinct one from the other; in which place, hee may bee thought to have meant their ſundrie Dialects.

Their Language.

Neither is there cauſe why any man ſhould marvell, that the Picts wrought ſo much miſchiefe, and gave ſo many overthrowes unto their country-men the Britans, D conſidering that wee ſee at this day in Ireland, thoſe which are within the Engliſh pale, have none ſo deadly foes unto them, as their owne countrey-men, the wilde Iriſh. For like; as we read in Paulus Diaconus, the Gothes, Hypogothes, Gepidians, and Vandals, varying their names onely, and ſpeaking one and the ſelfe-ſame language, encountered often times one another in open field with Banner diſplayed; even ſo did the Picts and Britans, eſpecially when theſe Britans were become the Roman allies. Theſe were the reaſons, ſuch as they be, that tooke hold of mee, and induced mee in a manner, to thinke the Picts a remnant of the Britans: but perhaps the authoritie of Beda weigheth downe all this; and therefore, if ye thinke ſo good, let the tradition of ſo reverend a man, grounded upon the relation of others, prevaile and take E place before theſe conjectures.

Theſe Picts Ammianus Marcellinus divideth into Dicalidonians, and Vecturiones. I would rather read Deucalidonians, and doe thinke they were planted about the Weſterne coaſts of Scotland, where the Deucalidonian Sea breaketh in. And albeit I have beeene of opinion, that theſe were ſo called, as if a man would ſay, Blacke Caledonians, for Dee in the Britiſh tongue, ſignifieth Blacke) like as the Iriſh now adaies terme the Scots of that tract, Duf Allibawn, that is, Blacke Scots, and ſo the Britans called the rovers and pirats, which out of theſe parts did much ſcath at ſea, Tlla du, that is, the blacke armie: yet now, mee thinkes we may gueſſe, (for gueſſes are free) that they tooke that name from their ſcituation. For Deheu Caledonij, betokeneth the Caledonians dwelling on the right hand, that is, Weſtward; like as the other Picts, who F kept on the left hand, that is, Eaſtward, which Ninnius calleth, the left ſide, were named Vecturiones, by a word haply drawne from Chwithic, which in the Britiſh tongue, ſignifieth, Left; and theſe ſome thinke are corruptly called in Ptolomee, Vernicones. And an old Saxon fragment ſeemeth to give them the name of Peyreopn, for ſo they terme an enemie-nation to the Britans: whereas the ancient Angles, or Engliſh called the Picts themſelves, Pehits and Peohtas. And hereupon it is that wee read everie where in Whitkindus, Pehiti, for Picti.

The manners of the Picts.

The manners of theſe ancient and barbarous Britans, who afterwards came to bee named Picts, I have heretofore deſcribed out of Dio, and Herodian. It remaineth now, that I goe on with my webbe, and weave thus much to it: namely, that in the declining ſtate of the Empire, when the Romans ſomewhat unadviſedly, and without good forecaſt enrolled cohorts of the Barbarians, certaine of theſe Picts, (when all was in quietneſſe and peace) were taken into the militarie ſervice of the Romans by Honorius, and therefore termed Honoriaci, who under that Tyrant Conſtantine (elected in hope of ſo fortunate a name) having ſet open the fortified entries of the Pyrænean hils, let Barbarians into Spaine. In the end, when firſt by themſelves, and afterwards combining with the Scots their confederats, they had afflicted the Roman Province, they began, though late it were, to waxe civill. Thoſe of the South, were by Ninias, or Ninianus the Britan, a moſt holy man, converted to Chriſt, in the yeare of Grace foure hundred and thirtie. But they of the North, who were ſecluded from the Southerne by a continuall ridge of high craggie mountaines, by Columbanus a Scot of Ireland, a Monke likewiſe of paſſing great holineſſe, in the yeare 565. who taught them, whence ſoever hee learned it, to celebrate the feaſt of Eaſter, betweeee the fourteenth day of the Moone in March, unto the twentieth, but alwaies upon the Lords day, as alſo to uſe another manner of tonſure, or ſhaving their heads, than the Romans did, to wit, repreſenting the imperfect forme of a Coronet. About theſe ceremonies hard hold there was, and eager diſputation for a long time in this Iſland, untill that Naitanus a King of the Picts brought his owne ſubjects with much adoe unto the Roman obſervance. In which age very many Picts with great devotion, as the daies were then, frequented the Chappels and Shrines of Saints at Rome, and among others he that is mentioned in the Antiquities of Saint Peters Church there, in theſe words [ASTERIVS COMES PICTORVM ET SYRA CVM SVIS VOTVM SOLVERE] that is, Aſterius a Count or Earle of the Picts, and Syra with their family performed their vowes. At length, by the Scots that infeſted them out of Ireland, they were made to ſtoop, and after ſo daunted, as that about the yeare of our Lord 740. being vanquiſhed in a moſt bloudy battell, they were either utterly extinct, or elſe by little and little, quite paſſed into their Scottiſh name, and nation. Which very ſame thing chanced to the moſt puiſſant Nation of the Gaules, who being ſubdued of the Frankes by little and little, were turned into their name, and called with them, Franci, that is, French.

Whereas the Panegyrick author, giveth ſome inkling, that Britaine before Cæſars time uſed to skirmiſh with their enemies the Picts and Iriſh, halfe naked men, hee ſeemeth to ſpeake after the manner of the time wherein hee lived: but ſurely in thoſe daies, there were none knowne in Britaine by the name of Picts.

Alſo, whereas Sidonius Apollinaris in his Panegyrick to his wives Father poetically powred out theſe verſes:

——— Victricia Cæſar
Signa Caledonios tranſvexit ad uſq; Britannos, Fuderit & quanquam Scotum & cum Saxone Pictum:

In traine of Conqueſt Cæſar ſtill his enſignes even as farre
As Britaine Caledonian advanc'd: and though no barre
Staid him, but that the Scots and Picts, with Saxons he ſubdu'd, &c.

I cannot chuſe but with another Poet, crie out in this wiſe:

——Sit nulla fides augentibus omnia Muſis:

Theſe Poets love to over-reach,
Beleeve them not, when ſo they teach.

For, Cæſar who is prodigall in his owne praiſe, would never have concealed theſe exploits, if he had ever performed them. But theſe men ſeeme not unlike to thoſe good, honeſt, and learned writers in our age, who whiles they patch together an hiſtorie of Cæſar, write forſooth, how he ſubdued the Franks in Gaule, and the Engliſh

A liſh men in Britaine, whereas in thoſe daies the names of Engliſh, and French were not ſo much as heard of, either in the one or the other country, as who, many ages after, came into theſe Regions.

That the Pictones of Gaule, and our Picts were both one Nation, I dare not with Ioannes Picardus avouch, ſeeing the names of the Pictones in Gaule was even in Cæſars time very rife and much ſpoken of, and for that our Picts were never called Pictones: yet am I not ignorant, how in one onely place of the Panegyriſt among all the reſt, through the negligence of the copier, there was foiſted in Pictonum, in ſtead of Pictorum. Pictones.

AMong the people of Britaine, after Picts, the Scotish Nation by good right challenge the next place: concerning whom, before I ſpeake ought, for feare leſt evill willers, & frowardly peeviſh, ſhould calumniouſly miſconſture thoſe allegations, which I, ſimply, ingenuouſly, and in all honeſt meaning, ſhall heere cite out of ancient writers as touching Scots, I muſt certifie the Reader before hand, that everyparticular hath reference to the old, true, and naturall Scots onely: Whoſe of-ſpring are thoſe Scots ſpeaking Iriſh, which inhabite all the Weſt part of the Kingdome of Scotland, now ſo called and the Iſlands adjoyning thereto, and who now adaies be termed High-land men. For, the reſt which are of civill behaviour, and bee ſeated in the Eaſt part thereof, albeit they beare now the name of Scottiſh-men, yet are they nothing leſſe than Scots, but deſcended from the ſame Germane originall, that wee Engliſh men are. And this, neither can they chuſe but confeſſe, nor we but acknowledge, being as they are, teamed by thoſe above ſaid, High-land men. Saſſones, as well as we; and uſing as they doe the ſame language with us, to wit, the Engliſh-Saxon, different onely in Dialect, a moſt aſſured argument of one and the ſame originall. In which regard, ſo farre am I from working any diſcredit unto them, that I have rather reſpectively loved them alwaies, as of the ſame bloud and ſtocke, yea, and honoured them too, even when the Kingdomes were divided: but now much more, ſince it hath pleaſed our Almightie, and moſt mercifull God, that we grow united in one bodie, under one moſt Sacred head of the Empire, to the joy, happineſſe, welfare, and ſafetie, of both Nations, which I heartily wiſh and pray for.

The beginning and Etymologie of the Scotiſh Nation, like as of other neighbour nations round about, is ſo full of obſcuritie, and lies over-ſpred under the miſt of darkeneſſe, in ſuch ſort, that even Buchanan himſelfe, though otherwiſe a man of a very deepe inſight, either hath ſeene little therein, or ſeene to himſelfe alone: for in this point he hath come ſhort of all mens expectation. Whereupon I have forborne a long time to take this enterprize in hand, leſt with others in admiring fables, I ſhould full ſweetly pleaſe my ſelfe, and fall into folly. For, a man may with as great probability derive the Scots pedigree from the Gods, as from Scota that ſuppoſed and counterfeit daughter of the Ægyptian King Pharaoh, wedded (forſooth) unto Gaithelus, the ſonne of Cecrops founder of Athens. But, as this conceite ariſing from the unskilfulneſſe of Antiquitie, is of the better ſort of ingenuous Scots rejected: ſo, that other opinion of later daies, drawne without all ſenſe from a Greeke fountaine, that Scots ſhould bee ſo called, as it were, σκότος, that is, Obſcure, I utterly diſallow and condemne, as a device of envious perſons, to the ſlanderous reproach of a famous and valiant Nation. Neither doe all men like the derivation of our * Florilegus, namely, that Scots were ſo called, becauſe they came of a confuſed mingle-mangle of divers nations: And yet I cannot but marvell, whence Iſidorus had this: The Scots (ſaith he) take their name in their owne proper tongue of their painted bodies, for that they are marked with ſharpe yron pricks, and inke, and ſo receive the print of ſundry ſhapes. Which alſo Rabanus Maurus, in the very ſame words (doubtleſſe out of him) doth teſtifie in his Geographie to Ludovicus Pius the Emperour, which is to be ſeene in the Libra- A rie of Trinitie Colledge in Oxford.

But ſeeing that Scotland it ſelfe hath of her owne people ſuch as might very well fetch their beginning from the inmoſt record of Antiquitie, and thereby beſt of all advance the glory of their Country, in caſe they would wholly ſet their minds, and beſtow their carefull diligence for a time in this argument; I will point only with my finger to the fountaines, from whence haply they may draw the truth; and lay before them certaine obſervations, which I would wiſh them to marke, and conſider more diligently: for, my ſelfe will in this matter play the Scepticke, and affirme nothing. And firſt, touching their originall; and then, of the place from whence they remo- B ved, and came over into Ireland. For, certainely knowne it is, that out of Ireland, an Iſle inhabited in old time by Britans, as ſhall in due place be proved, they paſſed into Britan, and what time as they were firſt known unto writers by this name, ſeated they were in Ireland. For, Claudian the Poet hath written of their irruptions into Britaine, in theſe verſes:

Ireland the native Countrey of the Scots.

——Totam cum Scotus Hibernem
Movit, & infeſto ſpumavit remige Thetis:
What time the Scots all Ireland ſtir'd offenſive armes to take,
And with maine ſtroke of enemies ores, the ſea much fome did make.

And alſo in another place; C

Scotorum cumulos flevit glacialis Hiberne:
And frozen Ireland, heapes of Scots bewail'd with many a teare.

Oroſius likewiſe writeth thus; Ireland is peopled with Scotiſh Nations. Gildas calleth Scots, Iriſh Spoilers. And Beda; The Scots that inhabite Ireland, an Iſle next unto Britaine: as alſo elſewhere. Yea, and in the daies of Charles the Great, Eginhardus in expreſſe words, calleth Ireland, The Iſle of Scots. Moreover, Giraldus Cambrenſis; That the Scottiſh nation (ſaith he) is deſcended out of Ireland, the affinitie as well of their Language, as of their apparell, of their weapons alſo, and of their manners even to this day doe ſufficiently prove. But now to come unto the points which I would have the Scots throughly to weigh.

For as much as they which are right and naturall Scots, acknowledge not this name D of Scots, but otherwiſe call themſelves Gaoithel, Gael, and Albin; ſeeing alſo, that very many people have other names given unto them by their neighbours, than they uſe themſelves, whereby often times there is a ſecret light given unto nations of their deſcent: as for example; the Inhabitants of the lower Pannonia, who terme themſelves Magier, are in Dutch named Hungari, for that they came firſt of the Huns: they that border upon the Forreſt Hercynia, among themſelves are called Czechi, but by others Bohemi, becauſe they deſcended from the * Boij in Gaule: the Inhabitants of A-fricke, who having alſo a peculiar name among themſelves, are by the Spaniards termed Alarbes, for that they be Arabians: the Iriſh, who call themſelves Erinach, are by our * Britans named Gwidhil: conſidering alſo, that as well thoſe Iriſh, and theſe E our * Britans, gave no other name to us Engliſh men, than Saſſons, becauſe wee are deſcended from the Saxons; I would have the learned Scotiſh men firſt to conſider, whether they might not bee called of their neighbours, as one would ſay, Scythæ. For, even as the Flemings and other Netherlanders, expreſſe by this one word, Scutten, both the Scythians and Scots; ſo it hath beene obſerved out of our Britiſh writers, that they named both Scythians and Scots, Y-Scot. Ninnius alſo expreſly calleth the Britans that inhabite Ireland, Scythians: and the narrow ſea, through which they paſ-ſed over out of Ireland into Britaine, Gildas nameth, Vallem Scythicam, that is, The Scythian Vale. For ſo hath the copie printed at Paris, where others without all ſenſe read, Stythicam Vallem Moreover, King Alfred, who ſeven hundred yeares paſt tranſla- F ted the Hiſtorie of Oroſius into the Engliſh-Saxon tongue, turned [Scotos] into [Scyttas] and our Country-men, who dwell next to Scotland, uſe to call them, not by the name of Scots, but Scyttes, and Scettes. For, like as (Walſingham is mine author) the ſame people be called Getæ, Getici, Gothi, Gothici; ſo, from one and the ſame originall, originall, Scythæ, Scitici, Scoti, Scoeici, take their names.

A But whether this name were impoſed upon this nation by their neighbours, in regard of Scythian manners, or becauſe they came out of Scythia, let them here adviſe well upon it. Surely, both * Diodorus Siculus, and alſo * Strabo, compare the firſt Britans inhabiting Ireland, (which is the native country indeed of the wild Iriſh, and thoſe that be right Scots) with the Scythians for their ſavage nature. Beſides, they drinke bloud out of the wounds of men ſlaine: they eſtabliſh leagues among themſelves, by drinking one anothers bloud; and ſuppoſe, that the greater number of ſlaughters they commit, the more honour they win: and ſo did the Scythians in old time. To this wee may adde, that theſe [wild] Scots, like as the Scythians, had for B their principall weapons, bowes and arrowes. For, Orpheus termeth Scythians τοξοφόρους, even as Aelianus, and Julius Pollux, Sagittarios, that is, Archers. And learned men there be, that thinke hereupon both nations had this name given unto them, for their skill in ſhooting. Neither may this ſeeme ſtrange, that divers nations carried the ſame names, by occaſion of the ſame manners: as they who have travailed all over the Weſt-Indies, doe write, that all ſtrange, and hardie men that doe ſo much miſchiefe with bow and arrowes throughout all India, and the Iſles thereof; are by one name called Caribes, although they be of divers nations.

Now, that theſe Scots came out of Scythia, the Iriſh Hiſtoriographers themſelves doe report: For Nemethus the Scythian, and long after him, Delas, one of C Nemethus his progenie, that is, of the Scythian ſtocke, they reckoned among the firſt Inhabitants of Ireland. Ninnius likewiſe a Diſciple of Eluodugus, hath plainly written thus: In the fourth age of the world (that ſpace I meane which was betweene the building of Salomons Temple, and the captivitie of Babylon) the Scythians poſſeſſed themſelves of Ireland. And hereto accordeth the authoritie of later writers, to wit, of Ciſnerus in his preface to Crantzius; and of Reinerus Reineccius, who writeth thus: There remaineth yet the nation of the Scots in Britaine, ſprung from the Scythians, &c. And yet I verily doubt, although the Getæ were a Scythicke nation, whether the Poet Propertius meaneth thoſe Iriſh of ours, in writing thus:

D Both Iriſh Getes and Britaine with her painted chariot.

But the Scots ſhould loſe part of their honour and dignitie, unleſſe they be brought out of Spaine into Ireland. For, both they themſelves, and their Hiſtoriographers labour to prove with all their might and maine; and good reaſon, (I aſſure you) have they ſo to doe. Unleſſe therefore wee find Scythians in Spaine, all our labour is loſt. And that Scythians have beene in Spaine (to ſay nothing of a promontorie or point among the Cantabri, called Scythicum next unto Ireland, and how that Strabo writeth, that the * Cantabri and Scythians ſorted well together in their deportment) Silius Italicus a Spaniard borne, doth moſt plainely declare: for by theſe E verſes he ſheweth, that the Concani, a nation of Cantabria, were begotten of the Maſſagetæ, that is, Scythians.

me, what thoſe Scythians were which came into Spaine. Verily I know not, unleſſe a man would thinke them to have beene Germans: And I could wiſh that the Scots themſelves would enter into a more ſerious and deepe conſideration of this point. But, that the Germans long agoe entred into Spaine; beſide Plinie, who calleth the Oretani in Spaine, Germans, Seneca which was a Spaniard borne will enforme us. The mountaine Pyrenæus (ſaith he) ſtopped not the paſſage of the Germans; the levitie of men made ſhift to enter through places ſcant paſſable, and unknowne. And that the Germans were called Scythians, we gather not onely out of Ephorus and Strabo, who termed all the nations in the North, Scythians, but alſo out of Plinie. The name of Scythians (quoth he) extendeth it ſelfe farre and wide every way, even to the Samaritans and Germans. Aventinus alſo witneſſeth, that Germans were by the Hungarians called Scythæ and Scythulæ. And to derive deſcent from a Scythian ſtock, cannot be thought any waies diſhonourable, ſeeing that the Scythians, as they are moſt ancient, ſo they have been the Conquerours of moſt Nations, themſelves alwaies invincible, and never ſubject to the Empire of others. Neither muſt we forget in this place that the Cauci and Menapij, ranged among the moſt famous Nations of Germanie, are by Ptolomee placed in Ireland under the ſame names, and in the very ſame vicinitie one to the other: ſo that by all likelihood, they derived from the ſame Germans, both their name, and alſo their deſcent.

De conſolatione ad Albinum lib. 4. cap. 12.

If the Scots have not their originall from theſe, I would they pondred with themſelves, whether they were not of thoſe Barbarians, who (as it is recorded in King Alphonſus his Chronicles) were by Conſtantine the Great, driven out of Gallycia in Spaine: for out of thoſe parts they will needs have it, that they came into Ireland. If they demand, who thoſe Barbarians were? I doubt not but they will bee of the ſame minde with me, that they were Germans. For during the raigne of Gallienus the Emperour, the Germans dwelling in the fartheſt parts (ſaith Oroſius) of Germanie, ſpoiled and held Spaine in ſubjection: and who ſhould thoſe remote Germans bee, unleſſe they were meere Scythians? but Aurelius Victor, whom Andrew Schot hath publiſhed, called thoſe Germans * Frankes. But ſeeing thoſe Frankes and Germans, inhabiting the fartheſt parts of Germanie, putting to ſea from thence, ſailed in their heate and furie farre into the Ocean, and as Nazarius ſaith unto Conſtantine, greatly annoied, and did much harme by theſe our ſeas, even to the Spaniſh coaſts alſo, who will believe that they preferred the dry and barren ſoile of Biſcay, before Ireland, an Iſle moſt fruitful, and fitly ſcited to endamage Spaine? Nay rather, as in the time of Charles the Great, and afterwards, the Norwegians out of Scandia, did often attempt and invade Ireland, yea, and ſeated themſelves there: ſo wee may with good probabilitie conjecture, that the Frankes did the ſame before; and that they paſſed from hence into Spain; and after they were driven out thence by Conſtantine the Great, retired backe againe into Ireland. Credible likewiſe it is, that more of them afterwards flocked thither, what time as the Vandales and Gothes depopulated Spaine, and as barbarous nations, warred among themſelves, and made havocke of all: as alſo, when any ſtorme of Sarazens lay ſore upon the Spaniards, and drave a great number of them into Gallycia and Biſcay. But I leave theſe overtures unto others for to prie further into: let it be ſufficient for me, that I have beene but willing onely to remoove this cloud out of the way.

Oroſius lib. 7.

But I beſeech the learned Scots in this place to conſider here, how it commeth to paſſe, that the Iriſh being the ancient forefathers and Progenitors of the Scots, yea, and the Scots themſelves, beare them highly of this, that they be called Gael and Gaiothel, and their Language Gaiothlac, as alſo why they named that part of Britaine, which they firſt poſſeſſed, Argathel? Whence can they ſay, that theſe names ſprang? From the Gallæci in Spaine, from whom very many, no doubt, flitted over into Ireland, and whoſe beginning is fetched from the Gallatæ or Galles: or from the Goths, as ſome later Writers are of opinion, who would have this word Gaiothel to proceed from the Gothes, as likely as Catholonia did in Spaine? Here ſhould they have drawn arguments from the affinitie, between the Gothicke Language, and the Iriſh: which notwithſtanding,

A not withſtanding, ſo farre as ever I could finde, hath no reſemblance at all of any other tongues in all Europe, ſave onely of the * Welch and Dutch. How truly Henry Huntingdon writeth; The Scots came in the fourth age of the world out of Spaine into Ireland: and part of them who ſtill remained there, uſeth as yet the ſame Language, and are called Navarrians: how truely (I ſay) he hath delivered this, let others ſpeake. And here I omit David Chambres the Scotiſh-man, who hath beene enformed by certaine Jeſuites, that the Scottiſh tongue is uſed in Eaſt India. I am afraid leſt that countrey ſo farre remote as it is, made the credulous man bold, not to make a lie, but to tell a lie.

B But if arguments in this caſe may bee taken from the habite and apparell of the people, ſurely the array and clothing of the wild Scots at this day, is all one with that of the Gothes in times paſt; as wee may by and by perceive out of Sidonius Apollinaris, who in deſcribing a Goth, portraieth & depainteth unto us a wild Scot, as right as may be. They are (ſaith he) *of a flaming deepe yellow, died with ſaffron; they buckle upon their feete a paire of Broges made of raw and untanned leather up to their ankles; their knees, thighes, and calves of their legs are all bare; their garments high in the necke, ſtraight made, and of ſundry colours, comming ſcarce downe to their hammes; the ſleeves cover the upper points of their armes and no more; their ſouldiers coats of colour greene, edged with a red fringe; their belts hanging downe from the ſhoulder; the lappets of their eares hidden under the curled * glibbes and lockes of haire lying all over them,* (For ſo a man may very C rightly call, the manifold branched, and parted twiſts of haire, which * Scots & Iriſh weare) they uſe alſo hooked Speares, which Gildas termeth, Vncinata tela, and axes to fling from them. They wore likewiſe ſtrait bodied coats (as ſaith Porphyrio) fitted cloſe to their breaſts, without girdles. If this bee not for all the world the very right apparell of the wild Iriſh-Scots, let themſelves be Judges. I would withall, they did conſider theſe words of Giraldus Cambrenſis, in his firſt booke of The Inſtitution of a Prince. When Maximus (ſaith he) was paſſed out of Britaine into Gaule, with the whole power of men, forces, and armour, that the Iſland could make, and all to ſeize into his hands the Empire, Gratian and Valentinian brethren, and partners in the Empire, ſhipped over theſe
D Gothes, (a Nation hardie and valiant in feats of armes, being alſo either confederate with them, or ſubject and obliged unto them for benefits, which they had received of the Emperours) from the borders of Scythia, into the North parts of Britaine, for to annoy the Britans, and cauſe the ſaid Vſurper to returne backe with his forces. But they, becauſe they were exceeding puiſſant, (ſuch was the inbred valour and warlike nature of the Gothes,) and withall finding the Iſland deſtitute both of men and other meanes to defend it, becomming of pirats, and rovers neighbour dwellers, planted themſelves in the ſaid Northerne parts, and held by ſtrong hand no ſmall Provinces thereof, which they uſurped as their owne. Now, who theſe Gothes were, let others ſhew, and peradventure out of Procopius, they may find ſome light; in whom we read, That Beliſarius, when the Goths
E expoſtulated with him, for that he had granted Sicilie to the Romans, anſwereth in theſe words: And wee likewiſe permit the Gothes to have unto themſelves Britaine a farre better countrey than Sicilie, and in ancient time ſubject to the Roman Empire: For, meete it is, that they who firſt have beſtowed benefits; ſhould either reape condigne thankes againe, or receive good turnes reciprocally. To this alſo may ſeeme to bee referred, that the Scots write, How Fergusius the Scot, accompanied Alaricke the Goth in the ſacking of Rome: that Irenicus likewiſe reporteth, How Genſricke King of the Vandals came over unto Scotland and Britaine: as alſo, that which Cambrenſis delivereth unto us, F (but whence himſelfe had it, I know not) namely, how the Gaideli, that is to ſay, the Scots, drew both their diſcent, and alſo their name from the Vandals, who were all one with the Gothes, as Paulus Diaconus ſheweth. Neither can it be any diſparagement at all to the name and nation of the Scots, to acknowledge themſelves the offſpring of the Gothes, ſeeing that the moſt puiſſant Kings of Spaine, thinke it an honour to fetch their pedigree from hence; and the nobleſt houſes in all Italie, either draw indeed, or elſe falſifie their lineall deſcent from the Gothes. The Emperor himſelfe Charles the fifth, would often times give out, and that in good earneſt; that all the Nobilitie of Europe came out of Scandia, and from the ſtocke of the Gothes. But theſe reaſons are not of ſuch credit and importance with mee, as that I dare thereupon reſolve, that the Scots are ſprung and iſſued from the Gothes.

Diodorus Siculus. Now, to end all in a word, I would have the learned Scots to conſider ſerioufly, whether they were of thoſe moſt ancient Britans Inhabitants of Ireland (For, certaine it is that Britans in times paſt inhabited Ireland) and called Scythæ or Scoti, becauſe they ſuted ſo well with Scythians in manners: or Scythians indeed, ſuch as came out of Scandia or Scythia, unto whom the Gallæci, Franci, or Germanes driven out of Spaine, and Gothes or Vandals came afterwards, what time as Spaine with moſt hot and bloody warres was all in combuſtion: or rather a miſhmaſh of ſundry nations which conflowed into Ireland, and thereupon gat that name among other neighbors. The language, ſaith Giraldus, of the Iriſh is called Gaidelach, as one would ſay, gathered out of all tongues. And Florilegus (whenceſoever he gathered it); From Picts and Iriſh, quoth he, the Scots tooke their beginning, as people compounded of divers nations: For that is called Scot, which from ſundry things groweth into one heape. Like as the Almanes (by the teſtimonie of Aſinius Quadratus) carried that name, becauſe they came of a commixture of divers men. Neither may any man thinke it ſtrange, that ſo many nations in old time flowed into Ireland, conſidering the ſcite of that Iſland in the very midſt betweene Britan and Spaine, and lying open ſo conveniently upon the French ſea: ſeeing alſo it appeareth moſt certainly upon record, in the beſt approved Annals, that within theſe eight hundred yeares laſt paſſed the Norwegians, and Ouſtmans, that is, Eaſterlings out of Germany, the Engliſhmen, Welchmen, and Scots out of Britaine, planted themſelves ſurely there. Theſe are the points, I ſay, which I would wiſh the Scotiſh men in this matter diligently to thinke upon. But let them remember in the meane time, that I have affirmed nothing, but onely given an inkling of certaine things, which may ſeeme in ſome ſort materiall and to make for the purpoſe. Whence, if the originall of the Scots ſhall receive no light, let them ſeek elſe where: For, I my ſelfe in this am ſtark blind, and have in vaine ſearched and hunted after the truth, that flieth ſtill from me; howbeit with this conſiderate and circumſpect care, that I have not, I hope, given the leaſt offence to any whomſoever.

An Dom. 77. Scot.

When the Scots came into Britaine. Touching the time when the name of Scots became firſt famous, there is ſome queſtion; and Buchanan a right good Poet, hath herein commenced an action againſt Humfrie Lhuid as good an Antiquarie: Becauſe the ſaid Lhuid averreth, that the name of Scots can no where be picked out of Authors before the time of Conſtantine the Great; he fals upon the man, is ready to take him by the throat, and with two ſilly arguments goeth about to give them the deadly ſtab; the one out of the Panegyriſt, the other grounded upou a bare conjecture. Becauſe we finde in the old Panegyriſt, that Britaine in Cæſars time was wont to be troubled with Iriſh enemies; therefore, the Scots as then were ſeated in Britaine: but no man before him ever ſaid, that ſo much as thoſe Iriſh had then any ſettled place, much leſſe, that they were Scots. No doubt, the Panegyriſt, after the uſuall and received manner of writers, ſpake according to his owne times, and not unto Cæſars. And as for the conjecture, it is none of his owne, but the conjecture of that moſt learned Joſeph Scaliger. For he in his notes upon Propertius, whiles he was correcting (by the way) of that verſe out of Seneca his enterlude;

> The Britans thoſe that ſeated are beyond the knowne ſea-coaſt
> And Brigants with blew painted ſhields, he forced with his hoaſt;
> To yield their necks in Roman chaines are captives to be led,
> And even the Ocean this new power of Roman ax to dread.
>
> Ille Britannos Vltra noti Littora Ponti
> Et cæruleos Scuta Brigantes Dare Romuleis
> Colla Catenis Iuſſit, &c.

readeth Scoto-Brigantes, and ſtraightwaies exclaimeth, that the Scots are now beholden unto him for their originall. But to this his opinion I cannot yield aſſent, though it it be ſomewhat againſt my will, who in many things have alwaies for his learning honored and admired the man. For, this conjecture ariſeth not from the divers readings in bookes, but out of his owne braine: and the ſenſe may beare, either [Cæruleos Scuta Brigantes] as it is in all bookes, or [Cæruleos cute Brigantes] that is, the Brigantes with blue died skins, as that moſt learned Hadrian Iunius readeth it. But Buchanan, who had rather diſport himſelfe ſweetly in his owne conceit and the witty invention of one other, than to judge aright with the uſuall and approoved reading of that place, giveth a marvellous applauſe to this conjecture. Firſt, becauſe authors do not record that the Britans painted their ſhields; Then, for that Seneca called them Scoto-Brigantes for difference ſake, to diſtinguiſh them from the Brigantes of Spaine and Ireland: Laſt of all, becauſe in theſe verſes hee makes a diſtinction betweene the Britans and Brigantes, as though they were divers nations. But if one would narrowlie ſift and examine theſe matters what letteth but that they might paint their ſhields as well as themſelves and their chariots? Why ſhould he for diſtinction ſake, coine this new word, Scoto-Brigantes: when he calleth them blew, and ſaith they were ſubdued by Claudius, doth he not ſufficiently diſtinguiſh them from the other Brigantes? But that obſervation of his touching Britans and Brigantes, as if they were divers nations, doth ſcarſe ſavour of a Poets head, which could not be ignorant of that poeticall figure, and manner of ſpeaking, wherein a part is uſed for the whole, and contrariwiſe. Wherefore, ſeeing theſe things make nothing to his cauſe, I will ſecond Buchanan by way, as it were, of a freſh ſupply, with the aid of Egeſippus, (who is commonly reputed a verie ancient writer:) For, thus writeth he, where he treateth of the Romans power: They make Scotland to quake, which is beholden to no land for any thing: before them, Saxony trembleth, that for Mariſhes is inacceſſible.* But heare you me, this author ſhal ſtand behind in the rereward, for he lived after Conſtantines daies, as may be gathered out of his owne writings: neither can it bee prooved out of him, that the Scots dwelt in Britain, no more than out of that verſe of Sidonius which erewhile I alleaged. Yea mary, but there is another reaſon of more weight and moment indeed, which M. Iohn Crag, a right famous and learned man, found by moſt exquiſite and curious ſearch in Ioſeph Ben-Gorion, writing of the deſtruction of Ieruſalem, to wit, that in an Hebrew copie, the Scots are expreſly named, where Munſter in his Latine tranſlation hath untruely put downe Britans for Scots. But in what age that Ben-Gorion lived, I cannot find for certaine: ſure I am, that hee was after Flavius Ioſephus, becauſe he maketh mention of the Franks, whoſe name long after began to be knowne.

Lib. 5. cap. 15.

But ſurely, if I may be ſo bold as to interpoſe my ſelfe in this queſtion, among ſo great Scholars: ſo farre as I have beene able to obſerve, the firſt time that ever the Scotiſh nation became named in authors, was whiles Aurelianus was Emperour. For Pophyrie, who then wrote againſt the Chriſtians, as * Saint Ierome informeth us, mentioned them in theſe words: Neither Britaine, a fertile Province of tyrants, nor the Scotiſh nations, together with the barbarous people round about, as farre as to the Ocean, had any knowledge of Moſes and the Prophets. At which time verily, or ſomewhat before, thoſe that are well ſeene in Antiquities have noted, that the names of the moſt potent nations of French and Almanes, were not heard of before the time of Gallienus the Emperonr.

* Vnto Cteſiphon againſt Pelagians.

It is no aſſured truth therefore, which ſome write, That the name and Kingdome of the Scots flouriſhed in Britaine many hundred yeeres before the birth of Chriſt. But hearken to Girald, who will tell you the juſt time: When Great O-Nel (ſaith he) held the Monarchie of Ireland, ſix ſonnes of Mured King of Vlſter, ſeized upon the North parts of Britaine. Hereupon from them was there a nation propagated, which by a peculiar name called, Scotica, that is, Scotiſh, inhabiteth that part even to this day. And that this befel at the very time when the Roman Empire in every mans ſight grew to decay, it is collected thus. Whiles Lagerius the ſonne of that O-Nel raigned over the Iriſh, Patrick (the Apoſtle of the Iriſh-men) came into Ireland, much about the yeere after Chriſts nativitie 430. So as it may ſeeme, this hapned neere the daies of Honorius

* Emperour.

* Auguſtus. For then, whereas before time, ranging up and downe without any certaine place of abode (as Ammianus doth report) they had long annoyed Britaine and the places appointed for the Marches, they ſeeme to have ſet their footing in Britaine. But they themſelves will have it thus, that they did but returne then out of Ireland, whither they had retired before, what time they were put to flight by the Britans, and driven away: and ſo they underſtood that place out of Gildas, of this very time; The Iriſh ſpoilers returne home, minding ſhortly to come backe againe. And much about this time, ſome think that Reuda, (whom Bede mentioneth) either by force and armes, or through favour planted himſelfe in this Iſland, upon an arme of the river Cluid Northward. And of this Captaine Reuda (ſaith he) the Dalreudini, even to this day take their name. For, in their tongue, Dal, ſignifieth a part: and others think, that from this Reuda it was, that wee called the Iriſh-Scots, Redſhanks. It is thought alſo, that the ſame Simon Brech, whom the Scots avouch to bee the founder of their nation, flouriſhed in theſe daies. Sinbrech in truth was the name of the man, which is as much to ſay, as Sin, with the freckled face, as we read in Fordon. And peradventure the ſame Brech he was, who about the time of S. Patricke, together with Thuibai, Mac-lei, and Auſpac, Scots, infeſted Britaine, as wee read in the life of Saint Carantoc.

Alban and Albin.

But why the High-land Scots living in Britaine, call that countrey which they inhabite, Alban, and Albin, and the Iriſh name it Allabany, were a queſtion for an ingenuous and liberall wit to travell in: as namely, whether this word Allabany, may not have it in ſome token of the ancient Albion: or whether it came of whiteneſſe, which they call Ban, and therefore may import as much in Scotiſh, as Ellan-Ban, that is, a white Iſland: or whether it bee derived of Ireland, which the Iriſh Poets name Banne; ſo that Allabanny, may ſound as much, as another Ireland, or a ſecond Ireland. For, Hiſtoriographers were wont to call Ireland, Scotland the greater, and the Kingdome of the Scots in Britaine, Scotland the leſſe. Moreover, ſeeing theſe Scots in their own language terme themſelves Albin, whereupon Blondus called the Scots, Albienſes, or Albinenſes, and Buchanan, Albini, let Criticks conſider, whether that in Saint Ierome, where hee inveigheth againſt a certaine Pelagian, a Scot borne, it ſhould not be read, Albinum for Alpinum, when hee taketh him up in theſe termes; The great and corpulent Alpine dog; and who is able to doe more harme with his heeles, than his teeth: for he hath his of-ſpring of the Scotiſh nation, neere neighbours to the Britans: of whom alſo in another place, he ſaid, that hee was full fatned with Scottiſh pottage & breweſſe. Of Alpine dogs, I never remember that I have read ought; but that Scotiſh dogs were in much requeſt at Rome in thoſe daies, Symmachus ſheweth unto us, Seven Scotiſh Dogs there were (ſaith he) the day going before the Games, which in Rome they wondred at ſo, as they thought they were brought thither in yron-grated Cages.

The Albine Dogge.

But after that the Scots were come into Britaine, and had joyned themſelves unto the Picts, albeit they never ceaſed to vexe the Britans with skirmiſhes and in-roades, yet grew they not preſently up to any great ſtate, but kept a long time in that corner, where they firſt arrived, not daring (as Beda writeth) for the ſpace of one hundred and ſeven and twentie yeares to come forth into the field, againſt the Princes of Northumberland; untill at one and the ſame time, they had made ſuch a ſlaughter of the Picts, that few or none of them were left alive: and withall the Kingdome of Northumberland, what with civill diſſentions and invaſions of the Danes, ſore ſhaken and weakned, fell at once to the ground. For then, all the Northerne tract of Britaine, became ſubject to them, and tooke their name, together with that hithermore countrey on this ſide Cluid, and Edenburgh Frith. For, that it alſo was a parcell of the Kingdome of Northumberland, and poſſeſſed by the Engliſh-Saxons, no man gain-ſaieth: and hereof it is, that all they which inhabit the Eaſt part of Scotland, and be called Lowland men, as one would ſay, of the Lower-countrey, are the very of-ſpring of the Engliſh-Saxons, and doe ſpeake Engliſh. But they that dwell in the Weſt coaſt, named Highland men, as it were, of the upper countrey, be meere Scots, and ſpeake Iriſh, as I have ſaid before: and none are ſo deadly enemies, as they be un-unto the Lowland men, which uſe the Engliſh tongue as we doe.

Ammianus Marcellinus writeth, that together with the Scots, ATTACOTTI, a warlike people, did much miſchiefe unto Britaine; and thoſe Humfrey Lhuid, gueſſeth, (how truely I know not) to have beene alſo of the Scotiſh nation. Saint Ierome telleth us plainely, that they were a Britiſh people. For he writeth, that when he was a very youth, (while Iulian as it ſeemeth was Emperour) he ſaw in Gaule the Attacots, a Britiſh nation, feed of mans fleſh, who when they found in the Forreſts heards of ſwine, flockes of neat and other cattell, were wont to cut off the buttockes of their heard-men, and keepers, the dugs alſo and paps of the women, and account the ſame the onely dainties in the world. For, ſo according to the true Manuſcript copies we are to read in this place, Attacotti [and not Scoti with Eraſmus] who acknowledgeth this text to be corrupted: Although I muſt needs confeſſe, that in one Manuſcript wee read Attigotti, in another Catacotti, and in a third Cattiti. Neither can this paſſage bee any waies underſtood as the vulgar ſort take it, of the Scots: conſidering that Saint Ierome treating there of the ſundry orders and manners of divers nations, beginneth the next ſentence following in this wiſe: The nation of the Scots hath no proper wives of their owne, &c. In another place alſo, where Saint Ierome maketh mention of the Attacotti, Eraſmus putteth downe for them, Azoti. Theſe Attacoti, as appeareth by the booke called Notitiæ, ſerved under the Romans in their warres, in the very decaying and declining ſtate of their Empire. For, reckoned there are among the Palatine aids within Gaul, Attecotti Iuniores Gallicani, and Attecotti Honoriani Seniores: alſo, within Italie, Attecotti Honoriani Iuniores. By this addition Honoriani, they ſeeme to be of the number of thoſe Barbarians, whom Honorius the Emperour entertained, and to no ſmall dammage of the Empire enrolled as ſouldiers to ſerve in his warres.

Among theſe nations alſo, which made rodes and invaſions into Britain, Iohn Caius, a man much exerciſed with cares and endevours of the beſt kind, and one who hath paſſing well deſerved of our Common-wealth of learning, reckoneth the * Ambrones, for that he red in Gildas, where he writeth of Picts and Scots, thus: Thoſe former enemies, like Ambrones, Wolves, even enraged for extreame hunger, with dry jawes leaping over the ſheep-fold whiles the ſhepheard is out of the way, being carried with the wings of ores and armes of rowers, ſet forward alſo with ſailes helped with gales of winde, breake thorow the bounds, killing and ſlaying all where they came. This good meaning old man thought of that which hee had read in Feſtus, namely, that the Ambrones, together with the Cimbri, flocked by numbers into Italie: and being buſied about another matter, it was quite out of his head, that [Ambro] as Iſidorus noteth, doth ſignifie, a Devourer. Neither doth Gildas uſe that word in any other ſence, nor Geffrey of Monmouth, who called the Saxons alſo, Ambrones: nor any other Ambrones than theſe, could my ſelfe hitherto ever find in ancient Writers, to have invaded Britaine.

ENGLISH-SAXONS.

WHen as now the Romane Empire under Valentinian the younger did more than decline, and Britaine being exhauſt through ſo many levies of all able men, and abandoned of the Romane gariſons, could no longer withſtand the force of Scots and Picts; Vortigern, whom the Britans had made their Soveraigne and chiefe Governour, or who (as others thinke) had uſurped the Monarchie, to the end that he might eſtabliſh his imperiall rule, and recover the State falling to ruine: (much awed hee was, ſaith Ninnius, by the Picts and Scots, he ſtood in feare of the Romanes forces, and was afraid of Aurelius Ambroſius) ſent for the Saxons out of Germanie to aide him: who forthwith under the conduct of Hengiſt and Horſa, with their Ciules (for ſo they called their Flat-boats or Pinnaces) arrive in Britaine, and after they had in one or two battels gotten the victorie againſt the Picts and Scots, became verie much renowned: and ſeeing the Britans ſtill relying upon their manhood and courage, they ſend for greater forces out of Germany, which ſhould keepe watch and ward upon the borders, and annoy the enemies by land and ſea. Guortigern (ſaith Ninnius) by the advice of Hengiſt, ſent for Octha and Ebiſſa to come and aid him: who being embarqu'd in 40. Cyules or Pinnaces, and ſailing about the Picts coaſts waſted the Iſles called * Orcades, yea and got many Iſles and Countreys beyond the * Frith, as farre as to the confines of the Picts. But at length, after they had begun to fall in love with the Lands, the civill faſhions, and riches of Britaine, preſuming upon the weaknes of the Inhabitants, and making the default of pay, and want of victuals their quarrell, they entred into league with the Picts, and raiſed a moſt bloodie and mortall warre againſt the Britans, who had given them entertainment: they kill and ſlay them in every place being put in affright and amazedneſſe, their fields they harrie, their cities they raze, and after many doubtfull events of battell, fought againſt thoſe two bulwarks of warre, Aurelius Ambroſius, who here tooke upon him to weare the purple roabe, wherein his parents were killed, and that warlike Arture, they diſſeize the Britans of the more fruitfull part of the Iſle, and drive them out of their ancient poſſeſſions. At which time, to ſpeake all in a word, the moſt miſerable Inhabitants ſuffred whatſoever either conquerour might dare, or the conquered feare. For, ſupplies of aide flocked together daily out of Germanie, which ſtill ſhould renew warre upon warre againſt the wearied Britans: to wit, Saxons, Iutes, (for ſo muſt we read, and not Vites) and Angles, who by theſe proper names were knowne one from another, although generally, they were called Engliſh, and Saxons. But let us treat of theſe in ſeverall, and ſummarily, that if it be poſſible we may have a ſight of our originall, and firſt cradles.

Aurelius Ambroſius.
Gildas calleth him, Ambroſius Aurelianus.

Howbeit, firſt will I adde hereto that which Witichindus, being himſelfe both a Saxon borne, and alſo a writer of good antiquitie; hath related, as touching the comming in of the Saxons. Britaine (ſaith hee) being by Veſpaſian the Emperour long ſince reduced among Provinces, and under the vaſſalage of the Romanes, ſtanding them in ſtead, and ſerving to good uſe a long time, became aſſailed by their neighbour-nations: for that it ſeemed deſtitute, and abandoned of the Romans helpe. For, the people of Rome, after that the Emperour * Martial was by his ſouldiers killed, being ſore tired out with forraigne warres, was not able to aſſiſt their friends with ſupply of accuſtomed aides. Yet neverthe-leſſe, the Romanes having built a mightie peece of worke for the defence of the Countrey, reaching betweene the confines from ſea to ſea, where it was thought that the enemies would aſſaile the Inhabitants, left the Land. But no difficultie it was for the enemie fiercely bent and alwaies ready to wage warre (eſpecially where they deale with a nation, feeble and unable to make warlike reſiſtance) to deſtroy the ſaid worke. Therefore hearing by report of the worthy and fortunate exploits, atchieved by the Saxons, they ſend an humble Embaſſage to require their helping hand: and ſo the Embaſſadors having audience given them, came forth and ſpake, as followeth. Moſt noble Saxons, The poore and diſtreſſed * Brets out-toiled, and over-tired by the many incurſions of their enemies, hearing the fame of thoſe victories which yee have valorouſly atchieved, have ſent us ſuppliants unto you, craving that yee would not denie us your helpe and ſuccour. A large and ſpatious Land, plentifull and abundant in all things, they yeeld wholly to be at your devotion and cammand. Hitherto have we lived liberally under the patronage and protection of the Romanes: after the Romans, we know none of more proweſſe than your ſelves: and therefore wee ſeeke for refuge under the wings of your valour. So that we may by your puiſſant vertue and armes, be found onely ſuperiour to our enemies, what ſervice ſoever ye impoſe upon us, willing we are to abide the ſame. To this petition the Peeres and Nobles of the Saxons briefly made anſwere in this wiſe. Know yee, that the Saxons will be faſt friends unto the Brets, and preſt at all times, both to aſſiſt them in their neceſſitie, and alſo to procure their wealth and commoditie. With joy returne theſe Embaſſadours home, and with this wiſhed-for tidings, make their countrey men more joyfull, Hereupon according to promiſe, an armie ſent into Britaine, and joyfully received, in ſhort time freeth the Land from the ſpoiling enemies, and recovered the countrey unto the behoofe of the Inhabitants. For, the performance hereof required no great labour: the enemies who had long ſince heard of the Saxons, were

* Brets, for Britans.

A terrified with the verie fame that was bruited of them: ſo that their very preſence drave them farre off, For theſe were the nations that troubled the Brets, namely, Scots and * Pehits: againſt whom, the Saxons whiles they maintaine warres, received of the Brets all things neceſſary. They abode therefore in that country a good while, making „ vſe in ciuill ſort of the Brets friendſhip reciprocally. But ſo ſoone as the Chieftaines of the „ armie ſaw the countrey to be large and fertile, and withall the hands of the Inhabitans ſlow „ to practiſe feats of armes: and conſidered therewith, that themſelves, and the greateſt part „ of the Saxons, had no certaine place to ſeat themſelves in, they ſend over to call vnto them a „ greater power and more forces. Thus having concluded peace with the Scots and Pehits, they „ B riſe all together in common againſt the Brets, drive them out of the countrey, and divide the „ Land at their pleaſure, as if it were their owne. Thus much Witichindus. * Picts.

The originall and Etymologie of the Saxons, like as of other nations, not onely Monkes ignorant, as they were, in learned antiquitie, but alſo latter Writers, being men of ſome exact and exquiſite judgment, have enwrapped with forged and fained fables, Some derive them and their name from Saxo, the ſonne of Negnon, and brother of Vandalus: others from their ſtonie nature: ſome from the remaines of the Macedonian armie; others of certaine knives, whereupon was made that rhyme in Engelhuſius:

Quippe brevis gladius apud illos Saxa vocatur,
C Vnde tibi nomen, Saxo traxiſſe putatur.

For, Sax, with them, and Short ſword, is the ſame,
From whence it 's thought, the Saxon tooke his name.

But Crantzius deriveth them from the Cattli in Germanie: and that learned Capnio from the Phrygians. Of theſe, let every man follow which he liketh beſt: For, ſuch conjectural opinions as theſe, I will not labour to diſproove. Howbeit, that conceit of the beſt learned Germans may ſeeme worthy of acceptance, and to bee preferred before the reſt, who ſuppoſe that the Saxons deſcended from the Sacæ, a moſt noble Nation, and of much worth in Aſia, and ſo called, as one would ſay, Sacoſones, that is, the ſonnes of the Sacæ: and that out of Scythia, or Sarmatia * Aſiatica, they came in companies by little and little, together with the Getæ, Suevi, Daci, and others into Europe. Neither is this opinion of theirs improbable, which fetcheth the Saxons out of D Aſia, wherein mankind was firſt created and multiplied: for, beſides that Strabo writeth, how thoſe Sacæ (as before time the Cimerij) made invaſions into countreys which lay farre off, and termed a part of Armenia after their owne name Sacacena: Ptolomee alſo placeth the Saſſones, Suevians, Maſſagetes and Daci in that part of Scythia: and Ciſner obſerveth, that theſe Nations retained the ſame vicinitie or neighborhood in a manner in Europe, which was among them in former times when they were in Aſia.

Saxons, from the Sacæ in Aſia.

Tartarie.

Lib. 11. Melanthon Ciſnerus.

Neither is it leſſe probable, that our Saxons deſcended from theſe Sacæ or Saſſones in Aſia, (call them whether you will) than the Germanes from thoſe Germanes in E Perſia, of whom Herodotus maketh mention: which they themſelves after a ſort doe affirme, by reaſon of the affinitie of their Language: for, that ſingular Scholer Ioſeph Scaliger ſheweth, that theſe words, Fader, Moder, Tuchter, Band, and ſuch like, are at this day found in the Perſian tongue, in the ſame ſence as we vſe, Father, Mother, Brother, Daughter, and Bond. But when the Saxons began firſt to bee of any name in the world, they had their abode in Cimbrica Cherſoneſus, which wee now call Denmarke, wherein Ptolomee placeth them, who was the firſt author (as far as I find) that mention them. For, we ſhould not indeed read, Saxones, (as it is in ſome bookes) but more truly, Axones, in that verſe of Lucan:

Michael Neander.

Axones, people of Gaule.

F ——Longiſq́, leves Axônes in armis:
And Axons in ſide armour light and nimble.——

Out of this Cimbrica Cherſoneſus in the time of Dioclesian, they (with the Frankes their neighbours) troubled our coaſts and the ſeas with Piracie, in ſo much as for the defence of the countrey, and to repell them, the Romanes made Carauſius their Generall. Afterwards they having paſſed over the river * Albis, part of them by little and and little gat footing within the ſeat and territorie of the Suevians, where now is the Dukedome of Saxonie, and part of them beſtowed themſelves in Friſland and Holland, which now the Frankes had quite forſaken. For, thoſe Frankes who before time had inhabited thoſe inmoſt Fennes of Friſland (whereof ſome, by overflowes and flouds, are growne to be that ſea, which at this day they call Zuider-ſea) and poſſeſſed themſelves of Holland, then called Batavia, under Conſtantius Chlorus, Conſtantine the Great, and his ſonnes, being received as Liege-men, and tranſlated from thence to inhabite the waſte and deſert countries of Gaule, either by the ſwords point making way into more plentifull regions, or elſe (as Zoſimus writeth) driven out by the Saxons, departed out of Holland. From which time, all the people bordering upon that ſea coaſt in Germanie, which were men of warre, and profeſſed Piracie, as before they grew to be Franci, ſo now they became clepid Saxons: thoſe Nations I meane, which inhabite Iutland, Sleſwicke, Holſt, Ditmarſe, the Biſhopricke of Breme, the countie of Oldenburgh, both Eaſt and Weſt Friſland, and Holland. For the nation of the Saxons, (as Fabius Quæſtor Ethelward, himſelfe deſcended of the Saxons royall bloud, writeth) was wholly all that upon the ſea coaſt, from the river Rhene unto the citie Donia, and which now is commonly called Dane-Marc. Which author, (that I may acknowledge by whom I have profited) maſter Thomas Allen of Oxford an excellent man, and one endued with very many ſingular Arts, firſt found out, and of his courteſie imparted the ſame unto me, with many others.

Ethelward, Son to King Adulph in the fourth degree, flouriſhed the yeere 950.

Out of this Maritime tract, the Saxons fleſhed now with the ſlaughter of many Romanes, brake many times into the Romans provinces, and for a great while annoied this Iland, untill Hengiſt himſelfe came: Who out of Batavia or Holland, ſailed into Britaine, and built that Caſtle of Leiden in Holland, as not onely the Hollanders Annals doe teſtifie, but alſo that noble Ianus Douſa, a man of excellent wit and learning: who of that Caſtle, verſifieth thus:

Ode 2. of Leiden.

Quem circinato mœnium ut ambitu,
Sic arcuatis fornicibus novum
Putatur Hengiſtus Britanno
Orbe redux poſuiſſe victor.

Which Hengiſt, by report, when he Return'd from Britaine with victorie,
Built new with walles in compaſſe round,
And on vaults arched under ground.

The Iutæ, who had that name (as many thinke) from the Gutes, Getes, or Gothes (for in a manuſcript booke, we read Geatun) did for certaine inhabite the upper part of Cimbrica Cherſoneſus, which ſtill the Danes call Iuitland: deſcended haply of thoſe Guttæ, whom Ptolomee hath placed in Scandia, whoſe habitation this day is called Gothland. But take heede you thinke not with Iornandes, that this was the native country of thoſe Gothes, who with victorious conqueſts over-ran all Europe: for, the moſt ancient and beſt approoved writers have recorded unto us, that they dwelt beyond the river * Iſter faſt by Pontus * Euxinus, and were before time called Getæ.

Spartianus Trebellius Pollio Capitolinus, &c.

* Alias, Danubius Donow * Marmajore.

But, in what place the Angles were ſeated, it is a queſtion, neither are all men of one opinion. Moſt authors place them in Weſtphalia, where Engern ſtandeth, and where the Suevians, whom Tacitus and Ptolomee make mention of, had their abode; whom I am willing to beleeve, if wee ſpeake of the age of Tacitus: but I ſuppoſe, that from thence they came downe to the tract by the ſea ſide. Others ſeeke for them in Pomerania, where the towne Angleen flouriſheth. But ſeeing theſe reach into the more inland parts of Germany far from our ſeas, ſurely we muſt ſeek for ſome other ſeat of our Angles or Engliſhmen: which Beda willed me to looke for between the Saxons and Iutes. The Angles (quoth he) came out of that countrey which is called Angulus, and is reported from that time to lie waſte, betweene the Provinces of the Saxons and * Iutes. Now ſeeing that between Iuitland and Holſatia the ancient countrey of the Saxons, there is a little Province in the Kingdome of Dania, named at this day Angel, Angles, or Engliſhmen.

Lib. 1. cap. 15. * Iutarum. So readeth the Manuſcript, and not Vitarum.

A Angel, beneath the citie Flemsburg, which Lindebergius in his Epiſtles calleth Little Anglia: I dare affirme, that now at length, I have found the place of our anceſtors habitation, and that from thence the Angles came into this Iland. And to averre this the more confidently, I have good warrant from the authoritie of that ancient writer Ethelwardus, whoſe words be theſe: Old Anglia is ſited between the Saxons and the Giets: they have a capitall towne, which (in the Saxon tongue) is named Sleſwic: but the Danes call it Haithby. In which verie place, Ptolomee ſeemeth to ſet the Saxons. So that a Poet of the middle time, ſung not untunably in this manner: Angel in Denmarke, the ſeat of the Engliſh, or Angles.

B ——Saxonia protulit Angles,
Hoc patet in lingua, niveoq; colore.——
That Engliſhmen from Saxons draw deſcent,
Their colour * white and tongue make evident. * Faire.

Of theſe Angles, ſome part having paſſed forward into the inmore quarters of Germanie, being blended with the Longobards and the Suevians went, as farre as Italie, and are thought to have left their footing in Engelheim, the native countrey of Charles the Great, Ingolſtad, Engleburg, Englerute in Germanie, and Angleria in Italie. But what the reaſon or Etymologie is of the name, I dare not definitively pronounce. Away with that Angulus the ſon of Humblus: and with Queene Angela, whom fooliſh
C folke babble to have beene the founders of our Nation. Neither thinke we that their name was impoſed of Angulus, that is, An angle or corner; as if it were a corner of the world, as ſome building upon that ſtale verſe, ſeeme to hold:

Anglia terra ferax, & fertilis angulus orbis,
Inſula pradives, quæ toto vix eget orbe:
England a fruitfull angle, is without the world ſo wide,
An Iland rich, that hath ſmall need of all the world beſide.

Neither doth Goropius his conjecture deſerve credit, but rather a ſmile, which deriveth Anglos, that is, Engliſhmen, from Angle, that is, A fiſhing rod, or a Fiſhhooke; becauſe (ſaith he) they hooked all unto them, and were, as we ſay, Good An- D glers. But he that ſeeth the Etymologie, of Engelbert, Englehard, and ſuch like Dutch names, may ſee perhaps the originall of Angli alſo. Moreover, it may ſeeme out of Procopius, that the Friſones likewiſe came with others into Britaine. The text whole as it lieth (for that the booke is not commonly extant in print) I will not thinke much here to ſet downe, even as Franciſcus Pithæus a ſingular good man, and in all ſorts of Antiquitie moſt skilfull, hath exemplified it unto me, out of the Kings Library in Paris: Βρεττίων τὼ νῦν ἴδιη τρία πολυανθρωπότατα ἔχνη, βασιλεύεταί τε ἑκάστῳ ἰδίᾳ τὰ, καὶ ὄνομα κεῖται τοῖς ἔθνεσιν τούτοις, Ἄγγιλοι, φρίσονες, καί τε οἱ νῆσῳ ὁμώνυμοι Βρίττονες. Τοσαύτη δέ τις τῶν ἐθνῶν πολυανθρωπία φαίνεται οὖσα, ὥστε ἀνὰ πᾶν ἔτος κατὰ πολλὰς ἐνδεῖσθαι μεταναιζόμενοι ξὺν γυναιξὶ, καὶ παισὶν εἰς φράγγους χρῆσι· οἱ δὲ αὐτοὺς ἐνοικίζουσι ἐν γῆς τῆς σφετέρας τῷ ἐρημοτάτῃ ἁπάντων εἶναι. καὶ ἀπ' αὐτῶν τῷ νῦν φρισσονίους φασίν. ὥστε ἀμύνει ἓ πολλῷ φέρτερον ὁ φράγγων βασιλεὺς ἐπὶ φρυβέῳ. Τοὶ ἐπιπρέσβεις πολὺ παρὰ βασιλέα Ἰουστινιανὸν ἐς Βυζάντιον στείλας ἄνδρας, αὐτοῖς ὃν τῷ Ἀγγίλων ξυνέπεμψε φιλοτιμούμενος, ὡς καὶ νῆσος ἥδε ὑπὸ ἀυτῷ ἄρχεται, That is, according to my groſſe tranſlation, thus: "*The Iland Britaine, three moſt populous nations doe inhabite, which have everie one their ſeverall King „ to rule them: and theſe Nations be called Angili, Friſones, and after the name of the very „ Iland, Britones. Now they ſeeme to be ſo great a multitude of people, that every yeere a „ mightie number of them, with their wives and children, flit from thence unto the Franks: „ and they give them entertainment in that part of their Land, which ſeemeth moſt deſert a- „ bove the reſt: and hereupon men ſay, they challenge unto themſelves the verie Iland. Theſe are the people of Germanie, that planted themſelves in Britaine, who, that they became one nation, and were called by one generall name, one while Saxons another while, Engliſhmen, and Engliſh-Saxons, for difference of thoſe that are in Germanie, may be gathered moſt truly, out of Gildas, Beda, Saint Boniface, Paulus Diaconus, and others: but moſt commonly in Latine, Angli, Gens Anglica; Saxons, Angles, and Iutes one nation.

Anglo-Saxons, when they came into Britaine.

About the time when they were admitted into Britaine by Vortigern, writers doe not agree: but to omit others, Bede and thoſe that follow him, make this computation of thoſe moſt confuſed times.

* or Aetius.

In the one and thirtieth yeere of Theodoſius the younger, and of Chriſt 430. The Britans pitiouſly crave aid, but in vaine, of Aetius the third time Conſul, for that they were ſore oppreſſed by the Picts and Scots.*

Under Valentinian the third, Saint German once or twice came into Britaine againſt the Pelagians, and after he had powred out his praiers unto God, led an armie [of Britans] againſt the Picts and Saxons, and gained the victorie.

In the firſt yeere of Martianus, and the yeere of our Lord 449, the nation of the Engliſh-Saxons arrive in Britaine.

* or Regiſter. Faſti Conſulares.

But ſeeing it appeareth for certaine by the * Kalender of the Conſuls, that the third Conſulſhip of Aetius fell out to be in the 39. yeere of the ſaid Theodoſius, and after the birth of Chriſt 446. as alſo by the beſt and moſt approoved authors, that Saint German died in the yeere of Grace 435: juſtly wee may ſuſpect, that thoſe numbers in Beda were corrupted, and that the Saxons had footing given them here, before the yeere of our Lord 449. For otherwiſe, how could it be, that S. German, who departed this life An. Do. 435, ſhould conduct the Britans againſt the Saxons, when as they were not yet come? Ninnius alſo writeth, that Saint German returned out of Britaine into his owne country after the death of Vortigern, who received the Saxons into Britaine: ſo that of neceſſitie their comming in was before the yeere of our Lord 435, which was the yeere wherein Saint German ended his life. In like manner, in the ſecond yeere after that Leo Magnus was created Biſhop of Rome, which was in the yeere of Chriſt 443, Proſper Tyro who then lived, writeth, that Britaine after ſundry ouerthrowes, was brought in ſubjection to the Saxons, ſo that they doubtleſſe muſt needs come in before that time, namely, the yeere of Chriſt 449. But to take away all ſcruples, and cleere all doubts in this point, this one note of computation adjoyned unto ſome copies of Ninnius, which is unto me inſtead of all, may ſuffice.

Baronius.

*From the Conſulſhip of the two Gemini, * Rufus and Rubellius, unto Stilico the Conſul, are reckoned 373. yeeres.*

* Read Fuſius.

Item, from Stilico unto Valentinian the ſon of Placidia, and to the raigne of Vortigern, be 28. yeeres.

* or battell.

From the raigne of Vortigern unto the diſcord of Guitolin and Ambroſe, are 12. yeeres. Which battell is Guoloppum,* that is, Cathguoloph.

Now Vortigern held the Kingdome of Britaine when Theodoſius and Valentinian were Conſuls: and in the fourth yeere of his raign, the Saxons came into Britaine, and were entertained by Vortigern, when Fœlix and Taurus were Conſuls.

From the yeere wherein the Saxons came into Britaine, and were received by Vortigern, unto Decius Valerianus, are 69. yeeres.*

* Elſewhere Decius Paulinus.

By caſting therefore the account thus, the comming in of the Engliſh-Saxons into Britaine, was in the 21. yeere of Theodoſius the younger: and this commeth neereſt to the computation of Bede, in the yeere of our ſalvation 428. For then Fœlix and Taurus bare their Conſulſhip: and ſo all circumſtances of perſons and times doe well cohere. This moreover I thinke good to tell you of, although I will not take upon me to be a Criticke, that in moſt copies of Gildas, whence Beda had that note of Etius, we read Agitio III. Conſuli, in others without adjection of number, Aegitio: and in one, Aequitio Coſ. But to this day never could I ſee in the Regiſter and Kalender of Conſuls, any Conſul of that name: unleſſe we might thinke that he was ſome Conſul extraordinarie.

Well, what time ſoever it was that they came in, they made good proofe of their ſingular valour and wiſedome with all. For in a ſhort ſpace, their State, for number, for good cuſtomes and ordinances, for lands and territories grew to that height, that it became moſt wealthy and puiſſant, yea, and their conqueſt in ſome ſort full and abſolute. For all the conquered, except ſome few, whom in the Weſterne rude the

A roughneſſe of the countrey defended and kept ſafe, became one nation, uſed the ſame lawes, tooke their name, and ſpake one and the ſelfe ſame language, with the conquerours. For, beſides England it ſelfe, a great part of Scotland, being poſſeſſed by the Engliſh Saxons (and ſtill to this day, the wilde and naturall Scots indeed, terme them Saſſones) uſeth the ſame tongue that we do, varying a little in the Dialect onely. Which tongue we and they together for the ſpace now of 1150. yeeres, have kept after a ſort uncorrupt, and with the poſſeſſion alſo of the Land. So that now it is proved vaine and falſe, (as other propheſies of that kind) which the Saxon Prophets fore- Gildas.

B yeeres and no more, and for one hundred and fiftie of them, often times waſte and ſpoile the countrey. Now, the matter it ſelfe, and the place ſeeme to require, that ſomewhat ſhould bee added as touching the ancient manners and demeanour of our Forefathers the Saxons: and ſurely, annex I will what I have obſerved in this behalfe.

The Saxons Manners.

This nation of the Saxons, was generally moſt warlike and martiall, For courage of minde, ſtrength of bodie, enduring of labour and travell, reputed of all the Germans moſt valiant, as ſaith Zoſimus. Moſt feared of the Romanes, becauſe their invaſions were ſudden, as Marcellinus reporteth: Terrible for hardineſſe and agilitie, as ſaith Oroſius. Saxony is a region (by reaſon of Mariſhes) inacceſſible, and environed with comber- ſome countreys, and unpaſſable. Which things although they may make them more ſecure for C war, and although it ſelfe alſo was ledcaptive oftentimes to ſet out the Roman triumphs, yet have they the name to bee a moſt valorous kind of men; excelling all other in piracie: howbeit, truſting in their ſwift pinnaces and flibotes (not in fine force) provided rather for flight than fight, as Egyſippus recordeth of them. In imitation of whom, Iſidorus writeth thus: The Nation of the Saxons ſeated upon the coaſts of the Ocean ſea, and among unpaſſa- ble Mariſhes, is for valour and nimbleneſſe meet for ſervice: and thereupon they tooke their name, as being a kinde of people ſtout, hardy, and moſt valiant, yea and redoubted above all other for piracie. Men they are for their tall ſtature, the good feature of their limbs, Lib. 9 cap. 2. Originum.
and framing of their lineaments, conſpicuous and notable. Whereupon Witi-D chindus the Monke, writeth thus of them; The Franks had theſe men in admiration for their excellencie as well in bodie as mind: they wondred at them for their new and ſtrange habite, for their armour alſo, and ſhoulders overſpred with the haire of their head; but above all for their conſtant reſolution, and valiant courage. Clad they were in ſouldiers caſſocks, and weaponed with long ſpeares) they truſted upon their little bucklers, and wore great knives or skeins at their backes. Howbeit, beforetime they uſed to ſhave their haire off, hard by the head to the very skinne, unleſſe it were round about the crowne, and to weare a plate about their head, as Sidonius Apollinaris teacheth us in theſe verſes:

Iſtic Saxona cærulum videmus
Adſuetum antè ſalo, ſolum timere;
E Cujus verticis extimas per oras
Non contenta ſuos tenere morſus,
Altat lamina marginem comarum.
Et ſic crinibus adcutem reciſis,
Decreſcit caput, additurque vultus.

Plates not content to keepe their wonted hold
Raiſe up in tufts, when all the reſt is pold:
F The Scalpe beneath thus ſhaven to the skin,
Their face ſeemes full, their heads but ſmall and thin.

As for their apparell, you may underſtand what it was out of theſe words of Paulus Diaconus, as touching the Longobards. Their garments were large, and looſe, and moſt of all linnen, ſuch as the Engliſh Saxons are wont to weare, trimmed and ſet out with verie broad gards or welts purfled and embroydered with ſundry colours. Moſt skilfull ſea men-

men they were, as who a long time lived as Pirats, ſo that being accuſtomed to the ſea they were afraid, as he ſaith, of the land: and wrought ſo much miſchiefe upon the ſea-coaſts of Britaine and France, as farre as to Spaine, that there were both Captaines and ſouldiers appointed all along the ſhores of both Countries to reſtraine their rovings and depredations, who thereupon were called Counts or Earles of the Saxon ſhore along Britaine and France. And heereto tend theſe verſes of Sidonius Apollinaris:

The Saxons ſhores or coaſts.

Comites littoris Saxonici.

Quin & Aremoricus piratam Saxona tractus, Sperabat cui pelle ſalum ſulcare Britannum*
Ludus, & aſſuto glaucum mare findere lembo.

The tract alſo that lies the Sea ſo neare,
Hight Armoricke, did Saxon pirate* feare:
Whoſe ſport it is with leather-ſtitched boat,
Of Britiſh Sea to cut the waves afloat.

Yea and that which more is, within Gaule neere unto Armorica, they ſeazed into their hands and held a long time the Country about the * Baiocaſſes, as is to bee ſeene in Gregorius Turonenſis, who termed them Saxones Baiocaſſinos, like as the common ſort, Seſnes Beſſins.

* Baiocæ.

Saxones Baiocaſſini.

But with how great cruelty they committed outraies along theſe ſhores, heare if it pleaſe you, Sidonius himſelfe. *The Meſſenger, (ſaith he) with whom we ſpent ſome time in talke, whiles for your ſake we held him with us, conſtantly affirmed, that you of late ſounded alarum at Sea, and performing the part in your owne perſon ſometime of a ſouldier, & ſometimes of a mariner, beſtirred your ſelfe up and downe the winding ſhores of the Ocean, to affront the * flat bottom barkes of the Saxons: Of whom as many rowers as you ſee, ſo many Archpirats you may thinke you beheld: They all of them together, ſo command, obey, teach, and learne to rob and ſteale; that even now alſo you have greateſt cauſe to be warned, and to be moſt heedfull and wary of them. There is no enemie ſo cruell as this. He ſetteth upon others at unwares, himſelfe ſlips away as warily: He ſetteth at nought ſuch as encounter him; he bringeth to nought thoſe that take no heed to him: whom he courſeth, he ſurely overtaketh; when he flieth he is ſure to eſcape. To this ſervice, ſhipwracks inure him, they terrifie him not. Not onely skilfull they are in the dangers of ſea, but alſo familiarly acquainted in ſome ſort therewith. Be there a tempeſt up? the ſame of one ſide ſerveth to ſecure them were they in jeopardie to be taken; on the other ſide if they be to aſſaile others, it keepeth them from being deſcried and ſeene farre off. In the mids of waves and craggy rocks, they hazard their lives in hope of good ſucceſſe. Beſides this, before they take ſhipping into their owne Country and weigh their flowked anchors from the enemies ſhore, upon the point of returne, their manner is to kill every tenth captive with equall and * dolorous torment (a cuſtome the more lamentable, becauſe it is ſuperſtitious) and among the number of ſuch as are gathered together to die, for to diſperſe the equity of lot, together with the iniquitie of death.*

* Ciuli.

* By hanging them indifferently one with another.

With ſuch vowes they bind themſelves, with ſuch ſacrifices they pay their vowes, and not ſo much purified by ſuch ſacrifices, as polluted with ſacrilegies, the bloudie and abominable murderers thinke it a religious thing, rather to torment a priſoner to death, than to ſet him free for a ranſome. Hitherto alſo may be referred that, which we collect of the fragment of an ancient Hiſtorie in Iſodorus. The Saxons truſt to their fly-boats and not to their ſtrength, better appointed for flight than for fight. As alſo this teſtimonie of Salvianus, who then lived, writing thus of Barbarous nations. The Alani are a people vicious and uncleane, but not ſo perfidious. The Franks be given to lying, howbeit full of hoſpitalitie and kind to ſtrangers. The Saxons in cruelty outragious, yet for chaſtitie to be honoured. But ſo firme and reſolute they were, (if I may be allowed to give it ſo good a terme) that they would chuſe rather to kill themſelves, and caſt away their lives wilfully, than be mocked and laughed to ſkorne. And hereupon it was, that when Symmachus had provided a band of them againſt the publicke ſhewes which were to be exhibited; the very day on which they ſhould have beene brought forth into the Theatre, for ſword play to kill one another, they by ſtrangling themſelves prevented all hope of ſhewing bloudy ſport and paſtime unto the people. Of whom Symmachus himſelfe writeth thus: The band or company of Saxons is leſſened by death. For, when as the private guard

Moreover, this nation of the Saxons was very much addicted to ſuperſtition, & for that cauſe when they were to conſult of weighty and important matters, beſide Sooth-ſaying by inſpection of beaſts entrails, they obſerved eſpecially the neighing of horſes, as preſaging things to come. And thence perhaps it is, that the Dukes of Saxonie in ancient time gave the horſe in their Armes. But why our firſt Progenitours Hengiſtus and Horſa, tooke their names of an horſe, (for both their names in the Saxon tongue do ſignifie, an horſe,) ſurely I know not, unleſſe it were for a lucky oſſe and fore-

B token of their warlicke proweſſe, according to that verſe of Virgil.

Bello armantur equi, Bella hæc armenta minantur:

For warre our horſes armed are,
Theſe beaſts alſo doe threaten warre.

An horſe the badge or cogniſance of the Saxons.

They uſed alſo caſting and drawing of lots very much; for, they did cut downe a branch from ſome tree that bare fruit, and ſlived or cleft the ſame into ſlips and twigs, and when they had diſtinguiſhed them with certain marks, they skattered them at hap-hazard upon a white garment. Straight waies, if the conſultation were publike, the Prieſt; if private, the goodman of the houſe, after prayers firſt unto the Gods, looking up to heaven, tooke each of them up three times, and having lifted them up, they

C interpreted them according to the marke ſet before upon them.

Theſe ceri-monies Adam Bremenſis aſcribeth to the Saxons which Tacitus attributeth to the Suevians.

To trie out the event and iſſue of warres, they were wont to ſet a priſoner of that nation againſt which they denounced warre, and a man choſen out of their owne countrimen, to fight together a combat, each of them with the weapon uſed in their countrie; and ſo to gueſſe by him that was victour, which nation ſhould goe away with victorie. Above all other Gods they worſhipped Mercurie, whom they called Wooden, whoſe favour they procured by ſacrificing unto him men alive; and to him they conſecrated the fourth day of the weeke, whereupon wee call it at this day, Wedneſday: like as the ſixth unto Venus, whom they named Frea or Frico, whence wee name that day Friday: even as we do Tueſday of Tuiſco, the ſtocke-father of the German or Dutch

In generall (as ſaith Tacitus) the Engliſh and other neighbour-nations worſhipped Herthus, that is, Dame Earth, for a Goddeſſe, and they had an opinion, that ſhe intermediated in humane affaires, and relieved the people. And even with us in theſe daies, that word Earth is in uſe, but growne out of uſe with Germans, who in ſtead of Earth, ſay, Arden. Of theſe ſuperſtitions that foreſaid Ethelward writeth thus; reſpectively an Heptarchie: In which notwithſtanding, the prince that had the greateſt power, was called, as we read in Beda, King of the Engliſh nation: So that in this very Heptarchie it may ſeeme there was alwaies a Monarchie. After this, Auguſtine, whom commonly they call the Apoſtle of the Engliſh men, being ſent hither by Gregorie the great, having abholiſhed theſe monſtrous abominations of heatheniſh impietie, with moſt happy ſucceſſe planting Chriſt in their hearts, converted them to the Chriſtian faith. But for what cauſe and upon what occaſion, this Gregorie was ſo diligent and carefull for the ſalvation of this Engliſh nation, Venerable Beda hath by tradition of his forefathers recounted unto us in theſe words: The report goeth, that on a certaine day, when upon the comming of merchants lately arrived, great ſtore of wares was „ brought together into the market place [at Rome] for to be ſold, and many chapmen flocked „ together for to buy, Gregory alſo himſelfe among others came thither, and ſaw with other „ things, boies ſet to ſale, for bodies faire and white, of countenance ſweet and amiable, ha- „ ving the haire alſo of their head as lovely and beautifull. Whom when he wiſtly beheld, he „ demanded, (as they ſay) from what countrey or land they were brought? Anſwere was „ made, that they came out of the Iſle of Britaine, the people whereof were as welfavoured to „ ſee unto. Then he asked againe, Whether thoſe Ilanders were Chriſtians, or enſnared ſtill „ with the errours of Paganiſme? To which it was it ſaid, They were Painims: but he fetching „ a long deepe ſigh from his very heart root; Alas for pitie, quoth he, that the foule fiend and „ father of darknes ſhould be Lord of ſo bright and lightſome faces, and that they whocaryed „ ſuch grace in their countenances ſhould be void of the inward grace in their hearts & ſoules. „ Once againe he deſired to underſtand by what name their nation was knowne; They made *Engliſhmen. „ anſwer, That they were called Angli: And well may they ſo be named, quoth he, for An- „ gelike faces they have: and meete it is that ſuch ſhould bee fellow-heires with Angels in „ heaven. But what is the name of that Province from whence theſe were brought? Anſwere * Hol-Deir-Neſſe. „ was returned, that the Inhabitants of the ſaid province were cleped * DEIRI: DEIRI, „ quoth he, They are in deed De ira eruti, that is delivered from ire and wrath, and called to „ the mercie of Chriſt. How call you the King of that province, ſaid he? Anſwere was given, „ that his name was Aelle: Then he alluding to the name, ſaid, That Allelu-jah ſhould be ſung „ in thoſe parts, to the praiſe of God the Creator. Comming therefore to the Biſhop of the Ro- „ mane and Apoſtolicall See (for himſelfe as yet was not made Biſhop) he entreated, that „ ſome miniſters of the word ſhould be ſent unto the Engliſh nation, by whoſe meanes it might „ be converted to Chriſt: and even himſelfe was ready to under take the performance of this „ worke, with the helpe of God, in caſe it would pleaſe the Apoſtolicall Pope, that it ſhould „ be ſo.

Concerning this converſion, the ſame Gregorie the Great writeth thus: Behold, * he * Chriſt. „ hath now entred already into the hearts of all nations, in manner, that are: Behold, in one faith „ he hath conjoined the limits of Eaſt and weſt: Behold, I ſay, the very Britiſh tongue, which „ could nought elſe but rudely bray Barbarous words, long ſince began in the laud of God to re- „ ſound the Hebrew Allelu-jah. And in his Epiſtle to Auguſtine himſelfe: Who is able heere „ to ſhew ſufficiently, what great joy is riſen up in the hearts of all the faithfull for that the nati- „ on of Engliſhmen by the operation of God almightie his grace, and the labour of your brother- „ hood, after the darknes of errours were chaſed and driven away, is illuminated with the „ light of holy faith: for that with moſt ſincere devotion they now ſpurne and tread idols „ under their feete, who beforetime in ſuperſtitious feare lay proſtrate before them: In an old fragment alſo written in that age, thus we read: Auguſtine upon one day of Chriſts „ Nativitie, which with the univerſall glorie of the Engliſhmen is for ever celebrated, did re- „ generate by lively Baptiſme above ten thouſand men, beſides an innumerable multitude of „ *women and young children. A other ſide: and notwithſtanding ſo deepe a current and chanell, ſo great and ſo divers differences of ſex and age, not one perſon (who will ever thinke it?) tooke harme. A great miracle no doubt, but this miracle as great as it was a greater preeminence doth ſurmount: in that, all feebleneſſe and infirmitie was laid off in that river: whoſoever was ſick and deformed returned out of it whole and reformed. O feſtivall ſpectacle for Angels and men to behold, when ſo many thouſands of a nation ſwing for grace, came forth of one rivers channel, as out of one mothers wombe, and out of one poole ſo great a progenie ſprung up for the celeſtiall and heavenly Citie? Hereupon the moſt gracious Pope Gregorie, with all the companies of Saints above, breaking forth into joy, could not conceale this, but wrote unto Saint Eulogius
B the Patriarch of Alexandria, that hee would moſt thankefully congratulate with him, for ſo great an hoſt baptized upon one Chriſtmas day.

No ſooner was the name of Chriſt preached, but the Engliſh preſently with ſuch fervent zeale and devotion conſecrated themſelves unto Chriſt, that they tooke incredible paines in propagating Chriſtianitie, in celebrating divine ſervice, performing all functions and duties of pietie, building Churches and endowing them with rich livings, ſo that there was not another region in all Chriſtendome that could make reckoning of more monaſteries richly endowed: Yea, & divers Kings there were that preferred a religious and monaſticall life before their Crowne and Kingdom. So many holy men alſo this land brought forth, which for their moſt firme profeſſion of
C Chriſtian religion, conſtant perſeverance therein, and ſincere pietie were canonized Saints, that it gave place to no other Chriſtian province in this behalfe: And like as Britaine was called of that prophane Porphyrie, a plenteous province of Tyrants; ſo England might truely be named, a moſt fruitfull Iſland of Saints. The Religion of the Engliſhmen.

Furthermore, they applied their minds to the bringing in againe of the better kind of arts and ſciences, and ſowed the ſeeds of Divinitie and good literature throughout all Germanie, by the meanes of Winifridus, Willebrodus, and others, which a German Poet ſheweth in theſe verſes: The learning of Engliſhmen.

Yet this immortall praiſe is due to Britain, Northern Iſle,
That when the world was overrun and waſted all the while
By Pannonik invaſions, it did reduce in ure
Thoſe troubled countries, with good arts: alſo with knowledge pure
Of Greeke tongue: and obſerving ſtill the ſtars in ſpacious skie,
And planets with their wandring waies, taught them Aſtronomie.
F For true religion eke preſerv'd, and ſowne in many a land,
The world much bound to Britaine is, and to her helpfull hand.
Thy name and gifts, ô Winifride, who knowes not? ſince by thee
The way was made in Germanie; where faith and pietie
Firſt ſetting foote beganne to chaſe all rites profane away:
What ow I not to Alcuine now? may eloquent Paris ſay,

Who happily went there in hand alone to plant a new,
Good arts and thence all barbariſme to baniſh far from view.
And unto thee for worthy Bede we are beholden much,
The only man for ſundry arts, his learned skill was ſuch.

Britaine twice Schoole-miſtris of France.

Peter Ramus ſaith moreover, that Britaine was twice Schole-miſtris to France, meaning, by the Druids and Alcuinus, whoſe induſtrie Charles the Great uſed eſpecially in erecting the Univerſitie of Paris.

The flitting backe againe of Anglo-Saxons into Germanie.

They brought alſo into Germanie military knowledge of Armes, as well as learning and religion: yea, and, which you will marvell at, if wee may beleeve theſe words of Eginhardus, they gave unto thoſe Saxons their firſt Originall, who now inhabite the Dukedome of Saxonie. The nation of the Saxons, ſaith he, as Antiquities do record, being departed from the Engliſh inhabiting Britaine, ſailing through the Ocean, partly upon a deſire they had, and partly driven of neceſſitie to ſeeke where they might ſeat themſelves, arrived upon the coaſts of Germanie, and landed at a place called Hadulôha: what time as Theodericus King of the Franks warring upon Hirminfridus Duke of the Thuringers his Daughters husband, cruelly with fire and ſword waſted their land. Now when as they had in two pight fields already, tried the doubtfull fortune of battaile, with lamentable ſlaughter of their people and uncertaine victorie, Theoderich diſappointed of his hope to be Maſter of the field, diſpatched Embaſſadors unto the Saxons, whoſe Duke was Hadugato: who having heard the cauſe of their comming, and taken their promiſe, that upon obtaining victorie they ſhould cohabite together, led forth an armie with them to aide Theodoricus. By meanes of which forces valiantly fighting now with him, as it were, for their libertie and native country, hee overcame his enemies: and when hee ſpoiled the naturall Inhabitants, killed them up, and in manner left not one alive, their land according to his promiſe hee ſet out and appointed for the Conquerours to poſſeſſe, who dividing the ſame by caſting lots, ſeeing many of them were ſlaine in the wars, and that by reaſon of their fewneſſe the whole country could not be occupied and peopled by them, part of it, that eſpecially which lyeth Eaſtward, they made over to coloners and new Inhabitants, to every one according as by lot it fell out, to be holden and tilled for a certaine rent and tribute: All the reſt they themſelves poſſeſſed. On the Southſide verily, theſe Saxons have the Franks, and a remnant of the Thuringers, whom the precedent whirlewind of hoſtilitie had not touched, and are divided from them by the channell of the river Unſtrote: Northward dwell the Normans, a moſt fierce Nation: Eaſt, from them the Obotrites inhabite: and Weſtward, the Friſians: from whom continually without intermiſſion they defended their territories and marches thereof, either by Covenants of league or neceſſary skirmiſhing. But now returne wee to our Engliſh-Saxons.

For a long time the State and Empire of the Saxons flouriſhed exceeding well under the foreſaid Heptarchie, untill thoſe Kingdomes bruiſed and impaired one of another with civill warres, came all in the end to bee ſubjeſt unto the Weſt-Saxons. For, Egbert King of theſe Weſt-Saxons, having conquered already foure of theſe Kingdomes, and ſwallowed up (as it were) in hope the other twaine alſo, to the end that they which were ſubdued, and reduced to the rule of one Prince might bee conjoyned likewiſe in one name, commanded by an Edict and Proclamation, that the Heptarchie which the Saxons held, ſhould bee called Engelonð, that is, England: whereupon in Latine it was named Anglia, taking denomination of the Angles, as beeing of thoſe three nations moſt in number, and of greateſt proweſſe. For they kept in their poſſeſſion the Kingdome of Northumberland, and Mercia, very great and large countries, together with Eaſt-England: whereas the off-ſpring of the Jutes held Kent only, and the Iſle of Wight: The Saxons Eaſt-ſex, South-ſex, & Weſt-ſex, a ſmall parcell verily if it be compared with thoſe ſpatious territories & lands of the Engliſh, Of whom, long before this they were generally throughout called Engliſh, & in their owne language Englatheod, Anglcynne Engl-cynn, and Engliſc-mon: albeit every Kingdome therein, had a ſpeciall name of the owne by it ſelfe. And this appeareth for certaine, England.

About the yeare, 800.

Theod. that is, a Nation.

A certaine, as well out of other writers, as Beda, who intituled his Story, The Hiſtorie of the Engliſh-Nation. Yea, and in that Heptarchie, thoſe Princes that over-ruled the reſt, were ſtiled Gentis Anglorum Reges, that is, Kings of the Engliſh nation: At this time, the name of Britaine, lay forgotten and growne quite out of uſe among the Inhabitants of this Iſland: remaining only in books, and not taken up in common ſpeech. And hereupõ it is, that Boniface the biſhop of Mentz, deſcended frõ hence, called this our country, Saxony beyond the Sea. Howbeit, K. Eadred, about the yeare of our Lord, 948. uſed in ſome Charters and Patents the name and title of King of Great Britaine: like as Edgar in the yeare, 970. bare this ſtile alſo, The Monarch of all whole Albion. Epiſt. to Zacharie the Pope.

B Being now called Anglia or England, the ſtate and puiſſance of theſe Angles was come to the full height, and therefore, (ſuch is the revolution of all mortall things) haſtened apace to their period and end. For, the Danes continually infeſting our coaſts many yeares together, at the length began to enter, ranſacking and mangling this countrie moſt pittifully.

NAMES OF ENGLISH-SAXONS.

C MY purpoſe was, even here to have ſet downe the orderly ſucceſſion of the Engliſh-Saxon Kings, both in the Heptarchie, and alſo in their Monarchie: but ſeeing that they ſeeme not properly to belong unto this place, neither is the bare heaping up of names onely delightfull to the Reader, perhaps it will be more acceptable, if I briefly annexe hereto what I have obſerved by much reading, and eſpecially in Alfricus our ancient Grammarian, as touching the force, reaſon, and ſignification of the ancient Engliſh names. Not that my meaning is to interpret every name ſeverally, (for, that were a piece of worke very laborious) neither can ſuch barbarous names, in which there lieth couched great ſignificancie, ſuccinct brevitie, and ſome ambiguitie, be eaſily delivered in another tongue. But conſidering that moſt of them bee compounded, and that of few ſimples: I will D explaine the ſaid ſimples, that the ſignifications of the compound, implying all the oſſe and preſage of good lucke, wiſhed-for, and happie fortune, may evidently appeare, and that we may throughly perceive, there is among all nations that Orthotes of names, which Plato ſpeaketh of. Porphyrius de Theolog. Phœ.

Abel, Eal, and Al, in names compounded, like as πᾶν in Greeke compoſitions, ſignifieth, Al, or Wholly. Hereupon Aelwin, is as much, as Wholly, or Fully Victor. Albert, All, bright and dread, wholly dread or reverend. Alfred, Altogether Pacificall, or peacefull. Whereunto in ſome ſort are correſpondent, in Greeke, Pammachius, Pancratius, Pamphilius, &c. Ael. Eal. &c.

E Aelf, which with varietie of Dialect, is pronounced, Vlf, Wolph, Hulph, Hilp, Helfe, and in theſe daies Helpe, carrieth in it a ſignification of Helpe or Aide: as for example, Aelfwin, that is, a victorious aide: Aelfwold, a helpfull Governour. Aelfgiva, ſhe that giveth helpe: according to which are theſe Greeke names, Boetius, Symmachus, Epicurus. Vlf.

Ard, betokeneth naturall diſpoſition or towardneſſe: as Godard, is as much, as Divine towardlineſſe or inclination, Reinard, Sincere diſpoſition, Giffard, a franke and liberall nature: Bernard, a filiall and ſonne-like affection. Ard.

Athel, Adel, and Ethel import Noble. Thus Aethelred, that is, Noble in counſell; Aethelard, a noble nature or diſpoſition: Aethelbert, famouſly Noble: Ethelward, a noble Tutor or Protectour. Athel, and Ethel.

F Bert, the ſame that with us at this day, Bright, and in Latin, Illuſtris, and clarus, that is, Splendent, and cleare: ſo, Ecbert, that is, Bright and ſhining for ever: Sigbert, a ſplendent conquerour: as alſo, ſhee whom the Germans named, Bertha, the Greeke called Eudoxia, as Luitprandus witneſſeth. And of this ſort were Phædrus, Epiphanius, Photius, Lampridius, among the Greekes; Fulgentius and Illuſtrius, &c. among the Latins. Bert.

Bald. BALD, with the people of the North parts, is the ſame that Audax in Latine, that is, Bold, as Jornandes ſheweth: a word, that yet is not growne out of uſe. So Baldwin, and by inverſion Winbald, is the ſame, that, Bold Victour: Ethelbald, Nobly bold: Eadbald, Happily bold. Unto which are conſonant, Thraſeas, Thraſimachus, and Thraſibulus, in Greeke, &c. A

Ken, and Kin. KEN, and KIN, import, Kinsfolke, as Kinulph, an helpe to Kinsfolke: Kinhelm, a Defender of his kin: Kinburg, a defence to kinred: Kinric, powerfull in or to kinſfolke.

Cuth. CVTH, beareth with it a ſignification of skill and cunning: ſo, Cuthwin, that is, a skilfull or politicke Conquerour: Cuthred, a learned counſellor: Cuthbert, Notable for his skill: neere unto theſe ſound the Greeke names, Sophocles, Sophianus, &c. B

Ead. EAD in the compounds, and Eeadig, in ſimple words, ſheweth as much as Happineſſe, and Bleſſedneſſe. Thus Eadward, is all one with, Happie Saviour, or preſerver: Eadulph, Bleſſed helpe: Eadgar, happie power: Eadwin, Fortunate Conquerour: Of which there is ſome reſemblance, in the Greeke names, Macarius and Eupolemus: in the Latine alſo, Fauſtus, Fortunatus, Felicianus, &c.

Fred. FRED, ſoundeth all one with peace, for, ſo our anceſtours called Sanctuaries, Fredſtole, that is, the ſeats of peace. Thus Frederic, is as much as Powerable, or wealthy in peace; Winfred, Victorious peace: Reinfred, Sincere peace.

Giſt. GISLE, among the Engliſh Saxons betokeneth a pledge or hoſtage, as Eredgiſle, an hoſtage of peace. Giſlebert, a notable or famous pledge: like as in Greeke, Homerus. C

Hold. HOLD, in the old Gloſſaries, like as Wold alſo, is interpreted, Governour, or chiefe Lieutenant: although in other places, it ſignifieth, LOVE; as Holdlic, Lovely, or Amiable.

Helm. HELM, is as much as Defence. Thus, Eadhelm, Happie defence: Sighelm, Victorious defence: Berthelm, Notable, or famous defence: even as theſe Greeke names, Amyntas, Boetius, &c.

Hare, and Here. HARE, and Here, as they are diverſly pronounced, betokened both an Armie, and alſo a Lord: ſo, Harhold, that is, the Ruler of an Armie: Hareman, A Principall or Chiefe man in an Armie: Herebert, Excellent in an armie: Herwin, a Victorious armie, or Conquerour of an Hoſt: not unlike to thoſe Greeke names, Stratocles, Polemarchus, Hegeſiſtratus, &c. D

Hild. HILD, in Alfricks Grammar is expounded, Lord, and Lady: thus Hildebert, betokeneth a famous or brave Lord: Mathild, a Virgin Ladie: and in the ſame ſenſe is Wiga found.

Wiga.

Leod. forſan ab Heb: לה pepulit.

Leod. LEOD, that is to ſay, People: thus, Leodgar, is one mightie with the people.

Leof. LEOF, ſignifieth, Love: thus, Leofwin, He that winneth love: Leofſtan, Moſt deare or beſt beloved: like as in Greeke, Agapetus, Eraſmus, Eraſtus, Philo; and in Latine, Amatus, and Amandus. E

Mund. MVND, betokeneth, Peace: whereof our Lawyers-terme Mundbreach commeth, that is to ſay, Breach of peace: ſo, Eadmund, is Happie peace: Aethelmund, Noble peace: Aelmund, Wholly peaceable, or Make-peace: whereunto are well neere equivalent theſe names, Irenæus, and Heſychius in Greeke: Lenis, Pacatus, Sedatus, Tranquillus, in Latine.

Rad, Red, and Rod. RAN, RAR, aud ROD, differing in Dialect, imply, Counſell: as Conrad, Powerfull, or skilfull in counſell. Etheldred, a noble Counſellor. Rodbert, notable for counſell: and in ſenſe not unlike to Eubulus, Thraſibulus, in Greeke.

Ric. RIC, ſignifieth, Potent, Rich, and Valiant, as Fortunatus in theſe verſes hath taught us: F

Hilperice potens, ſi interpres barbarus adſit,
Adjutor, fortis, hoc quoq; nomen habet:
O Hilpericke ſo mightie thou, (ſtood here th'expounder by Of bar'brous words) an helper ſtrong, eke doth this name imply.

Like as Alfric, Al or wholly powerfull: Athelric, Nobly valiant, or mighty. Unto which names

names theſe in Greeke allude, Polycrates, Crato, and Plutarchus, Opimius alſo in Latine.

SIG, uſually among them, was put for Victorie, whereupon, Sigbert, Renowned or glorious for victorie; Sigward, a victorious Protectour: Sigard, Victorious towardneſſe. And to the ſame ſenſe in manner, Nicocles, Nicomachus, and Nicander with the Greekes: Victor, Victorinus, Vincentius, &c. among the Latines. Sig.

STAN, was among thoſe old Forefathers of ours, a termination of the Superlative degree, as, Athelſtan, that is, Moſt noble: Betſtan, beſt: Leefſtan, moſt liefe or deare: Wiſtan, moſt wiſe: Dunſtan, moſt high. Stan.

WI, the ſame that Holy, as Wimund, holy or ſacred peace: Wibert, Famous, or renowned for holineſſe: Alwi, All holy: like as in Greeke, Hierocles, Hieronymus, Hoſius, &c. wi.

WILLI, and Vili, among Engliſh Saxons, as Billi at this day, among the Germans carried a ſignification of Many: as Willielm, a defender to many: Wildred, Honoured, or reverend of many: Wilfred, Peace to very many. To which in ſenſe and ſignification accord, Polymacus, Polycrates, Polyphilus, &c. will.

WOLD, and Wald, betokened with them a Ruler or Governour: Hence commeth Bellewold, An excellent Governour: Ethelwold, a noble Ruler: Herwald, and by inverſion, Waldher, the Governour or Ruler of an Armie. wold.

But lay a ſtraw here, for in a trifling matter, others as well as my ſelfe, may thinke theſe notes ſufficient, if not ſuperfluous.

But, of greater moment peradventure it will be, if I here commit to writing (if ſo be theſe papers be marked to long life) what we have ſeene: namely, that as Egbert commanded this hither part of Britaine, and which was his owne poſſeſſion, to bee named England: ſo now after 800. yeares, or there about, come and gone; even whiles we are peruſing this worke, King JAMES inveſted in the Monarchie of the whole Iſle, by the propitious favour and grace of God, in the right of his owne inheritance, and with the generall applauſe of all good men; to the end that this ſaid Iſle, which is one entire thing in it ſelfe, encircled within one compaſſe of the Ocean; in his owne perſon, under one Imperiall Crowne, and Diademe, in one communitie of Language, Religion, Lawes, and Judiciall proceſſes; to the increaſe of perpetuall felicitie, and oblivion of old enmitie, ſhould beare alſo one name: hath in the ſecond yeare of his raigne by an Edict publiſhed and proclaimed through his Realmes, aſſumed the name, title, and ſtile of KING OF GREAT BRITAINE, in all matters generally, ſave only in Writs, and formalities of Law Inſtruments. The name of Britaine brought into uſe againe.

THE DANES.

WHat was the beginning of the Danes, the Danes themſelves verily know not for certaine. For, the veritie it ſelfe hath hiſſed out of the Schoole of Antiquitie, not onely that Giant Danus the ſonne of Humblus, but alſo Goropius (who deriveth it from a Henne.) Andrew Velleius a Dane and a very great ſcholler, fetcheth their originall from the Dahæ, a people of Scythia, and from Marc, a word which ſhould ſignifie not a limit but a Region: Our country man Ethelward was fully perſwaded, that the name aroſe from the Citie of Donia. For mine owne part, I alwaies thought, that they ſprung from the Danciones, (whom Ptolomee placeth in Scandia, and who by change of one letter, in ſome copies be named Dauciones) and from thence voided themſelves into the deſert and forſaken ſeat of the Engliſh, to wit, into Cimbrica Cherſoneſus: untill that Jonas Jacobus Venuſinus, a moſt learned man, right judicious, and paſſing well ſeene in the ſtudie of Antiquitie, found out by diligent ſearch and inquirie, the very expreſſe tracts, as it were, and marks of the Danes name, within Sinus Codanus or Codanonis, that is, the Baltiſh ſea, or Oſt-ſea; where Pomponius Mela made mention in this very tract. Which names pronounced ſomewhat groſſely by the Northerne people, Cadan and Cdonorum, Mela forged and faſhioned upon the Latine anvill, into Codanum Da-ben.

num and Codanonia: like as the posteritie after him, Gdanum have coined out with a more gentle sound Dansk; of Clodoræus, Lodovic, of Cnutus, Canutus. And yet before the daies of Justinian the Emperour, about the yeare of our redemption 570. the world tooke no knowledge of their name. For then, begun they to rove upon the coasts of France and England, and were by the writers, that penned in Latine the histories of England, named Winccingi, for that they practised Piracie: for Wiccinga, in the Saxon tongue, as Alfricus witnesseth, doth signifie a Pirat that runneth from creek to creeke: also Pagani, that is, Painims, becaufe as yet they were not become Christians: but the Angles themselves in their language, termed them Denisean, and often times Heathon-men, as one would say, Ethnicks. Of these Danes listen to * Dudo of Saint Quintins, an author of good antiquitie, out of the Librarie of John Stow (that most studious Antiquarie of the Citie of London) which was never shut from me. The Danes swarmed from out of Scanza, that is, Scandia, like bees out of an hive, in manifold diuersitie and barbarous manner, after they had in heat, lascivious lust, and wantonnesse engendred an innumerable of-spring. Who after they were growne to ripenesse of yeares falling to hot contention for goods and lands with their fathers, and grand-fathers, yea and often times among themselves; when they once overflowed and grew so populous that they could have no roome sufficient for to inhabite in the place, wherein they presently dwelt: having gathered together by lot a multitude of youth and springals, after a most ancient custome, were thrust out into forraine Realmes, to conquer unto themselves lands by dint of sword, wherein they might live.

The Religion of the Danes. Hereupon peradventure we have our Thursday so called.

* Burnt offering.

But in the full performance of discharging those that should be thus sent out, and in mustering up their armies, they sacrificed unto Thvr, *whom they worshipped in old time as their Lord; for whom they killed not any sheepe, oxen or other cattell, but offered mens bloud: Thinking that to be the most precious * holocaust and sacrifice of all others, because when the Priest by casting lots had predestinated who should die, they were all at once deadly smitten upon the head with oxe yokes: and when every one that was chosen by lot had his braines dashed out, at one severall stroke, laid along hee was on the ground, and sought out there was with narrow prying the fibre, that is to say, the veine of the heart on the left side, and having after their manner drawne out the bloud thereof and stricken it upon the heads of their friends, speedily they hoise up sailes, and thinking that they please their God with such an act, they immediatly put to Sea, and fall to their ores.* Moreover, there is another manner, or rather a most foule and detestable superstition, which the Danes used in pacifying their Gods, and this doth Ditmarus the Bishop, who was of greater antiquitie somewhat than Dudo, in these words describe. But because I have heard strange, and wonderfull things of the ancient Sacrifices that the Danes and Normans used, I will not over passe the same. There is in these parts a place, and the chiefe it is of this kindome, called Lederum, in a province named Selon: where every ninth yeare in the moneth of Januarie, *after the time in which we celebrate the * Nativitie of our Lord, they all assemble together, and there they kill and sacrifice unto their Gods ninetie and nine men, and as many horses, with dogs and cocks for the hauks, which the Gods sent them, certainly perswading themselves, as I said before, that by the same they should please them.*

* Theophania.

The waste and spoile that the Danes made.

About the time of Egbert, in the yeare of Christ, 800. they first landed on our sea-coasts: afterwards with such tumults and hurliburlies as never the like was heard of, having for many yeares made foule havock over all England, razing cities, firing Churches, and wasting countries, they let out the raines loose to all barbarous crueltie, driving, harrying, spoyling, and turning all upside downe where ever they went. Thus after they had killed the Kings of the Mercians & East-Angles, seazed upō their Kingdomes, with a great part of the Kingdome of Northumberland. Then was there a tribute called, Dangelt, imposed upon the poore people, for the repressing of their robberies and outrages: and that you may know what manner of imposition this was, I would have you to reade these few lines copied out of our ancient Lawes: The paiment of Dangelt was at the first ordained for Pirats. For by sore annoying the countrey, they went on, and did what they could to waste it utterly. And verily to keepe downe their insolencie, it was enacted, that Dangelt should yearely be paid, that is, twelve pence out of every great ſlaughter of the Danes ſubdued Northumberland, and ſo terribly purſued the Danes, that they were forced either to depart the realme, or to ſubmit themſelves unto him. By the valorous proweſſe of theſe Princes, England recovered out of the whirlepit of calamities, and reſted from that bloody warre by the ſpace of 50. yeares.

THE NORMANS.

LIke as in ancient times out of that Eaſt coaſt of Germanie (in reſpect of us) which tendeth Northward, the Franks firſt, and then the Saxons, grievouſly annoied both France, Gaule, and Britaine, with their depredations, ſo that in the end, the one became Lords of Britaine, the other of France: even ſo in theſe later daies enſuing, the Danes firſt, and afterward the Normans ſucceeding in their place, from out of the ſame coaſt did the like. As if it were fatally given unto that tract, by the diſpoſe and providence of Almightie God, to conceive ſtill, and often times to ſend out of her wombe, nations to afflict France, and Britaine, yea, and to eſtabliſh new Kingdomes therein.

Nordmanni. Nord leudi. Helmoldus.

Theſe Normans were ſo called of the Northerne quarter or climate from whence they came: for, Normans be nothing elſe but Men of the North: in which ſenſe alſo they are named Nordleudi, that is, a Northerne people (for, a mixt nation they were of the moſt valiant Norvegians, Suedens, and Danes.) In the time of Charles the Great, they practiſed roving and piracie, in ſuch cruell manner about Friſia, Belgia, England, Ireland, and France, that when the ſaid Charles the Great ſaw their roving ſhips in the Mediterranean ſea, he ſhed teares abundantly, and with a grievous deepe ſigh ſaid: Heavie I am at the heart that in my life time they durſt once come upon this coaſt: and I foreſee what miſchiefe they will worke hereafter to my poſteritie: Yea, and in the publique Proceſſions, and Letanies of Churches, this afterwards was added to the reſt: From the race of Normans, Good Lord deliver us. They drave the French to that extremitie, that King Charles the * Bald, was forced to give unto Haſting a Norman Archpirate, the Earledome of Charters for to aſſwage the mans furie: King Charles the * Groſſe, granted unto Godfrey the Norman a part of * Neuſtria, with his daughter alſo in marriage. But afterwards, by force, and armes they ſeated themſelves neere unto the mouth of the river Sein, in a country which before time was corruptly called Neuſtria, becauſe it had beene a parcell of Weſtraſia: For, ſo the writers of the middle time named that which the Germans uſed to call Weſten-rijch, that is, the Weſtkingdome: and doth compriſe all that lieth betweene the rivers of Loyre, and Seine: Which tooke the name of Normandie afterwards of them, as it were the region of Northerne men, when King Charles the ſimple had confirmed it unto their Prince * Rollo, whoſe Godfather he was at his Baptiſme, to bee held in Fee by homage, and withall beſtowed upon him his daughter in marriage.

At which time, as we reade in an old Manuſcript belonging to the Monaſterie of Angiers, Charles, ſurnamed * Stultus, gave Normandie to Rollo, and his daughter Giſla with it: This Rollo daigned not to kiſſe the foote of Charles, and when his friends about him admoniſhed him to kiſſe the Kings foote as his homager, for the receit of ſo great a beneſit, hee anſwered in the Engliſh tongue, Ne ſe by God, which they interpret thus, No by God: The King then and his Courtiers deriding him, and corruptly repeating his ſpeech, called him Bigod, whereupon the Normans be at this day called Bigods. Hence alſo peradventure it is, that the Frenchmen even ſtill uſe to call hypocrites, and ſuperſtitious folke, Bigod.

* The Foole.
Bigod.

This Rollo, who being baptiſed received therewith the name of Robert, ſome writers report to have become a Chriſtian but in ſhew and colour onely; others, upon good deliberation and in earneſt: and they adde moreover, that hee was warned ſo to doe by God in a dreame: which I pray you give me leave, (being a man for all this, that doateth not upon dreames) to relate without ſuſpicion of vanitie, from the credit of writers in thoſe daies. The report goeth, that as he ſailed, he dreamed he ſaw himſelfe fouly infected with the leproſie, but when hee was waſhed once in a moſt cleare ſpring at the foot of an high hill, hee recovered, and was cleanſed thereof, and anon climbed up to the top of the ſaid hill. This Dreame when he reported, a Chriſtian that was a captive in the ſame ſhip with him, interpreted it in this wiſe: The Leproſie

A *Leproſie was the impious worſhip of Idol-gods, wherewith he was tainted; that the ſpring, betokned the holy * Laver of Regeneration, wherewith being once cleanſed, he ſhould aſcend up the hill, that is, attaine unto high honor, and heaven it ſelfe.* * Baptiſme.

This Rollo begat William ſurnamed * Long-eſpee, of the long ſword which he uſed to weare: and William begat Richard, the firſt of that name. Whoſe ſonne, and nephew by his ſon carrying both his name, ſucceeded after him in the Duchie of Normandie: but when Richard the third was dead without iſſue, his brother Robert was Duke in his ſtead, who of his concubine begat that William, whom wee commonly name The Conqueror, and the Baſtard. All theſe were every one for their noble acts, atchieved both at home and abroad, moſt renowned Princes. Now whiles B this William being of ripe yeares, ruled Normandie, Edward the holy, ſurnamed CONFESSOR, King of England, and the laſt of the Saxons line, departed out of this world unto his heavenly country, to the great miſſe and loſſe of his people, who being the ſonne of Ladie Emma coſen to William, and daughter to Richard, the firſt of that name, Duke of Normandie, whiles hee remained in Normandie baniſhed, had promiſed unto him, that he ſhould ſucceed after him in the Crowne of England. But Harold the ſonne of Godwin, and Great Maſter or Steward of King Edwards houſe, uſurped the Kingdome: whom to diſpoſſeſſe, his brother * Toſto of one ſide, and the Normans of the other, did what they could, and left no ſtone unturned: But C when he in a pitched field had, neere unto Stamford-bridg in Yorkſhire, ſlaine his brother Toſto and Harold King of Norway, whom Toſto had drawn to take part with him in this war, and ſo obtained a bloudy victorie, behold, within nine daies after the ſaid WILLIAM ſurnamed the Baſtard, Duke of Normandie, taking hold of the promiſes of King Edward late deceaſed, and preſuming of his adoption and neere alliance, having levied a great armie, arrived in England among the South-Saxons. Againſt whom Harold forthwith advanced, albeit his ſouldiers were ſore wearied, and his power by the former battaile much empaired. And not farre from Haſtings they encounter and joyne battaile: where Harold engaging himſelfe into the midſt of the medley, and fighting manfully loſt his life with a great number of Engliſhmen left D ſlaine in the place: but how many they were juſt, hard it is exactly to conceive and faithfully to put downe. WILLIAM thus a Conquerour preſently with banner diſplaid marched about in order of battaile by Wallingford to London: where being received, he was ſolemnly inaugurated King, as unto whom, by his owne ſaying, The Kingdome was by Gods providence appointed, and by vertue of a gift from his Lord and Coſen King Edward the Glorious, granted: and after ſome few lines the ſtory runneth on and ſaith, that the moſt beauteous King Edward had by adoption ordained him his heire in the Kingdome of England. And if we liſt to believe the Hiſtorie of Saint Stephens in Caen of Normandie, at his laſt breath he uttered theſe words: The Re- E gall Diadem which none of all my predeceſſours ever wore, I got and gained by the grace of God only, and no right of inheritance. And a little after: I ordaine no man heire of the Kingdome of England, but I commend the ſame to the eternall Creator, whoſe I am, and in whoſe hands are all things. For I became not poſſeſſed of ſo great honour by any hereditary right, but by a terrible conflict, and with much effuſion of bloud I tooke it from that perjured King Harold, and after I had either ſlaine or put to flight his favourers, and adherents, I ſubdued it under my Dominion.

The Charter of William Conquerour.

The Hiſtorie of Saint Stephens Abbey at Cane in Normandie.

But why doe I ſo briefly run over this ſo great alteration of the Engliſh ſtate? Have therefore, if you thinke not much to read it, what my ſelfe with no curious pen, (haply with as little ſtudie and premeditation, howbeit according to the truth of the Hiſtorie) wrote, when being but young, not well adviſed nor of ſufficiencie F to undergoe ſo great a burthen, I purpoſed to ſet forth our Hiſtorie in the Latine tongue.

The Normans conqueſt.

WHen Edward the Confeſſour was now without iſſue departed this life, the Nobles and people of the land were in doubtfull care diſtracted about the ſetting up of a new King in his place. Edgar, ſurnamed Aetheling, King Edmund Iron-ſide his nephewes nephew

by

by a ſonne onely of all the iſſue male of the Saxons line remained alive, unto whom by right of inheritance the kingdome was due. But conſidering he was thought by reaſon of his tender yeares, not meete to mannage the State, and had beſide intermingled his naturall diſpoſition with forrain manners, as being borne in * Pannonia, and the ſonne of Agathra daughter to the Emperor Henrie the third, who was in ſo remote a countrie farther off, than that he could conveniently aſſiſt the young Gentleman either with aid or counſell: in theſe regards hee was leſſe affected of the Engliſhmen, who deſired nothing more than to have a King, (as it were) out of their owne bodie: And therefore, all of them for the moſt part had their eies fixed with much reſpect upon Harold Goodwins ſonne, a man for his good parts as well in warre as peace very glorious. For albeit he was of noble parentage but by one ſide: and his father for his treacherie and treaſon, as alſo for pilling and polling had incurred everlaſting infamie and ſhame, yet with his courteous affabilitie, gentill deportment, liberalitie, and warlike proweſſe he wound himſelfe into exceeding great eſpeciall favour with the people. For, there could not another bee ſet by him, in whom there was more reſolute hardineſſe to adventure upon danger, or more adviſed policie in the midſt of dangers. His valour alſo and fortitude ſhined out ſo apparantly in the Welſh warres, which heretofore moſt happily hee had brought to an end, that he was reputed verily a man paſſing well furniſhed with all vertues required in a ſoveraigne Commander, and even borne to repaire the decaied ſtate of England. Moreover, good hope there was that the Danes (who onely terrified this country) would bee the better contented and pleaſed with him, becauſe he was the ſon of Githa, daughter to Sueno King of Denmarke. And in caſe there ſhould ariſe any other power againſt him, either forraine or domeſticall, he was thought ſufficiently enabled to make his part good, with the affectionate hearts of the common people, with the alliance alſo and affinitie that hee had among the Nobility. For hee had to wife, the ſiſter of Morcar and Edwin two brethren, men of exceeding great puiſſance: and Edric ſurnamed the Wild, a man of high ſpirit, and in chiefe authoritie was linked to him in the neereſt bond of Affinitie: beſides it fell out very well for him, that at one and the ſelfe-ſame time, Sueno King of the Danes had his hands full of warre with Sueden; and betweene William Duke of Normandy, and Philip the French King, there fell ſome diſlikes and emulation, for that Edward the Confeſſor during his exile in Normandie, had in expreſſe termes promiſed unto William of Normandie the Kingdome, if hee died without iſſue: For the performance of which promiſe, Harold became as it were, ſurety, and bound himſelfe with an oath, (what time hee was detained priſoner in Normandie) but with this condition annexed, that he might eſpouſe the daughter of the ſaid William of Normandie. Whereupon moſt men thought it the wiſeſt policy to ſet the Crowne upon William his head; to the end that by performing oath, and promiſe, the warre that they foreſaw now threatned, and deſtruction (which alwaies waiteth as a due puniſhment upon perjurie) might be averted, and withall by laying Normandie to England, the Kingdome under ſo mightie a Prince might be ſurely eſtabliſhed, and the common-wealth very much advanced. But Harold quickly preventing all conſultations whatſoever; thinking it not good for him to linger and delay any whit: that very day on which King Edward was enterred, contrary to the expectation of moſt men, entred upon the ſoveraigne government, and with the applauſe onely of ſuch as were then preſent about him, who with acclamations ſaluted him King, without the due complements and ſolemnitie of Coronation, ſet the Imperiall Diadem upon his owne head. By which act of his, as being a breach of ancient ordinance, he exceedingly provoked and ſtirred up againſt him, the whole Clergie and Eccleſiaſticall ſtate. But he knowing well enough, how hard it was for a new Prince, and an uſurper, to maintaine his royall place and dignitie without an opinion of pietie and vertue, for to blot out that his offence given, and to eſtabliſh his Scepter, did all he poſſibly could for the promoting of religion, and preferment of Churchmen, and to beautifie and adorne Monaſteries and religious houſes: Edgar Aetheling Earle of Oxford, and all the nobles he entertained with all love and favour: the people he eaſed of theire tributes: he gave bountifully a great largeſſe of mony to poore people: and in one word, with faire ſpeech and affable language, with mild hearing of cauſes, and equitie in deciding the ſame, he wonn to himſelfe ſingular love, and no leſſe authoritie and reputation. So ſoone as William Duke of Normandie was truly advertiſed of theſe newes, he ſeemed to take the death of King Edward very heavily, whiles in the meane time, time, he was vexed at the heart that England which hee had in conceit and hope already swallowed and devoured, was thus caught away out of his very chawes. Forthwith therefore, by advice of his counsell and friends, he dispatcheth Embassadors to Harold, with instructions to put him in mind of the promises and stipulation past; but withall, in his name to make claime to the Crowne. Harold, after some pause and deliberation upon the point, returneth his answer: As touching the promises of King Edward, William was to understand, that the Realme of England could not be given by promise, neither ought he to bee tied unto the said promise, seeing the kingdome was fallen unto him by election and not by right of Inheritance. And as for his owne stipulation, extorted and wrung it was from him, then a prisoner, by force and by guile, in feare of perpetuall imprisonment, to the hinderance of the English common-wealth and prejudice of the State, and therefore void: which neither ought hee, if he could, nor might if he would, make good, since it was done without the Kings privitie and consent of the people. And a very hard and unreasonable demand it was of his, that hee should renounce and surrender unto a Norman Prince, a meere stranger and of forrein linage, that kingdome wherein hee was invested with so great assent of all sorts. With this answere William was not well pleased, and he thought that Harold thereby sought starting holes for to hide his perjurie. Others therefore he sent out of hand in Embassage about the same matter, who should admonish him, how religiously hee had bound himselfe by oath, and that forsworne persons should be sure of finall perdition at Gods hands, and reproachfull shame among men. But when as now the daughter of William affianced unto Harold in the covenant, (the very strength and knot of the foresaid stipulation) was by Gods appoinment taken away by death, the Embassadours were with lesse courtesie entertained, and received none other answere than before. So that now by this time, there was nothing like to follow but open warre. Harold riggeth and prepareth his navie, musters and pressеth souldiers and placeth strong garrisons along the sea coasts in convenient places, and provideth all things in readinesse which were thought needefull and meet for to beat backe the Normans forces: Howbeit, the first tempest of warre, beside the expectation of all men, arose from Tosto the brother in whole blood of Harold. He being a man of a proud, hautie and fell heart, ruled in great authority a good while over Northumberland, but growing outragious in cruelty to his inferiors, in pride towards his Soveraigne, and in hatred to his brethren, was outlawed by Edward the Confessor, and so withdrew himselfe into France, and now, by the advice of Baldwine Earle of Flanders, and perswasion of William Duke of Normandie, as it seemeth probable, (For Tosto and William married two daughters of Baldwine Earle of Flanders) beginneth to trouble his brother with open warre, whom a long time he deadly hated. From Flanders hee tooke sea with a fleet of 60. rovers-ships, wasteth the Isle of Wight, and annoyeth the sea-coast of Kent: but terrified at the comming of the Kings navie, hee set up saile and directing his course toward the more remote parts of England, landeth in Lincolneshire, and there harrieth the Countrey: where Edwin and Morcar give him battell: but beeing discomfited and put to flight, into Scotland hee goes, from thence to renew his forces and so to warre afresh. Now were all mens minds held in suspense with the expectation of a twofold warre, of the one side out of Scotland, of the other out of Normandie: and so much the more because at the feast of Easter, there was seene about a sevennight together a blazing starre of an hideous and fearefull forme, which turned mens minds already troubled and perplexed, (as it falleth out in a turbulent time) to the forefeeling of some unluckie events. A Comet. But Harold carried an heedfull eie to all parts of his kingdome, and the south coast hee fortified with garrisons. Lesse feare hee had from Scotland and Tosto, because * Malcolme King of the Scots was more disquieted with civill dissensions. *Malcolm. * Mil. Columbus.* Meane while, William much busied in his mind about England, casting about what course to take, ever and anon communicated with his Captaines about the point; whom hee saw cheerefull, and full of forward hopes: But, all the difficulty was how to make money, for defraying the charges of so great a warre. For, when in a publike assembly of all the states of Normandie, it was propounded as touching a subsidie, answere was made, That in the former warre against the French, their wealth was so much empaired, that if a new warre should come upon them, they were hardly able to hold and defend their owne: That they were to looke rather unto the defence of their proper possessions, than to invade the territories of others: and this warre intended, just though though it were, yet seemed it not so necessary, but exceeding dangerous: beside, the Normans were not by their allegeance bound to military service in forain parts. Neither could they by any meanes be brought to grant a levie of money, although William Fitzosbern, a man in high favour with the Duke and as gracious among the people, endeavoured what he could to effect it: yea, and to drawe others by his owne example, promised to set out fortie tall ships of his owne proper charges towards this warre. Duke William then, seeing he could not bring this about in a publike meeting, goeth another way to worke. The wealthiest men that were he sendeth for, severally one by one to repaire unto him: he speaks them faire, and requireth them to contribute somewhat toward this warre. They then, as if they had strived avie who should helpe their Prince most, promise largely: and when that which they promised was presently registred in a booke, there was a huge masse of money quickly raised, and more than men would ever have thought. These matters thus dispatched, he craveth aid and helpe of the Princes his neighbours, to wit, the Earles of * Anjou, * Poictou, * Maine and * Bulloigne, and unto them he promiseth faire Lands and possessions in England. Philip also the French King he goeth unto, and solliciteth: voluntarily promising in case he aided him, to become his vassall and leege man, and for England to take the oath of fealtie unto him. But it being thought nothing good for the state of France, that the Duke of Normandie, who already was not so pliable and obedient to the French King as he ought, should bee bettered in his state by the addition of England (for, the power of neighbour potentates is alwaies suspected of Princes) so far was the King from yeelding any helpe, that he disswaded him rather from invading England. But by no meanes could the Duke be reclaimed from his enterprise, nay much more encouraged he was now and set on, being once backed with warrant from Alexander the Bishop of Rome (for even now began the Pope to usurpe authority over Princes:) who allowing of his cause and quarrell, had sent unto him a sacred and hallowed banner as a luckie fore-token of gaining both the victory, and Kingdome: yea and with all cursed whosoever should oppose themselves against him. He assembled therefore all the forces he could possibly raise, and gathered together a mighty navie before the Towne of Saint Valeries, which standeth upon the mouth of the river Some, where he lay a long time windbound: For the procurement whereof with many a vow he importuned Saint Valeric the patron-Saint of the Towne, and heaped upon him a number of gifts and oblations. Harold, who with his forces had waited very long in vaine for his comming determined to dissolve his armie, to withdraw his navie, and to leave the sea-coast: both for that he was compelled thereto for want of provision, as also because the Earle of Flanders had written unto him, that William would not stirre that yeere: whom he soone beleeved, as thinking that the time of the yeere was such as had locked up the seas and barred all navigation, forasmuch as the [autumnall] * Æquinox was neere: Whiles he thus deviseth with himselfe, driven he was (upon an unexpected necessity of new warre) to call backe his armie; for, Harold surnamed the * Hard and Harfager, king of Norway, who had practised piracie in the North parts of Britaine, and already subdued the Isles of Orknes, being by Tosto sollicited and called forth in hope of the Kingdome of England, arrived within the mouth of the river Tine with a fleet of 500. flibotes or thereabout, where Tosto also came and joined his owne fleet. When they had a good while forraged and spoiled the countrey heere, they weighed anchor, and sailing along the coast of Yorkshire, put into Humbre, and there began to commit outrages with all manner of hostility. For the repressing of whom, the two Earles Edwin and Morcar led forth a power of soldiers, whom they had raised suddainly and in tumultuary haste: but they not able to abide the violent charge of the Norwegians, fled for the most part as fast as they could, and together with the Earles made shift to escape: howbeit, many of them passing over the river Ouse, were swallowed up with the waves thereof. The Norwegians then, goe in hand to lay siege unto the Citie of Yorke, which straight waies they get by surrender, hostages being given on both sides. But after some few dayes, King Harold having gathered his whole power from all parts together, speedeth him to Yorke, and from thence marcheth against the Norwegians, who lay encamped strongly in a most safe place: for backed they were with the Ocean, flanked on the left hand with Humber, wherein their fleet rid at anchor, and had for their defence on the right side and afront, the river Derwent. Howbeit King Harold couragiously setteth upon them: where first, there

* Hungarie.

A was a cruell conflict at the Bridge, ſtanding ouer the riuer Darwent, which one Norwegian ſouldier, by report, made good for a time againſt the whole armie of the Engliſhmen, and held out ſo long vntill he was ſhot through with a dart, and died: after this continued the battell a good while within the very campe, fought with equall valour, and indifferent fortune on both ſides: But in the end, the Norwegians were diſmaied and ſcattered, and in the midſt of the battell Harold himſelfe King of the Norwegians, and Toſto, with the greater part of the Armie loſt their liues. Vpon this Victorie, there fell vnto King Harold an exceeding rich boatie, a great maſſe both of gold and ſilver, and that huge Armado, except twentie ſmall Barques onely, which he granted vnto Paul Earle of Orkney and O-
B laue the Sonne of Harold who was ſlaine, for to carry away thoſe that were hurt, taking their oath firſt, that from thence forward they ſhould not attempt any hoſtilitie againſt England. This happie victorie encouraged Harold and ſet him aloft: now, he thought that he ſhould bee a terrour, yea, to the Normans, how ſoeuer hee grew odious vnto his owne people, becauſe hee had not diuided the ſpoile among his ſouldiers. Howbeit, wholly hee employed himſelfe to reforme the diſordered ſtate of the countrey, which in this part was pittifully out of frame and lay neglected. Meane while, William Duke of Normandie, finding a fit ſeaſon for his purpoſe, about the end of September weighed anchor and launched forth: then with a gentle gale of winde, he ſailed with all his ſhipping, and arriued at Pouenſey in Suſſex, where being landed vpon the naked ſhore, for to cut off all hope of return from his men, he did ſet fire
C on his ſhips: and hauing erected a fortreſſe there, for his men to retire thither in ſafetie, forward he marcheth to Haſtings, where alſo he raiſed another ſtrong hold, and placed therein a garriſon. Now by this time, he maketh proclamation, declaring the cauſes of this warre: namely, to reuenge the death of Alfred his Couſin, whom together with many Normans Godwin the Father of Harold had murthered: Item, to bee auenged of the wrongs that Harold had done, who when he had baniſhed Robert Archbiſhop of Canterburie, euen then by intruſion entred vpon the Kingdome of England now pertaining to him, (treading vnder foot the religious reſpect of his oath.) Howbeit, by an Edict he ſtraightly charged his ſouldiers not in hoſtile manner to ſpoile the Engliſh men. Newes hereof in all haſt was brought to D King Harold, who by all meanes thinking it good to vſe preuention, and as ſpedily as might be to encounter the Duke, ſendeth out his meſſengers euery way, calleth earneſtly vpon his ſubiects to continue in their faithfull allegiance, aſſembleth all his forces in euery place, and with great iournies haſteneth to London: where there preſented himſelfe vnto him an Embaſſadour from Duke William; but as he made many words in claiming the Kingdom, Harold in a furious fit of anger and indignation, went within a little of laying violent hands vpon the very perſon of the Embaſſadour. For a hard matter it was to bereaue a freſh Victour of his pride and confident hope. Forthwith he diſpatched his Embaſſadours alſo vnto William, by way of inſolent termes to menace him, vnleſſe with all ſpeed he retired backe into Normandie. Yet William gaue him a gentle anſwer, and diſmiſſed them with great courteſie.
E Meane time, Harold muſtreth vp ſouldiers in London, and findeth that by the former battell againſt the Norwegians, his forces were very much diminiſhed: yet a mightie armie hee leuied of Nobles, Gentlemen, and others, whom the loue of their native countrey had raiſed and brought into the field, for to put backe & repell the common danger. Preſently he leadeth forth into Southſex, notwithſtanding his mother (though in vaine) did what ſhe could to ſtay him: and with an vndaunted heart, encamping vpon a faire plaine, ſcarce ſeuen miles from Duke William, ſat him downe. And thither alſo immediately the Norman approached with his Armie. Firſt there were ſecretly ſent out on both ſides Eſpies: and they of the Engliſh part, either not knowing the truth, or diſpoſed to lie, made incredible report of the Normans number, their furniture and proviſiõ, of their good order alſo and diſcipline, inſomuch as Gyth, a younger brother of King Harold, a man renowned for martiall exploits, thinking it no good policy
F to hazard all in the triall of one battel, aduertiſed the King, that the euents of war were doubtful, that victories oftener depend of fortune than of valour, & that holding off, and deliberate delay, was the chiefeſt point of militarie diſcipline: Alſo, he aduiſed him, that in caſe he had made promiſe vnto William of the Kingdom, he ſhould for his owne perſon withdraw himſelf: for, ſurely he could not with all his forces be fenced againſt his conſcience, and God no doubt, would require puniſhment for breach of faith & promiſe: neither, ſaith he, wil any thing ſtrike greater terrour into the Normans, than if he ſhould be levying and enrolling of a new Armie, whereby they might bee received eſtſoones with freſh battels. Furthermore, he aſſureth him in his owne behalfe, that if he would commit the fortune of that battell into his hands, hee would not faile to performe the part of a good brother, and a valiant Captaine: as who truſting upon the clearenesſe of his heart, and a good conſcience, might either more eaſily defeat his enemies, or elſe more happily ſpend his life for his country. The King was not well content, to heare theſe admonitions and counſels which ſeemed to tend unto his diſhonour: for, as he could willingly abide the event and iſſue of warre, ſo in no wiſe could he endure the reproach of fearefull cowardiſe. And therfore, the praiſes of the Normans with bad words he depraved, neither thought he that it would ſtand with his owne dignitie, or the reputation of his former proweſſe, being now come as it were to the utmoſt point of perill and hazard, like a milke-ſop and daſtard, to draw foot backe, and incurre the perpetuall ſtaine and blot of ſhame. Thus, whom it pleaſeth Almightie God to overthrow, hee firſt maketh them uncapable of good counſell. Whiles theſe matters thus paſſed between them, Duke William upon a pious affection to preſerve & maintaine the ſtate of Chriſtendome, and to ſpare the effuſion of Chriſtian bloud, ſendeth a Monke as a mediatour between both, who propoſed this offer & condition unto Harold, Either wholly to reſigne up his Kingdom, or to acknowledge from thence forth, that he holdeth it of the Norman Duke as his ſuperiour Lord, or elſe to decide the quarrell with William by combate, or at leaſtwiſe to ſtand to the judgment of the Pope of Rome, touching the Kingdom of England. But he as one having no rule of himſelfe, and accepting of no condition whatſoever, referred the whole triall of the matter to the tribunall ſeat of God, & made anſwer, that the very next day following, which was the ſecond* before the Ides of October, he would bid him battell: and this day upon a credulous errour, he had aſſured himſelfe would be fortunate unto him, becauſe it was his birth day. All the night enſuing, the Engliſhmen ſpent in licentious revels, in riotous exceſſe of banqueting, and in clamorous noiſes: But the Normans beſtowed the ſame in praiers and vows for the ſafetie of the armie, and for victorie. The next morning by day light they embattell thẽſelves on both ſides: Harold placed in the vant-guard, the Kentiſh men with their billes* and halberts, (for by an old cuſtome the front of the battell was due to them:) and in the rereguard himſelfe took place with his brother, and thoſe of middle England with the Londoners. Of the Normans vaward Roger of Montgomerie, and William Fitz-osberne had the leading: the ſame conſiſted of horſemen out of Anjou, Perch, and little Britaine, the moſt part of whom ſerved under Fergentus the Briton. The maine battell which ſtood of Poictovins & Germans, Geffery Mattell, and a German Penſioner commanded. In the rereguard was the Duke himſelfe with the whole manhood of Normans, and the flower of his Nobilitie and Gentrie. But in every place, were intermingled with the reſt certaine companies of Archers. The Normans having with no confuſed nor untunable ſhout, ſounded the battell, and advanced forward with their Battalions, & at the firſt encounter did let flie luſtily on every ſide a volley of arrowes like haile, a kind of fight, which as it was ſtrange to the Engliſhmen, ſo it terrified thẽ exceedingly for, they flew ſo thick, that they thought they had their enemies even in the midſt of thẽſelves. Then with a violent charge, they aſſaile the vaward of the Engliſh: and they for their parts, who reſolutely had determined to cover the place which they had taken up with their bodies, rather than to give one foot of ground, bending all their forces, and keeping themſelves cloſe together right valiantly put the enemies backe, and ſlew a number of them: the Normans reenforced themſelves againe upon them, and with an horrible noiſe, the battels of both ſides gave the ſtrok: And now by this time were they come to the medley, wherin as if foot to foot, & man to man, they had coped together, there was for a good while a fierce & cruel fight: The Engliſhmen ſtanding thick & cloſe, as if they had ſtuck one to another, abid the brunt & charge of the enemies with conſtant reſolution, inſomuch as after many a bloudy wound received, they were now at the point to have reculed, had not William performing the part of a leader, as well as of a ſouldier, with his authoritie reſtrained them. Thus the fight continuing ſtill, the Norman horſemen brake in upon them, and withall from above, the arrowes flew ſo thick about the Engliſh mens eares, that they were in manner overwhelmed with them: yet for all that, they kept their array unbroken. For, Harold neglecting no dutie of a valorous Captaine, was ready in perſon every where: and William againe for his part bare himſelfe as worthily, who having one or two horſes ſtabbed and ſlaine under him, ſeeing that he could not

A by fine force, and true valour indeed get the upperhand, betooke himselfe to stratagems: commanding his men to sound the retreat, and keeping them still in good order and array, to give ground and retire. The English men supposing now, that they turned backe and fled, and that themselves had the victorie in their hands, display their ranks, and being thus disraied, presse hard upō their enemies, as making full account that the day was now sure enough theirs. Whereas the Normans casting themselves suddenly againe into array, and winding about, charge the English afresh, and thus setting upon them being scattered, and out of order, enclosed them round about, and made an exceeding great slaughter of them. Many of them whiles they stood doubtfull, whether to fight or to flie, were borne downe and slaine: but more of them having recovered an higher ground, casting themselves round into a ring, and comforted with the exB hortation one of another, with good resolution, turned head and resisted a long time, as if they had made choice of that place for an honorable death: until that Harold being shot through the head with an arrow, together with his two brethren, Gyth & Leofwin, lost his life. Then Edwin and Morcar with some others that remained alive, and escaped by flight, yielded to the hand of God, and gave place unto the time, considering that the battell had continued without intermission from seven of the clock in the morning unto the evening twilight. There were in this battell missed of Normans much about 6000. but of English many more by far. William now Conqueror, rejoyced exceedingly, & by way of a solemne supplication or procession, which he appointed, gave all honor to the Almightie and most gratious God: and when he had erected his C pavilion in the midst of the bodies lying slain by heapes, there he passed that night. The morrow after, when he had buried his owne men, & granted leave unto the English men to do the like, himselfe returned to Hastings, partly to consult about following the traine of his victorie, and in part to refresh awhile his wearied souldiers. No sooner was the newes of this grievous overthrow by fearfull Messengers brought to London, and to other cities of England, but the whole land generally was striken into dumps, and as it were astonied. Githa the Kings mother, like a woman gave her selfe to plaints and lamentations, so, as that she would admit no consolation, but with most humble praiers intreated the Conqueror, for the dead bodies of her sonnes. And those she enterreth in the Abbey of Waltham. Edwin sendeth Queen Algitha his sister into the D farther parts of the Kingdome: But the Lords and Peeres of the Realme, will the people not to cast downe their hearts, but lay their heads together about the State and Common wealth. The Archbishop of Yorke, the Citizens of London, and the Sea souldiers, whom they called Boteskarles, gave their advice to consecrate Edgar King, and to begin warre againe with William: Edwin and Morcar plotted secretly to usurpe the Imperiall rule and dignitie for themselves: but the Bishops, Prelates, and others, who were terrified with the flashing thunderbolts of the Popes curse, thought best to yield, and not by doubtfull battell to provoke the Conquerours heavie indignation against them: nor to strive against God, who now for the sinnes of the people calling for vengeance, had delivered England, as it were into the hands of the Norman. William all this while fortifying the Towne of HaE stings, purposed to march directly with his armie in warlike manner to London: but because he would raise the greater terrour abroad, and make all sure behinde, having divided his forces, he rangeth over part of Kent, over Southsex, Suthrey, Southampton shire, and Berk shire, fireth villages, and upland houses, driveth booties, at Wallangford hee passeth over the Thames, and terrifieth all the countrey as hee goeth. Yet for all this, the Nobles and Peeres wist not what counsell or course to take, neither could they be brought, to lay downe private grudges, and enmities, and with one heart to consult in common for the good of the State. The Prelates, to be absolved from curses of the Church, and censures of the Bishop of Rome, (whereby he now exercised his authoritie, not only over mens soules, but also over Kingdomes) seeing that the state of the Realme was now not decaied, but quite ruinate and past recoverie, persisted in this mind to submit, in so much as many seeking to save themF selves, secretly departed out of the Citie. But Alfred Archbishop of Yorke, Wolstan Bishop of Worcester, and other Prelates, together with Eadgar Aetheling, Edwin and Morcar, at Berkhamsted doe meete the Norman Conqueror, (who made them many and large promises:) and having given hostages, committed themselves to his protection, and submitted. Then forthwith speedeth he to London, where being received with great and joyfull acclamations, he was saluted King: for the solemnizing of his Coronation, which he appointed should be on Chriſtmas day, he made all the preparation that might bee, and meane while bent his whole mind, and all his thoughts to the ſetling of the State.

Now was the period and revolution of the Engliſh-Saxons Empire in Britaine come about, which was determined within the compaſſe of 607. yeeres, and a notable alteration and change made in the Kingdome of England: which ſome lay upon the baſe avarice of the Magiſtrates, and the ſuperſtitious lazineſſe of the Prelates: others impute to that Comet or blazing Starre, and the powerable influence of celeſtiall bodies: ſome againe made God the Author thereof, who in his ſecret judgements, and thoſe never unjuſt, diſpoſeth of Kingdomes. Others alſo there were, who looked into neerer ſecondarie cauſes, and they found a great want and lacke of wiſedome in King Edward, in that whiles under a goodly ſhew and pretext of religious and vowed virginitie, he caſting off all care of having iſſue, expoſed the Kingdome for a prey to ambitious humours. B

VVHat an inſolent and bloudie victorie this was, the Monks that write of it, have declamed with full mouth: neither is it to be doubed, but in this Victorie, (as it hapneth in other) wickednes tooke head and bare the full ſway. William the Conquerour, in token as it were of a Trophee for this conqueſt, abrogated ſome part of the ancient poſitive lawes of England, brought in ſome Cuſtomes of Normandie. and by vertue of a decree, commanded, That all cauſes ſhould be pleaded in the French tongue. The Engliſh hee thruſt out of their ancient Inheritances, aſſigned their lands and Lord-ſhips to his ſouldiers, yet with this reſervation to himſelf, that he ſhould ſtill remaine chiefe Lord and bind them to doe due ſervice and homage unto him and his ſucceſſors, that is to ſay, That all of them ſhould hold their lands in Fee or fealty. C He cauſed alſo a Seale for himſelfe to be made of purpoſe, with this inſcription upon the one ſide:

The ſeale of William. Conqueror. D Moreover, as William of Malmesburie doth report, In imitation of Cæſars policy, who expelled the Germans, (lying hidden within that huge forreſt Ardenna, and by many a ſallie from thence annoying his armie) not by the helpe of his owne Romans, but by the Gaules his confederates: to this end, that whiles ſtrangers and aliens killed one another, himſelfe might triumph with their bloud-ſhed: the very ſame courſe, I ſay, did William take with the Engliſh men. For, againſt certaine of them, who upon the firſt battell of that infortunate man Harold were fled into Denmarke and Ireland, and returned with a puiſſant armie in the third yeere after, he oppoſed meere Engliſh forces and an Engliſh generall; permitting the Normans to ſit ſtill and keepe holiday: foreſeeing heereby and providing for his owne great eaſement, whether of them ſoever ſhould have the better. Neither was he in this point E fruſtrate of his purpoſe. For, the Engliſh, having thus a prettie while skuffeled and skirmiſhed one with another, in the end rendred up the entire Victorie to the King, without his paines taking. And in another place: Having undermined and quite overthrowne the power of the Laimen, he provided by a ſure and irrevocable edict, to ſuffer no Monke or Clerke of the Engliſh Nation, to endevour for to get any dignitie; much diſagreeing herein from the clemencie and gentleneſſe of King Cnuto in times paſt, who gave unto thoſe that he conqnered, all their honours entire. And hence it came to paſſe, that when hee was once dead, the naturall Inhabitants of the countrey upon light occaſions fell to driving out of ſtrangers, and recovered unto themſelves their ancient right and freedome.

When he had brought this to paſſe, above all things hee laboured to turne away F the ſtorme of the Daniſh wars, that hung over his head, and to purchaſe peace, though it were with round ſums of mony. Wherein he uſed Adelbert Archbiſhop of Hamburgh as his Inſtrument. For, Adam Bremenſis writeth thus: Betweene Suen and the Baſtard there was continuall ſtrife about England, although our Biſhop being greaſed in the hand with Williams bribes, would have concluded a firme peace betwixt the Kings. Which may ſeeme alſo to have beene eſtabliſhed: for, ſince that time, England was never any whit afraid of the Danes. And William verily betooke himſelfe wholly to the defence and maintenance of his Imperiall dignitie, and to governe the ſtate by excellent lawes. For, as Gervaſe of Tilburie writeth; When the renowned Conqueror of England King William, had ſubdued the farther coaſts of this Iſland, under his dominion, and throughly tamed the ſtomacks and hearts of rebels by terrible examples, leſt that from thenceforth they ſhould licentiouſly run into errour and commit treſpaſſe, he determined to reduce his ſubjects under the obedience of poſitive, and written Lawes. Having therefore all the lawes of England laid before him, according to the Tripartite Diviſion, whereby they were diſtinguiſhed, that is to ſay, Merchenlag, Denelag, and Weſtſex-enlag, *when hee had rejected ſome of them, and allowed of others, he adjoyned thereto thoſe Lawes of * Neuſtria beyond the ſeas, which ſeemed moſt effectuall to preſerve the peace of his Kingdome.* Afterwards, as mine Author Ingulphus ſaith, who flouriſhed in thoſe daies, He commanded every Inhabitant of England to doe him homage, and to ſweare fealtie to him againſt all men: He tooke the ſurvey and deſcription of the whole Land, neither was there an Hide of England through, but he knew both the value, and the owner thereof; there was neither plaſh nor place, but ſet it was in the Kings Roll: and the rent, revenue, and profit thereof, the very tenure of poſſeßion, and poſſeſſour himſelfe was made knowne to the King, according to the credit and true relation of certaine Taxers, who being choſen out of every country, did put downe in writing the territorie properly belonging thereto. And this Roll was called, the Roll of Wincheſter, and by the Engliſhmen (for the generalitie thereof, becauſe it contained fully and exactly, all the tenements of the whole Land) named, Domeſday. I have beene more willing to make mention of this booke, becauſe it is to be cited & alleaged often times hereafter: which booke alſo, it pleaſeth me to name, Gulielmi librum Cenſualem, that is, The Tax booke of William: Angliæ Notitiam, that is, The Notice of England: Angliæ commentarios Cenſuales, that is, The Taxe Regiſter, or Seſſing booke of England: and Angliæ Luſtrum, that is, the Survey of England.

Domeſday-booke.

But whereas Polydore Virgill writeth, how William that Conqueror, firſt brought in the Triall or Iudgement of twelve men,* there is nothing more untrue. For, moſt certaine it is, and apparant by the lawes of Etheldred, that it was in uſe many yeares before. Neither hath he any cauſe to terme it a terrible Iudgement. For theſe 12. free-borne and lawfull men, are duely by order empannelled, and called forth of the Neighbourhood; theſe are bound by oath to pronounce and, deliver up their Verdict, * de facto: they heare the counſell pleading in courts on both ſides before the Bench or Tribunall, and the diſpoſition of witneſſes: then taking with them the evidences of both parties, they are ſhut up together; and kept from meat, drinke, and fire, (unleſſe haply ſome one of them be in danger of death thereby) ſo long untill they be all agreed of the fact: which when they have pronounced before the Judge, hee, according to right and law giveth his definitive ſentence. For, this manner of triall our moſt ſage and wiſe Anceſtours have thought the beſt to finde out the truth, to avoid corruption, and cut off all partialitie and affections.

* A Jurie of twelve.

* As touching the fact.

Now, as touching martiall proweſſe, how much the Normans excelled therein, let others tell: this may ſuffice for me to have ſaid thus much, that being planted among moſt warlike nations, they alwaies ſaved themſeves, not by obſequious baſeneſſe, but by force of armes, and founded moſt noble Kingdomes in England, and Sicilie. For Tancrede, nephew unto Richard the ſecond of that name, Duke of Normandie, and his poſteritie, atchieved brave exploits in Italie, and having compelled the Sarazens to flie out of Sicilie, erected a Kingdome there. Whereupon the Sicilian Hiſtoriographer doth freely acknowledge, that the Sicilians are beholden unto the Normans, for that themſelves remaine ſtill in their native ſoile, live in freedome, and continue Chriſtians. Likewiſe in the holy Land their martiall proweſſe hath been ſeen with ſingular commendation. Hence it is alſo, that Roger Hoveden writeth in theſe termes; Bold France having made triall once of the Normans warfare, durſt not peepe out: Fierce England being conquered, yielded as captive unto them: Rich Apulia falling to the lot of their poſſeßion flouriſhed a freſh: Famous Ieruſalem, and renowned Antioch were both ſubdued by them. And ever ſince their comming, England as well for martiall honour as civill behaviour, hath among the moſt flouriſhing Kingdomes of Chriſtendome flouriſhed with the beſt. In ſo much, as Engliſhmen were picked forth to guard the perſon of the Emperours of Conſtantinople. For, John the ſon of Alexius Comenus, (as our writer of Malmesburie reporteth) having their fidelitie in great eſteeme, applied himſelfe eſpecially to their familiaritie, commending their love unto his ſon after him: and a long time ſince, they were the Yeomen of the ſaid Emperours guard, called by Nicetes Choniata, Inglini Bipenniferi, that is, Engliſh Halberdiers or Bill men, and by Curopalata, Barangi. Theſe attended upon the Emperour in every place, carrying Polaxes or Halberds upon their ſhoulders: which they tooke up, and held upright whenſoever the Emperour ſhewed himſelfe from out his Cloſet, and knocking then their Halberds one againſt another to make a clattering noiſe, they in the Engliſh tongue, prated for his long life.

Chalcondilas. As for that blot wherewith Chalcondilas hath beſmutted our nation, for having wives in common, the truth it ſelfe waſheth it cleane away, and repreſſeth the overlaſhing vanitie of the Grecian. For, as ſaith that moſt learned man, and my ſingular good friend Ortelius in this very matter, thoſe things be not alwaies true, which by every one are given out of all whatſoever. Well, theſe are the nations that ſeated themſelves in Britaine, whereof remaine the Britans, Saxons, or Engliſh men, and Normans intermingled with them: the Scots alſo in the North: whereupon came the two Kingdomes in this Iſland, to wit, England and Scotland, long time divided, but moſt happily now in the moſt mightie Prince King Iames, under one Imperiall Diademe conjoyned and united.

In Pembroke ſhire. Touching the Flemings, which flocked hither foure hundred yeares ſince, and by permiſſion of the Kings, received a place in Wales to inhabit, it is not requiſite to ſpeake of them now, elſewhere I will treat of that matter. But let us conclude this argument with Seneca. By theſe, it is manifeſt that nothing hath continued in the ſame place, wherein it had the firſt beginning. There is a daily ſtirring and mooving to and fro of mankind: ſome change or other there is every day in ſo great a revolution of this world. New foundations of Cities are laid: New names of nations ſpring up, whereas the old are either growne out of uſe, or altered by the comming in of a mightier.

Of conſolation to Albina. And conſidering that all theſe nations which have broken into Britaine, were Northern as all the reſt, which about the ſame time over-ranne all Europe, and afterwards Aſia; moſt truely from the authoritie of holy Scripture, wrote Nicephorus, Like as terrors oftentimes are ſent from heaven by God upon men, as lightning, fire, and tempeſtuous ſhowers; oftentimes from the earth, as open gapings of the ground, and Earthquakes; often from the aire, as whirlewinds and extraordinarie ſtormes: ſo, theſe terrours of the Northerne and Hyperborean parts, God keepeth by him in ſtore, to ſend them forth for ſome puniſhment, when, and among whom, it pleaſeth him in his divine providence.

Nicephorus.

THE DIVISION OF BRITAINE.

How countries are divided. NOw let us addreſſe our ſelves to the Diviſion of Britaine. Countries are divided by Geographers, either Naturally, according to the courſe of rivers, and interpoſe of mountaines: or Nationally, according as the people inhabite them: or Diverſly and Civilly, according to the wils and juriſdiction of Princes. But foraſmuch as wee ſhall treat here and there throughout the whole worke, of the firſt and ſecond kinds, that third (which is civill and politike) ſeemeth properly pertinent to this place. Which yet is overcaſt with ſo darke a miſt, through the iniquitie of former times, that much eaſier it is in this caſe to confute what is falſe, than to find out the truth.

Our Hiſtoriographers will needs have that diviſion of Britaine to be moſt ancient, whereby they divide it into Loegria, Cambria, and Albania, that is, to ſpeake more plainely, into England, Wales, and Scotland. But I would think this diviſion to be of a newer and later edition, both becauſe it is threefold; for it ſeemeth to have riſen of thoſe

A thoſe three ſorts of people, Engliſh, Welch, and Scotiſh, which laſt of all parted the Iſland among themſelves: and alſo for that ſuch a partition is no where extant in approved Authors before our Geffery of Monmouth. For, the fable, (as the Criticks of our age doe thinke) could not hang well together, unleſſe he the ſaid Geffrey had deviſed three ſonnes of Brutus, to wit, Locrine, Camber, and Albanact, becauſe ſo many Nations flouriſhed heere when he lived. Neither make they doubt, but hee would have found out more children of Brutus, if there had beene more nations diſtinct at the ſame time in Britaine.

The moſt ancient diviſion of Britaine in the opinion of many learned men is that,
B which is found in Ptolomee, in the ſecond booke of * Mathematicall Conſtruction, where he threatneth the Parallels: namely, into Britaine the GREAT, and the LESSE. But by their leave, as great learned men as they be, they themſelves ſhal ſee, if it pleaſe them to examine throughly and exactly in that place, the proportion of diſtance from the Aequator, and compare the ſame with his Geographicall Deſcriptions, that hee calleth this our Iſland there, Britaine the GREAT, and Ireland, Britaine the LESSE. Howbeit ſome of our later writers named the hither part of this Iſland toward the South, GREAT, and that farther part Northward, the LESSE: the Inhabitants whereof in times paſt, were diſtinguiſhed into MAIATAE, and CALEDONII, that is to ſay, into the habitation of the Champian, or Plaines, and the Mountainers: as now, the Scots are divided into Hechtlandmen, and Lawlandmen. But for as much
C as the Romans cared not for that farther tract, becauſe (as Appian ſaith, it could not be profitable for them nor fruitfull; having ſet downe their bounds not farre from Edenburgh, at the firſt they made this hither part reduced already into a Province, two-fold, to wit, the LOVVER, and the HIGHER, as it is gathered out of Dio. For, the hither or neerer part of England, together with Wales, he termeth the HIGHER, the farther and Northen part the LOVVER. Which thing the very ſeats, and abiding places of the Legions in Dio do prove. The ſecond Legion Auguſta, which kept at Caerleon in Wales, and the twentieth ſurnamed Victrix, which remained at Cheſter or Deva, he placeth in the Higher Britaine: but the Sixth Legion Victrix, that was reſident
D at Yorke, ſerved, as he writeth, in the Lower Britaine. This diviſion I would ſuppoſe, was made by the Emperour Severus, becauſe Herodian reporteth, that hee after hee had vanquiſhed Albinus Generall of the Britiſh forces, who had uſurped the Empire, and therewith reformed, and ſet in order the State of Britain, divided the government of the Province in two parts, betweene two Prefects, or Governours.

Britan Great and Small.

Britaine the Higher, and the Lower.

After this, the Romans did ſet out the Province of Britaine into three parts, as is to be ſeen out of a manuſcript of Sextus Rufus: namely, into MAXIMA CAESARIENSIS, BRITANNIA PRIMA, and BRITANNIA SECVNDA. Which, I take it, I have found out by the Biſhops, and their ancient Dioceſſes. Lucius the Pope, in Gratian, inſinuateth thus much, that the Eccleſiaſticall Iuriſdictions of the Chriſti-
E ans, followed the Iuriſdictions of the Roman Magiſtrates, and that Archbiſhops had their Seas in thoſe cities, wherein the Romane Preſidents in times paſt made their abode. The Cities and places (ſaith he) in which Primats ought to ſit and rule, were appointed not by the Moderne, but long before the comming of Chriſt: to the Primats of which Cities &c. the Gentils alſo appealed in matters of greater importance. And in thoſe verie cities after Chriſts comming, the Apoſtles and their Succeſſors placed Patriarks, or Primats, unto whom the affaires of the Biſhops, and greater cauſes ought to be preferred. Whereas therefore, Britaine had in old time three Archbiſhops, to wit, of London, of Yorke, and Caerleon in Southwales, I ſuppoſe, that the Province which now we call of Canterburie, (for thither the Sea of London was tranſlated) made BRITANNIA PRIMA: Wales un-
F der the * Citie of Caer Leon, was BRITANNIA SECVNDA: and the Province of York, which then reached unto the Limit or Borders, made MAXIMAA CAESARIENSIS.

Tripartite Britaine.

Diſt. 80. cap. 1.

* Cheſter.

In the age next enſuing, when the forme of the Roman Empire was daily changing, either through ambition, that more men might attaine to places of honour, or the warie forecaſt of the Emperours, that the power of their Preſidents which grew over great might be taken downe and abridged, they divided Britaine into five parts,

to Britaine in five parts.

to wit, BRITANNIA PRIMA, SECVNDA, MAXIMA CAESARIENSIS, VALENTIA & FLAVIA CAESARIENSIS. VALENTIA ſeemeth to have been the northerly part of Maxima Cæſarienſis, which being uſurped and held by the Picts and Scots, Theodoſius Generall under Valens the Emperour recovered out their hands, and in honour of him named it Valentia, which Marcellinus ſheweth more plainly in theſe words: Lib. 28. The Province now recovered, which was fallen into the enemies hands, he reſtored to the former ſtate, in ſuch ſort, as by his own procuring it had both a lawful governor, & was alſo afterwards called, VALENTIA, at the pleaſure of the Prince. Now that the ſon of this Theodoſius, (who being created Emperour was named Flavius Theodoſius, and altered very many things in the Empire) added Flavia, we may very wel conjecture, for that before the time of this Flavius wee read no where of BRITANNIA FLAVIA. Wherefore to make up this matter in few words, All the ſouth coaſt which of one ſide lieth between the Britiſh ſea, and the river Thames with the Severn ſea on the other ſide, was called BRITANNIA PRIMA. BRITANNIA SECVNDA, was that which now is Wales. FLAVIA CAESARIENSIS, reacheth from Thames to Humber. MAXIMA CAESARIENSIS, from Humber to the river of Tine, or the wall of Severus. VALENTIA from Tine to the wall or rampier neere Edenburgh, which the Scots call Grameſdike, and was the utmoſt limit of the Roman Empire in this Iſland, when this laſt diviſion was in uſe.

And now I cannot chuſe but note ſome want of judgement in certaine men, who otherwiſe being very learned, doe reckon Scotland in this account, which ſome of them make to have beene Maxima Cæſarienſis, and others, Britannia Secunda: As if (forſooth) the Romans neglected not that part of the Iſland, lying under a cold climate, and reckoned here thoſe Provinces onely, which they governed by Conſular Lieutenants, and Preſidents: for Maxima Cæſarienſis, and Valentia were ruled by Conſular Lieutenants; Britannia Prima, Secunda, and Flavia, by Preſidents.

Now if any man would have me render a reaſon of this my diviſion, and accuſe me as a falſe bounderer and ſurveior, let him heare in briefe, what hath induced mee to this opinion. Having obſerved thus much, that the Romans alwaies called thoſe Provinces PRIMAS, which lay nigheſt to Rome: as Germania Prima, Belgica Prima, Lugdunenſis Prima, Aquitania Prima, Panninia Prima; all which lay neerer to Rome, than thoſe that were named, Secundæ: and that theſe Primæ, were by the finer ſort of writers, termed Superiores, or higher: the Secundæ, Inferiores, or Lower: I reſolved, that the South-part of our Iſland, and neerer to Rome, was Britannia Prima. By the ſame reaſon ſeeing the Provinces Secundæ (as they call them) were more remote from Rome, I ſuppoſed Wales was the Britannia Secunda. Moreover, having noted this alſo, that in the decaying State of their Empire, thoſe Provinces onely had Conſular Magiſtrates, which lay againſt the enemies, not onely in Gaule, but alſo in Africke, as appeareth in the booke of Notices: alſo, that in the ſaid Booke, Valentia with us, and Maxima Cæſarienſis be accounted Conſular Provinces; I have judged them being next and expoſed to the Scots and Picts, to lie in thoſe places which I have ſpoken of. I can doe no other but gueſſe, that Flavia Cæſarienſis here, was in the midſt betweene them all, and in the very heart of England: and ſo much the more confidently, becauſe that ancient writer Giraldus Cambrenſis, is juſt of the ſame opinion with me. And thus much of the Diviſions of Britaine under the Romans.

Afterwards, when the Barbarians made invaſion on every ſide, and civill war daily increaſed among the Britans, the Iſland, as bereft of all life and vigour, lay for a time languiſhing and forlorne, without any ſhew at all of government. But at length that part which inclineth to the North became two Kingdomes, to wit, of the Scots and the Picts, and the Romans Pentarchie, or five portions, in this hither part became in proceſſe of time the Heptarchie, or ſeven Kingdomes, of the Saxons. For, they divided the whole Province of the Romans, (ſetting Wales aſide, which the remnant of Britans poſſeſſed) into ſeven Kingdomes, that is to ſay, Kent, Southſex, Eaſt-England, Weſtſex, Northumberland, Eaſtſex, and Mercia.

The Saxons Heptarchie or ſeven Kingdomes.

But what this Heptarchie of the Engliſh-Saxons was, and what their names were in thoſe daies, in this chorographical table here adjoyned you may (if you pleaſe) behold.

Although ſome of theſe names may at the firſt ſight be diſcovered, yet others of them a man ſhall hardly picke out although hee ſtudie upon them: and they require one I profeſſe it, of much ſharper wit and quicker inſight than my ſelfe, to gueſſe what they ſhould meane.

Aelfred he is named in pieces of Coine. alſo Alured, in our Engliſh Chronicles.

Afterwards, when Aelfred was ſole Monarch, like as the Germans our anceſtors, as Tacitus witneſſeth, kept courts and miniſtred juſtice in every Territorie and town, and had a Hundred men out of the the Common people as companions and aſſiſtants to performe this function: even ſo, to uſe the words of Ingulphus of Crowland, He firſt divided England into Counties, for that the neighbour Inhabitants after the example, and under colour of the Danes committed outrages and robberies. Beſides, hee cauſed the Counties to be parted into Centuries, that is Hundreds, and Decimes, that is Tithings: and commanded withall that every Homeling or naturall Inhabitant ſhould bee in ſome one Hundred and Tithing. Hee divided alſo the governours of the Provinces, who before were called Vice-Domini, that is, Vice-Lords, into two offices, to wit, Iudges, now Iuſtices, and Vice-Comites, that is, Sheriffes, which ſtill retaine the ſame name. By whoſe care and induſtrie, peace ſo much flouriſhed within ſhort ſpace through the whole Province, that had a way-faring man let fall in the fields or common highwaies, a ſumme of money, how great ſoever it had beene, if he returned thither the next morning or a moneth after he might bee ſure to ſee it there ſafe and untouched. Which our Hiſtoriographer of Malmesburie will declare unto you more at large. By occaſion, ſaith he, and example of the Barbarians, that is, Danes, the proper and naturall Inhabitants alſo were very greedy of ſpoile, ſo that no man could paſſe to and fro in ſafety, without weapons for his defence. Aelfred therefore ordained Centuries, which they terme Hundreds, and Decimes, which they call Tithings, that every Engliſh man living under law, as a liege ſubject, ſhould bee within one Hundred and Tithing, or another. And if a man were accuſed of any tranſgreſſion, hee ſhould bring in ſtraightwaies ſome one out of the ſame Hundred and Tithing, that would bee bound for his appearance to anſwer the law; but he that could not find ſuch a ſurety, ſhould abide the ſeverity of the Lawes. But in caſe any man ſtanding thus accuſed, either before or after ſuretiſhip, fled, then all that Hundred and Tithing, incurred a mulct or fine to bee impoſed by the King. By this device he brought peace into the Country, ſo as along the common cauſies and highwaies where they croſſed one another, he commanded bracelets of gold to be hanged up,

Hundreds.

A to delude the greedineſſe of paſſengers, whiles there was no man that durſt take the away. But theſe Hundreds be in ſome places of the realme called Wapentaches: if you would know the reaſon therof, I wil tel you it out of the laws of Edward the Confeſſor. When a man received the government of a Wapentach, upon a certaine day appointed in the place where they were wont to aſſemble, all the elder ſort met together and expected him: and as hee alighted from his horſe, roſe up unto him and did him reverence. Then he, ſetting his ſpeare upright, received of them all, according to the cuſtome, a covenant of Aſſociation. For, as many as came, with their ſpeares touched his ſpeare, and thus they aſſured themſelves by touching of weapons, in peaceable manner. For, armes in Engliſh they call pæpun, & Tæccan B is as much as to confirme or eſtabliſh: as if this were a comfirmation of weapons: or, to ſpeak more ſignificantly and expreſly according to the Engliſh tongue, Wepentac, is the touching of weapons. For pepun ſoundeth as much, as armes, tac is touching. There were beſides, other governments and juriſdictions above Wepantaches which they called Þpihingaſ, for that this was the third part of a Province. And the rulers over thoſe were X termed Þpiningeperaſ. Before theſe officers were brought thoſe cauſes that could not be determined in the Wapentachs. And ſo, that which the Engliſhmen named a Hundred, theſe termed a Wapentach. And that which in Engliſh they called three or foure Hundreds, theſe named Þpihinge. Howbeit in ſome Provinces they called that Lep, which theſe terme Trihing: and that which could not be decided and ended in a Þpihinge, was brought into the Schyre.

C These Counties which you may properly and in Latine call, either Conventus or Pagos, we by a peculiar terme name Shires, of Scype a Saxon word, which ſignifieth, to part or divide: and at the firſt diviſion, were there in all but thirtie two. For, in the yeare after Chriſts nativitie 1016. whiles Etheldred raigned, the Chronicle of Malmesburie reporteth there was no more: For, thus writeth hee in the life of the ſaid Etheldred. The Danes at this time when there bee reckoned in England thirty two Shires, invaded 16. of them. And in thoſe daies, according to the varietie of lawes theſe counties or ſhires were divided. For the lawes of England were diſtinguiſhed into three ſorts: to wit, thoſe of the Weſt-Saxons which they called Weſt-Saxenlage: D thoſe of the Danes, named Denelage, and thoſe of the Mercians, termed Merchenlage. To the law of the Weſt-Saxons belonged nine counties, to wit, Kent, Suſſex, Suthrie, Berkſhire, Hantſhire or Southampton, Wiltſhire, Sommerſetſhire, Dorſetſhire, and Denſhire. To the Danes law appertained 15. Counties, namely, Yorkeſhire, Darbyſhire, Nottinghamſhire, Leiceſterſhire, Lincolnſhire, Northamptonſhire, Bedfordſhire, Buckinghamſhire, Hertfordſhire, Eſſex, Middleſex, Northfolk, Suffolk, Cambridgeſhire, Huntingdonſhire. The eight remaining, followed the law of the Mercians: there were, Gloceſterſhire, Worceſterſhire, Herefordſhire, Warwickſhire, Oxenfordſhire, Cheſhire, Salop or Shropſhire, and Staffordſhire. But when William the Firſt made a ſurvey and taxed this Kingdome, there were reckoned, as wee reade E in Polychronicon, xxxvj. ſhires or counties: and yet the publike * record, in which he engroſſed and regiſtred this ſurvey and taxe, doe make mention of 34. onely. For, Durham, Lancaſhire, Northumberland, Weſtmorland, and Comberland were not compriſed in that number, becauſe theſe three laſt were then ſubject to the Scots, as ſome will have it, and thoſe other two were either free from paiments and taxes, or comprehended under Yorkſhire: but being afterwards added to the reſt they made up in all, the number of 39. ſhires, which we have at this day. Unto which are adjoyned ſince 13. more in Wales: whereof ſixe were in the time of Edward the Firſt, the reſt Henry the Eighth ordained by Parliamentarie authoritie.

Wales divided into Shires.

In theſe Shires there is appointed in troubleſome times by the Prince, a Prefect or F Deputie under the King, whom they call a Lieutenant, to ſee that the Commonweale ſuſtaine no hurt. The firſt Inſtitution of this Lieutenant, as it may ſeeme, is to be fetched from King Aelfred, who appointed in every Countie certaine Cuſtodes or Keepers of the Kingdome: whom Henry the Third afterward did ſet up and reſtore againe, naming them Capitaines. For hee in the fiftieth yeare of his raigne, *Held a Parliament as Iohn * of London writeth, wherein this wholeſome ordinance was enacted, that* that in every Countie there ſhould be made at the Kings charge, one Captaine, who with the helpe of the Sheriffe ſhould reſtraine the cruel and outragious robbers & theeves from ſtealth and rapine. Many therefore being frighted with this terrour gaue ouer, and ſo the Kings power began to breath againe and reuiue. With good forecaſt this was done verily by this Prince: but whether Canutus the Dane did more wiſely, who in his Monarchie erected a Tetrarchie, let our Politicians and Statiſts diſpute. For he, (Hermandus the Archdeacon is mine Author) being a prudent Prince, and watchfull euery way, diuiding the care of his Kingdome into foure parts, ordained Tetrarchs, ſuch as hee had found to bee moſt faithfull and truſty. The charge of the greateſt portion, to wit, Weſtſex, hee tooke vpon himſelfe; of Mircha, which was the ſecond portion, he committed to one Edrich; the third, vſually called Northumbre, to Yrtus; and to Turkil Earle of Eaſt-Englan, the fourth; which flowed in plenty and abundance of all wealth.* For this inſtruction I am beholden to the diligence of Francis Thinn, a man, who with exceeding great commendation hath trauelled very much in this Studie of Antiquities.

He flouriſhed in the yeare, 1070.

* Mercia.

Now euery yeare, ſome one of the Gentlemen Inhabitants, is made ruler of the countrie wherein he dwelleth, whom we call in Latin Vicecomitem, as one would ſay, the Deputie of the Comes or Earle, and in our tongue Sheriffe, that is, the Reeue of the ſhire, who alſo may well be termed the Treaſurer of the Shire or Prouince. For, it is his dutie, to gather the common monies and profits of the Prince in his Countie, to collect and bring into the Exchequer all fines impoſed, even by diſtreining: to be attendant vpon the Judges, and to execute their commandements: to aſſemble and empanell the twelue men which in cauſes do enquire of the fact, and make relation therof and giue in their verdict to the Judges (for Judges with us ſit vpon the right onely of a cauſe and not vpon the fact) to ſee condemned perſons executed, and to examine and determine certaine ſmaller actions. Moreouer, there bee ordained in euerie Shire, and that by the inſtitution of Edward the Third, certaine Juſtices of peace, who examine Murders, Felonies, and Treſpaſſes, as they cal them, yea and many other delinquences. Furthermore, the King ſendeth yearely into euery Shire of England two Juſtices, to giue Judgement of priſoners, and that I may vſe the Lawyers terme, to deliuer the Goale. As touching Eccleſiaſticall juriſdiction, when the Biſhops of Rome had aſſigned ſeuerall Churches to ſeuerall Prieſts, and laid pariſhes vnto them, Honorius Archbiſhop of Canterburie, about the yeare of our Redemption 636. began firſt to diuide England into pariſhes, as wee reade in the Hiſtorie of Canterburie. But now hath England two prouinces, and accordingly two Archbiſhops: to wit, the Archbiſhop of Canterburie Primate and Metropolitan of all England, and the Archbiſhop of Yorke. Vnder theſe are twenty fiue Biſhops: to the Archbiſhop of Canterburie are ſubiect twentie two, to the Archbiſhop of Yorke, the other three. Now what Biſhoprickes theſe be, with the ſhires and Dioceſſes that are at this day vnder their juriſdiction, that godly, and right reuerend father Matthew Parker, [late] Archbiſhop of Canterburie, a man very ſtudious and skilfull in antiquitie, and a worthy Patron of good learning, ſheweth in theſe his owne words.

Then, the Biſhoprick of Lincolnſhire, which of all other is the greateſt, is bounded with Lincolnſhire, Leiceſterſhire, Huntingdonſhire, Bedfordſhire, Buckinghamſhire, and the other part of Hertfordſhire. To the Biſhoprick of Ely pertaine Cambridgeſhire, and the Iſle it ſelfe of Elie. Vnder the Biſhopricke of Norwich is Norfolke and Suffolke. The Biſhopricke of Oxenford hath under it Oxenfordſhire. The Biſhopricke of Peterborough compriſeth Northamptonſhire and Rutlandſhire. Under the Biſhopricke of Briſtoll, is Dorſetſhire. Vnto which
B eighteene Dioceſſes in England, are to be added thoſe of Wales, which are both bereft of their owne peculiar Archbiſhopricke, and made alſo fewer in number; ſeven being brought ſcarce to foure: to wit, the Biſhopricke of Meneva, having the ſeat at Saint Davids, the Biſhopricke of Landaffe; the Biſhopricke of Bangor, and the Biſhopricke of Saint Aſſaph.

IN THE PROVINCE OF YORKE.

C THe Biſhopricke of Yorke comprehendeth Yorkeſhire it ſelfe, and Nottinghamſhire. The Biſhopricke of Cheſter containeth, Cheſhire, Richmondſhire, Lancaſhire, part of Cumberland, of Flintſhire, and of Denbiſhire. The Biſhopricke of Durham, hath Durham it ſelfe under it, and Northumberland. The Biſhopricke of Carleil containeth within it part of Cumberland, and the Country of Weſtmerland. To theſe you may adde, the Biſhopricke of Sodor, in the Iſle of Mona, which commonly is called Man. Among theſe, the Archbiſhop of Canterburie hath the firſt place: the Archbiſhop of Yorke the ſecond: the Biſhop of London the third: the Biſhop of Durham the fourth: the Biſhop of Wincheſter the fifth: the reſt as they are conſecrated or enſtalled firſt, ſo in prioritie they take the place. Howbeit, D if any of the other Biſhops happen to be Secretary to the King, hee challengeth by his right the the fift place. Beſides, there are in England Deaneries xxvj. whereof thirteene were ordained by Henrie the Eighth in the greater Cathedrall Churches after the Monks were thruſt out. Archdeaconries three skore: Dignities and Prebends five hundred fortie foure.

Numbred alſo there are pariſh-churches under Biſhops, 9284: of which 3845, be Appropriat, as I find in a Catalogue exhibited unto King Iames, which here I have put downe underneath. Now, Appropriat Churches thoſe are called, which by the Popes authority comming betweene, with conſent of the King and the Biſhop of the Dioceſſe were upon certaine conditions tied, or as the forme runneth, of our Law, united,
E annexed, and incorporate for ever, unto Monaſteries, Biſhopricks, Colledges and Hoſpitals, endowed with ſmall lands, either for that the ſaid Churches were built with in their Lordſhips and lands, or granted by the Lords of the ſaid lands. Which Churches afterwards when the Abbaies and Monaſteries were ſuppreſſed, became Laye Fees, to the great dammage of the Church.

Howbeit, in the booke of Thomas Wolſey Cardinall, digeſted and written in the

A The yeere 1520. by Counties are reckoned, 9407. Churches. How this varietie ſhould come, I cannot ſay, unleſſe that in the former age ſome Churches were pulled downe, and the Chappels which belong unto Pariſhes be omitted, and others that are but bare Chappels, counted in the number of Pariſh-churches. Yet, out of this booke of Wolſey, have I put downe the number of Pariſh-churches to every Shire.

There were alſo, in the reigne of Henrie the Eight (I hope without offence I may ſpeake the truth) many religious places, Monuments of our fore-fathers pietie and devotion, to the honor of God, the propagation of Chriſtian faith and good learning, and alſo for the reliefe and maintenance of the poore and impotent, to wit, Monaſteries or Monaſteries or Abbaies.
B Abbaies, and Priories, to the number of 645: of which when by permiſſion of Pope Clement the ſeventh, fortie were ſuppreſſed by Cardinall Wolſeies meanes, who then had begun to found two Colledges, one at Oxenford, the other at Ipſwich: ſtraight waies, about the xxxvj. yeere of the reigne of the ſaid Henrie the Eight, a ſudden floud (as it were) breaking thorow the banks with a maine ſtreame, fell upon the Eccleſiaſticall State of England; which whiles the world ſtood amazed, and England groned thereat, bare downe and utterly overthrew the greateſt part of the Clergie, together with their moſt goodly and beautifull houſes. For, that leave which the Pope granted to the Cardinall; the King with aſſent of the Parliament tooke to himſelfe. Where-
C upon, in the yeere of our Lord, 1536. all religious houſes every one, together with all their livings and revenewes, as many I meane as might diſpend by yeerely rent 200. pound or under, (and thoſe amounted to the number of 376) were granted to the King. And in the yeere next following, under a faire pretence and ſhew of rooting out ſuperſtition, all the reſt, together with Colledges, Chanteries and Hoſpitals were left to the diſpoſe and pleaſure of the King. At which time, the religious houſes remaining, in number 605. were ſurveied, valued or taxed. Colledges there were, beſides thoſe in the Vniverſities, 90. Hoſpitals 110. Chanteries and free Chappels 2374. All which for the moſt part, ſhortly after were every where pulled downe, their revenues ſold and made away, & thoſe goods & riches which the Chriſtian pietie of the Engliſh na-
D tion had conſecrated unto God, ſince they firſt profeſſed Chriſtianity were in a moment as it were diſperſed, and (to the diſpleaſure of no man be it ſpoken) prophaned.

THE STATES AND DEGREES of England.

E AS touching the diviſion of our Common-wealth, it conſiſteth, of a King or Monarch, Noblemen or Gentry, Citizens, Free-borne, whom we call, Yeomen, and Artiſans or Handicraftſmen.

The King

THE KING, whom our anceſtors [the Engliſh-Saxons] called Coning and Gyning, (in which name is implied a ſignification both of power and skill) and wee name contractly, King, hath ſoveraigne power and abſolute command among us, neither holdeth he his Empire in vaſſalage, nor receiveth his inveſture or enſtalling of another, ne yet acknowledgeth any ſuperiour but God alone: and as one ſaid, All verily are under him, and himſelfe under none, but God onely: Alſo, he hath very many rights of Majeſtie peculiar to himſelfe, (the learned Lawyers terme them, Sacra ſacrorum, that is Sacred, and Individua; that is, inſeparable, becauſe they cannot be ſevered: and the common ſort Royall prerogatives) which they terme, The flowers of his Crowne, in which reſpect they affirme that the regall materiall Crowne is adorned with flowers. Some of theſe, Bracton lib. 1. cap. 8.
F are by poſitive or written law; others, by right of cuſtome, which by a ſilent conſent of all men without law, preſcription of time hath allowed, the King juſtly enjoieth: and moſt deſervedly; conſidering that His watchfull care defendeth the ſtate of all, his painfull labour maintaineth the reſt of all, his ſtudious induſtry upholdeth the delights of all, and his buſie employment affordeth eaſe to all. But theſe are points of a loftier diſcourſe, and not of the argument now in hand. Seneca.

The Prince.

The ſecond or next to the King, is his firſt begotten ſonne: who, like as among the Romans, the heire apparant, and aſſigned ſucceſſour to the Empire, was firſt entituled, Princeps Iuventutis, that is, Prince of the youth; and afterwards (as flatterie did increaſe) ſtiled by the name of Cæſar, * Noble Cæſar, and the * moſt Noble: ſo, with our Anceſtors the Engliſh-Saxons, hee was named in their tongue, Aetheling, that is, Noble, and in Latine Clito, of the Greeke word, κλυτὸς, that is, Glorious or Excellent (ſee how that age affected the Greeke Language.) And hereupon, of that Eadgar, the laſt heire male of the Engliſh bloud royall, this old ſaid ſaw is yet rife in every mans mouth, Eadgar, Ædeling, England ofgeaþling. And in the ancient latine Patents and Charters of the Kings wee read often times, Ego E. vel Ae. Clyto, Regis filius: But this addition Clyto, I have obſerved to be given even to all the Kings ſonnes. After the Norman conqueſt, no certaine or ſpeciall title of honour was aſſigned unto him, nor any other to my knowledge, than ſingly thus, The Kings ſonne, and, The firſt begotten of the King of England, untill that Edward the firſt ſummoned unto the high Court of Parliament his ſonne Edward, by the name of Prince of Wales, and Earle of Cheſter; unto whom he granted afterwards, the Dukedome alſo of Aquitain: like as the ſame Prince, being now King Edward the Second, called unto the Parliament his young ſonne Edward, not full ten yeeres old, by the title of Earle of Cheſter, and of Flint. But the ſaid Edward, having now attained to the Crowne, and being Edward the Third, created Edward his ſonne, a moſt valiant and renowned man of warre, Duke of Cornwall. Since which time, the Kings firſt begotten ſonne, is reputed * Duke of Cornewall at the houre of his birth. And ſoone after, he adorned the ſame ſonne by ſolemne inveſture and creation, with the title of Prince of Wales. And gave the Principality of Wales in theſe words, To be held of him and his heires Kings of England. And as the declared or elect Succeſſours of the Roman Empire, (as I ſaid even now) were named Cæſares, of the Greekiſh Empire, * Deſpotæ; of the Kingdome of France, Dolphins, and of Spaine, Infants: ſo from thence forward, the Heires apparant of the Kingdome of England, were entituled, Princes of Wales. And this title continued unto the daies of Henrie the Eight, when Wales was fully united to the Kingdome of England.

* Nobilis Cæſar.
* Cæſar Nobiliſſimus.
* Dux Cornubiæ natus.
* Lords.

But now, whereas the Kingdomes of Britaine formerly divided, are by the happy good luck, and rightfull title of the moſt mighty Prince, King Iames growen into one; his Eldeſt ſonne Henrie, the Lovely Ioy and Dearling of Britaine, is ſtiled, PRINCE OF GREAT BRITAINE: who, as he is borne thus to the greateſt hopes, ſo all Britaine from one end to the other, prayeth unceſſantly from the very heart, that God would vouchſafe to bleſſe him with the greateſt vertues, and continuance of honour, that hee may by many degrees, and that moſt happily exceede our hope, ſurpaſſe the noble Acts of his Progenitours, yea, and outlive their yeeres. As for our Nobilitie, or Gentry, it is divided into Superiour, and Inferiour. The Superiour or chiefe Noblemen we call, Dukes, Marqueſſes, Earles, and Barons: which have received theſe titles from the Kings of this Realme for their Vertue and Proweſſe.

A Duke.

DVKE, is the chiefe title of honour among us next after PRINCE. This was a name at firſt of charge and office, and not of dignitie. About the time of Aelius Verus the Emperour, thoſe who governed the Limits and Borders, were firſt named Duces, and this degree in the daies of Conſtantine was inferiour to that of Comites. After the Romane government was heere in this Iland aboliſhed, this title alſo remained as a name of office: and thoſe among us, who in old Charters, during the Saxons time, are ſo many of them called Duces, were named in the Engliſh tongue onely Ealdermen: and the verie ſame, that were named Duces, they called alſo, * Comites. As for example, that William the Conquerour of England, whom moſt call Duke of Normandie, William of Malmsburie, termeth Comes, or Earle of Normandie. But, as well Duke as Earle, were names of charge and office, as appeareth by this Briefe or Inſtrument of creating a Duke or Earle, out of Marculphus an ancient Writer. In this point eſpecially is a Princes regall Clemencie fully commended, that thorowout the whole people there bee ſought out honeſt and vigilant perſons; neither is it meete to commit hand over head, unto every man a judiciarie Dignity, unleſſe his faithfulneſſe and and valour ſeeme to have beene tried before: ſeeing then therefore, we ſuppoſe that we have had good proofe of your truſtie and profitable ſervice unto us, wee have committed unto you the government of that Earledome, Dukedome, Senatourſhip, or Elderſhip in that Shire or Province, which your Predeceſſor untill this time ſeemed to have exerciſed, for to manage and rule the ſame accordingly. Provided alwaies, that you evermore keepe your faith untouched and untainted toward our Royall governance, and that all people there abiding may live, and be ruled under your regiment and governance, and that you order and direct them in the right courſe, according to law, and their owne cuſtomes: That you ſhew your ſelfe a Protector to widowes, and Guardian to Orphans: that the wickedneſſe of theeves and malefactors be moſt ſeverely by you puniſhed: that the people living well under your regiment, may with joy continue in peace quietly: and whatſoever by this very execution is looked for to ariſe, in profit due to the Exchequer bee brought yeerely by your ſelfe into our Coffers, and Treaſurie.

This title of Duke, began to be a title of honour under Otho the Great, about the yeere 970. For hee, to bind more ſtreitly, and neerer unto him, martiall and politike men, endowed them with Regalities and Roialties, as hee termed them. And theſe Roialties were either Dignities, or Lands in fee. Dignities were theſe, Dukes, Marqueſſes, Earles, Capitaines, Valvaſors, Valvaſines. Later it was ere it came to bee an Hereditarie title in France: and not before the time of Philip the third King of France, who granted, that from thence forth, they ſhould bee called, Dukes of Britaine, who before time were indifferently ſtiled, both Dukes and Earles. But in England, in the time of the Normans, ſeeing the Norman Kings themſelves were Dukes of Normandie, for a great while they adorned none with this honour: nor before that Edward the Third created Edward his ſonne, Duke of Cornwall, by a wreath upon his head, a ring on his finger, and a ſilver verge or rod: like as the Dukes of Normandie were in times paſt created by a Sword, and Banner delivered unto them: afterwards, by girding the Sword of the Dutchie, and a circlet of gold, garniſhed with little golden Roſes in the top. And the ſame King Edward the Third, created in a Parliament his two ſonnes, Lionel Duke of Clarence, and Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, by the girding of a Sword, and ſetting upon their heads a furred chapean, or cap, with a circlet or Coronet of gold, pearle, and a Charter delivered unto them. From which time there have beene many hereditary Dukes among us, created one after another, with theſe or ſuch like words in their Charter or Patent: We give and grant the Name, Title, State, Stile, Place, Seat, Prehemineence, Honour, Authoritie, and Dignitie of a Duke, to N. and by the cincture of a Sword, and impoſition of a Cap and Coronet of gold upon his head, as alſo by delivering unto him a verge of gold, we doe really inveſt.

Afterward a golden rod or verger was uſed.

A MARQVESSE, that is, if you conſider the very nature of the word, a Governour of the Marches, hath the next place of honour, after a Duke. This Title came to us but of late daies, and was not beſtowed upon any one, before the time of King Richard the Second: For, hee made his minion Robert Vere, who was highly in his favour, Marqueſſe of Dublin: and then it began with us to be a title of honour. For before time thoſe that governed the Marches, were commonly called, Lord Marchers, and not Marqueſſes (as now we terme them. Henceforth they were created by the King, by cincture of the Sword, and the impoſition of the Cap of honor and dignitie, with the Coronet, as alſo by delivery of a Charter or writing. Neither will I think it much to relate here, that which is found recorded in the * Parliament Rols. When Iohn de Beaufort, from beeing Earle of Sommerſet, was by Richard the Second created Marqueſſe Dorſet, and afterwards by Henrie the Fourth, deprived of that title; what time as the Commons of England made humble ſuit in Parliament to the King, that hee would reſtore unto him the title of Marqueſſe which he had loſt: he oppoſed himſelfe againſt that petition, and openly ſaid, That it was a new dignitie, and altogether unknowne to his Anceſtours; and therefore hee neither craved it, nor in any wiſe would accept of it.

Marqueſſes.

* An. 4. Henrie. 4.

Earles, called in Latine, Comites, are ranged in the third place, and may ſeeme to have come unto us from our Anceſtours the Germans: For, they in times paſt, as Cornelius Tacitus writeth, had their Comites, Who ſhould alwaies give attendance upon their Princes, and bee at hand in matters of counſell and authoritie. But others thinke, that they they came from the Romans to us, as alſo to the Franks, or French. For, the Emperours, when as the Empire was growne now to the full ſtrength, began to have about them a certaine privie Counſell, which was called Cæſaris Comitatus: and then thoſe whoſe counſell they uſed in warre and peace, were termed Comites: whence it is that in ancient Inſcriptions, wee find oftentimes COMITI IMPP. And in few yeares the name of Comes, grew ſo rife, that it was given to all Officers and Magiſtrates that obſerved or gave attendance upon the ſaid ſacred or privie Counſel, or that came out of it: and from hence afterward the name extended to all thoſe which were the Provoſts or Over-ſeers of any matters of ſtate. And Suidas defineth Comes, to be The ruler of the people, as Cuiacius hath taught us: who alſo teacheth us, that before Conſtantine the Great, the name of Comes was not in uſe, to ſignifie any honour. But he, when he altered the forme of the Roman Empire by new diſtinctions, and endevored to oblige many unto him with his benefits, and them to advance unto honour, ordained firſt the title of Comes without any function or government at all, to be a title of dignitie: and this Comes had a certaine power and priviledge, for to accompanie the Prince, not only when hee went abroad, but in his palace alſo, in his privie chamber, and ſecret roomes, to have libertie likewiſe to be preſent at his Table, and private ſpeeches. And hereupon it is, that wee read thus in Epiphanius, ὁ καὶ παρ' αὐτῷ τῷ βασιλεῖ ἀξιώματος κομήτου τυχών, that is, Who ſo obtained of the King, the Dignitie of Comites. At length, to them which were beholden unto him for this honourable preferment, hee granted other dignities with charge: and againe, upon thoſe that were in place of Magiſtracie, and executed any office of State, either at home or abroad, he beſtowed that title of honour, Comes Domeſticorum, L. Great Maſter of the Houſhold; Comes ſacrarum largitionum, L. High Treaſurer; Comes ſacræ veſtis, Maſter of the Wardrobe; Comes Stabuli, Maſter of the Horſe; Comes Theſauri, Treaſurer; Comes Orientis, Lieutenant of the Eaſt; Comes Britanniæ, Comes Africæ, &c. Herehence it came, that ever ſince the name of Comes, imported Dignitie, and authoritie, or government, at the firſt temporarie, afterward for terme of life. Moreover, in proceſſe of time, when the Empire of the Romans became rent into many kingdomes, this title yet was retained: and our Engliſh-Saxons, called them in Latine, Comites, and Conſules, whom in their owne language, they named Ealdormen, and the very ſame the Danes termed in their tongue, Eorlas, that is, Honourable, as Ethelward writeth, by which name ſomewhat mollified, they are called of us at this day, Earles. And verily for a long time, they were knowne by this name ſimply: at length, with addition alſo of the place over which they were put in authoritie. Neither as yet deſcended this honour to the next heire by inheritance. Where, by the way thus much I note, that the firſt hereditarie Earles in France, were the Earles of Britaine. But when William of Normandy had made conqueſt of this Land, and ſeated himſelfe in the abſolute government of this Kingdome, Earles began to bee Feudall, Hereditarie, and Patrimoniall, that is, By fee, or Tenure by ſervice, by inheritance, and by Lands, who alſo, as it appeareth in * Doomeſday-booke, were ſimply without any addition at all, named Earles, as Comes Hugo, Comes Alanus, Comes Rogerus; Earle Hugh, Earle Alan, Earle Roger, &c. Afterwards, as wee may ſee in ancient Charters, Earles were created with the name of a place joyned unto them, and the third pennie of the Shire was aſſigned unto them. As for example, Mawd the Empreſſe, daughter and heire to K. Henry the Firſt, created an Earle in theſe words, as appeareth in the very Charter which I have: I Mawd, daughter of K. Henry, and Ladie of the Engliſhmen, doe give and grant unto Geffrey de Magnavil for his ſervice, & to his heires after him by right of inheritance to be Earle of Eſſex, & to have the third pennie out of the Sheriffs Court, iſſuing out of all pleas, as an Earle ſhould have through his Countie in all things. And this is the moſt ancient Charter that hitherto I have ſeen, of an Earles creation. Likewiſe Henry the Second, King of England her ſonne, created an Earle by theſe words: Know yee, that wee have made Hugh Bigod, Earle of Norfolk, to wit, of the third pennie of Norwic, and Norfolc, as freely as any Earle of England holdeth his Countie. Which words, an old booke of Battaile Abbey expoundeth thus: An uſuall and ancient cuſtome it was throughout all

* or Maundevil.

A all England, that the Earles ſhould have the third pennie to themſelves of the Provinces, A whereof they tooke the name, and were called Earles. Semblably, another booke without name, more plainly: The Shire or Countie hath the name of the Earle or Count, or elſe contrariwiſe, the Count of the Countie. And Count or Earle he is, becauſe he receiveth the third part of thoſe things, that accrew or ariſe, by plea in every Countie or Shire: But all Earles reape not theſe fruits, but thoſe to whom the King hath granted them by right of inheritance, or in their owne perſons. And hereupon Polydore Virgil writeth truly, and according to the manner of our age. It is a cuſtome in England, ſaith he, that the titles of Earldomes be given at the Princes pleaſure, even without poſſeſſion of thoſe places, from whence the very titles are taken. And therefore the King is wont to give unto them, that poſ- B ſeſſe nothing in that Countie, ſome certaine penſion or ſumme of money out of his owne revenues, in liew of the poſſeſſion.

Earles were created in old time without any complement or ceremonie at all, but onely by delivering unto them a Charter. Vnder Stephen who uſurped the kingdome, during the heat of civill war, many alſo tooke upon them the titles of Earles, whom the Hiſtorie of Waverlew Church, and others of that age calleth Pſeudo-Comites, that is, counterfeit Earles, and Comites imaginarios, that is, Earles in conceit, whiles it reporteth unto us, that Henrie the Second depoſed them. And King Iohn, was the firſt by my obſervation, that uſed in creating of them, the cincture of a ſword. For Roger of Hoveden writeth thus: King Iohn upon the day of his Coronation girded Wil- C *liam Mareſchall with the ſword of the Earldome of * Strigulia, and Geffrey Fitz-Peter with the ſword of the Earldome of Eſſex: who albeit they had beene called Earles before and governed their Shires, yet were they not girt with the ſword of an Earldome: and upon that day they waited at the Kings table, wearing thoſe ſwords by their ſides.* In the age next enſuing, there came up the impoſition of a chaplet cap, with a Circlet of gold, that now is turned into a coronet with raies or points onely, and with a robe of eſtate. Which three, to wit, a ſword with a girdle, a cap or chaplet with a coronet, and a mantle or robe of eſtate, are by three ſeverall Earles borne before him, that is to be created Earle: and betwixt two Earles arraied alſo in their robes of eſtate, brought he is in his Surcoat unto the King ſitting in his throne, where kneeling downe D while the Patent or Charter of his creation is a reading: at theſe words, This ſame T. we erect, create, conſtitute, make, appoint, and ordaine Earle of S. and we give and grant unto him the name, title, ſtate, ſtile, honour, authority, and dignitie of the Earle S. and into it by the cincture of a ſword really doe inveſt: Then is the robe or mantell of eſtate done upon him by the King: the ſword hung about his neck, the cap with the Coronet put upon his head, and the ſaid Charter of his creation being read before, delivered into his hand. But theſe matters are beſide my purpoſe. Now, whereas it is growen to bee a cuſtome, that he which is to be created Earle, if he were not a Baron before, ſhould be made a Baron firſt; it is a new ceremonie come up of late daies, and put in uſe, ſince the time E of King Henrie the Eight. But among Earles, moſt honorable are they by many degrees, which are called Counts Palatine: For, as this terme Palatine was a name common to all them that had offices in the Kings palace; ſo Count Palatine was a title of dignity conferred upon him that before had beene an Officer Palatine, with a certaine roiall authority to ſit in judgment within his owne Territorie. As for the Earle Marſhall of England: King Richard the ſecond gave that title firſt to Thomas Mowbray Earle of Nottingham, whereas before they were ſimply ſtiled Marſhals of England and after the baniſhment of Mowbray, he granted to T. Holland Duke of Surrey ſubſtituted Earle Marſhall in his place, that he ſhould carrie a rodde of gold enamelled blacke at both ends, when as before they uſed one of wood.

F After Earles, next follow in order VICECOMITES, whom we call Vicounts: An old name this is of an office, but a new title of dignitie, not heard of with us before Henry the Sixth daies, who conferred that title upon I. Lord Beaumont. In the ranke of the ſuperior or chiefe Nobility, BARONES have the next place. And although I am not ignorant, what the learned doe write of this words ſignification in Tullie, yet willingly will I accord to the opinion of Iſidore and of an old Grammarian, who will have have Barones to ſignifie, hired ſouldiers. For, that place in Hirtius ſo well knowne, touching the warre of Alexandria, ſeemeth cleerely to prove the ſame: and this it is. They came running together to defend Caſsius; for, hee was wont alwaies to have about him Barones, and a great many choſen ſouldiers weaponed, from which the reſt are ſevered apart. Neither diſſenteth from this, the old Gloſſarie with Latin before Greeke, which interpreteth Baro, by ἀνὴρ that is, a man. And throughout the laws of the Longobards, Baro is uſed for Vir, that is, a man. And for the Etymologies of this word which ſome have forged, I like thē not. The French Heralts deduce Barones from the French tongue, as one would ſay, Par-hommes, that is, men of equall dignitie: our Engliſh Lawyers would have them to be as much, as Robora belli, that is, the ſtrength of war. Some Germans ſay they import, as it were, Banner heires, that is, Lord-bearing Banners. Iſidorus ſaith, they are ſo termed, as a man ſhould ſay, βαρεῖς that is, grave or weighty. Alciatus deriveth them of Berones, an ancient people in Spaine, who were, as he ſaith, in times paſt, waged ſouldiers. But that derivation out of the German tongue is the better, wherin Bar betokeneth Free, and him that is his owne man, and at libertie. When this name firſt came into this Iſland I know not for certaine. The Britaines doe not acknowledge it for theirs. In the Engliſh Saxon Lawes it is no where to bee ſeene; nor found in the Saxon Gloſſarie of Alfricus among the Vocables or termes of honour; where, Dominus is tranſlated Laford, which wee have contracted ſhort into Lord. The Danes called their Free-Lords, ſuch as theſe Barons be at this day, Thani, and ſo they terme them ſtill, as Andreas Velleius witneſſeth. Howbeit, in Burgundie the uſe of the name hath beene of great antiquitie: For, Gregorie Turonenſis writeth thus, The Barons of Burgundie as well Biſhops as other Leudes, &c. In a fragment of the laws of Canutus King of Engliſh-men and Danes, was the firſt mention made of a Baron with us, ſo far as ever I could hitherto obſerve: and yet therein, according to the variety of copies we read indifferently theſe termes, Vironis, Baronis, and Thani. But that a Baron is meant therby, evident it is out of the Lawes of William the Conquerour, into which thoſe ordinances of Canutus are in the Normans tongue tranſlated under the name of Baro: and loe what the very words are: Exercitualia verò, &c. That is, Let the Heriots or Relevies be ſo moderate, as that they may bee tolerable. Of an Earle, as decent it is, eight horſes, foure with ſaddles, and foure without ſaddles: foure Helmets, and foure ſhirts of male: eight launces or ſpeares, and as many ſhields, foure ſwords, and withall 200. mauces of gold. Of a Viron or Baron to the King, who is next unto him, foure horſes, two with ſaddles, and two without ſaddles, two ſwords, foure ſpeares and as many targets, one helmet, and one coate of mauile, and with fifty mauces of gold.

Alſo in the firſt time of the Normans, Valvaſores and Thani were ranged in degree of honour, next after Earles and Barons: and the Valvaſores of the better ſort, if wee may beleeve thoſe that write de Feudis, were the very ſame that now Barons are. So that the name [Baro] may ſeeme to bee one of thoſe, which time, by little and little hath mollified and made of better eſteeme. Neither was it as yet a terme of great honor. For, in thoſe daies ſome Earles had their Barons under them: and I remember that I read in the ancient Conſtitutions and ordinances of the Frenchmen, how there were under an Earle, twelve Barons, and as many Capitaines under a Baron. And certaine it is, that there be ancient Charters extant, in which Earles, ſince the comming in of the Normans wrote thus, To all my Barons as well French as Engliſh, Greeting, &c. Yea even Citizens of better note were called Barons. For, the Citizens of Warwick, in Doomeſday book, were named Barones: likewiſe, Citizens of London; and the Inhabitants of the Cinque-ports enjoyed the ſame name. But, ſome few yeares after, like as at Rome in times paſt, they choſe Senators for their worth in wealth: ſo were they with us counted Barons, who held lands of their own by a whole Baronie: that is, 13. Knights Fees, and a third part of one Knights Fee: reckoning every fee, as an old book witneſſeth, at 20. li. which make in all 400. marks. For, that was the value of one entire Baronie: and they that had lands and revenues to this worth, were wont to be ſummoned unto the Parliament. And it ſeemed to bee a dignitie with a juriſdiction: which the Court Barons, as they terme them, in ſome ſort doe prove: yea

Court-Barons.

A yea and the very multitude that was of theſe Barons perſwaded me, to thinke them to be Lords of this nature, as that they might in ſome ſort miniſter and execute juſtice within their circuit and ſeigniorie, ſuch as the Germans call Free-heires, and eſpecially, if they had Caſtles of their owne. For then, they jumped Juſt with the definition of that moſt famous Civilian Baldus, who defineth him to be a Baron, whoſoever had a meere and ſubordinate rule in ſome caſtle, by the grant of the Prince. And all they, as ſome would have it, that held Baronies, ſeeme to have claimed unto themſelves this honor: ſo that, as divers learned in our lawes are of opinion, a Baron and a Baronie, a Count or Earle and a Countie, a Duke and a Dutchie, were Conjugata: that is, termes
B as one would ſay, yoked together. Certes, in thoſe daies, Henrie the Third reckoned in England 150. Baronies. And hereupon it is, that in all the Charters and Hiſtories of that age, all noble men in manner be called Barons: and verily that title then was right honorable, and under the terme of Baronage, all the ſuperiour ſtates of the kingdome, as Dukes, Marqueſſes, Earles and Barons, in ſome ſort were compriſed. But it attained to the higheſt pitch of honor, ever ſince that King Henrie the Third, out of
C ſo great a number, which was ſeditious and turbulent, called the very beſt, by writ or ſummon, unto the high Court of Parliament. For he (out of a writer I ſpeake of good antiquity) after many troubles and enormous vexations, betweene the King himſelfe, & Simon of Mont-fort with other Barons raiſed, & after appeaſed, did decree and ordaine, that all thoſe Earles and Barons of the Realme of England, unto whom the King himſelfe vouchſafed to direct his writs of Summons, ſhould come unto his Parliament, and none others. But that which he began a little before his death, Edward the Firſt and his ſucceſſour, conſtantly obſerved, and continued. Hereupon, they onely were accounted Barons of the kingdom, whom the Kings had cited by vertue of ſuch writs of Summons, as they terme them, unto the Parliament. And it is noted, that the ſaid prudent King Edward the Firſt, ſummoned alwaies thoſe of ancient families that were moſt wiſe to his Parliaments, but omitted their ſonnes after their death, if they were not anſwerable to their parents in underſtanding. Barons were not created by Patent untill ſuch time as King Richard the Second created Iohn Beauchamp de Holt Baron of Kiderminſter
D by his letters Patent, bearing date the eighth day of October, in the eleventh yeare, of his raigne. Since that time, the Kings by their Pattents, and the putting on of the mantle or roabe of honour, have given this honour. And at this day, this order of creating a Baron by letters Patent, as alſo that other by writs of Summons, are in uſe: in which notwithſtanding they are not ſtiled by the name of Baron, but of Chevalier; for the Common law doth not acknowledge Baron to be a name of dignity. And they that be in this wiſe created, are called Barons of the Parliament, Barons of the Realme, and Barons of honor, for difference of them, who yet according to that old forme of Barons, be commonly called Barons, as thoſe of Burford, of Walton; and thoſe who were Barons unto the Count-Palatines of Cheſter and Pembroch, who were Barons in fee
E and by tenure.

Theſe our Parliamentarie Barons carie not the bare name onely, as thoſe of France and Germanie, but be all borne Peeres of the Realme of England, Nobles, Great States and Counſellors: and called they are by the King in theſe words, To treat of the high affaires of the kingdome, and thereof to give their counſell. They have alſo immunities and priviledges of their owne, namely that in criminall cauſes they are not to have their triall but by a Iurie of their Peeres: that they be not put to their oath, but their proteſtation upon their Honor is ſufficient: that they be not empanelled upon a Iurie of twelve men for enqueſt de facto. No ſupplicavit can be granted againſt them. A Capias cannot be ſued out againſt them: Neither doth an Eſſoine lie againſt them: with very F many other, which I leave unto Lawyers, who are to handle theſe and ſuch like. Beſides theſe, the two Archbiſhops, and all the Biſhops of England, be Barons alſo of the kingdome, and Parliament: even as in our Grandfathers daies, theſe Abbats and Priors following:

Vnto whom, as ſtill unto the Biſhops, By right and cuſtome it appurtained, as to Peeres of the Kingdome, to be with the reſt of the Peeres perſonally preſent at all parliaments whatſoever, there to conſult, to handle, to ordaine, decree, and determine, in regard of the Baronies which they held of the King. For, William the firſt, (a thing that the Churchmen of that time complained of, but thoſe in the age enſuing counted their greateſt honor) ordained Biſhopricks and Abbaies, which held Baronies in pure and perpetuall Almes, and untill that time were free from all ſecular ſervice, to bee under military or Knights ſervice, enrolling every Biſhopricke and Abbay at his will and pleaſure, and appointing how many ſouldiers he would have every of them to find for him and his ſucceſſours, in the time of hoſtility and warre. From that time ever ſince thoſe Eccleſiaſticall perſons enjoyed all the immunities that the Barons of the Kingdome did, ſave onely that they were not to be judged by their Peeres. For conſidering that according to the Canons of the Church, ſuch might not be preſent in matters of life and death: in the ſame cauſes they are left unto a jurie of twelve men to be judged, in the queſtion of Fact. But whether this be a cleere point in law or no, I referre me to skilfull Lawyers.

Vavaſors.

Vavaſors or Valvaſors in old time, ſtood in the next ranke after Barons: whom the Lawyers derive from Valva, that is, leaved doores. And this dignitie ſeemeth to have come unto us from the French: For when they had ſoveraigne rule in Italy, they called thoſe Valvaſores who of a Duke, Marqueſſe, Earle or Captaine, had received the charge over ſome part of their people: and as Butelere the civill Lawyer ſaith, had power to chaſtiſe in the higheſt degree, but not the Libertie of faires and mercates. This was a rare dignity among us, and if ever there were ſuch long ſince by little and little, it ceaſed and ended. For, in Chaucers time it was not great, ſeeing that of his Franklin a good yeoman or Freeholder, he writeth but thus:

Signius.

A Sheriffe had he beene and a Contour,
Was no where ſuch a worthy Vavaſour.

Nobles of an inferiour ranke.

Inferiour nobles are Knights, Eſquires, and thoſe which uſually are called Generoſi and Gentlemen.

Knights.

Knights, who of our Engliſh Lawyers be termed alſo in Latin Milites, and in all nations well neere beſides, tooke their name of Horſes: for the Italians call them Cavellieri, the Frenchmen, Chevaliers, the Germans Reiters, and our Britans in Wales Margogh, all of riding. Engliſhmen onely terme them Knights, by a word that in the old Engliſh language, as alſo of the German, ſignifieth indifferently a ſervitor or miniſter, and a luſty young man. Heereupon it commeth, that in the Old written Goſpels tranſlated into the Engliſh tongue, wee read, for Chriſts Diſciples, Chriſts Learning Cnyhts, and elſe where for a Client or Vaſſall, Incnyght: and Bracton our ancient civill Lawyer

A Lawyer maketh mention of Radcnights, that is to ſay, ſerving horſemen: who held their
A lands with this condition, that they ſhould ſerve their Lords on horsbacke: and ſo by cutting off a peece of the name, as our delight is to ſpeake ſhort, I thought long ſince, that this name of Knights remained with us. But whence it came, that our countreymen ſhould in penning of lawes, and in all writings ſince the Normans conqueſt terme thoſe Knights in Latin, Milites, I can hardly ſee. And yet I am not ignorant, that in the declining time of the Roman Empire, the Denomination of Milites, that is, Souldiers, was transferred unto thoſe that converſing neere about the Princes perſon bare any of the greater offices in the Princes Court or traine. But if I have any ſight
B at all in this matter, they were among us at firſt ſo called, who held any lands or inheritances, as Tenants in Fee, by this tenure, to ſerve in the warres, For thoſe Lands were termed Knights Fees: and thoſe that elſewhere they named Feudatarij, that is, Tenants in Fee, were here called Milites, that is, Knights: as for example, Milites Regis &c. The Kings Knights, Knights of the Archbiſhop of Canterburie, Knights of Earle Roger of Earle Hugh &c. For that they received thoſe lands or manors of them with this condition to ſerve for them in the wars, and to yeeld them fealty and homage: whereas others who ſerved for pay were ſimply called Solidarij and Servientes, that is, Souldiers and Servitors. But theſe, call them Milites or Equites, whether you will, are with us of foure diſtinct ſorts: The moſt honorable and of greateſt dignitie be thoſe of the Order of S. George, or of the Garter: In a ſecond degree are Banerets: in a third ranke,
C Knights of the Bath: and in a fourth place, thoſe who ſimply in our tongue, be called Knights, in Latin Equites aurati, or Milites, without any condition at all. Of S. Georges Knights, I will write in due place, when I am come to Windſor. Of the reſt thus much briefly at this time.

Solidarij.

Banerets, whom others terme untruely Baronets, have their name of a Banner: For, granted it was unto them in regard of their martiall vertue and proweſſe, to uſe a foure ſquare enſigne or Banner, as well as Barons: whereupon ſome call them and that truly Equites Vexillarij, that is, Knights-Banerets, and the Germans, Bannerheires. The antiquitie of theſe Knights Banerets, I cannot fetch from before the time
D of King Edward the Third, when Engliſhmen were renowned for Chivalrie: ſo that I would beleeve verily, that this honorable title was deviſed then firſt, in recompence of martiall proweſſe, untill time ſhall bring more certainty of truth to light. In the publicke records of that time, mention is made among military titles, of Banerets, of * Men at the Banner, (which may ſeeme all one) and of Men at armes. And I have ſeene a Charter of King Edward the Third, by which he advanced Iohn Coupland to the State of a Baneret, becauſe in a battell fought at Durham hee had taken priſoner David the Second, King of the Scots; and it runneth in theſe words: Being willing to reward the ſaid Iohn, who tooke David de Bruis priſoner, and frankly delivered him unto us; for the deſerts of his honeſt and valiant ſervice, in ſuch ſort as others may take example by E this preſident to doe us faithfull ſervice in time to come; we have promoted the ſaid Iohn to the place and degree of a Baneret: and for the maintenance of the ſame ſtate, we have granted for us and our heires to the ſame Iohn, five hundred pounde by the yeere, to bee received for him and his heires, &c. Worth the remembrance it is, to ſet downe heere out of Froiſſard the very maner and forme, whereby Iohn Chandos a brave & noble warrior in his time was made a Baneret. What time as Edward Prince of Wales, ſaith he, was to fight a field in the behalfe of Peter King of Caſtile againſt Henry the Baſtard and the Frenchmen, Iohn Chandos came unto the Prince and delivered into his hands his own Banner folded and rolled up, with theſe words: My Lord, this is my Banner, may it pleaſe you to unfold and diſplay it, that I may advance it into the field this day. For,
F I have by Gods favour revenewes ſufficient thereunto. The Prince then, and Peter King of Caſtile who ſtood hard by, tooke the Banner into their hands, unfolding the ſame, delivered it again unto him with theſe or ſuch like words: Sir Iohn, in the name of God, who bleſſe this dayes ſervice of yours, that it may ſpeed well and turne to your glorie, Beare your ſelfe manfully, and give proofe what a Knight you are. Having thus received the Banner, to his companies he went with a cheerefull heart: My fellow low ſouldiers, quoth he, Behold there is my Banner and yours, in caſe yee defend it courageouſly as your owne. Of later time, he that is to be advanced unto this dignity, either before the battell, that hee may bee encouraged; or after the battell ended, that hee may receive due honor for his valour, bearing an enſigne of a long faſhion, ſuch as they call a Pennon wherein his owne armes are depainted in their colours, is brought betweene two elderly Knights, with trumpeters and Heralds going before, into the preſence of the King, or his Regent and Lieutenant generall: who after good words and wiſhes imparting happie fortune, commandeth the tip or point of the ſaid pennon to bee cut off, that of a long pennon it might bee made a foure ſquare banner.

Knights of the Bathe.

Concerning Knights of the Bath, in all my readings hitherto, I could find no greater Antiquitie thereof, than this, that they were in uſe among the ancient French: and that Henrie the Fourth King of England, that day whereon hee was crowned in the Tower of London, dubbed 46. Eſquiers Knights, who the night before had watched and bathed: unto every one of whom, hee gave greene ſide coats reaching downe to their ankles, with ſtreit ſleeves, and furred with minivere: alſo, they they wore upon their left ſhoulder two cordons of white ſilke with taſſels thereto hanging downe. Theſe in former times were wont to be created, and ſelected out of the flower of Nobilitie (which had not before taken the degree of Knighthood) at the coronation of Kings and Queenes, and at their marriages: ſometimes alſo, when their ſonnes were inveſted Princes of Wales, or Dukes, or when they ſolemnly received the cincture or militarie girdle of Knighthood, and that with many ceremonies, which now for the moſt part are grown out of uſe. But in our daies, they that are called by the King to enter into this order (neither will I handle this argument exquiſitly) the day before they are created, being clad in an Eremits gray weed, with a hood, a linnen coife, and booted withall, come devoutly to divine ſervice, to begin their warfare there, as if they would employ their ſervice for God eſpecially: they ſuppe all together: and upon every one of them, there wait two Eſquiers, and one Page: After ſupper, they retire themſelves into their bed-chamber, where for each of them is prepared a prettie bed, with red curtains, and their owne armes faſtened thereupon, with a bathing veſſell ſtanding cloſe by, covered with linnen clothes, wherein after they have ſaid their praiers, and commended themſelves to God, they bathe themſelves, that thereby they might bee put in mind, to be pure in bodie and ſoule from thenceforth. The next morrow, early in the morning awakened they are, and raiſed with a noyſe of Muſicall Inſtruments, and doe on the ſame apparell. Then the high Conſtable of England, the Earle Marſhall, and others whom the King appointeth, come unto them, call them forth in order: and tender an oath unto them, namely, that they ſhall ſerve and worſhip God above all, defend the Church, honour the King, maintaine his rights, protect widowes, virgins, orphans, and to their power repell and put by all wrong. When they have ſworne thus to doe, by laying their hand upon the Goſpels, they are brought with ſtate to morning prayer, the kings Muſitians and Heralds going before, and by them likewiſe, they are conducted backe to their bed-chambers: where after they have deveſted themſelves from their Eremites weed, they put on a mantle of martiall redde Taffata, implying they ſhould bee Martiall men, and a white Hat with a white plume of feathers over their linnen coife, in token of ſincerity; and tie a paire of white gloves to the pendant cordon of their mantle. This done, they mount upon Steedes, dight with ſadle and furniture of blacke leather, with white intermingled, and having a croſſe in the frontlet. Before every one of them rideth his owne Page, carrying a ſword with a gilded hilt, at which there hang gilt ſpurres, and of either hand of them ride their Eſquiers. With this pompe, and trumptes ſounding before them, to the Kings Court they goe, where when they are brought by two ancient Eſquiers to the Kings preſence, the Page delivereth the Girdle and Sword hanging thereto, unto the Lord Chamberlaine, and he with great reverence unto the King, who therewith girdeth the Knight overthwart, and commandeth therewith two elder Knights to put on the Spurres, who in times paſt were wont with with good wiſhes, and praiers to kiſſe his knees that was to bee Knighted. And theſe new Knights thus created, uſed in old time to bring up the ſervice of meates to the Kings Table: after this, they dine altogether, ſitting to one ſide of the boord, every one under the Eſcutcheon of his owne Armes faſtened over his head. At evening praier they repaire to the chapel, offer their ſwords upon the high altar, and by laying downe a piece of money redeeme the ſame againe. Now, as they returne from divine ſervice, the Kings Maſter-Cooke ſheweth them his knife, and admoniſheth them to performe the part of good and faithfull Knights, otherwiſe he would to their ſhame and reproch, cut off thoſe Spurres of theirs. Upon the Coronation day, in that ſolemne pompe, they accompanie the King keeping their places, with their Swords girt to them, and their ſpurres on, in Joviall blew mantles, as a man would ſay, in the colour of juſt Jupiter, as a fore-token of juſtice, having the knot of white ſilke made in forme of a croſſe, with an hood upon their left ſhoulder. But of theſe complements (which my purpoſe was not to proſecute in particular) this may bee thought ſufficient, if not ſuperfluous.

Knights.

Now as touching thoſe Knights, who ſimply without any addition bee called, Knights, and howſoever they are in order ranged laſt, yet by inſtitution they be firſt, and of greateſt Antiquitie. For, as the Romans, a gowned nation, gave unto them that were entring into mans eſtate, a virile and plaine gowne, without welt or gard: even ſo, the Germans our Anceſtors beſtowed upon their young men, whom they judged meet for to manage armes, armour, and weapons. Which Cornelius Tacitus will informe you of, in theſe words of his: The manner was not for any one to take armes in hand, before the State allowed him as ſufficient for Martiall ſervice. And then, in the very aſſembly of Counſell, either ſome one of the Princes, or the father of the young man, or one of his kinsfolke furniſh him with a ſhield and a javelin. This with them ſtandeth in ſtead of a virile gowne, this is the firſt honour done to youth: before this they ſeeme to bee but part of a private houſe, but now within a while members of the Commonweale. De moribus Germanorum.

And ſeeing that ſuch military young men, they termed in their language (as we in ours) Knechts, from them I deeme, the originall both of name and inſtitution alſo, ought to be fetched. This was the firſt, and moſt ſimple manner of creating a Knight, this the Lombards, this the Frankes, this our countrymen, all deſcended out of Germanie in old time uſed. Paulus Diaconus reporteth thus; among the Lombards, This is the Cuſtome, that the Kings ſonne dineth not with his father, unleſſe hee receive Armes before from ſome King of a forraine nation. The Annals of France record, that the Kings of the Franks, gave armes unto their ſonnes, and to others, and girded them with a ſword: yea, and our Aelfred, as William of Malmesburie witneſſeth, when he dubbed Athelſtan his nephew, Knight, being a child of great hope, gave him a ſcarlet mantle, a belt or girdle ſet with precious ſtones, and a Saxon-ſword with a golden ſcabberd. Afterwards, when as religion had poſſeſſed mens minds ſo, as that they thought nothing well & fortunately done, but what came from Church-men, our Anceſtors a little before the Normans comming received the Sword at their hands. And this, Ingulphus who lived in thoſe daies, ſheweth in theſe words; He that was to be cõſecrated unto lawfull warfare, ſhould the evening before, with a contrite heart, make confeſſion of his ſinnes unto the Biſhop, Abbat, Monke, or Prieſt, and being abſolved, give himſelfe to prayer, and lodge all night in the Church, and when hee was to heare divine ſervice the morrow after, offer his ſword upon the Altar: and after the Goſpel, the Prieſt was to put the ſword firſt hallowed upon the Knights neck, with his Benediction, and ſo when hee had heard Maſſe againe, and received the Sacrament, he became a lawfull Knight. Neither grew this cuſtome out of uſe ſtreight waies under the Normans: For, John of Sariſburie writeth in his Polycraticon, thus; A ſolemne Cuſtome was taken up and uſed, that the very day when any one was to be honoured with the girdle of knighthood, hee ſhould ſolemnly goe to Church, and by laying and offering his Sword upon the Altar, vow himſelfe (as it were) by making a ſolemne profeſſion, to the ſervice of the Altar, that is to ſay, promiſe perpetuall ſervice, and obſequious dutie unto the Lord. Peter alſo of Blois, writeth thus:

Lib. 1. cap. 22.

Epiſt. 94. At this day young Knights, and ſouldiers receive their Swords from the Altar, that they might profeſſe themſelves Sonnes of the Church, and to have taken the Sword for defence of the poore, for puniſhment and revenge of malefactors, and delivery of their Country. But in proceſſe of time (ſaith he) it is turned cleane contrary. For, in theſe daies ſince they are become adorned with the Knights cincture, preſently they ariſe againſt the Annointed of the Lord, and rage upon the patrimonie of Chriſt crucified. And as for this ceremonie, that they would be girt with a Sword, it may ſeeme no doubt to have proceeded from the militarie diſcipline of the Romans; becauſe as they denied it unlawfull to fight with their enemie before they were bound to their militarie oath, by a drawn ſword: even ſo, our Forefathers thought they might not go to warfare lawfully, before they were by this ceremonie lawfully authoriſed: according to which wee reade, that William Rufus King of England, was dubbed Knight, by Lanfranke the Archbiſhop. But this cuſtome by little and little grew to diſuſe, ſince the time that the Normans, as Ingulphus writeth, laughed and ſcorned at it; and in a Synode at Weſtminſter, An. 1102. a Canon paſſed, That no Abbats ſhould dubbe Knights: which ſome notwithſtanding expound thus, That Abbats ſhould grant no lands of the Church to be held, by Knights ſervice, or in Knights fee, or ſervice.

Afterwards, Kings were wont to ſend their ſonnes unto the neighbour Princes to receive Knighthood at their hands: thus, was our K. Henrie the Second, ſent unto David King of the Scots, and Malcolme King of Scots unto our Henry the Second, and our Edward the firſt unto the King of Caſtile, to take of them Militarie or Virile armes: for, theſe termes and phraſes they uſed in that age for the creation of a Knight. Then it was alſo, that beſides the ſword and girdle, gilt ſpurres were added for more ornament; whereupon at this day, they are called in Latin, Equites aurati. Moreover, they had the priviledge to weare & uſe a ſignet: for before they were dubbed knights, (as I gather out of Abendon Booke) it was not lawfull to uſe a ſeale: Which writing (quoth he) *Richard Earle of Cheſter purpoſed to ſigne with the ſeale of his mother Ermentrud, conſidering that all Letters which he directed (for as yet he had not * taken the Militarie girdle) were made up and cloſed within his mothers ſignet.* In the age enſuing, knights (as it may be well collected) were made by their wealth, and ſtate of living: For, they which had a great knights Fee, that is, (if wee may beleeve old records) * 680. akers of land, claimed as their right, the ornaments and badges of knighthood: Nay rather under Henry the Third, they were compelled after a ſort to be knights, as many as in revenues of their lands might diſpend fifteen pounds by the yeare: ſo as now it ſeemed a title of burden, rather than of honour. In the yeare 1256. there went out an edict from the King, by vertue whereof, commandement was given, & proclamation made throughout the Realme, that whoſoever had fifteen pounds in land and above, ſhould be dight in his armes, and endowed with knighthood: to the end that England as well as Italie might be ſtrengthned with Chivalrie: and they that would not, or were not able to maintaine the honour of knighthood, ſhould fine for it, and pay a piece of money. Hence it is, that in the Kings Records, we meet ſo often with this: For reſpit of Knighthood, A. de N. I. H. &c. Alſo ſuch like preſentments from the Jurors, or ſworne Enqueſt, as this R. de S. Lawrence holdeth an entire and whole Fee, is at full age, and not yet Knight, therefore in Miſericordia, that is, To be fined at the Kings pleaſure. To this time and after, unleſſe I faile in mine obſervation, in the Briefes and Inſtruments our law when twelve men, or Jurers are named, before whom there paſſeth triall or proofe de facto, that is, of a fact, they bee called, Milites, that is, Knights, who have a compleat Fee, and thoſe Milites gladio cincti, that is, Knights with cincture of ſword, who by the King are girded with the belt of knighthood. At which time when the King was to create knights, as the ſaid Matthew Paris writeth, he ſat glorioufly in his ſeate of eſtate, arraied in cloth of gold of the moſt precious and coſtly Bawdkin, and crowned with his Crowne of gold, and to every Knight he allowed or gave 100 ſhillings, for his * harneſſements. And not only the King, but alſo Earles in thoſe daies created Knights. For the ſame author reporteth, How the Earle of Gloceſter inveſted with a militarie girdle his brother William, after he had proclaimed a Turneament. Simon likewiſe de Montefort Earle of Leiceſter,

* Beene dubbed Rnight.

* Others ſay 100.

* Compliements.

A Leiceſter, did the ſame by Gilbert de Clare: Like as in France, (a thing that evidently appeareth by the Patent or Inſtrument of * Nobilitation) he that hath obtained ſuch letters of * Ennobliſhment, is enabled to be dubbed Knight, and receive the girdle of knighthood at any Knights hand that he will himſelfe. But ſince that time, hath no man with us beene created Knight, but either by the King himſelfe, or the Kings eldeſt ſonne, warranted before by authoritie received from his father, or elſe by the Kings Lieutenant, or Deputie Generall in the Campe, and that in conſideration either of ſome valiant acts atchieved, or exploits to be performed abroad in armes: or elſe of wiſedome and policie at home. And verily a moſt prudent and wiſe order was this, that our
B Kings tooke, ſince they had not any Fees or Lands now to beſtow upon them. Neither was their (I aſſure you) any thing of more validitie, to give an edge unto the courage of hardy men, and to bind unto them their beſt ſubjects, and ſuch as had deſerved well, (being otherwiſe worſhipfully deſcended, and of honourable parentage, and withall ſufficient for eſtate and living) than kindly and lovingly to adorne them with this high eſteemed title of Knighthood, which was before time the name only of charge and function: when this right worſhipfull title was by the Prince conferred upon one, adviſedly and for deſert, it went (no doubt) for an ample reward, was prized as a benefit, and accounted among the tokens of honour. For, Knights in this manner dubbed, made this eſteeme thereof, that in it conſiſted the guerdon of C their vertue and valour, the praiſe of their houſe and family, the memoriall of their ſtocke and linage; and laſtly, the glory of their name. Inſomuch, as our Lawyers have in their bookes writen, That [Knight] was a name of dignitie, but ſo was not Baron. For in old time a Baron (if he were not of this order of Knighthood) was written ſimply by his Chriſtian, or fore-name, and the proper name of his family, without any addition, unleſſe it were of Dominus, a terme fitting Knights alſo. And this name of Knight may ſeeme to have beene an honourable additament to the higheſt dignitie, when Kings, Dukes, Marqueſſes, Earles, and Barons, requeſted to have the dignitie, and name together. Heere it likes me well to inſert, what Matthew Florilegus hath written concerning the creation of Knights in the time of Ed-
D ward the Firſt. The King (quoth he) for to augment and make a goodly ſhew of his expedition into Scotland, cauſed publike proclamation to be made throughout England, that whoſoever were to be Knights by hereditarie ſucceſſion, and had wherewith to maintaine that degree, ſhould preſent themſelves in Weſtminſter, at the feaſt of Whitſontide, there to receive every one, the ornaments of a Knight, (ſaving the equipage or furniture that belongeth to horſes) out of the Kings Wardrobe. When as therefore there flocked thither to the number of 300. young gallants, the Sons of Earles, Barons, and Knights, purple liveries, fine ſilke Scarfes, Roabes moſt richly embroidered with gold, were plentifully beſtowed among them, according as was befitting each one: And becauſe the Kings Palace, (large though it were) was ſtreited of roome, for ſo great a multitude aſſembled, they cut downe the apple trees a-
E bout the new Temple in London, laid the walles along, and there ſet up pavilions and tents, wherin theſe noble young gallants might array, and ſet out themſelves one by one in their gorgeous and golden garments. All the night long alſo, theſe foreſaid youths, as many as the place would receive watched and prayed in the ſaid Temple. But the Prince of Wales, by commandement from the King his father, held his wake, togither with the principall and goodlieſt men of this company within the Church of Weſtminſter. Now ſuch ſound was there of trumpets, ſo loud a noiſe of Minſtrelſie, ſo mightie an applauſe and cry of thoſe that for joy ſhouted, that the chaunting of the Covent could not be heard from one ſide of the Quire to the other. Well, the morrow after, the King dubbed his Sonne Knight, and gave him the Girdle of Knighthood in his owne palace, and therewith beſtowed upon him the Du-
F chie of Aquitaine. The Prince then, thus created Knight, went directly into Weſtminſter Church for to grace with the like glorious dignitie his feers and companions. But ſo great was the preaſe of people thronging before the High Altar, that two Knights were thronged to death, and very many of them fainted, and were readie to ſwowne, yea, although every one of them had three ſouldiers at leaſt to lead and protect him: The Prince himſelfe by reaſon of the multitude preaſing up to him, having divided the people by the meanes of ſteeds of ſervice, no otherwiſe than upon the high Altar girt his foreſaid companions with the order of knighthood. But in our daies, hee that receiveth the dignitie of a Knight, kneeleth downe, and then the * King with his ſword drawne, ſlightly ſmiteth him upon the ſhoulder, ſpeaking unto him theſe words withall, in French, Soïs Chevalier au nom de Dieu, that is, Be thou Knight in the name of God: and afterwards hee ſaith moreover, Avances Chevalier, that is, Ariſe Sir Knight. As for all things elſe appurtaining to this order, namely, what an excellent and glorious degree this of knighthood was eſteemed with our Anceſtours, how noble a reward to brave minded men, ſuch as deſired glorie and honour, it was reputed, how carefully they kept faith & troth, conſidering it was ſufficient, if they undertook or promiſed ought as faithfull Knights or upon the faith of a Knight, how far they were from baſe gaine and lucre, and what manner of paiment or Aid is to be levied for Knights fees, when as the Prince, the Kings eldeſt ſon ſhould be inveſted in this honour, &c. I leave it for others to write: as alſo, when they had ſo far offended, that being to ſuffer death therfore, they were firſt diſpoiled of their enſignes, and of their degree, to wit, their militarie Girdle ungirted, the Sword taken away, their Spurs cut off with an hatchet, their Gantlets or Gloves plucked from them, and the Eſcutcheon of their Armes reverſed: like as in the degrading * Eccleſiaſticall order, all the Eccleſiaſticall ornaments, booke, chalice, & ſuch like are taken away. Let the curious alſo enquire, whether thoſe knights were truly by ſome termed Knights Bachelars, or whether Bachelars were of a middle degree between theſe Knights and Eſquires? For, in the Kings Record are read, The names of Knights, of Bachelars, and of Valects of the Earle of Goceſter, and of others. Whereupon there be that would have Bachelars ſo called, as one would ſay, Baſ-Chevaliers, that is, knights of low degree: although other derive that name from the French verbe Battailer, which ſignifieth to combate or fight it out. Withall, let them weigh and conſider, whether theſe dignities of knighthood in times paſt ſo glorious, (as long as they were more rare, and beſtowed onely as the reward of vertue) may not be vilified, when it becommeth common, and lieth proſtitute (as it were) to the ambitious humour of every one. Whereof in the like caſe Æmilius Probus complained long ſince among the Romans.

Eſquires.

Next in degree after theſe Knights, are Eſquires, termed in Latine, Armigeri, that is, Coſtrels, or Bearers of Armes: the ſame that Scutiferi, that is, Shield-bearers, and Homines ad arma, that is, Men at Armes: the Goths called them Schilpor, all of carrying the ſhield: as in old time among the Romans, ſuch as were named Scutarii, who tooke that name either of their Eſcutcheons of armes, which they bare as Enſignes of their deſcent, or becauſe they were armour-bearers to Princes, or to the better ſort of the Nobilitie. For, in times paſt every Knight had two of theſe waighting upon him: they carried his Morrion and ſhield, as inſeparable companions, they ſtuck cloſe unto him, becauſe of the ſaid Knight their Lord they held certaine lands in Eſcutage, like as the knight himſelfe of the King by knights ſervice. But now a daies, there be five diſtinct ſorts of theſe: for thoſe whom I have ſpoken of already, be now no more in any requeſt. The principall Eſquires at this day thoſe are accounted, that are ſelect Eſquires for the Princes bodie: the next unto them be knights eldeſt ſonnes, and their eldeſt ſonnes likewiſe ſucceſſively. In a third place, are reputed younger ſonnes of the eldeſt ſonnes of Barons, and of other Nobles in higher eſtate: and when ſuch heires male faile, togither with them the title alſo faileth. In a fourth ranke are reckoned thoſe, unto whom the King himſelfe, together with a title, giveth armes, or createth Eſquires, by putting about their necke a ſilver colar of * SS. and (in former times) upon their heeles a paire of white ſpurres ſilvered: whereupon at this day in the Weſt part of the Kingdome, they be called White-ſpurres, for diſtinction from Knights who are wont to weare gilt ſpurres: and to the firſt begotten ſonnes onely of theſe doth the title belong. In the fifth and laſt place bee thoſe ranged, and taken for Eſquires, whoſoever have any ſuperiour publike office in the Commonweale, or ſerve the Prince in any Worſhipfull calling. But this name of Eſquire, which in ancient time was a name of charge and office onely, crept firſt among other titles of dignitie and worſhip, (ſo farre as ever I could obſerve,) in the raigne of Richard the Second.

Gentlemen, or the common ſort of Nobilitie bee they, that either are deſcended of worſhipfull parentage, or raiſed up from the baſe condition of people, for their vertue or wealth. Gentlemen.

Citizens or Burgeſſes, be ſuch as in their owne ſeverall citie execute any publike office, and by election have a roome in our High Court of Parliament. Citizens.

Yeomen, are they whom ſome call, Free-borne, or Free-holders, and our law termeth, Homines Legales, that is, Lawfull men, and who of Free-lands may diſpend fortie ſhillings at leaſt by the yeare. Yeomen.

Laſtly, Craftſmen, Artiſans, or Workemen, be they that labour for hire, and namely, ſuch as ſit at worke, Mechanicke Artificers, Smiths, Carpenters, &c. Which were termed of the Romans, Capite cenſi, as one would ſay, Taxed or reckoned by the poll, and Proletarii.

LAVV COVRTS OF ENGLAND.

AS touching the Tribunals, or Courts of Juſtice of England, there are three ſorts of them among us: for, ſome bee Eccleſiaſticall, others Temporall, and one mixt of both, which being the greateſt, and moſt honourable of all, is called by a name of no great antiquitie, and the ſame borrowed out of French, The Parliament. The Anglo-Saxons our anceſtours termed it, Witenage-mote, that is, An aſſembly of the wiſe, and ȝe-þæniſſ, that is, A Counſell, and Micilſynod, of the Greeke word Synodus, that is, A great Synod or meeting. The Latine writers of that, and the enſuing age called it, Commune Concilium, Curiam altiſſimam, Generale placitum, Curiam magnam, Magnatum Conventum, Præſentiam Regis, Prælatorum, Procerumq́, collectorum, Commune totius Regni Concilium, &c. That is, The Common councell, The Higheſt court, The Generall Plea, The Great court, The meeting of States, The Preſence of the King, Prelates and Peeres aſſembled together, The Publike Councell of the whole Kingdome, &c. And like as the Generall Councell of all Etolia is named by Livie Panaetolium, ſo this may well be termed Pananglium. For it conſiſteth of the King, the Clergie, the ſuperior Nobles, the elect Knights and Burgeſſes; or to ſpeake more ſignificantly after the Lawyers phraſe, of the King, the Lords Spirituall, and Temporall, and the Commons, which States repreſent the body of all England. It is not held at ſet and certaine times, but ſummoned by the King at his pleaſure, ſo often as conſultation is to be had of high affaires and urgent matters, that the Common weale may ſuſtaine no damage; at his will alone it is diſſolved. Now this Court hath ſoveraigne, and ſacred authoritie in making, confirming, repealing, and expounding Lawes, in reſtoring ſuch as be attainted or outlawed to their former eſtates, in deciding of the hardeſt controverſies betweene private perſons, and, to ſpeake at a word, in all cauſes which may concerne either the ſafetie of the State, or any private perſon whatſoever. Parliament.

The next Court after this, in the daies preſently following the Normans comming, and ſome good while after, was, The Court of the King himſelfe; and the ſame kept in the Kings houſe or Pallas, & accompanying the King whither ſo ever he retired or went in progreſſe. For, in the Kings Palace, a place there was for the Chancellor and clerks, ſuch as were imployed about writs or proceſſes, and the ſeale: for Judges alſo that handled as well Pleas (as they terme them) pertaining unto the Kings Crown, as between one Subject and another. There was alſo the Exchequer, wherein the Lord Treaſurer, Auditours, and Receivers ſat, who had the charge of the Kings revenues, treaſure, and coffers. Every of theſe being counted of the Kings houſhold in ordinary, had allowed them from the King, both diet, and apparell. Whereupon Gotzelinus in the life of S. Edward, calleth them, The Lawyers of the Palace, & John of Salisburie, The Court Lawyers. The Kings Court.

yers. But beſide theſe and above them all, was one appointed for adminiſtration of Juſtice, named, Iuſtitia Angliæ, The Iuſtice of England; Prima Iuſtitia, The principall Iuſtice; The Iuſticer of England, and chiefe Iuſticer of England, who, with a yearely penſion of a thouſand Marks, was ordained by a Commiſſion or Charter running in theſe termes; The King, to all Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbats, Priors, Earles, Barons, Sheriffes, Forreſters, and all other liege and faithfull people of England, greeting. Whereas for the preſervation of our ſelves, and the peace of our Kingdome, and for the miniſtring of Iuſtice, to all and every perſon of our Realme, we have ordained our beloved and truſtie Philip Baſſet, Chiefe Iuſticer of England, ſo long as it ſhall pleaſe us; wee charge you upon the faith and allegiance that yee owe unto us, and doe ſtraightly enjoyne you, that in all things which concerne the office of our foreſaid Iuſticeſhip, and the preſervation of our peace, and Kingdome, yee be fully attendant, and aſſiſtant unto him, ſo long as he ſhall continue in the ſaid Office. Witneſſe the King, &c.

But when as in the raigne of Henry the Third, enacted it was that the Common Pleas of the Subjects ſhould not follow the Kings Court, but be held in ſome certain place: within a while after, the Chancerie and the Court of the Pleas of the Crowne, together with the Exchequer, were tranſlated from the Kings Court, and eſtabliſhed in certaine places apart by themſelves: as ſome, I know not how truely, have reported.

Having premiſed by way of Preface thus much, I will proceede to write briefly ſomewhat of theſe Courts, and others that ariſe from them, according as they are kept at this day. And whereas ſome of them bee Courts of Law, to wit; the Kings Bench, The common Bench or Pleas, the Exchequer, the Aſſiſes, the Star-Chamber, the Court of Wards, and the Admirals Court: others of Equitie, namely; The Chauncerie, the Court of Requeſts, The Counſels in the Marches of Wales, and in the North parts; of every of theſe in due order, ſomewhat, as I have learned of others.

Kings Bench. The Kings Bench, ſo called becauſe the Kings were wont there to ſit as Preſidents in proper perſon, handleth the pleas of the Crowne, and many other matters which pertaine to the King, and the Weale publique: and withall it ſifteth and examineth the errors of the Common Pleas. The Judges there, beſide the King when it pleaſeth him to be preſent, are, the Lord chiefe Juſtice of England, and other Juſtices foure, or more, as the King ſhall thinke good.

Common Pleas. The common Pleas hath that name becauſe in it are debated the common Pleas betweene Subject and Subject, according to our law, which they call common. Heerein give judgement, The chiefe Iuſtice of the common Pleas, with foure Juſtices aſſiſtants or more. Officers attendant there be, The Keeper of the Brieffes or writs, Three Protonotaries, and inferiour Miniſters very many.

Exchequer. The Exchequer tooke that name of a boord or table whereat they ſat. For, thus writeth Gervaſe of Tilburie, who lived in the yeere 1160. The Exchequer is a foure cornered boord, about ten foote long, and five foote broad, fitted in manner of a table for men to ſit round about it. On every ſide a ſtanding ledge or border it hath of the bredth of foure fingers. Vpon this Exchequer boord is laid a cloth bought in Eaſter terme, and the ſame of black colour, and rewed with ſtrikes diſtant one from another a foote or a ſpan. And a little after. This Court, by report, began from the very Conqueſt of the Realme, and was erected by King William: howbeit the reaſon and proportion thereof, taken from the Exchequer beyond Sea. In this are all cauſes heard which belong unto the Kings treaſury. Judges therein, be The Lord Treaſurer of England, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, The Lord chiefe Baron, with three or foure other Barons of the Exchequer. The ſervitours and Miniſters to this Court are, The Kings Remembrancer, The Lord Treaſurers Remembrancer, The Clerke of the Pipe, The Controller of the Pipe: Auditours of the old revenues five: The Forrein Oppoſer, The Clerke of the Eſtreights, The Clerke of the Pleas, The Mareſchall, The Clerke of the Summons, The Deputie Chamberlaines Secondaries in the office of the Kings Remembrancer two, Secondaries in the office of the Lord Treaſurers Remembrancer two, Secondaries of the Pipe two, Clerkes in divers offices foure, &c. In the other

A other part of the Exchequer called the Receipt, theſe bee the Officers: Two Chamberlains, a vice Treaſurer, Clerke of the Tallies, Clerke of the Pels, Tellers foure, Ioyners of Tallies two, Deputie Chamberlaines two: The Clerke for Tallies, The Keeper of the Treaſurie, Meſſengers or Purſevants ordinarie foure: Scribes two, &c. The Officers likewiſe of the Tenths and firſt Fruits belong to this Court, who were ordained, when as the Popes authoritie was baniſhed and aboliſhed, and an act paſſed, by which it was provided that the Tenths, and Firſt fruits of Churchmens Benefices ſhould be paid unto the King.

Iuſtices Itinerant.

Beſide theſe three Kings Courts for law, to cut off delaies, to eaſe the ſubject alſo of travell and charges; King Henrie the Second ſent ſome of theſe Judges B and others yearely into every Shire or Countie of the Realme, who were called Iuſtices Itinerant, and commonly Iuſtices in Eyre. Theſe determined and gave judgement, as well of the Pleas of the Crowne, as the Common Pleas, within thoſe Counties whereunto they were aſſigned. For, the ſaid King, as Matthew Paris ſaith, By the counſell of his ſonne and the Biſhops together, appointed Iuſtices to ſixe parts of the Kingdome: in every part three, who ſhould ſweare to keepe and maintaine the right belonging to every man, ſincerely and uncorruptly. But this ordinance vaniſhed at length under Edward the Third: Howbeit, within a while after by Parliamentary authoritie, it was in ſome ſort revived. For the Counties being divided into certaine Circuits, as wee terme them, two of the Kings Juſtices together twice in the yeare ride about and C keepe their Circuits, for to give definitive ſentence of the Priſoners, and as we uſe to ſpeake, to deliver the Goales or Priſons. Whereupon in our Lawyers Latin, they bee called Iuſticiarii Gaolæ deliberandæ, that is, Juſtices for Goale deliverie: as alſo to take Recogniſances of Aſſiſes of new Deſeiſine, &c. whereof they be named Iuſtices of the Aſsiſes, to end and diſpatch controverſies depending, and growne to an iſſue in the foreſaid principall Kings Courts, betweene plaintiffes and defendants, and that, by their Peeres, as the cuſtome is: whence they are commonly called Iuſtices of Niſi prius, which name they tooke of the writs ſent unto the Sheriffe, which have in them theſe two words, Niſi Prius, that is, Vnleſſe before, &c.

Star-Chamber.

The Star-Chamber or the Court rather of Kings Counſell, wherein are diſcuſſed D and handled criminall matters, perjuries, couſenages, fraud, deceit, riots or exceſſe, &c. This Court in regard of time is right ancient, and for dignitie moſt honourable. For it ſeemes that it may claime antiquitie ever ſince the firſt time that Subject appealed unto their Soveraignes, and the Kings Councell was erected. Now, the Judges of this Court are perſons right Honourable, and of greateſt reputation, even the Kings Privie Counſellors. As for the name of Star-Chamber, it tooke it from the time that this Counſell was appointed at Weſtminſter in a Chamber there anciently garniſhed, and beautified with Starres: For we read in the Records of Edward the Third, Counſeil en la Chambre des Eſtoilles, pres de la Receipt al Weſtminſter, that is The Counſell E in the Chamber of Starres, neere unto the Receit at Weſtminſter. But the Authoritie thereof, that moſt ſage and wiſe Prince Henry the Seventh, by authoritie of Parliament ſo augmented and eſtabliſhed, that ſome are of opinion, though untruely, hee was the firſt founder of it. The Judges heere, are The Lord Chancellor of England, The Lord Treaſurer of England, The Lord Preſident of the Kings Counſell, The Lord Keeper of the Privy Seale, and all Counſelors of the State, as wel Eccleſiaſticall as Temporall: and out of the Barons of the Parliament, thoſe whom the King will call: The two chiefe Iuſtices of the Benches, or in their abſence two other Iudges. The Officers heerein are theſe, The Clerke of the Counſell, The Clerke of writs and proceſſe of the Counſell in the Star-Chamber, &c. And cauſes here are debated and decided not by Peeres according to our common Law, but after the courſe of Civill Law.

Court of Wards.

F The Court of Wards and Liveries hath the name of Pupils or Wards, whoſe cauſes it handleth; was firſt inſtituted by Henrie the Eighth; whereas in former times their cauſes were heard in the Chancerie and Exchequer. For, by an old Ordinance derived out of Normandie, and not from Henry the Third (as ſome doe write) when a man is deceaſed, Who holdeth poſſeſsions or Lands of the King in chiefe by Knights ſervice, as well the heire as his whole patrimonie and revenues are in the Kings power, tuition, and protection, untill he be full one and twentie yeares of age, and untill by vertue of the Kings briefe or letter, reſtitution and re-delivery be made unto him thereof. In this Court, the Generall Maſter ſitteth as Judge: under whom are theſe, The Supraviſor, or Surveior of Liveries, The Atturney generall of the Court, The generall Receiver, The Auditour, The Clerke of the Liveries, The Clerke of the Court, Fortie Fedaries, and a Meſſenger.

and

There have ſprung up alſo in theſe later times, two other Courts, to wit, Of reforming Errours: whereof the firſt is, to correct Errours in the Exchequer, the other to amend errours committed in the Kings Bench. The Judges in the former of theſe twaine, are the Lord Chancellor, and Lord Treaſurer of England, with others of the Kings Juſtices whom they are diſpoſed to take unto them. In the later, The Juſtices of the Common Pleas, and the Barons of the Exchequer.

Admirals Court.

The Admirals Court handleth Sea matters. In this are reckoned the Lord Admirall of England, his Lieutenant, and a Iudge: two Scribes, a Serjeant of the Court, and the Vice-Admirals of England. Now proceede we to the Courts of Equitie.

Chancerie.

The Chancerie drew that name from a Chancellor: which name under the ancient Roman Emperours, was not of ſo greate eſteeme and dignitie, as wee learne out of Vopiſcus. But now adaies a name it is of higheſt honour, and Chancellors are advanced to the higheſt pitch of civill Dignitie. Whoſe name Caſſiodorus fetcheth from croſſe grates or latteſſes, becauſe they examined matters, within * places ſevered apart encloſed with partitions of ſuch croſſe bars which the Latins call Cancelli. Regard, ſaith hee to a Chancellor what name you beare: It cannot bee hidden which you doe within Latteſſes. For you keepe your gates lightſome; your barres open, and your dores tranſparent as windows. Whereby, it is very evident, that he ſate within grates, where he was to be ſeene on every ſide, and thereof it may be thought he tooke that name. But, conſidering it was his part, being as it were the Princes mouth, eie, and eare, to ſtrike and daſh out with croſſe-lines lattiſe like, thoſe letters, Commiſſions, Warrants, and Decrees paſſed againſt law and right, or prejudiciall to the comon-wealth, which not improperly they termed to cancell, ſome thinke the name of Chancellor came from this Cancelling: and in a Gloſſarie of latter time thus we read, A Chancellor is he whoſe Office is, to looke into and peruſe the writings and anſwers of the Emperour: to cancell what is written amiſſe, and to ſigne that which is well. Neither is that true, which Polydore Virgil writeth, namely, that William the Conquerour inſtituted a Colledge or fellowſhip of Scribes, to write letters pattents, &c. and named the Maſter of that Societie, Chancellor: conſidering it is plaine and manifeſt that Chancellors were in England before the Normans Conqueſt. How great the dignitie and authoritie of the Chancellor is at this day, it is better knowne than I can declare: but of what credit it was in old time, have heere in a word or two out of a writer of good antiquitie. The dignitie of the Chancellor of England is this, He is reputed the ſecond perſon in the Realme, and next unto the King; with the one ſide of the Kings Seale, (whereof by his Office he hath the Keeping) he may ſigne his owne injunctions, to diſpoſe and order the Kings Chappell as hee liketh, to receive and keepe all Archbiſhopricks, Biſhopricks, Abbeies, and Baronies, void and falling into the Kings hand, to be preſent at all the Kings Counſels, and thither to repaire uncalled: alſo that all things be ſigned by the hand of his Clerke who carrieth the Kings Seale, and that all things be directed and diſpoſed by adviſe of the Chancellor. Item, that by the helpfull merits of his good life through Gods grace, he need not die, if he will himſelfe, but Archbiſhop or Biſhop: And heereof it is, that the Chancellor-ſhip is not to be bought. The forme and manner of ordaining a Chancellor, (for that alſo I will note) was in the time of King Henrie the Second, by hanging the great Seale of England about the necke of the Chancellor elect. But in King Henry the Sixth daies, this was the order of it, according to the notes I tooke out of the Records. When the place of the Lord Chancellor of England is void by death, the Kings three great Seales, to wit, one of gold, and other two of ſilver, which remained in the cuſtodie of the Chancellor, preſently after his death are ſhut up in a wooden cheſt faſt locked, and ſigned with the Seales of the Lords then preſent, and ſo conveied into the Treaſurie: From thence brought they are to the King, who in the preſence of many Noblemen

Robert Fitz-Stephen, who lived under Henry the Second.

A blemen delivereth them into the hands of him that ſhall be Chancellor, and undertaketh the charge of executing the Office of Chancellorſhip, taking before an oath of him, well and truely to exerciſe the ſame: firſt he delivereth the great Seale of ſilver, then that of gold, and ſo the other of ſilver: who receiving the ſame beſtoweth them againe in the cheſt: and being ſigned with his owne Seale conveieth it home to his owne houſe, and before certaine of the Nobilitie, cauſeth the Kings Patents and writs to be Sealed. When a Chancellor is diſcharged of his place, he delivereth up into the Kings hands in the preſence of the Lords and Nobles, thoſe three Seales, firſt, the Seale of gold, then one broad Seale of ſilver; and ſo another of a leſſe forme. Howbeit at this day one Seale and no more is delivered unto
B the Chanchellor, neither is there mention any where made of theſe three Seales, but in the raigne of Henry the Sixth. To this Chancellors Office in proceſſe of time much authoritie and dignitie hath been adjoyned by authoritie of Parliament, eſpecially ever ſince that Lawyers ſtood ſo preciſely upon the ſtrict points of Law, and caught men with the traps and ſnares of their law termes; that of neceſſitie there was a Court of equitie to be erected, and the ſame committed to the Chancellor, who might give judgement according to equitie and reaſon, and moderate the extremitie of law, which was wont to bee thought extreme wrong. In this Court there ſitteth as Preſident, the Lord Chancellor of England, and as aſſeſſors or aſſiſtants to him, twelve
C Maſters of the Chancerie: whereof the chiefe and principall is the Keeper of the Rolls belonging to the ſame Court, and thereupon he is called Maſter of the Rolles. There belong alſo to this Court very many Officers, of whom ſome attend eſpecially upon the Kings Seale, namely, The Clerke of the Crown, The Clerke of the Hanaper, The Sealer, The Chauff-wax, The Controller of the Hanaper, Curſitours twenty foure, A Clerke for the writs of Sub-pœna. Others are attendant upon Bils of complaint there exhibited, to wit, A Protonotarie, ſixe Clerkes, or Atturnies of the Court, and a Regiſter. There belong alſo thereto the Clekes of the Petty Bag, The Clerke of Preſentations, The Clerke of Faculties, The Clerke for examination of Letters Patents, The Clerke for diſmiſſions, &c.

D There is another Court alſo derived out of the Kings Privie Counſell, called The Court of Requeſts, which giveth hearing likewiſe, as in the Chancerie, to cauſes betweene private perſons, but ſuch as before are preſented unto the Prince, or his Privie Counſell, as alſo to others. In this are employed certaine Maſters of the Requeſts, and a Clerke or Regiſter, with two Atturneys or three. But as touching thoſe Counſels held in the Marches of Wales and in the North parts, wee will ſpeake with the leave of God in their due place. Court of Requeſts.

As for Eccleſiaſticall or Spirituall Courts there be two principall; to wit, The Synode, which is called The Convocation of the Clergie, and is alwaies kept with the Parliament: and the Provinciall Synods in both Provinces. Eccleſiaſticall Courts. See the Antiquitie of the Britiſh Church.

E After theſe are reckoned the Archbiſhop of Canterburies Courts, to wit, The Court of the Arches: wherein ſitteth as Judge the Deane of the Arches. He is called Deane, for that he hath juriſdiction in xiij. Pariſhes of London, exempt from the Biſhop of London, which number maketh a Deanrie; and Deane of the Arches, becauſe the principall of his Churches is, S. Maries Church in London, the tower, ſteeple or lanterne whereof is beautifully built of arched worke. He hath to doe with appeales of all men within the Province of Canterburie. Advocates there bee in this Court xvj. or more, at the pleaſure of the Archbiſhop, all Doctors of the Law; two Regiſters, and ten Proctours. Court of the Arches.

The Court of Audience, which entertaineth the complaints, cauſes and appeales of them in that Province. Court of Audience.

F The Prerogative Court, in which the Commiſſarie ſitteth upon Inheritances fallen either by the Inteſtate, or by will and teſtament.

The Court of Faculties, wherein there is appointed a chiefe Preſident, who heareth and conſidereth of their grievances and requeſts that are petitioners for ſome moderation and eaſement of the Eccleſiaſticall law, ſometimes over-ſtrict and rigorous; and a Regiſter beſide, who recordeth the Diſpenſations granted. Court of Faculties.

The

The Court of Peculiars, which dealeth in certaine Pariſhes exempt from the Biſhops juriſdiction in ſome Dioceſſes, and are peculiarly belonging to the Archbiſhop of Canterburie. Other Courts of meaner account I willingly overpaſſe. Neither doe I wiſely, I aſſure you, thus to entermeddle heerein: and yet Guicciardine in his Deſcription of the Neatherlands hath given me a precedent hereof to follow.

Heere in this place my purpoſe was to have interſerted ſomewhat, (ſo farre forth eſpecially as concerned antiquitie) as touching the chiefe Magiſtrates, and higheſt Offices of England, as namely, The Lord Chancellor aforeſaid, The Lord Treaſurer, The Preſident of the Counſell, The Lord Keeper of the Privie Seale, The Lord high Chamberlain, The Lord high Conſtable, The Mareſchall, and Seneſchal or Steward of the Kings houſhold, &c. But underſtanding that others were in hand with theſe matters, ſo farre am I from preventing them, that right willingly I ſhall impart even to them, whatſoever in this behalfe I have obſerved.

Vnder what Signe in heaven Britaine lieth.

Some man perhaps heere looketh, that I ſhould out of Aſtrologicall rules, adde to to the reſt, under what Signe and Planet our Britaine is ſeated. And verily I will ſay ſomewhat to ſatisfie the Curious; for in thoſe learned errors I have, I may tell you, in my youth taken ſome paines: although the Conjecturers of Aſtrologers touching this point are ſo divers, that the very diverſitie may ſeeme to weaken the thing it ſelfe, and leave no place for the truth. M. Manilius an ancient Poet in this verſe of his, ſeemeth to intimate, that Capricorne heere beareth rule in Britaine:

Tu Capricorne regis quicquid ſub Sole cadente Expoſitum.

Thou Capricorne doeſt governe all,
That lies to Sun at his down-fall.

Ptolomee, Albumazar, and Cardane, doe make Aries our Tutelar Signe; Iohannes de Muris, the Planet Saturne: The Frier Perſcrutator, Eſquidus and Henrie Silen, the Moone; for that, as they ſay, it is in the ſeventh Climate. Roger of Hereford, Thomas of Ravenna, Philologus, and Hiſpalenſis, are of opinion Piſces governe us; and laſt of all Schonerus, and Pitatus, (ſee how they all diſagree) have with no better reaſon than the reſt, ſubjected us unto Gemini.

The order or Method of the worke enſuing.

Now will I, by Gods aſſiſtance, make my perambulation through the Provinces or Shires of Britaine: wherein (according to the Preface that they uſed in old time, before they tooke any enterprize in hand) God grant me gracious good ſpeed. In the ſeverall diſcourſes of every of them, I will declare as plainely, and as briefly as I can, who were their ancient Inhabitants; what is the reaſon of their names; how they are bounded; what is the nature of the ſoile; what places of antiquitie, and good account are therein; what Dukes likewiſe, or Earles have beene in each one ſince the Norman Conqueſt: And in this ſucceſſion of Earles, to confeſſe frankly, by whom I have taken profit, I doe willingly and juſtly acknowledge that Thomas Talbot a moſt diligent Clerke in the Records of the Tower, a man of ſingular skill in our antiquities, hath given me much light.

And begin I will at the fartheſt parts in the Weſt, that is to ſay, at Cornwall, and ſo paſſe over the other countries in order, imitating herein Strabo, Ptolomee, and the moſt ancient Geographers, who alwaies begin their deſcription in the Weſterne countries, as being firſt from the Meridian.

DANMONII.

THat Region, which according to the Geographers, is the first of all Britaine, and growing straiter still and narrower, shooteth out fartheſt into the Weſt, and hath on the North ſide the Severne-Sea; on the South the Britiſh, and on the Weſt, the Vergivian or Weſterne Ocean, beating upon it; was in ancient time inhabited by thoſe Britaines, whom Solinus called, DVNMONII, Ptolomee, DAMNONII, or (as we find in ſome other copies,) more truely DANMONII. Which name, if it bee not derived from thoſe ever-continuing mines of tinne in this tract, which the Britans terme Moina; may ſeeme to come of the dwelling there under hils. For, their habitation all over this Country is ſomewhat low, and in valleys: which manner of dwelling is called in the * Britiſh tongue Dan-munith: in which ſenſe alſo the Province next adjoyning, in like reſpect is at this day named by the * Britans Duffneint, that is to ſay, Low valleys. Now whether the OSTIDAMNII, called alſo OSTAEI, and OSTIONES, of whom Strabo maketh mention out of Pitheas of Marſiles, be our Danmonij, I wiſh the ſtudious ſearchers of Antiquity would weigh with themſelves, and examine ſomewhat more diligently. For, ſeated they were, by their report, in the fartheſt parts of Europe, toward the Weſt Ocean over againſt Spaine, not farre from the Iſle Vxantiſſa, now called Vſhant, Which particulars every one doe very well, and in each point agree unto this Region of our Danmonij. And ſeeing that thoſe Oſtiones be called by Artemidorus COSSINI, as Stephanus in his Cities ſeemeth to note, I wiſh likewiſe they would conſider (becauſe theſe people are termed alſo Corini) whether in ſtead of COSSINI, we are not to read CORINI: For, we read Fuſij for Furij, and Valeſij for Valerij. And ſurely, the Geographers have not ſo much as a glimps where to ſeeke theſe Oſtidamnij and Coſsini, by the weſterne Sea, if they be hence excluded. But the Country of this nation is at this day divided into two parts, knowne by later names of Cornwall and Denſhire, whereof wee will ſpeake in order.

* Welch.

* Welchmen.

Oſtidamnij.

CORNWALL.

COrnwall, which alſo by later Writers is called Cornubia in Latin, of all Britaine doth beare moſt Weſtward, and is inhabited by that remnant of Britans, which Marinus Scotus calleth Occidentales Britones, that is, Britaines of the Weſt parts, who in the Britiſh tongue (for as yet they have not loſt their ancient language) name it Kernaw, becauſe it waxeth ſmaller ſmaller and ſmaller in manner of an horne, and runneth forth into the Sea with little promontories, as they were hornes, on every ſide: For the Britaines call an horne, [Corn] and hornes [Kern,] in the plurall number: although others would have Cornwall to take the name of one Corineus, I know not what Companion of Brutus, and doe call it Corinea, according to this verſe of a fabulous Poet;

Corn and Kern.

Pars Corinea datur Corinæo, de duce nomen
Patria, deq; viro gens Corinenſis habet.
To Captaine Corineus, part was given, to hold by right:
Of him both coaſt Corinea, and people Corniſh height.

But, no ſtrange matter it is (if a man ſearch Antiquities) for many places to have their denominations given them of ſuch kind of ſcite as this. In Crete and * Taurica Cherſoneſſus, there bee promontories termed, Κριὸς μέτωπα, that is, Rams Foreheads, becauſe they ſhoote forth into the ſea, after the faſhion of Rams hornes. Semblably, Cyprus was of the Greekes in old time, called Ceraſtis, for that it butteth on the ſea with promontories bearing out like hornes, ſo that it is no marvell, if the coaſt bee called Kernaw, and Corn, crookening inward as it doth, like unto an horne, and having divers ſmal capes and points ſticking out, as it were hornes. Whereupon, when in the heat of the Saxons warre, many Britans retired themſelves into this tract, truſting to the naturall ſtrength of the place; for, they knew that the waies by land were hard enough to bee paſſed through by reaſon of mountaines, and croſſed in divers places with armes of the Sea; that ſailing likewiſe there, was comberſome, becauſe the places were unknowne: the Saxon being Conquerour, who called all forraine things, and aliens or ſtrangers, in their language Wealſh, named the Inhabitants hereof Cornwealer and Werrowealer. Hereof ſprang the Latin name Cornwallia, and in the later age Cornubia, and in ſome writers Occidua Wallia. So farre it is off, that it ſhould be called Cornwallia, of the Gaules that conquered it, which ſome there bee, that in flatterie of the French name and nation would uphold: who, if they were as quickeſighted at home, as they bee curious abroad, might find that their * Britaine lying upon the ſea coaſt, oppoſite to this country, is ſo named of our Britan, and that Cornovaille, no ſmall territorie therein, which ſpeaketh the ſame language that our Corniſhmen doe, tooke name of our countrey-men, that paſſed over hence to dwell there. For, as theſe our Britaines of the Weſt parts, aided the Armorici of Gaule, inhabiting in that tract in their warres againſt Cæſar; upon which occaſion hee pretended a quarrell to invade Britaine, and they afterwards comming thither, as wee ſaid before, changed the name of Armorici, and called it Britaine: ſo in the foregoing ages, readie they were, and ever at hand to helpe thoſe Britaines their country-men againſt the French; and during the tempeſtuous troubles of the Daniſh warre, ſome of them put over thither alſo, and are thought to have left this name of Cornovaille behind them there. But to leave that Cornovaille.

* Perocopſca. or, Procopia.

* Bretaigne or, Little Britaine.

Strabo.

This our Cornwall, as if nature made amends and recompence for the incroching in of the ſea, is for the moſt part raiſed on high with mountaines, being in the vallies betweene of an indifferent glebe, with which the Sea weede, or reit commonly called Orewood, and a certaine kind of fruitfull Sea-ſand, they make ſo ranke and battle, that it is incredible. The Sea coaſt, is beautified with very many Townes, able to ſet out a great fleet of Ships: the inland parts have rich and plenteous mines of tinne. For, there is digged out of them wonderfull ſtore of tinne, yielding exceeding much profit and commoditie, where are made houſhold pewter veſſels, which are uſed throughout many parts of Europe in ſervice of the table, and for their glittering brightneſſe, compared with ſilver plate. The Inhabitants doe diſcover theſe mines by certaine tinne-ſtones lying on the face of the ground, which they call Shoad, being ſomewhat ſmooth and round. Of theſe Mines or tinne-workes, there be two kinds: the one they call, Lode-workes; the other Stream-workes. This lieth in lower grounds, when by trenching they follow the veines of tinne, and turne aſide now and then the ſtreames of water comming in their way: that other, is in higher places, when as upon the hils they dig very deepe pits, which they call, Shafts, and doe undermine,

Orewood.

Tinne.

A mine. In working both waies there is ſeen wonderfull wit and skill, as well in draining of waters aſide, and reducing them into one ſtreame; as in the underbuilding, pinning and propping up of their pits: to paſſe over with ſilence their devices of breaking, ſtamping, drying, craſing, waſhing, melting, and fining the mettall, than which there cannot be more cunning ſhewed. There are alſo two ſorts of Tinne, Blacke tinne, which is tinne-ore broken and waſhed, but not yet founded into mettall, and white tinne, that is molten into mettall, and that is either ſoft tinne which is beſt merchantable, or hard tinne leſſe merchantable.

That the ancient Britans practiſed theſe tinne-works, (to omit Timæus the Hiſto-
B rian in Plinie, who reporteth, That the Britans fetched tinne out of the Iſle Icta, in wicker boats covered and ſtitched about with leather) appeareth for certaine out of Diodorus Siculus, who flouriſhed under Auguſtus Cæſar. For, hee writeth, that the Britans, who Inhabited this part, digged tinne out of ſtonie ground, and at a low water carried the ſame in carts, to certaine Ilands adjoyning. From whence Merchants tranſported it by ſhips into Gaule, and from thence conveied the ſame upon horſes within thirtie daies unto the ſpring-heads of the river * Eridanus, or elſe to the citie Narbone, as it were, to a Mart. AEthicus alſo, who ever hee was, that unworthily beareth title to be interpreted by S. Hierome out of the Sclavonian tongue, inſinuateth the very ſame, and ſaith, That hee delivered rules and precepts to theſe Tinne-
C workers. But it ſeemeth, that the Engliſh-Saxons neglected it altogether, or to have uſed the workmanſhip and labour of Arabians or Saracens. For, the Inhabitants in their language terme the mines forlet and given over, Attal Sariſin, that is, the leavings of the Saracens; if they did meane by that name, the ancient Panims.

Lib. 6. cap. 8. & 9.

 Po.*

After the comming in of the Normans, the Earles of Cornwal gathered great riches out of theſe mines, and eſpecially Richard brother to King Henrie the Third: and no marvell, ſith that in thoſe daies Europe had tinne from no other place. For, the incurſions of the Mores, had ſtopped up the tinne mines of Spaine; and as for the tinne veines in Germanie, which are in Miſnia and Bohemia, they were not as yet knowen: and thoſe verily not diſcovered, before the yeere after Chriſts nativitie,
D 1240. For then, (as a writer of that age recordeth) was tinne mett all found in Germanie by a certain Corniſhman driven out of his native ſoile, to the great loſſe and hindrance of Richard Earle of Cornwal. This Richard began to make ordinances for theſe tin-works, and afterward Edmund his ſonne granted a Charter, and certain liberties, and withall preſcribed certaine Lawes concerning the ſame: which hee ratified or ſtrengthened under his ſeale, and impoſed a tribute or rent upon tin, to be anſwered unto the Earls.

Theſe liberties, priviledges and lawes King Edward the Third, did afterwards confirme and augment. The whole common-wealth of thoſe Tinners and workmen, as it were, one bodie, hee divided into foure quarters, which of the places they call Foy-more, Black-more, Trewarnaile, and Penwith. Over them all hee ordained a War-
E den, called, L. Warden of the Stanniers, of Stannum, that is, Tinne; who giveth judgement as well according to equitie and conſcience, as Law; and appointed to every quarter their Stewards, who once every iij. weeks, (every one in his ſeverall quarter) miniſter juſtice in cauſes perſonall betweene Tinner and Tinner, and betweene Tinner and Forrainer, except in cauſes of land, life, or member. From whom there lieth an appeale to the Lord Warden, from him to the Duke, from the Duke to the King. In matters of moment, there are by the Warden generall Parliaments, or ſeverall aſſemblies ſummoned: whereunto Iurats are ſent out of every Stannarie, whoſe conſtitutions do bind them. As for thoſe that deale with tinne, they are of foure ſorts: the owners of the ſoile, the adventurers, the merchants or regraters, and the labourers, called F the Spadiards (of their Spade) who poore men are pitifully out-eaten by uſurious contracts. But the Kings of England, and Dukes of Cornwall, in their times have reſerved to themſelves a præemption of tin (by the opinion of the learned in the Law) as well in regard of the proprietie, as being chiefe Lords and Proprietaries; as of their royall prerogative. Leſt the tribute or rent impoſed, ſhould be embezelled, and the Dukes of Cornwall defrauded, unto whom by the old cuſtome for every thouſand pound waight of tinne there is paid forty ſhillings, it is by a Law provided, that all the tin which is caſt & wrought, be brought to one of the foure appointed townes: where twice in the yeere it is weighed, and ſigned with a ſtampe, (they call it Coinage) and the ſaid impoſt according paid: neither is it lawfull for any man before that, to ſell or ſend it abroad, under forfeiture of their tin. And now only tin is here found, but therewith alſo gold and ſilver; yea, and Diamonds ſhaped, and pointed anglewiſe, ſmoothed alſo by nature it ſelfe: whereof ſome are as big as walnuts, and inferiour to the Orient Diamonds, in blackneſſe and hardneſſe only. Moreover there is found Eryngium, that is, Sea Holly, growing moſt abundantly every where along the ſhore. Furthermore, ſo plentifull is this countrey of graine, although not without great toile of the husbandman, that it hath not onely ſufficient to maintaine it ſelfe, but alſo affoordeth often times great ſtore of corne into Spaine. Beſides, a moſt rich revenue and commoditie they have by thoſe little fiſhes that they call Pilchards, which ſwarming, as one would ſay, in mighty great skuls about the ſhores from Iuly unto November, are there taken, garbaged, ſalted, hanged in the ſmoake, laied up, preſſed, and by infinite numbers carried over into France, Spaine, and Italie, unto which countreys they be very good chaffer, and right welcome merchandiſe, and are there named * Fumados. Whereupon Michael a Corniſh Poet, and of Rhymers in his time the chiefe, in his Satyre againſt Henrie of Aurenches, Archpoet to King Henrie the Third, becauſe he had unreverently plaied upon Corniſhmen, as if they were ſeated in the nocke hole of the world; after much ſatyricall ſharpneſſe, came out with theſe round rhymes:

Corniſh Diamonds.

Pilchards.

* Which peradventure be Gerres in Plinie.

Non opus eſt ut opes numerem quibus eſt opulenta,
Et per quas, inopes ſuſtentat non ope lenta:

I need not here report the wealth, wherewith enrich'd it is,
And whereby alwaies to ſuſtaine poore folke it doth not miſſe:
No coaſt elſewhere for fiſh and tinne, ſo plentious, ywis.

And yet is Cornwall nothing happier in regard of the ſoile, than it is for the people; who as they were endued and adorned with all civilitie, even in thoſe ancient times; (For by reaſon of their acquaintance with merchants ſailing thither for tin, as Diodorus Siculus reporteth, they were more courteous toward ſtrangers:) ſo they are valiant, hardie, wel pitcht in ſtature, brawny & ſtrong limmed: ſuch as for wraſtling, (to ſpeak nothing of that manly exerciſe, & feat of hurling the Ball which they uſe) ſo farre excell, that for ſlight and cleane ſtrength together, they juſtly win the prize and praiſe from other nations, in that behalfe. Moreover, that Poet Michael, when as in the exceſſive commendation of his country men, hee had with gigging rimes reſounded, how Arthur in his battels, gave them the honour, to give the firſt charge, he thus couragiouſly concludeth in rime.

Hurling.

Quid nos deterret? ſi firmiter in pede ſtemus,
Fraus ni nos ſuperet, nihil eſt quod non ſuperemus.

What frighteth us? if footing ſure we have on ſteady ground, (Barre crafty ſleights) there is no force but we can it confound.

And hereof peradventure ariſeth the report ſo generally received, that Giants in times paſt Inhabited this countrey. For, Havillan the Poet, who lived foure hundred yeares ſince, in deſcribing of certaine Britiſh Giants, wrote pleaſantly of Britaine, and the Corniſh Giants, in this wiſe: ——— Titanibus illa

O Cornwall, utmoſt dore that art to let in Zephirus blaſt.

Now, whether this firme and wel compact conſtitution of the Corniſh-men which proceedeth from the temperature of heat and moiſture, is to bee referred unto the
B breeding-weſt wind and the Weſterne ſituation thereof, like as wee ſee, that in Germanie the Batavians, in France the Gaſcoines who be fartheſt Weſtward are the ableſt and moſt valiant, or rather to ſome peculiar and ſpeciall reaſon of aire and ſoile; it is not my purpoſe to ſearch curiouſly. Weſterne people moſt ſtrong and hardie.

Now let us treat of the Promontories, Cities and Rivers, whereof ancient writers have made mention: For, this is my principall project: beginning at the furtheſt point, and ſo ſurveying firſt the Southerne ſhore, then the Northern, and laſtly the courſe of the river * Tamara, which ſevereth this countie from Devonſhire. The utmoſt Promontorie which lieth upon the Weſtern Ocean, and is diſtant 17. degrees and no more in the globe or ſurface of the earth, from the Ilands called Azores, is
C called by Ptolomee Bolerium, and by Diodorus, Belerium; perhaps of the Britiſh word Pell, which ſignifieth a thing moſt remote or fartheſt off: by Ptolomee alſo the ſame is termed ἀντικρυον, or ANTIVESTAEVM, by the Britans, I meane their Bardie onely or Poets, Penringuaed; that is, the Promontorie of Bloud: For, the Welſh Hiſtorians name it Penwith, that is, the Promontorie on the left hand: The Saxons Penpiþ-þveopc. For, Steort with them betokeneth a peece of land ſhooting into the Sea: and hereupon all that Hundred of Penwith at this day is called by borderers in their language, Pen von las, that is, the end of the land: and in the ſame ſence, we in Engliſh name it, The lands end; becauſe it is the utmoſt part of the Iland toward the Weſt. And if this Promontorie were ſometimes called Helenum, as Volaterran and the late writers affirme, it
D came not of Helenus K. Priams ſonne, but of Pen-Elin, which ſignifieth in the Britiſh tongue an Elbow, as Ancon doth in Greeke. And ſeeing that crooked and bending ſhores be termed of the Greekes Ancônes, as Elbows, for ſo Plinie witneſſeth of Ancona in Italie, no abſurditie is it at all, that this crooked and bowing ſhore ſhould by the Britans in the ſame ſence be called Pen-elin, and thereof that Latin name Helenum be derived. But as touching this name Antiveſtæum, I was wont now and then to doubt, whether it favoured not of ſome Greek originall. For, ſeeing it was a common and uſuall thing with the Greeks, to impoſe names upon places taken from the names of ſuch as were oppoſite unto them, not only in Greece it ſelfe, where they have, * Rhium, and * Antirrhium, but alſo in the * Arabian gulfe, where there is Bacchium and An-
E tibacchium, as alſo upon the gulf of Venice, Antibarrium, becauſe it looketh towards Barrium, lying over againſt it in Italie; I ſearched diligently whether any place named Veſtæum, lay oppoſite unto this our Antiveſtæum: but finding no ſuch thing, I betooke my ſelfe againe to the Britiſh tongue, neither yet can I here reſolve my ſelf. But the Inhabitants doe ſuppoſe, that this Promontorie heretofore ran further into the Sea, and by the rubbiſh which is drawne out from thence, the Mariners affirme the ſame: yea and the neighbor Inhabitants avouch, out of I wote not what fable, that the earth now covered there all over with the in-breaking of the Sea, was called Lioneſſe.

In the utmoſt rocks of this Promontorie, when at a low water they be bare, there appeare veines of tin and copper, and the people there dwelling report, that there
F ſtood a watch-Tower upon it, from whence by the light of burning fire, there was a ſigne given unto Sailers: no doubt, ad ſpeculam Hiſpaniæ, according as Oroſius hath put downe in writing, That the moſt high watch-towre of Brigantia in Gallicia, a rare and admirable peece of worke, was erected ad ſpeculam Britanniæ: that is, if I well underſtand him either for the uſe of Mariners ſailing out of Britaine toward Spaine, or elſe, over againſt the watch-Towre of Britaine. For, no other place of this Iland looketh directly to Spaine. Upon it there ſtandeth now a little village named S. Buriens (in old time Eglis Buriens, that is, The Church of Buriena or Beriena) conſecrated to Buriena, a religious Iriſh woman. For, this nation alwaies honoured Iriſh Saints as tutelar patrons of their owne, ſo, all their Towns in manner they have conſecrated unto them. This village King Athelſtan, as the report goeth, granted to be a priviledged place or Sanctuarie, what time as he arrived as Conquerour out of the * Iles of Sylly: True it is, that he built heere a Church, and that under William the Conquerour there was heere a Colledge of Chanons, unto whom the territorie adjoyning belonged. Neere unto this, in a place which they call Biſcaw Woune, are to bee ſeene nineteene ſtones ſet in a round circle, diſtant every one about twelve foote from the other; and in the very center there is one pitched far higher and greater than the reſt. This was ſome Trophee (or monument of victorie) erected by the Romans (as probably may bee conjectured) under the later Emperours, or elſe, by Athelſtan the Saxon, when he had ſubdued the Corniſh-men, and brought them under his dominion.

As the ſhore fetcheth a compaſſe by little and little from hence Southward, it letteth in a bay or creeke of the Sea, in manner of a Creſcent, which they call Mounts-bay: wherein, as the common ſpeech goeth, the Ocean by ruſhing with a violent force drowned the land. Vpon this lieth Mouſehole, in the Britiſh tongue Port Inis, that is, The Haven of the Iland: For which, Henry of Ticis, a Baron in his time and Lord of Alwerton and Tiwernel in this Country, obtained of King Edward the Firſt the grant to have a market there. Likewiſe there is ſeated upon this Bay Pen-ſans, that is, The Cape or Head of Saints, or as ſome thinke Sands, * a prety market Towne: within a little whereof is that famous ſtone, Main-Amber; which, being a great Rock advanced upon ſome other of meaner ſize with ſo equall a counterpeize, a man, may ſtir with the puſh of his finger, but to remove it quite out of his place a great number of men are not able: as alſo Merkin, that is, Iupiters market, (becauſe Thurſday anciently dedicated to Iupiters is their market day) a dangerous rode for ſhips. And in the very angle and corner it ſelfe S. Michaels mount, which gave name unto the foreſaid Bay; ſometime called Dinſol, as wee find in the booke of Landaffe: the Inhabitants name it Careg Cowſe, that is, The hoary Crag or Rock, the Saxons Michel-ꝑtop, that is, Michaels place, as Maſter Laurence Noel, a man of good note for his ſingular learning, and who was the firſt in our age that brought into ure againe and revived the language of our anceſtours the Saxons, which through diſuſe lay forlet and buried in oblivion, hath well obſerved. This Rocke is of a good height and craggy, compaſſed round about with water ſo oft as it is floud, but at every ebbe joyned to the main-land, ſo that they ſay of it, It is land and Iland twice a day. For which cauſe, Iohn Earle of Oxford, not many yeeres ago, preſuming upon the ſtrength of the place, choſe it for his chiefeſt defence when he raiſed war againſt King Edward the Fourth, and valiantly held the ſame, but with no good ſucceſſe. For, his ſouldiers being aſſailed by the Kings forces ſtraightwaies yeelded. In the very top heereof within the Fortreſſe, there was a Chappell conſecrated to S. Michael, the Archangell, where William Earle of Cornwall and Moriton, who by the bounteous gift of King William the Firſt had great lands, & large poſſeſſions in this tract, built a Cell for one or two monks; who avouched that S. Michael appeared in that mount: which apparition, or the like, the Italians challenge to their hill Garganus, and the Frenchmen likewiſe to their Michaels mount in Normandie. At the foote of this mountaine within the memorie of our Fathers, whiles men were digging up of tin they found Spear-heads, axes, and ſwords of braſſe wrapped in linnen: ſuch as were ſometimes found within the forreſt Hercinia in Germanie, and not long ſince in our Wales. For, evident it is by the monuments of ancient Writers, that the Greeks, the Cimbrians and Britans uſed brazen weapons, although the wounds given with braſſe bee leſſe hurtfull, as in which mettall there is a medicinable vertue to heale: according as Macrobius reporteth out of Ariſtotle. But happily that age was not ſo cunning in deviſing meanes to miſchiefe and murthers, as ours is. In the rocks underneath, as alſo along the ſhore every where breedeth the * Pyrrhecorax, a kind of crow with bill and feet red, and not

A not, as Plinie thought, proper to the Alpes onely. This bird the inhabitants have found to be an Incendiarie, and theeviſh beſide: For, oftentimes it ſecretly conveieth fire-ſticks ſetting their houſes a fire and as cloſely filcheth and hideth little peeces of money. In this place the countrey is moſt narrow and groweth as it were into an * Iſthmus, for it is ſcarſe foure miles over from hence to the Severn or upper ſea. A little above this mount, there openeth a Creeke of good bredth, called of the mount, Mountsbay, a moſt ſafe rode and harbour for ſhips, when the South and Southeaſt winds are aloft and bluſter, at a mid ebbe and returne of the Sea, ſix or ſeven fathom deepe. More toward the Eaſt ariſeth Godolcan hill, right famous for plentifull veines of tin (they call it now Godolphin) but much more renowned in regard of the Lords

B thereof, bearing the ſame name, who with their vertues have equalled the ancientneſſe of that houſe and linage. But that name in the Corniſh language, came of A white Aegle, and this family hath anciently borne for their armes in a ſhield Gules, an Ægle diſplaied Argent, betweene three Flower-deluces of the ſame, id eſt Argent likewiſe in a ſhield Gules.

From S. Michaels mount Southward, immediatly there is thruſt forth a bi-land or demi-Ile, at the very entrie whereof Heilſton ſheweth it ſelfe, called in their country language Hellas, by reaſon of the ſalt water flowing thereto: a Towne of great reſort for their priviledge of marking and coinage of tin. Under which by the confluence

C and meeting of many waters there is made a lake two miles in length, named Loopoole, divided from the Sea by a narrow banke running betweene, which whenſoever it is by the violence of waves broken thorow, a wonderfull roring of waters is heard far and neere all over the countrey adjoining. And not far from thence there is to be ſeene a militarie fenſe or rampier of a large compaſſe built of ſtones, heaped together and laid without mortar, they call it in their tongue, Earth; of which ſort there be others heere and there: raiſed, as I verily beleeve, in the Daniſh warre. Neither is it unlike to thoſe fortifications of the Britans, which Tacitus termeth rudes & informes ſaxorum compages, that is, rude and ilfavoured compacted piles of ſtone. As for the ſaid

D Demi-Iland, it ſelfe being of a good bigneſſe and repleniſhed with villages, it is named Meneg, and no doubt that MENNA, which out of Cornelius a writer of Annals (but whether he be Tacitus, I wot not) Jornandes in his Geticks deſcribeth, and is in ſome copies found written Memma. For, it is, as he ſaith, In the utmoſt coaſt of Britaine, having in it great ſtore of mettall mines, very full of graſſe and herbes, bringing forth more plentifully all thoſe things which ſerve for paſtorage of beaſts, rather than nouriſhment of men. But where as he ſaid, that it hath plenteous ſtore of Mettals, it is now ſo deſtitute, that it may ſeeme long ſince to have beene exhauſt thereof. The Sailers, at this day call the utmoſt South-Weſt point thereof Liſard; Ptolomee, The PROMONTORIE OF THE DANMONII, add OCRINVM; Aethicus in that ſtrange Geographie of his, OCRANVM; and he reckoneth it among the mountaines of the Weſt

And yet among the Alpes, Ocrea, Ocriculum, and Interocrea, drew their denomination of their ſteepe and rocky ſite. But ſeeing that Ochr betokeneth in the Britiſh tongue an Edge, what if I ſhould thinke the name was given to this Promontorie, becauſe it hath a ſharpe edge and groweth at the end pointed in faſhion of a cone? In the turning in of the ſhore from this Meneg, you meet with a Bay very commodious for ſhips to harbour in, by reaſon of ſo many turnings, cones and angled windings therein, receiving into it the little river Vale. Neere unto which within the countrey, flouriſhed ſometime that ancient Towne Voluba, menti-

This Haven is as noble as * Brunduſium it ſelfe in Italie: of exceeding great capacity; for it is able to receive an hundred ſhips, which may ride therein ſo a part by themſelves, that out of never a one of them the top of anothers Maſt can be ſeene: and moſt ſafe withall under the wind, by reaſon that it is encloſed on every ſide with brims of high riſing banks. In the very entrance of this Haven, there mounteth up an high and ſteep craggy rock, which the inhabitants call Crage. The gullet on either hand, as well for the defenſe and ſafetie of the place, as for terror to enemies, is fortified with block-houſes: to wit, the caſtle of S. Maudit Eaſt-ward, and toward the Weſt, the fort Pendinas, built both by King Henrie the Eighth: Of which fortreſſes the * Antiquarian Poet writeth thus:

Cenionis oſtium.

But the Haven it ſelfe is by Ptolomee called Oſtium CENIONIS, The mouth of Cenio, doubtleſſe of the Britiſh word Geneu, which betokeneth a doore and entrance. And this to bee true, the Towne Tregenie neere adjoyning doth teſtifie: for it is as much (if a man interpret it) as a little Towne by the Mouth. Vpon the innermore creeks and nooks of this Haven, there ſtand ſome Townes: namely, Peryn, for a market well frequented, where Walter Broneſcome Biſhop of Exceſter, in the yeeae 1288. erected a Collegiat Church, (they call it Glaſnith) and twelve Prebendaries: Arwenak, the ſeat of the ancient and noble family of the Killegrewes; Truro, in the Corniſh tongue Truru, ſo called of three Streets encircled, as it were, with two rivers; a Maior Towne, as they call it, and endowed with many priviledges, and coynage of tin: alſo Grampound, which is ſeated fartheſt from the Haven, and neighbour to it is Golden the inheritance of Tregian, a houſe ancient and well allied. But deſcending to the Havens mouth you may ſee Fenten-Gollan, in Engliſh Harteſ-well, lately the ſeat of Carminow a family anciently of high eſteeme for bloud and wealth, betweene whom and the Lord Scrope two hundred yeeres ſince, was a plea commenced in the Court of Chivalry, for bearing in a ſhield Azure a Bend Or.] Vnder which on the Sea ſide lieth the territorie of Roſſeland; ſo named, as ſome thinke, as if it were a roſe-plot: but as I ſuppoſe, becauſe it is an heath or place of lings: for ſo Ros ſignifieth in the Britiſh tongue. Whereof, Roſſe in Scotland, and another Roſſe in Wales have their names, as being tracts drie, hungry and barren: Howbeit, this heere, through the induſtrie of the husbandmen is more battle-ground and fruitfull. Beyond this Roſſeland preſently the Ocean (as the land retireth and giveth back) ſhooteth in and maketh a large Bay; they call it Tru-ar-draith Bay, which is by interpretation, The Bay of the towne upon the ſand: whereunto fall many freſh rillets, amongſt which that is principal which paſſeth by Lanladron, whoſe Lord S. Serlo Lanladron was ſummoned a Baron to the Parliament, in that age when the ſelect men for wiſedome and worth amongſt the Gentrie were called to Parliament, and their poſterity omitted if they were defective therein. Scarſe two miles from hence, whereas the river Fawey falleth into the Sea, lieth the Towne Fowey, Foath in Corniſh, ſtretching out in length upon the ſea banke: a Towne moſt renowned in former ages, for ſea-fights: which the very armes of the Towne doe witneſſe, as being compounded of the Cinque-ports arms, By the haven it hath bulwarks on both ſides built by King Edward the Fourth: who ſhortly after being diſpleaſed with theſe townesmen of Fowey, for that when the warre in France was compounded, they practiſed piracy upon the French; tooke from them all their ſhips and furniture for ſhipping. Von the other bank over againſt it ſtandeth Hall, ſituate on the hanging of an hill with a right pleaſant vvalke, the habitation full vvell knovvne of Sir Reginald Mohun Knight, of an ancient and noble houſe by birth, as deſcended from the Mohunes, of Somerſet, and the Courtneyes Earles of Devonſhire. Farther vvithin the countrie, and by the ſame river, VZELLA mentioned by Ptolomee is ſeated: vvhich tovvne hauing not loſt altogether the old name, is at this day called Leſt-uthiell: It ſtood anciently upon an high hill, vvhere the old

Britans have not the letter X.

A old caſtle Leſtmel now ſheweth his ruins: but it was removed lower into the valley. From the high ſituation it received the ancient name; for Vchel in the Britiſh tongue ſoundeth as much as [high] or [aloft]: whence * Vxellodunum alſo in France tooke the name, becauſe the towne ſtanding upon an hill had a very ſteep fall on every ſide. In the Britiſh ſtorie, this is called Pen-uchelcoit; that is, The high hill in the wood: which ſome would have to be Exceter. But the ſituation in Ptolomee, and the name remaining ſtill, prove this to be the ancient Vzella. In theſe our dayes, a ſmall towne it
B is and nothing populous, becauſe the river Fawey, which aforetime was wont at every tide or high water to flow unto the very towne and to beare and bring in ſhips, hath his channell ſo choked and damned up now with ſands, comming from the tinworkes (wherewith all the havens in this province are like in proceſſe of time to be choked up) as that it is hardly able to beare the leaſt barge that is. Howbeit, the chiefe towne it is of the whole countie, where the Shiriffe ſitteth judicially every moneth and determineth cauſes: and there the Warden of the Stannaries hath his priſon. It enjoyeth alſo the priviledge, by the bounteous favour, as themſelves ſay, of Edmund Earle of Cornwall (who there in times paſt had his honor) to ſeale or coyne the tin. But there bee two townes above the reſt that hinder the light and
C eclipſe the fame of this; to wit, on the Eaſt ſide thereof Leskerd, ſituat on the top of a very high hill, much frequented for the mercat, and renowned for an ancient caſtle there: and on the North ſide Bodman, which ſtandeth on the ſide hand of it ſcarſe two miles off: and is named (if I be not deceived) Boſuenna in the Corniſh tongue, and Bodminian in old Deeds and Charters. This towne ſituate thus in no healthy ſeat between two hils, and lying out in length Eaſt and Weſt, is for the mercat there kept, of great reſort, for the inhabitants populous, beautifull enough for building, and of name for their priviledge of coinage of tin: but more famous in ancient time for the Biſhops See there. For, about the yeere of our ſalvation 905, when the State of the Church lay in this tract altogether neglected, by vertue of a decree from Pope Formoſus, King
D Edward the Elder erected heere a Biſhops See, and granted at that time unto the Biſhop of Kirton, three villages in this countrie, Polton, Caling, and Lanwitham, that from thence every yeere he ſhould viſit the people of Cornwall, to fetch out of them their errours: for, before time they did what they could to reſiſt the truth, and obeied not the Apoſtolicall decrees. But afterwards, in the furious heat of that terrible Daniſh warre, the Biſhoprick was tranſlated to Saint Germans. Hard by Leskerd lyeth that which ſometime was the Church of S. Guerir, that is, (if you interpret it out of the Britiſh ſpeech) S. Leech or Phyſician: where, (as writeth Aſſerius) King Alfred lying proſtrate at his prayers, recovered out of a ſickneſſe. But when Neotus a man of ſingular holineſſe and learning, was afterwards entombed in the ſame Church, hee outſhone the E light of the other Saint, ſo as that in his memorie it was named Neoteſtow, that is, The place of Neotus, and now Saint Neoths: and the religious men that ſerved God therein were named Saint Neoths Clerkes, and had for their maintenance rich and large revenues, as we may ſee in William Conquerours booke. Neere unto this, as I have learned, within the pariſh of Saint Clare, there are to be ſeene in a place called Pennant, that is, The head of the vale, two monuments of ſtone: of which the one in the upper part is wrought hollow in manner of a Chaire: the other, named Otherhalfe ſtone, hath an inſcription of Barbarous characters, now in manner worne out, in this wiſe.

Which as I take it, ſhould be read thus, * DONIERT : ROGAVIT PRO ANIMA: unleſſe it pleaſe you to give this conjecture, that thoſe little pricks after DONIERT, are the reliques of the letter E: and then to read it after this manner, DONIERT EROGAVIT, as if he had given and beſtowed upon thoſe religious men, that peece of land, for his ſoule. As for Doneert, I cannot but thinke, he was that Prince of Cornwall, whom the Chronicles name Dungerth, and record, that he was drowned in the yeere of our Salvation 872.

* Doniert Prayer for the ſoule, &c.

Hard by, there is a number of good big rockes heaped up together, and under them, one Stone of leſſer ſize, faſhioned naturally in forme of a cheeſe, ſo as it ſeemeth to be preſſed like a cheeſe, whereupon it is named, Wring-cheeſe. Many other Stones beſides in ſome ſort foure ſquare, are to be ſeene upon the plaine adjoyning; of which ſeven or eight are pitched upright of equall diſtance aſunder. The neighbour Inhabitants terme them Hurlers, as being by a devout and godly error perſwaded, they had beene men ſometimes transformed into Stones, for profaning the Lords Day, with hurling the ball. Others, would have it to be a Trophee (as it were) or a monument, in memoriall of ſome battell: And ſome thinke verily they were ſet as meere ſtones or land marks, as having read in thoſe authors that wrote of Limits, that ſtone were gathered together of both parties, and the ſame erected for bounders. In this coaſt the river Loo maketh way and runneth into the ſea: and in his very mouth giveth name to two little townes, joyned with a bridge together. That on the Weſt ſide, which is the newer, flouriſheth moſt: but the other Eaſtward, time hath much decayed: although it bee a Corporation retaining ſtill the priviledge of a Maior and Burgeſſes. Somewhat Weſt-ward from this lieth Kilgarth the habitation of the Bevils of eſpeciall good note for antiquity and gentry. From Loo Eaſt-ward you meet with no memorable thing, but a ſmall river paſſing by Minhevet, whereby is Pole the ſeat of the Trelawnies, to whom with others the inheritance of the Courtneys Earles of Devon accrewed: untill you come to the Liver, a little river ſtored with oiſters, that runneth under S. Germans a ſmall towne, unto which during the tempeſtuous Daniſh warre, the Biſhops Sees were for feare tranſlated: where there is a prety Church dedicated unto S. German of Antiziodorum, who rooted out the hereſie of Pelagius, that

A that ſprung up againe in Britaine. Wherein after that ſome few Biſhops had ſitten, Levinus the Biſhop of Kirton, who was in great favour with Canutus the Dane, obtained by vertue of the Kings authoritie, that it ſhould be Joyned to his See. Since which time, there hath beene but one Biſhop over this Province and Denſhire both (whoſe ſeat is now at Exceter): and who appointed the little Towne of S. Germans to be the ſeat of his Suffragan. For at this day, it is nothing elſe but a village conſiſting of fiſhermens cabins, that make a good gainfull trade, by catching ſtore of fiſh in the Ocean and rivers neere adjoyning. Some few miles from hence, upon the ſame river ſtandeth Trematon, bearing the name of a Caſtle, though the wall bee halfe downe; in which, as we find in Domeſday booke, William Earle of Moriton had his Caſtle, and held his mercate, and was the capitall ſeat of the Baronie belonging to the Earles and Dukes of Cornwall, as we may ſee in the Inquiſitions. When the Liver is paſt this Caſtle, neere unto Saltaſh, ſometimes Eſſe, the habitation in old times of the * Valtorts, and now a Towne well repleniſhed with Merchants, and endowed with many priviledges, it runneth into the river Tamar, the bound of the whole countrey: where at the Eaſt-ſide Mont-Edgecombe, the ſeat of that ancient family of the Edgecombs, ſited moſt pleaſantly hath a proſpect into an haven underneath it, full of winding creekes. Next unto which is Anthony, a Towne memorable for the elegant building thereof, as alſo for a fiſh poole that letteth in the Ocean, and yeeldeth ſea-fiſh for profit and pleaſure both: but more memorable it is for the Lord thereof, Richard Carew, who ſo maintaineth his place and eſtate left unto him by his anceſtors, as that in ornaments of vertues he ſurmounteth them. Hitherto we have ſurveied the South coaſt: now let us take a view of the Northern alſo. The Northern-ſhore from the very lands end, having for a great length huge banks of ſand driven upon heapes againſt it, ſhooteth out firſt to a Towne running into the ſea with a long ridge like a tongue, called S. Ies, taking the name of one Ia an Iriſh woman that lived heere in great holineſſe, for anciẽtly it was named Pendinas. And from her the Bay underneath into which the little river Haile falleth, hath likewiſe received the name, for the Mariners call it S. Ies Bay. As for the Towne it ſelfe, it is now very ſmall: For, the North weſt wind that playes the tyrant in this coaſt by drifts of ſand hath ſo beaten upon it, that from thence it is tranſlated and removed. From hence the countrey on both ſides, ſtill Eaſtward, waxeth broader, and the Northern ſhore with a more crooked winding holdeth on * North-eaſt as far as Padſtow: neither all that way along hath it any thing ſavouring of antiquity, ſave onely a Chappell built in the ſands, to the honor of S. Piran, who being likewiſe an Iriſh Saint reſteth heere entombed: unto whoſe Sanctitie a certaine vaine writer in his childiſh folly hath aſcribed this miracle, that with three kine of his owne he fed ten Kings of Ireland and their armies eight dayes together: alſo that hee raiſed from death to life both pigs and men. Then, farther from the ſhore is ſeated S. Columbs a little mercate Towne, conſecrated to the memoriall of Columba a right devout woman and a martyr, & not of Columban the Scot, as now I am given to underſtand for certaine, out of her life. Neere unto which, but more to the ſea-ward, Lhanheton ſheweth it ſelfe, the ſeat of the Arondels, a familie of Knights degree, who for their faire lands and large poſſeſſions were not long ſince called, the Great Arondels. In ſome places they are written in Latin, De Hirundine, and not amiſſe, if my judgement be ought: For Hirundo, that is, a Swallow, is named Arondell in French: and in a ſhield ſables, they beare for their armes ſix Swallowes argent. Certes, a very ancient and renowned houſe this is, ſpreading far and neere the branches of their kinred and affinity: unto the name and coat-armour whereof William Brito a Poet alluded, when as he deſcribeth a valiant warriour out of this familie flying as it were upon William of Bar a French noble man, and aſſailing him, about the yeere of our Lord 1170. in theſe termes:

Lib. 3. Philippeios, of William Brito, who lived anno 1170.

——Hirundelæ velocior alite, quæ dat
Hoc agnomen ei, fert cujus in ægide ſignum,
Se rapit agminibus mediis, clypeoq; nitenti

Quem

Quem ſibi Guilielmus læva prætenderat ulna,
Immergit validam præacutæ cuſpidis haſtam.

* Swallow.

——more ſwift, than bird hight * Arondell
That giv's him name, and in his ſhield of armes emblazoned well,
He rides amid the armed troupes, and with his ſpeare in reſt
(The ſtaffe was ſtrong, the point right ſharpe) runs full upon the breſt
Of Sir Guillaum, and pierceth through his bright and glittering ſhield,
Which on left arme he for defence, againſt him ſtoutly held.

Within a little hereof, there is a double rampire intrenched upon the pitch of an hill, with a cauſey leading thereto, named, Caſtellan Denis, that is, The Danes Campe; becauſe the Danes when they preyed upon the coaſts of England, encamped themſelves there, like as they did in other places of this tract.

Caſtle Denis.

Nor farre from hence the river Alan, which alſo is called Camb-alan, and Camel, of the crooked windings & reaches that it makes in his courſe, (for ſo Cam with them doth ſignifie) runneth gently into the upper ſea: which river at the very mouth thereof hath Padſtow a pretty market towne, ſo called ſhort for Petrockſtow, (as we read in the Hiſtories of Saints) of one Petrocch a Britan, canonized a Saint by the people: who, ſpent his daies here in the ſervice of God, whereas before time it had the name of Lederic and Laffenac. The ſite of this Town is very commodious for traffique in Ireland, to which men may eaſily ſaile in foure and twentie houres. And much beautified it is with faire and goodly houſes adjoyning thereto, in manner of a Caſtle, built by N. Prideaux, a Gentleman of ancient gentry in thoſe Weſt parts. At the Spring-head of this river Alan, ſtandeth the little village Camelford, otherwiſe Gaffelford. Leland Judgeth, it was in old time called Kamblan, who writeth alſo, That King Arthur our Hector was there ſlaine: For, as hee recordeth, peeces of armour, rings, horſe-harneſſe of braſſe are otherwhiles digged up, and turned out of the ground by husbandmen: and the common fame that continued ſo many ages together, reporteth, that there was a notable battell fought in this place. There are alſo certaine verſes in an unkowne Poet living in the middle time, of Cambula flowing with bloud, ſhed in a battell of Arthur againſt Mordred: which I will not thinke much of my labour to put downe, becauſe they may ſeeme to have beene written in no bad Poeticall vaine.

Padſtow.

——Naturam Cambula fontis
Mutatam ſtupet eſſe ſui, tranſcendit inundans
Sanguineus torrens ripas, & volvit in æquor
Corpora cæſorum, plures natare videres
Et petere auxilium, quos undis vita reliquit.

Then Cambula was ſore agaſt, the nature chang'd to ſee
Of his ſpring-head, for now the ſtreame by this time gan to bee
All mixt with bloud, which ſwelling high the banks doth overflow,
And carry downe the bodies ſlaine, into the ſea below.
There might one ſee how many a man that ſwum and helpe did crave,
Was loſt among the billowes ſtrong, and water was their grave.

And in very deed (not to deny this of Arthur) I have read in Marianus, that the Britans and Saxons fought in this place a bloudy battell, in the yeere of our Lord 820, ſo that this may ſeeme a place conſecrated unto Mars. And if it be true that Arthur here died, the ſame coaſt was deſtined unto him for his death, as for his birth. For, on the ſhore hard by, ſtandeth Tindagium (the native place of that great Arthur) partly upon a little ridge, putting forth, as it were, a tongue; and partly within an Iland, having both of them ſometime a bridge betweene. They call it at this day Tindagel, beeing now a glorious ruine onely, in times paſt a ſtately Caſtle: of which a late Poet hath thus written:

Tindagel.

The place of Arthurs Nativitie.

Eſt locus Abrini ſinuoſo littore ponti
Rupe ſitus media, refluus quem circuit æſtus;
Fulminat hic latè turrito vertice caſtrum,
Nomine Tindagium veteres dixere Corini.

There

There is a place within the winding ſhore of Severne Sea
On mids a rocke about whoſe foote the tides turne-keeping play,
A Towry-topped Caſtle here farre thundreth over all,
Which Corniſhmen by ancient name, Tindagel Caſtle call.

A long diſcourſe it would aske to declare here out of Geffries hiſtory, how Uther Pendragon King of Britaine, within this Caſtle became enamoured upon the wife of Gorlois Prince of Cornwall; and how by Magick ſlights and deluſions, taking the ſhape of her husband upon him, diſhonourably violated the Ladie his wife, and of her begat the ſaid renowned Arthur. It may ſuffice, if I doe but alleage the verſes of our Poet Iohn Havillan. Architrenius.

——Facie dum falſus adulter
Tindagel irrupit, nec amoris Pendragon æſtum
Vincit, & omnificas Merlini conſulit artes,
Mentiturq; ducis habitus, & rege latente,
Induit abſentis præſentia Gorlois ora,

Whiles Pendragon that could not quench his flaming heats of love,
But beare a mind adult'rous ſtill, by meanes brake in above
To Tindagel, diſguiſ'd in face, by Merlin taught thereto,
By magicke and inchauntments ſtrange, which all ſuch feats could doe.
Duke Gorloes habite, abſent then that was, he tooke by guile;
But preſence of the King in place he did conceale the while.

This Uther Pendragon verily was a Prince flouriſhing in Martiall feats, & who valiantly upheld the decaying ſtate of his countrey againſt the Engliſh Saxons: But whether came from him, That Royall Banner in England, having the portraict of a Dragon with a golden head, whereof neighbour nations have had experience, and which in far Lands beyond ſea was under King Richard the Firſt, terrible to the Panims, I dare not avouch: I would beleeve rather, it was received from the Romans, who a long time uſed the Eagle, after that Marius had rejected the Enſignes of a Wolfe, of Minotaurus, of an Horſe, &c. And in the end under the latter Emperors, tooke them to the Dragon: Whereupon Claudianus writeth thus: Banners.

——Hij picta Draconum
Calla levant——

The banners theſe advance aloft
With ſpeckled necks of Dragons wrought.

And Nemeſianus:

Signa micant, ſinuatq; truces levis aura Dracones.

Their Enſignes ſhine, and Dragons fell that therein pictur'd ſhow, Wave to and fro with whiffes of wind, as it doth gently blow.

And Hoveden ſheweth, that the Weſt Saxon Kings uſed to carrie in their Banners, the Dragon. As for another Banner of the Engliſh, which Beda called Tufa, as alſo the Danes, Reafan, I will ſay nothing of them in this place, for feare I may ſeeme to have digreſſed too farre from my purpoſe. Betweene Padſtow and Tindagel, inwardly there extendeth a fruitfull veine, and therein flouriſh the families of Roſcarrock, Carnſew, Penkevell, Cavell, Pencavell, of ancient name and great reſpect in this coaſt. Tufa, a Banner.

Forward ſtill, Eaſtward on the ſame coaſt which is open, barren, and deſtitute of woods, there butteth upon the ſea Botereaux Caſtle, corruptly by the common people, called Boſcaſtle, built by the Lords Botereaux, who gave for their armes three Buffones, toads ſable in a ſhield Argent. William Botereaux was the firſt famous man of honour in this familie, who married Alice the daughter of Robert Corbet, whoſe ſiſter was Paramour to King Henrie the Firſt, of whom hee begat Reginald Earle of Cornwall. From this William there flouriſhed eleven ſucceſſively in order. But Margaret the onely daughter and ſole heire of the laſt, was wedded unto Robert Hungerford: by whoſe poſteritie the Inheritance is devolved upon the familie of the Haſtings, which inheritance was augmented, and became more honourable by marriages, Botereaux.

ges, that those of Botereaux contracted with the heires of the Noble houses, De Moeles, S. Laud, commonly called, S. Lo, and Thweng.

* De Sancto Laudo.

From hence the Land shooting forth into the Sea, extendeth it selfe so farre northward, that the countrey carrieth here full three and twenty miles in breadth, betweene the two seas, which hitherto went on still drawen after a sort together into a narrow streit. In this greatest breadth of it, standeth Stow upon the sea-side, the ancient habitation of the Creenvils: which verily for Antiquitie and Nobleneſſe of birth is a famous house: out of which one Richard, in the raigne of William * Rufus, was for his valour much renowned among those worthy Knights that subdued Glamorganshire in Wales: and another of late daies surnamed likewise Richard, for his magnanimitie surpassing the Nobilitie of his bloud, fighting most valiantly against the Spaniards at the Ilands of Tercera, lost his life, as I shall shew more fully in my Annals. To this Stratton lieth close to a market Towne of no meane name amongst the neighbours for their gardens, and good garlicke: and next unto it Lancels a faire new seat of that old family, de Calvo monte, or, Chanmond.

The river Tamara, now Tamar, shewing his head here not farre from the northern shore, taketh his course with a swift running streame southward; encreased with the channels of many rivelets hard by Tamara, a Towne mentioned by Ptolomee, now called Tamerton, by Tamar an ancient Mannour of the Trevilions, to whom by marriage, the Inheritance of Walesborough and Ralegh of Netlested descended: also, by Lanstephadon, that is, Saint Stephens, commonly and contractly Launston, which standeth farther off from his banke: a proper little Towne this is, situate upon the pitch of a prettie hill, which of two Burgards, Dunevet and Newport, is growne as it were, into one Burgh. At the first comming of the Normans, William Earle of Moriton, built a Castle there; and had a Colledge of * Chanons, or Secular Priests, as appeareth out of Domesday book, wherein it is named Launstaveton, of that Colledge, no doubt, built in the honour of Saint Stephen, which Reginald Earle of Cornwall, about the yeere of our Lord 1150, turned into a monasterie. Against which pious worke of his, the Bishops of Excester, carried away over much and seduced with humane and private affection, were verie maliciously bent, as fearing exceedingly, lest one day it would become a Bishops seat, and so prejudice and impeach their jurisdiction. At this day this Town is best knowne, by reason of the common Goale of the countrey, and the Assises, which are often times kept there.

The river Tamar.

Launston.

Then Tamar looketh up unto an high hil stretched out in length, with a vast head, which Marianus nameth Hengeroun, and interpreteth it, Hengists mount, commonly called, Hengston-hill. Which in times past was so plentifull of Tinne veines, that the countrey people had this by word of it, [Hengston downe well ywrought,] [Is worth London deere ybought.] And it was an ordinarie place, where every seven or eight yeere, the Stannarie men of Cornwall and Denshire, were wont in great frequencie, to assemble together, and to consult about their affaires. At this hill in the yeere of savation DCCCXXXI, the British Danmonij, who calling the Danes to aid them of purpose to break into Devonshire, that they might drive out the English from thence, who alreadie possessed themselves of the countrey, were pitiously defeated by King Egbert, and slaine almost to the very last man. Beneath it Tamar leaveth Halton the habitation of the Rouses, anciently Lords of Little Modbery in Devonshire, and running nigh unto Salt-Esse, a prettie market Towne seated in the descent of an hill, which hath a Major and certaine priviledges of their owne, as I said erewhile, it entertaineth the river Liver, on which standeth that same Towne of Saint Germans, whereof I spake before. And now by this time spreading broader, dischargeth it selfe into the Ocean, making the haven which in the life of Saint Indractus, is called Tamerworth, after it hath severed Cornwall from Denshire. For Athelstane, the first English King that brought this countrey absolute under his dominion, appointed this river to be the bound or limit, between the Britans of Cornwal, and his Englishmen after he had remooved the Britans out of Denshire, as witnesseth William of Malmsburie, who calleth it Tambra. Whereupon Alexander Necham, in his Praises of divine

Salt-Esse.

A vine wiſedome, writeth thus: Loegria Tamaris diviſor Cornubiæq́, Indigenas ditat pinguibus Iſicius.

Tamar that Lhoegres doth divide from Cornwall in the weſt,
The neighbour-dwellers richly ſerves with Salmons of the beſt.

The place requireth here, that I ſhould ſay ſomewhat of the holy and devout virgin Vrſula deſcended from hence, as alſo of the eleven thouſand Britiſh Virgins. But ſuch is the varietie of Writers, whiles ſome report they ſuffered martyrdome under Gratian the Emperour about the yeare of our Lord CCCLXXXIII, upon the coaſt of Germanie, as they ſailed to Armorica; others by Attila the Hun, that ſcourge of God, B in the yeare CCCCL. at Coline upon Rhene, as they returned from Rome; that with ſome it hath brought the truth of the Hiſtory into ſuſpition of a vaine fable. And as touching that Conſtantine, whom Gildas termeth a tyrannous whelpe of the uncleane Danmonian Lioneſſe; as alſo of the Diſforreſting of all this country, (for before-time it was reputed a Forreſt) let Hiſtorians ſpeake, for it is no part of my purpoſe. Saint Vrſula, and 11000. Virgins.

As for the Earles, none of Britiſh bloud, are mentioned but onely Candorus (called by others Cadocus) who is accounted by late writers, the laſt Earle of Cornwall, of Britiſh race, and as they which are skilfull in Heraldry, have a tradition, bare x v, Beſaunts v. IIII III. II. and I. in a ſhield Sable. But of the Normans bloud the firſt Earle was Robert of Moriton, halfe brother to William Conqueror, by Herlotta, their C mother; after whom ſucceeded William his ſonne: who when hee had ſided with Robert of Normandie againſt Henry the Firſt, King of England, being taken priſoner in battell, loſt both his libertie, and his honours; and at laſt turned Monke at Bermondſey. Then Reginald, a baſe ſonne of Henrie the Firſt, by the daughter of Sir Robert Corbet, (for, that King plied getting children ſo luſtfully, as that hee was father of thirteene Baſtards) was placed in his roome. This Reginald dying without iſſue male legitimate, King Henry the Second, having aſſigned unto his daughters certaine lands and Lordſhips, reſerved this Earledome to himſelfe, for the behoofe of his owne youngeſt ſonne Iohn, a child of nine yeares old, upon whom his brother Richard the Firſt conferred it afterwards with other Earledomes. This Iohn afterward D was crowned King of England, and his ſecond ſonne Richard, was by his brother King Henry the Third, endowed with this honour, and the Earledome of Poicton: a Prince verily in thoſe daies puiſſant, in Gods ſervice devout and religious, in war right valiant, for counſell ſage and prudent, who in Aquitaine fought battels with fortunate ſucceſſe, and ſhewed much valour: and having made a voyage into the Holy Land, enforced the Sarazens to make truce with him: the Kingdome of Apulia, offered unto him by the Pope he refuſed; the troubles and tumults in England, he often times compoſed; and in the yeare of our Lord MCCLVII. by ſome of the Princes Electours of Germany was choſen King of the Romans, and crowned at Aquiſgrane: whereupon, as if he had made meanes thereto by money, this verſe was ſo rife and currant E every where. Earles of Cornwall. Robert de Monte. 1175.

Nummus ait pro me, nubit Cornubia Romæ.
For me, my money, ſaieth this,
Cornwall to Rome now wedded is.

For, ſo well monied he was before, that one, who then lived, hath put downe in writing, that for ten yeares together hee might diſpend one hundred markes a day. But when as Germanie was all on a light fire with civil warres among competitors of the Empire, he returned quickly into England, where he departed this life, and was interred in the famous Monaſtery of Hales which he had built; a little after that his firſt begotten ſon Henry, newly in his return from the Holy Land, whiles he was at divine F ſervice, devoutly occupied within a church at Viterbium in Italy, was by Guy de Montfort, ſon of Simon Montfort Earle of Leceiſter, in revenge of his fathers death, wickedly ſlaine. Edmund therefore, his ſecond ſon ſucceeded in the Earledome of Cornwall; who died without any lawfull iſſue: and ſo his high and great eſtate of inheritance returned to King Edward the Firſt, as who was the next unto him in bloud, and * found (as our Lawyers ſay) his heire. Whereas that Richard and Edmund his ſonne, Princes * Hæres inventus.

of the bloud Royall of England, bare divers Armes from the Armes Royall of England, to wit, in a ſhield argent, a Lyon rampant, gules crowned, or, within a border ſables Bezante, I have with others oftentimes much marvelled at: neither (I aſſure you) can I alleage any other reaſon, but that they in this point imitated the houſe Royall of France, (for the manner of bearing Armes came from the French men unto us.) For, the younger ſonnes of the Kings of France, even to the time wee now ſpeake of, bare other coats than the Kings themſelves did, as we may ſee in the family of Vermandois, Dreux, and Courtney: and as Robert Duke of Burgundy, brother to Henrie the Firſt, King of France, tooke unto him the ancient ſhield of the Dukes of Burgundie: ſo we may well thinke, that this Richard having received the Earledome of Poicton, from Henry the Third his brother, aſſumed unto him that Lyon gules crowned, which belonged to the Earles of Poicton before him, (as the French writers doe record) and added thereto the border garniſhed with Beſaunts, out of the ancient coat of the Earles of Cornwall. For ſo ſoone as the younger ſonnes of the Kings of France began to beare the Armes of France with differences, ſemblably they did among us, and began firſt at Edward the Firſt his children. But whither am I carried away from my purpoſed matter, as forgetting my ſelfe in the delight I take of mine owne ſtudie, and profeſſion? When Cornwall was thus reverted unto the Crowne, King Edward the Second, who had received from his father faire lands and poſſeſſions here, beſtowed the title of Earle of Cornwall, upon Piers Gaveſton a Gaſcon, who had enſnared his youth by the allurements of corrupt life: But when as hee for corrupting the Prince, and for other heinous crimes, was by the Nobles intercepted, and beheaded; there ſucceeded him Iohn of Eltham, a younger ſonne of Edward the Second, advanced thereto by his brother Edward the Third, who dying young, and without iſſue alſo, Edward the Third erected Cornwall into a Dukedome, and inveſted Edward his ſonne a Prince moſt accompliſhed with martiall proweſſe, in the yeare of Chriſt 1336. Duke of Cornwall, by a wreath on his head, a Ring upon his finger, and a ſilver verge. Since which time, that I may note ſo much under warrant of record, (let the skilfull Lawyers judge thereof) the King of Englands eldeſt ſonne is reputed Duke of Cornwall by birth, and by vertue of a ſpeciall Act, the very firſt day of his nativitie is preſumed and taken to be of full and perfect age, ſo that he may ſue that day for his liverie of the ſaid Dukedome, and ought by right to obtaine the ſame, as well as if hee had beene full one and twentie yeares old: and he hath his Royalties in certaine actions, in Stannary matters, in wracks at ſea, cuſtomes, &c. yea, and divers miniſters or officers aſſigned unto him, for theſe and ſuch like matters. But more plainly, and fully inſtructed are we in theſe points by Richard Carew of Anthony, a Gentleman innobled no leſſe in regard of his Parentage, and deſcent, than for his vertue, and learning, who hath publiſhed, and perfected the deſcription of this countrey more at large, and not in a ſlight, and meane manner, whom I muſt needs acknowledge to have given me much light herein.

DENSHIRE.

THe neerer or hithermore region of the Danmonians, that I ſpeake of, is now commonly called Denſhire, by the Corniſh-Britaines Deuinan, and by the Welſh Britaines Duffneint, that is, Low valleies, for that the people dwell for the moſt part beneath in vales: by the Engliſh Saxons Deven-ſcyne, whereof grew the Latine name Devonia, and by that contraction, which the vulgar people uſeth, Denſhire; and not of the Danes, as ſome ſmatterers of meane knowledge moſt ſtifly maintaine: a countrey which as it extendeth it ſelfe both waies wider than Cornwall, ſo is it harborous on either ſide with more commodious Havens, no leſſe inriched with tin mines, eſpecially Weſt-ward; garniſhed with pleaſanter medowes, ſightly with greater ſtore of woods, and paſſing well repleniſhed with Townes, and buildings. But the ſoile in ſome places againe, is as leane, and barren: which not withſtanding yieldeth fruit to the Husbandman plenteouſly, ſo that he be skilfull in husbandry, and both can take paines, and be able withall to defray the coſt. Neither is there in all England almoſt any place where the ground requireth greater charges: For, in moſt parts thereof it groweth in manner barren, if it be not overſtrewed, and mingled with a certaine ſand from the Sea, which is of great efficacie to procure fertilitie, by quickning, as it were, and giving life unto the glebe: and therefore in places far from the ſhore it is bought at a deare rate.

Sand, making grounds fruitfull.

In deſcribing of this region, I will firſt travell over the Weſt-ſide, as the river Tamara runneth along, and then the South coaſt which bordereth on the Ocean: From whence by the Eaſterne bounds where it confineth upon Dorſet, & Sommerſet ſhires, I will returne backe unto the Northern, which is hemmed in with the Severne Sea.

Tamar which divideth theſe two ſhires, firſt on this part receiveth into it from the Eaſt a rivelet called Lid, which paſſeth by Coriton, and K. Sidenham ſmall townlets, but which have given ſurnames to ancient, and worſhipfull families, to Lidſtow a little mercate Towne, and Lidford, now a ſmall village, but in ancient time, a famous Towne, which in the yeare 997. was moſt grievouſly ſhaken, and diſpoiled by the furious rage of the Danes, (which as it is written in that booke, whereby William the Firſt tooke the ſurvey and value of England) was not wont to be rated and aſceaſed at any other time, nor otherwiſe than London was. That little river Lid, here at the bridge, gathered into a ſtreight, and pent in between rocks, runneth downe amaine, and holloweth the ground daily more and more ſo deepe, that his water is not ſeene; only a roaring noiſe is heard to the great wonder of thoſe that paſſe over.

Beneath it, Tamar receiveth Teave a little river, on which Teaviſtok, commonly called Taviſtoke flouriſheth, a town in times paſt famous for the Abbey there, which Ordulph, the ſon of Ordgare Earle of Devonſhire, (admoniſhed by a viſion from heaven) built about the yeare of our Saviour Chriſt Dccccl xj. a place, as William of Malmesburie deſcribeth it, Pleaſant in regard of the groves ſtanding ſo conveniently about it, and of the plenteous fiſhing there, for the handſome and uniforme building alſo of the Church, for the ſewers from the river paſſing downe along by the houſes of office, which runne with ſuch a force of their owne, that they carry away with them all the ſuperfluitie they find. Saint Rumon is much ſpoked of, and lies as Biſhop there. There is to be ſeene alſo in the ſame Abbey, the Sepulchre of that Ordgar before named: and the huge bigneſſe of his ſonnes tomb, who was called Ordulph, is thought to be a rare thing worth the ſight: for he was a man of a mighty ſtature giant like, and of exceeding great ſtrength, as who was able to burſt in ſunder the bars of great gates, and to ſtride over the rivelet there, ten foote broad; if ye liſt to believe the ſaid William. But ſcarcely had this Abbey ſtood thirty yeare after it was firſt founded, when the Danes in their ſpoyling rage burnt it to the ground: yet it flouriſhed againe, and by a laudable ordinance, lectures therein were kept of our ancient language (I meane the Engliſh Saxon tongue) which continued even to our fathers daies; for feare leſt the ſaid language (a thing that now is well neere come to paſſe) ſhould be forgotten. Tamar having thus received the Teave, draweth now very neere unto his mouth, where he and the river Plime together fall into the Ocean: of which river the Towne adjoyning to it, is called Plimmouth: ſometime named Sutton: and ſeemeth to have conſiſted of two parts. For, we read in the Parliamentary Acts, of Sutton * Vautort, and Sutton Prior, becauſe it belonged partly to the family of the Vautorts, and partly to the Prior. Of late time it became of a poore fiſher village to be a great Towne, and for the number of Inhabitants growne to that paſſe, (as now it is to be ſeene) that it may bee compared with a Citie. Such is the commodiouſneſſe of the haven, which without ſtriking ſaile admitteth into the boſome thereof the talleſt ſhips that be, & doth harbour them very ſafely, as well within Tamar as Plime, and beſide againſt hoſtilitie ſufficiently fortified: For, before the very midſt of the havens mouth, lieth S. Michaels Iſle, ſtrongly fortified both by nature, and art: as for the haven it ſelfe at the very Towne, it hath fortifications on both ſides, and is chained over when need requireth, having on the South ſide a Pier againſt it, and upon an hill next adjoyning a Caſtle built, as it is thought, by the * Vautorts. The whole Towne is divided into foure * Wards, governed by a *Major, ordained there by K. Henry the Sixth, and under him every ward had in times paſt a Captaine ſet over it, each of them likewiſe had his inferiour officers. As touching that fabulous wreſtling betweene Corinæus, and Gogmagog the Giant in this place, let it ſuffice to ſet downe a verſe or two out of Architrenius concerning the ſame, and the Weſterne Giants.

These martiall monſters, Giants ſtrong, by Corinæus ſlaine;
With Gogmagog twelve cubits high, a combat did remaine:
Whom up he hang'd twixt heaven and earth, (thus once Alcides hung Antæus fell) and from the rock into the Sea him flung.
His bloud gave Thetis the waves to drinke (her ſelfe therewith was drunke)
His griſly ghoſt had Cerberus, when body torne was ſunke.

As for that rock, from whence, they ſay, this Giant was caſt down, it is now called the Haw: a very hill ſtanding between the Town and the Ocean: on the top whereof, which lieth ſpred into a moſt pleaſant plaine, there is a right delectable, and goodly proſpect every way, and for the uſe of Sailers a very faire Compaſſe erected. The circuit of this Town not great, but much renowned it is among forraine nations: and not ſo much for the commodious haven, as the valour of the Inhabitants in ſea ſervices of all ſorts. For (to ſay nothing of all others) from hence was Sir Francis Drake that famous Knight, and moſt skilfull man at ſea in our daies; who firſt (as I have heard himſelfe relate) to repaire thel oſſes which he had ſuſtained at the Spaniards hands, for two yeares ſpace together with victorious ſucceſſe held and kept the Bay of Mexico as it were beſieged, and travailed over the * Iſthmus of Dariena: From whence when he had once beheld the South ſea (as the Spaniards call it) as another Themiſtocles ſtirred up with the Trophees of Miltiades, thought hee ſhould have neglected himſelfe, his country, and his owne glory, unleſſe he ſailed over it, which continually preſented it ſelfe as an object to his adventurous mind. In the yeare therefore 1577. putting to ſea from hence, he entred into the ſtreits of Magellan, and in two yeares and ten moneths, through many alternative varieties of fortune, God being his guide, and valour his conſort, was the next after Magellanus, that ſailed round about the world. Whereupon, one wrote thus unto him.

Sir Drake, whom well the worlds end knows, which thou did'ſt compaſſe round:
And whom both poles of heaven once ſaw, which North and South doe bound:
The Starres above will make thee knowne, if men here ſilent were,
The Sunne himſelfe cannot forget his fellow-travailler.

The reſt of his noble exploits, and of others who deſcended from hence taking example by him, flouriſhed in glorious atchivements by ſea, ſeeing it belongs not to this place, let Hiſtorians record in writing. Neither have I ought elſe to ſay more of
B this Towne, but that in the raigne of William *Rufus, there flouriſhed heere one Ealphege, a learned and married Prieſt. For, untill the yeare 1102. Prieſts in England were not forbidden to have their wives. Then, Anſelme Archbiſhop of Canterbury violently forced both the ſacred Scripture, and nature alſo, as our writers in thoſe daies doe complaine, and namely, Henry of Huntingdon expreſly of Anſelme in theſe termes: He prohibited Engliſh Prieſts to have wives, who before-time were not prohibited. Which, as ſome thought to be a matter of greateſt puritie: ſo others againe tooke it to be moſt perilous, leſt while by this meanes they aimed at cleanneſſe above their power, they ſhould fall into horrible uncleanneſſe, to the exceeding great ſhame of Chriſtianitie.

More inward in the country, and yet not farre from the water of Plim, is Plimpton
C ſeated, a mercate Towne, well frequented, where the remnants, and deformed ruines of a Caſtle ſhew themſelves: of which many men have holden as our Lawyers terme it, in Caſtle guard; for it was the chiefe ſeat of the Redverſies, or the Riparii, (for both we read) who were Barons of Plimpton, and Earles of Denſhire. Next unto this, ſtood Plimpton S. Mary, the glorie whereof then fell to decay, when as not long ſince the Colledge there of Canons was diſſolved, which William Watlewaſt, Biſhop of Exceter, in old time had founded. More, Eaſtward you ſee Modburie, a little Towne, which acknowledgeth it ſelfe to appertaine to the ancient and right worſhipfull family of the Campernulphs, Knights, who alſo are called in old Deeds De campo Arnulphi, but commonly Champernouns, which received much advancement and reputation by the heire of the Uautorts.

From Plims mouth, where the South ſhore of this region beginneth, the conntrey runneth along with a large and great front as farre as to Stert, a cape or promontorie (for, ſo the word in the Engliſh Saxon tongue ſignifieth) but ſo ſoone as the ſhore hath drawne it ſelfe back land-ward, the river Dert breaketh out, which ariſing from the inward part of the country runneth downe apace, through certaine leane and high grounds, called thereupon Dertmore, (wherein of late were Lode ſtones found) and carrieth downe with it certaine grit, and ſand out of the Tin-mines, (which by little and little choke up the channell) through the Forreſt of Dortmore, where David
E of Sciredun held lands in Sciredun, and Siplegh, by this tenure or ſervice, to find two arrowes, when the King his ſoveraigne Lord ſhould come to hunt in that Forreſt: From thence by Dertinton, a Baronie ſometimes of the Martins, who were Lords of Keimes in Wales, it holdeth in his ſtreame unto Totnes. Which being an ancient little Towne ſtanding pendant upon the fall of an hill, Eaſt, and Weſt, flouriſhed ſometime in great honour. It paid no * tribute, as we find in Doomeſday, the ſurvey-book of England, but when Exceter paid; and then it yielded xl.d. and did ſervice, if any expedition marched by land, or went by ſea: and Totnes, Barneſtaple and Lidford ſerved and paid, as much as Exceter. King John granted unto it power to chuſe a Major for the chiefe Magiſtrate: Edward the Firſt enriched it with ſundry liberties; and about that time it was fortified with a Caſtle by the Zouches, as the Inhabitants are perſwaded. The F poſſeſſion it was in times paſt of one Iudaël, ſurnamed De Totnais; afterwards of William Briwer a right noble perſonage, by one of whoſe daughters it came to the Breoſes, and from them by a daughter likewiſe to George De * Cantelupo, Lord of Abergeveny, whoſe ſiſter Melicent wedded unto Eudo De la Zouch, brought it in by her marriage to the family of the Barons La Zouches: and theirs it was, untill that John, Lord Zouch being attaint and proſcribed, becauſe hee tooke part with King Richard the Third, Henry the Seventh beſtowed it franckly (as I have heard ſay) upon Peter Edgecombe a noble and wiſe gentleman. Adjoyning to this towne is Berie Pomerie, ſo called of the Pomeries a right noble houſe in thoſe parts, which a little more Eaſtward, and ſomewhat farther from the river ſide, had a very proper Caſtle of their owne. Theſe derive their pedigree from Radulph Pomerie, who in William Conquerors time held Wich, Dunwineſdon, Brawerdine, Pudeford, Horewood, Toriland, Helecom, and this Berie, &c. Of this Totnes, the ſtrond or ſhore adjoyning, was called in old time Totoneſe: where (as the Britiſh Hiſtorie ſaith) Brutus the founder of the Britiſh nation firſt landed, and Havillanus, as a Poet, relying thereon verſified in this wiſe:

Inde dato curſu, Brutus comitatus Achate,
Gallorum ſpoliis cumulatis nauibus æquor
Exarat, & ſuperis, auraq́; faventibus uſus,
Littora fœlices intrat Totoneſia portus.

Thence hoiſing ſailes with Gauliſh ſpoiles the fleet fraight ſea doth take Our Brutus with his truſtieſt friend; and through waves way doth make:
The Gods lookt cheerefull on his courſe, the wind he had at will;
At Totneſſe ſhore, that happy haven, arriv'd he and ſtood ſtill.

But, that river Dert, whereof I ſpake, having paſſed beyond Totnes bridge, at which it leaveth whole heape of ſands brought downe by his ſtreame from out of the Tin mines, hath for proſpect on both ſides, nothing but fruitfull fields, untill hee come all weary with his long courſe, to his mouth; over which upon an hill reaching forth in length, ſtandeth Dertmouth a Port Towne, by reaſon of the commodious haven, defended with two Caſtles, much frequented with Merchants and furniſhed with very good ſhipping. A Major it hath, by the grant of King Edward the Third. For Lords it acknowledged long ſince the Zouches, Nicolas of Teukesbury, and the Brients, according to the variable change of the times: and hath ſundry times defended it ſelfe ſtoutly againſt the French: but eſpecially in the yeare of Chriſt 1404. Monſieur De Caſtell, a Frenchman, who by his men of warre and piracies had ſtopped all intercourſe of traffique in thoſe parts, and burnt Plimmouth, whiles hee invaded this place, was by women, and country people intercepted, and ſlaine with all his companie. And heere I muſt not paſſe over in ſilence Stoke Fleming that lieth hard by, and which taking that name of a noble man of Flanders, ſometime Lord thereof, came by the daughter of Mohun to the Carewes.

From this place, as the ſhore giveth backe Northward, the ſea followeth in upon it, and by that meanes with a large and ſpacious creeke, which taketh about ten miles in circuit maketh a bay, called now Torbay: a very ſafe rode and harbour for ſhips when the South-weſt wind is aloft; and hath faſt by it a little village ſo called, where ſometime the Briewrs dwelt, and built a religious houſe, who in the daies of King Richard the Firſt, and King John, were men of great renowne and revenue: and afterward the habitation it was of the Wakes. Neere unto it is Cockington, where the family of the Caries (a different houſe from that of the Carewes) hath flouriſhed a long time in great honour and eſtimation; out of which the Barons of Hunſdon, concerning whom I will ſpeake more in due place, are deſcended. A little higher appeares in ſight Hacombe, the habitation in old time of Sir Iordan Fitz-Stephen Knight, ſurnamed of this place, de Hacombe: by whoſe daughter and heire Cecilie, it came into the familie of the Archdeacons; From which likewiſe by Hugh Courtney in proceſſe of time, it was devolved upon the Carewes, whoſe houſe in theſe parts is reputed very worſhipfull, and ſpred into many branches. For, Jane the daughter of the ſaid Hugh, and heire to her mother, being joyned in mariage to Nicolas Baron Carew, brought him many children: and when the eldeſt of them, named Thomas, uſed not his mother with ſuch dutifull reſpect as a ſonne ought, ſhe made a conveyance of that great, and wealthy inheritance to her three younger ſonnes (from whom thoſe three families of the Carews, de Hacombe, Anthony, and Bery are ſprung) and to Iohn Vere, a ſonne that ſhe had by a ſecond husband, from whom the Earles of Oxford are iſſued.

Then

A Then meet you with Teignemouth a little village at the mouth of the river Teigne, whereof it hath alſo the name: where the Danes that were ſent before to diſcover the ſcituation of Britaine, and to ſound the landing places, being firſt ſet a ſhore about the yeare of Salvation 800. and having ſlaine the governour of the place, tooke it as an ominous good token of future victorie; which indeed afterward they followed with extreme crueltie through the whole Iſland. More inward, neere unto the ſource of the river Teigne is Chegford ſeated, where flouriſhed ſometime the noble family of the Prows: then Chidley, which gave the name to that great houſe, and linage of the Chidleyes: and next unto the very mouth thereof, Biſhops Teignton, ſo called becauſe B it belonged to the Biſhops; in which becauſe there was a Sanctuarie, Iohn Grandiſon deſcended out of Burgundy, Biſhop of Exceter, as preſaging what would enſue in future time built a very faire houſe, to the end that his Succeſſors (theſe are the very words of his teſtament) might have a place whereon to leane, and lay their heads, if happily their Temporalities ſhould be ſeized into the Kings hands. But ſo farre was it off that his purpoſe tooke effect, that his ſucceſſors have not onely loſt that houſe, but alſo beene quite deſſeized now well neere of all the reſt.

Danes when they firſt entred Britaine.

About ſix miles from thence, the river * Iſc, whereof Ptolomee maketh mention, which the Britaines call Iſc, and the Engliſh-Saxons Ex, with a large channell runneth into the Ocean. Whether it tooke this name of Iſcaw, that ſignifieth in the Britiſh tongue Elders trees, I wot not. Some fetch it from Reeds, which the Britaines C call Heſk, wherewith Northerne nations, (and ſuch are the Britaines) thatched, and covered their houſes, yea and faſtened together, as it were, with ſoder, the joynts of their ſhips. But conſidering that there be no reeds heere found, I am not haſty to give credit thereto. This river hath his head, and ſpringeth firſt in a weely, and barren ground named Exmore, neere unto Severn ſea, a great part whereof is counted within Sommerſetſhire: and wherein, there are ſeene certaine monuments of anticke worke, to wit, Stones pitched in order, ſome triangle wiſe, others in a round circle: and one among the reſt with an Inſcription in Saxon letters, or Daniſh rather, to direct thoſe (as it ſhould ſeeme) who were to travaile that way. Now this Ex or Iſc be- D ginning his courſe firſt from thence Southward by Twifordton, ſo called of two foords, but commonly Teverton, a Towne ſtanding much upon clothing, to the great gaine, and credit thereof, paſſeth forward through a faire country of good, and fertile fields, and is augmented with two eſpecial rivelets, Creden from the Weſt, and Columb from the Eaſt. Upon Creden in the Primitive Church of the Saxons, there flouriſhed an Epiſcopall See, in a Towne of the ſame name, anciently called Cridiantun, now by contraction Kirton: where that Winifride or Boniface was borne, who converted the Heſſians, Thuringers, and Friſians of Germany unto Chriſt, and for that was accounted the Apoſtle of Germany, and canonized a Saint. At this preſent, it is of no great reckoning, but for a ſmall market, and the Biſhop of Exceter his houſe there: E but within our fathers remembrance of much greater name, and requeſt it was for a Colledge there of twelve Prebendaries, who now are all vaniſhed and gone. The river Columb that commeth from the Eaſt, paſſeth hard by Columbton, a little Towne bearing his name: which King Alfred by his Teſtament, bequeathed to his younger ſonne: and neere unto Poltimore the ſeate of that worſhipfull, and right ancient family of Bampfield, intermingleth it ſelfe with the waters of Ex. And now by this time, Iſc or Ex growing bigger, and ſporting himſelfe, as it were, with ſpreading into many ſtreames, very commodious for mils, hieth apace, and commeth cloſe to the Citie of Exceſter, unto which he leaveth his name: whereupon Alexander Necham writeth thus, in his Poem of Divine ſapience:

beene reſident; Whereas, wee ſhall ſhew hereafter that it kept ſtation, and reſidence in * Isca Silvrvm. The Engliſh-Saxons termed it Exanceaſtep, and Monketon, of the Monks, at this day it is called Exceſter, in Latine Exonia, in Britiſh Caerisk, Caeauth, and Pencaer, that is, a head or principall Citie. For Caer, (to tell you once for all) with our * Britans is as much to ſay, as a Citie, whereupon they uſe to name Jeruſalem, Caer Salem; Lutetia or Paris, Caer Paris; Rome, Caer Ruffaine. Thus Carthage in the Punick tongue, was called, as Solinus witneſſeth, Cartheia, that is, the new Citie. I have heard likewiſe, that Caer in the Syriack tongue, ſignified, a Citie. Now ſeeing that the Syrians, as all men confeſſe, peopled the whole world with their Colonies, it may ſeeme probable, that they left their tongue alſo to their poſteritie, as the mother of all future languages. This Citie, as ſaith William of Malmesbury, albeit the ſoile adjoyning bee wet, foule and wealie, ſcarce able to bring forth hungry oates, and many times emptie huskes without graine in them, yet by reaſon of the ſtatelineſſe of the place, the riches of the Inhabitants, and frequent concourſe of ſtrangers, all kind of traffique, and commerce of merchants is there ſo freſh, that a man can aske there for no neceſſary, but hee may have it. Scituate it is on the Eaſtward banke of the river Ex, upon a little hill gently ariſing with an eaſie aſcent to a pretty heighth, the pendant whereof lieth Eaſt, and Weſt, environed about with ditches, and very ſtrong walles, having many turrets orderly interpoſed, and containeth in circuit a mile and a halfe, having ſuburbs running out a great way on each ſide. In it there are xv. Pariſh-Churches, and in the very higheſt part thereof, neere the Eaſt gate, a Caſtle called Rugemont, ſometime the ſeat of the Weſt Saxon Kings, and afterwards of the Earles of Cornwall: but at this day commended for nothing elſe, but the antiquitie and ſcituation thereof. For it commandeth the whole Citie, and territorie about it, and hath a very pleaſant proſpect into the ſea. In the Eaſt quarter of the City, is to be ſeen the Cathedrall Church in the midſt of many faire houſes round about it, founded as the private hiſtory of the place witneſſeth, by King Athelſtan in the honour of Saint Peter, and repleniſhed with Monks: which Church at length Edward the Confeſſor after he had remooved ſome of the Monks from thence to Weſtminſter, and tranſlated thither the Biſhops Sees of Cornwall, and Kirton, adorned with Epiſcopall Dignitie, and made Leofrike the Britan firſt Biſhop there: whoſe Succeſſours augmented the Church both with Edifices, and alſo with revenues: and William Bruier the ninth Biſhop after him, when the Monks were diſplaced, brought in a Deane, and twentie and foure Prebendaries. In which age flouriſhed Joſeph Iſcanus borne heere, and from hence taking his ſurname, a Poet of moſt excellent wit, whoſe writings were ſo well approved, as that they had equall commendation with the works of ancient Poets: For, his Poem of the Trojan war, was divulged once or twice in Germanie under the name of Cornelius Nepos.

When this Citie * Iſca came under the Roman Juriſdiction it appeareth not for certaine: For, ſo farre off am I from thinking that Veſpaſian wonne it, (as Geffrey of Monmouth affirmeth) what time as he warring in Britaine under Claudius the Emperour, was ſhewed by the Deſtinies unto the world, that I thinke it was then ſcarcely built. Yet in the time of the Antonines, it may ſeeme to have beene well knowne: for hither, and no farther this way did Antonine ſpecifie any place in his way-faring book. It came not fully to the Engliſh-Saxons hands before the 465. yeare after their entrance into Britain. For, at that time Athelſtane expelled the Britans quite out of the Citie, who before had inhabited it in equall right with the Saxons, yea, and drave them beyond Tamar, and then fortified the Citie round about with a rampire, and wall of foureſquare ſtone, and other bulwarks for defence. Since which time, many benefits by the Kings have beene beſtowed upon it, and among the reſt, as we read in William the Conquerours * booke, This Citie paide no tribute, but when London, Yorke, and Winchester paide, and that was halfe a marke of ſilver for a ſouldiers ſervice. And when there was any expedition ſet out either by ſea or land, it ſerved in proportion to five hides. It hath beene likewiſe from time to time much afflicted, once ſpoiled and ſore ſhaken, by the furious outrages of the Danes, in the yeare of our redemption

And ſcarcely began it to flouriſh againe, when William the Conquerour, moſt ſtraightly beleaguered it: when the Citizens in the meane while thought it not ſufficient to ſhut their gates againſt him, but malapartly let flie taunts, and flouts at him: but when a piece of their wall fell downe, by the ſpeciall hand of God, as the Hiſtorians of that age report, they yielded immediatly thereupon. At which time, as we find in the ſaid ſurvey-booke of his, The King had in this Citie three hundred houſes: it paid fifteene pounds by the yeare, and fortie houſes were
B deſtroyed after that the King came into England. After this it was thrice beſieged, and yet it eaſily avoided all: Firſt, by Hugh Courtney Earle of Denſhire in that civill warre betweene the two houſes of Lancaſter and Yorke: then, by Perkin Warbecke that imaginarie, counterfeit and pretended Prince, who being a young man of a very baſe condition, faining himſelfe to be Richard Duke of Yorke, the ſecond ſonne of King Edward the Fourth, ſtirred up dangerous ſtirres againſt Henrie the Seventh: thirdly, by ſeditious Rebels of Cornwall, in the yeare of Chriſt 1549: at which time the Citizens, moſt grievouſly pinched though they were with ſcarcitie of all things, continued nevertheleſſe in their faith and allegeance, untill that Iohn Lord Ruſſell, raiſed the ſiege, and delivered them.

C But Exceſter received not ſo great damage at theſe enemies hands, as it did by certaine dammes, which they call Weares, that Edward Courtney Earle of Denſhire, taking high diſpleaſure againſt the Citizens, made in the river Ex, which ſtop the paſſage ſo, that no veſſell can come up to the Citie; but ſince that time all merchandize is carried by land from Topeſham three miles off. And albeit it hath beene decreed by Act of Parliament, to take away theſe Weares, yet they continue there Weare.

As touching the Geographicall deſcription of this place, the old tables of Oxford have ſet downe the longitude thereof to bee nineteene degrees, and eleven ſcruples: the latitude fiftie degrees, and fortie ſcruples or minutes.

This Citie; that I may not omit ſo much, hath had three Dukes. For, Richard the Dukes of Exceſter.
Second of that name, King of England, created Iohn Holland Earle of Huntingdon and his brother by the mothers ſide, the firſt Duke of Exceſter: whom Henrie the Fourth depoſed from this dignitie, and left unto him the name onely of Earle of Hun-
E tingdon: and ſoone after for conſpiracie againſt the King he loſt both it and his life by the hatchet. Some few yeares after, Henry the Fifth ſet in his place Thomas See the Earles Beaufort of the houſe of Lancaſter, and Earle of Dorſet, a right noble and worthy of Dorſet.
warriour. When he was dead leaving no iſſue behind him, John Holland ſonne of that aforeſaid John, (as heire unto his brother Richard who died without children, and to his father both) being reſtored to his bloud, by the favour and bounty of King Henry the Sixth recovered his fathers honor; and left the ſame to Henry his ſonne, who ſo long as the Lancaſtrians ſtood upright, flouriſhed in very much honor; but afterwards when the family of Yorke, was a-float and had rule of all, gave an example to teach men, how ill truſting it is to great Fortunes. For this was that ſame Henry, Duke of Exceſter, who albeit he had wedded King Edward the Fourth his ſiſter, was Philip Comineus, cap. 50.
F driven to ſuch miſerie, that he was ſeene all tottered, torne, and barefooted to begge for his living in the Low countries. And in the end after Barnet field fought, wherein he bare himſelfe valiantly againſt Edward the Fourth, was no more ſeene, untill his dead bodie (as if he had periſhed by Shipwracke) was caſt upon the ſhore of Kent. A good while after this, Henry Courtney, Earle of Denſhire, the ſonne of Katharine daughter to King Edward the Fourth, was advanced to the honour of Marqueſſe

Marqueſſe of Exceſter. queſſe of Exceſter by Henry the Eighth, and deſigned heire apparant. But this Marqueſſe as well as the firſt Duke was by his high parentage, caſt into a great tempeſt of troubles, wherein as a man ſubject to ſuſpitions, and deſirous of a change in the State, he was quickly overthrowne. And among other matters becauſe he had with money, and counſell aſſiſted Reginald Poole (afterwards Cardinall) then a fugitive; practiſing with the Emperour and the Pope, againſt his owne Country, and the King who had now abrogated the Popes authoritie; he was judicially arraigned, and being condemned, with ſome others, loſt his head. But now of late by the favour of King Iames, Thomas Cecill Lord Burleigh, enjoyeth the title of Earle of Exceſter, a right good man, and the worthy ſonne of ſo excellent a father, being the eldeſt ſonne of William Cecill Lord Burleigh, high Treaſurer of England, whoſe wiſedome for a long time was the ſupport of peace, and Englands happy quietneſſe.

From Exceſter, going to the very mouth of the River, I find no monument of Antiquitie, but Exminſter, ſometime called Exanminſter, bequeathed by King Elfred to his younger ſonne; and Pouderham Caſtle built by *Iſabell de * Ripariis*, the ſeat long time of that moſt noble family of the Courtneys, Knights: who being lineally deſcended from the ſtocke of the Earles of Denſhire, and allied by affinitie to moſt honorable houſes, flouriſh ſtill at this day, moſt worthy of their deſcent from ſo high Anceſtors. Under Pouderham, Ken a pretty brooke entreth into Ex, which riſeth neere Holcombe, where in a Parke is a faire place built by Sir Thomas Denis, whoſe family fetcheth their firſt off-ſpring and ſurname from the Danes, and were anciently written Le Dan Denis, by which name the Corniſh called the Danes. But lower upon the very mouth of the river on the other banke ſide, as the name it ſelfe doth teſtifie, ſtandeth Exanmouth; knowne by nothing elſe but the name, and for that ſome fiſhermen dwelt therein.

Otterey. More Eaſtward, Otterey, that is, The River of Otters, or River-Dogs, which we call Otters, as may appeare by the ſignification of the word, falleth into the ſea; which runneth hard under Honnyton, a Towne not unknowne to thoſe that travell into theſe parts, and was given by Iſabell, heire to Earles of Devonſhire, to King Edward the Firſt, when her iſſue failed: and doth import his name to certaine places. Among which theſe are of greateſt note: above Honnyton, Mohuns Ottery, the poſſeſſion in times paſt of the Mohuns, from whom by right of marriage it came to the Carews: beneath Honyton Saint Maries Otterey, ſo called of Saint Maries Colledge, which Iohn Grandiſon Biſhop of Exceſter founded, who drew the whole eſtates of all the Clergie men in his Dioceſſe to himſelfe. For he perſwaded them in their Wils to give up, and make over all that they had unto his hands, as who would beſtow the ſame to godly uſes, in endowing Churches, and in building of Hoſpitals, and Colledges therewith, which verily he (by report) performed accordingly very devoutly.

Honnyton.

From the mouth of this Otterey, the ſhore runneth Eaſtward with many winding reaches, and turning creekes, by Budley, Sidmouth, and Seaton, famous Ports in times paſt, but now the havens there are ſo choked up with ſand, brought in with the reciprocall courſe of the tides, and heaped up againſt them, that they have almoſt utterly loſt all that benefit. As for Seaton, I would gheſſe it to bee that MORIDVNVM, which Antoninus ſpeaketh of, and is placed betweene DVRNOVARIA and ISCA, (if the booke be not faultie) and called in Peutegerius table by a name cut ſhort, RIDVNVM, conſidering both the diſtance, and the ſignification of the name. For, Moridunum in the Britiſh tongue is the very ſame that Seaton in Engliſh, to wit, A Towne upon an hill by the Sea. Hereto adjoyneth Wiſcomb, a Towne memorable in this reſpect that in it there dwelt William Lord Bonevill, whoſe heire Cecilie by her mariage brought the titles of Lord Bonevill, and Harington with a goodly inheritance in theſe parts, unto Thomas Grey Marqueſſe Dorſet.

Axminſter.

A Princes, who were ſlaine in that bloudy battell at Brunaburg, and tranſlated hither; and ſcituate it is in the very frontire and limit of this Province. Neere unto which Reginald Mohun of Dunſter, unto whom the Mannour of Axminſter in right of inheritance fell by the Fourth daughter of William de Briewr, built the Abbey of Newenham in the yere of Grace 1246. Hence the Eaſt-bound runneth crookedly north-weſtward, by villages of no fame toward Severn ſide; along wch now let us take our way. The Regiſter of Newenham.

From Cornwall the firſt ſhore in this ſhire that ſtretcheth out it ſelfe in length to the Severn Sea, is by Ptolomee called, THE PROMONTORIE OF HERCVLES, and retaineth ſtill ſome little remnant of that name, being called at this day Herty- Hercules his Promontory.
B poinct, and hath in it two pretty townes, Herton, and Hertlond, famous in old time for the reliques of that holy man Saint Nectan. In honour of whom there was erected Saint Nectan. heere a little Monaſterie, by Githa Earle Goodwins wife, who had this Nectan in eſpeciall reverence, for that ſhe was perſwaded, that for his merits her husband had eſcaped the danger of ſhipwracke in a violent and raging tempeſt. Howbeit afterwards, the Dinants, who alſo are named Dinhams, that came out of Bretagne in France, whoſe demeans, as in fee it was, were counted the founders thereof: and from them deſcended Baron Dinham, Lord high Treaſurer of England, under K. Henry the Seventh, by whoſe ſiſters, and heires, the inheritance was divided between Lord Zouch, Bourchier Fitz-warin, Carew, and Arundell. William of Malmesbury. Dinham.

C The name of this Promontorie hath given credit to a very formall tale, That Hercules (forſooth) came into Britaine, and vanquiſhed here I wot not what Giants. But if it be true as * Mythologers affirme, that there was never any Hercules, but that by him the power of humane wiſedome is underſtrod, whereby wee overcome pride, luſt, envie, and ſuch like monſters: or if, according to the Gentiles divinitie, by Hercules they meane the Sunne, and by thoſe twelve Labours, endured and performed by Hercules, the twelve ſignes of the Zodiack, which the Sunne in his yearely courſe paſſeth through; what it is they ſay, let them looke to it themſelves. But for mine owne part, I willingly believe that there was an Hercules, nay, I could be con- Whether ever Hercules came into Britaine. * Expounders of Morall Tales.
D tent to grant with Varro, that there were of them fortie and three, all whoſe acts were aſcribed to that Hercules, who was the ſonne of Alcmena; yet can I not perſwade my ſelfe, that ever Hercules came hither, unleſſe haply hee ſailed over the Ocean in that Cup which God Nerius had given him, whereof Athenæus maketh mention. But you will ſay, that Franciſcus Philelphus in his Epiſtles, and Lilius Giraldus in his Hercules, averre no leſſe. Pardon mee, I pray you; theſe latter writers may well moove mee, but they are not able to remoove mee, conſidering that Diodorus Siculus, who went on with the Greekiſh hiſtorie in order, even from the moſt remote, and firſt records of all Antiquitie, in plaine termes affirmeth, that neither Hercules, nor Father Bacchus went ever into Britaine. I am therefore verily perſwaded, that E the name of Hercules even to this place, came either through the vanitie of Greekes, or from the ſuperſtitious Religion of Britaines. For, as theſe beeing a moſt warlike Nation themſelves, had valiant men in marvellous admiration, and as highly eſteemed of ſuch as vanquiſhed Monſters: ſo, the Greekes againe, whatſoever was any where ſtately, and magnificent, that they referred to the glory of Hercules: and becauſe hee had beene a great traveller, ſuch as travelled were wont to offer ſacrifice unto him; and to him likewiſe conſecrate the places where they firſt arrived. Hereof came Hercules-rocke in * Campania, Hercules Hauen in * Liguria, Hercules Grove in Germanie: hence likewiſe, the Promontories of Hercules in Mauritania, Galatia, and Britaine. * Terra di Lavoro. * Riviera di Genoa.

As the ſhore giveth backe againe from this Promontorie of Hercules, the two
F Rivers, Towridge, and Taw, which are the onely Rivers in this north part of the Countie, diſcharge themſelves into the ſea at one mouth. Towridge ſpringing not farre from Herty poinct above ſaid, runneth South-Eaſtward, and taking into him the river Ock, whereof Ock-hampton a little market towne tooke the name, where Baldwine the Vicount had his Caſtle in William the Conquerour time (as appeareth out of Domeſday booke) from whom it deſcended to the Courtneys; ſuddenly turning his

Poderidge. his channell maketh way Northward, insulating in a manner Potheridge the Mansion of the Familie, surnamed, Monke. Happily for that some one of them being a professed Monke by dispensation to continne his house, returned to temporall state; as that Noble house in France surnamed Archevesque, that is, Archbishop, tooke that name to continue the memorie that one of the Progenitours of an Archbishop, returned by dispensation to be a Temporall man. Certainely, whencesoever the name came, it is ancient, and they have worshipfully matched, and not long since with one of the daughters of Arthur Plantagenet, Vicount Lisley, naturall sonne to King Edward the Fourth. Hence Towridge hastneth to Tourington, which it giveth name

Bediford. unto, standing over it in a great length upon the brow of a little hill: by Bediford also, a towne of right good name for the frequent resort of people, and number of Inhabitants, as also for a goodly stone bridge, with arched worke, where straightwaies it windeth it selfe into the Taw. This Taw breaking forth out of the very midst and hart of the shire, first runneth downe by Chimligh a little market towne, not far from Chettlehampton a small Village, where Hyertha, canonized a Shee-Saint, lay interred: from thence having passed by Tawton, where Werstane, and Putta, the first Bishops of Denshire had their See, about the yeare of our Lord 906. and Tawstoke over a-

John Hooker of the Bishops of Excester. gainst it, now the seate of the right honourable Earle of Bathe, it maketh haste to Berstaple. Reputed this is a very ancient Towne, and for elegant building, and frequencie of people held chiefe in all this coast, scituate amidst hilles in forme of a semicircle

Berstable. upon the river, being as it were, a diameter. Which River at every change and full of the Moone, by the swelling of the Ocean, overfloweth the fields so, as the very Towne it selfe seemeth to be a demie Island: but when, (as one saith) * the sea reengorgeth it selfe backe againe into the sea, it is so shallow, creeping betweene sands and shelves, as it hardly beareth smaller vessels. On the south side it hath a stately bridge built by one Stamford a Citizen of London: In the North part, where North Ewe a little river or brooke runneth, are seene the reliques of a Castle, which by the common report, King Athelstane, but (as others say) Iudaël of Totenais built: for the keeping, and defence whereof certaine Lands adjoyning thereabout, are held in Castleguard. It had sometimes a wall about it, but now there remaine scarce any small tokens thereof: The said Iudaël of Totenais received it in free gift in fee of King William the First: after him the Tracies held it for a long time: then, the Martins: after whom in the raigne of King Richard the Second, it came to Iohn Holland Earle of Huntingdon, who afterwards was Duke of Excester; and last of all it fell to the Crowne. But Queene Mary gave the Mannour to Thomas Marrow, whose son sold it away. In K. William the First his daies, as we find in Domesday booke, It had within the Burgh fortie Burgesses, and nine without. King Henrie the First, endowed it with many priviledges, and King John with more. A Major, and two Bailiffes for a long time it had: but Queene Mary ordained there a Major, two Aldermen, and a Counsell of twentie and foure. The Inhabitants (for the most part) are Merchants, who in France, and Spaine trade, and traffique much. Neither must this be passed over with silence, that out of this Towns-Schoole, their issued two right learned men, and most

John Jewell. Thomas Harding. renowned Divines, John Jewell Bishop of Sarisbury, and Thomas Harding the publike professour in Lovain, who most hotly contended, and wrote learnedly one against the other, concerning the truth of Religion.

Ralege. From hence, the river Taw saluting (as it were) Ralegh, which in times past had noble Lords of that name, but now is the possession of a right worshipfull house, surnamed Chichester: and afterwards encreased by Towbridge water, falleth into the Severne Sea, but it meeteth not with Kinwith Castle, whereof Asserius maketh men-

Kinvith. tion. For, here about such a Castle there was of that name, for scite of the ground about it, very safe on every side, save onely on the East quarter: at the which in the yeare of Christ, 879. Hubba the Dane, who with many slaughters and overthrowes had harried the English Nation, was (with many other Danes) slaine. And thereupon the place afterwards was called by our Historiographers; Hubbestow. And then it was

The Danes Banner. that the Englishmen wan the Danes banner, called, Reafan. Which, I note therefore

A fore the rather, becauſe it may be gathered out of a pretty tale in Aſſerius Meneven-ſis, who hath delivered theſe things in writing, that the Danes bare in their Enſigne a Raven wrought (by report) in needle-worke, by the daughters of Lothbrooke, that is, Leather-breech, the Dane, with ſuch an opinion of good lucke, as they thought that it never ſhould be wonne.

After this, nothing there is to bee ſeene upon this coaſt but Ilfarcomb, a good and ſure rode for ſhips, and Comb-Marton bordering hard upon it: under which, old mines of lead, but without veines of ſilver, have of late beene diſcovered. As for this word Comb, (to obſerve ſo much once for all) which is an uſuall adjection to names of pla-
B ces in this tract, it ſignifieth, a low ſcituation, or a Vale: and derived it may ſeeme to be of Kum a Britiſh word, that betokeneth the ſame: and the French men in their tongue retaine it ſtill in the very ſame ſenſe, from the ancient Gallique language, the ſame with old Britiſh.

Comb, what it ſignifieth. Nicotius.

More South-Eaſt from hence, and neere unto Somerſetſhire Bampton, ſometimes Baentun, ſheweth it ſelfe: which under William the Conquerour befell unto Walter de Doway, with other right large and faire lands elſe-where: of whoſe poſteritie Iuli- ana an Inheritrix, married to William Paganell, commonly Paynell, bare * Fulk de Bampton: and he begat William, and Chriſtian the wife of Cogan of Ireland whoſe
C poſteritie ſucceeded in the poſſeſſion thereof; for that the iſſue of the ſaid William died without children. But from the Cogans, the poſſeſſion deſcended at length hereditarily unto the Bourchiers now Earles of Bathe, by an heire of Hanſford, who had married likewiſe an heire of the Lord Fitz-warin.

* Fulconem.

In the prime and infancie of the Normans Empire, (to ſay nothing of Hugh the Norman whom Queene Emnia had before time made Ruler over this countrey) King William the Firſt ordained one Baldwine to be the hereditarie Sheriffe, or Vi-count of Denſhire, and Baron of Okehampton: after whom ſucceeded in that honour Richard his ſonne, who died without iſſue male. Then, King Henrie the Firſt, beſtowed upon Richard de * Redveriis, Firſt Tiverton, and afterwards the honour of Plimp- D ton with other places appurtaining thereto: and conſequently created him Earle of Denſhire, by granting unto him the third penie of the yearely revenues growing out of the ſame Coun-tie. Now the revenue of the Countie which in thoſe daies was due to the King, was not above thirtie marks: out of which, the ſaid Earle tooke unto him for his part, ten markes yearely. After this hee obtained of the ſaid King, the Iſle of Wight: whereupon ſtiled hee was, Earle of Denſhire, and Lord of the Iſle. Hee had a Sonne named Baldwin, who ſiding with Maude the Empreſſe againſt King Stephen was baniſhed the Realme.
Howbeit, Richard his Sonne recovered this honour of his Fathers: and hee left behind him two Sonnes, Baldwin, and Richard, who in order ſucceſſively were Earles of Denſhire, and died without iſſue. The honour therefore reverted backe againe
E to their unkle by their fathers ſide, named, William, ſurnamed, de Vernon, becauſe he was there borne. This William begat Baldwin, who departed this life before his father: yet before his death, he had begotten of Margaret, daughter to Gwarin Fitz- Gerold, Baldwine the third of that name, Earle of Denſhire. This Baldwin had two children, to wit, Baldwin the laſt Earle out of this family, that died without iſſue 1261. who changed the Ghryphon, claſping and cruſhing a little beaſt, (which mark his Anceſtours uſed in their ſeale) into a Scutcheon, or with a Lyon rampant, azur, and * Iſabell, who being eſpouſed to William * de Fortibus, Earle of Albemarle, bare to him a Sonne, named Thomas, who died ſoone after, and Avellina a daughter maried to Edmund Earle of Lancaſter, whom ſhe mightily enriched, with the inheritance of her father, and died iſſuleſſe. After ſome time, King Edward the Third, by his F letter miſſive onely, without any other complement of ceremonies, created Hugh Courtney, Earle of Devonſhire, and linked as couſin, and next heire to the ſaid Iſabel.
For he commanded him by vertue of thoſe miſſives, to uſe that title, and by a precept to the high Sheriffe of the Shire, commanded he ſhould be ſo acknowledged. Reginald Courtney was the firſt of this family that came into England, brought hither by King Henry the Second, and by him advanced with the marriage of the heire of Regiſter of Ford Abbey.

the Baronie of Okehampton, for that he procured the marriage betweene the ſaid King and Eleonor his heire of Poictu and Aquitaine. But whether hee was branched from the houſe of Courtney before it was matched in the bloud royall of France, or after which our Monks affirme, but Du Tillet Keeper of the Records of France doubteth, I may ſay ſomewhat in another place. After the firſt Earle Hugh, ſucceeded his ſonne Hugh; whom Edward his Grand-child, by Edward his Sonne followed, who died before him; and when he died, he left it to his ſonne Hugh: and hee likewiſe to Thomas his ſonne, who died in the thirtieth and ſixth yeare of King Henry the ſixth his raigne. The ſaid Thomas begat three ſonnes, namely, Thomas, Henrie, and Iohn: whoſe eſtate during the heate of thoſe mortall diſſenſions betweene the houſes of Lancaſter and Yorke, was much toſſed and ſhaken, whiles they ſtood reſolutely and ſtiffely for the Lancaſtrians. Thomas taken at Towton field, was beheaded at Yorke: Henry his brother, and Succeſſour ſeven yeares after, dranke of the ſame cup at Salisburie. And although King Edward the Fourth, advanced Sir Humfrey Stafford of Suthwicke to the Earledome of Denſhire, who within three moneths revolting from King Edward his advancer moſt ingratefully, was apprehended, and without proceſſe executed at Bridg-water: yet Iohn Courtney aforeſaid, the youngeſt brother, would not leave this title, but with his life, which hee loſt in the battell of Tewksbury. For a long time after, this family lay in ſome ſort obſcured: yet under King Henrie the Seventh, it reflouriſhed: for, hee advanced againe Edward Courtney, the next heire male unto the honors of his Progenitors. He begat William Earle of Devonſhire, who matched in wedlocke with Katherine, daughter to King Edward the Fourth: of whom he begat Henry Earle of Devonſhire, and Marqueſſe withall of Exceſter, who under King Henry the Eighth, loſt his head, as we have now ſhewed: whoſe Sonne Edward was reſtored againe by Queene Mary, a moſt noble young Gentleman, and of paſſing good hope, but he died an untimely death at Padua in Italie: for, the beſt men (as ſaith Quadrigarius) are of leaſt continuance. In the fortieth and ſixth yeare after his death, King Iames gave the honorable title of Earle of Devonſhire, to Charles Blunt Lord Mountjoy, and Lieutenant Generall of Ireland; which title he affected, as deſcended from a Coſin, and heire of Humfrey Stafford Earle of Devonſhire. Hee was a worthy perſonage, as well for martiall proweſſe, and ornaments of learning, as for ancient nobilitie of birth: for that he had recovered Ireland into the former good eſtate, by driving out the Spaniards, and by ſubduing or enforcing the Rebels to ſubmiſſion: Him (I ſay) he created Earle of Devonſhire, him hee heaped with favours, and according to the bountifull munificence of a King mightily enriched. But within a ſmall while, death envied him the fruition both of honour and wealth, which hee enjoyed as few yeares, as his Predeceſſour Humfrey Stafford did moneths.

DVROTRIGES.

NExt unto the Danmonians Eaſtward, Ptolomy placeth in his Geographicall tables ΔΟΥΡΟΤΡΙΓΕΣ, as hee wrote in Greeke, who in the Latine copies are written DVROTRIGES. The ſame people were named by the Britaines about the yeare of Salvation 890. Dwr-Gwyr, as ſaith mine Authour Aſſerius Menevenſis, who lived in that age and was himſelfe a Britaine borne. The Engliſh-Saxons called them Dop-ꝛeꝋꝋan, like as we at this day call this County, the County of Dorſet, and Dorſet-ſhire. That name DVROTRIGES, being ancient and meere Britiſh, may ſeeme by a very good and probable Etymologie to be derived of Dovr, or Dwr, which in the Britiſh tongue ſignifieth Water, and of Trig, that betokeneth an Inhabitant, as if a man would ſay, dwellers by the water or Sea-ſide. Neither verily from any other fountaine than from water are we to fetch thoſe names of places in old France or Gaule, which uſed in times paſt the very ſame language that our ancient Britans did, which either begin with Dur, and Dour, or doe end in the ſame; As for example, DVROCASES, DVROCOTTORVM, DVRANIVS, DORDONIA, DVROLORVM, DOROMELLVM, DIVODVRVM, BREVIODVRVM, BATAVODVRVM, GANODVRVM, OCTODVRVM, and a number of that ſort, as well in Gaule as in Britaine. As for that Engliſh-Saxon word Dop ꝛetta, compounded of both tongues, Britiſh and Engliſh, it carryeth the ſame ſence and ſignification that DVROTRIGES doth. For, Setta with our old Forefathers, like as with the reſt of the Germans, ſoundeth as much as to inhabit or dwell upon. And therefore they termed mountaners in their language Dun-ꝛeꝋꝋan: the Inhabitants of the Chiltern-hilles, Cylteꝛn-ꝛeꝋꝋan: the dwellers by the river Arow, Aꝛop-ꝛeꝋꝋan: even as the Germans called the Inhabitants of Woods and Forreſts Holtſatten: becauſe they dwelt within or among the Woods. Neither went our Britans from the reaſon and meaning of the old name, when they termed theſe DVROTRIGES, of whom we now treat, Dwr-Gweir, that is to ſay, Men bordering on the Maritime or Sea-coaſt. For, their country lieth ſtretched out with a ſhore full of turnings or windings in, and out, for a long tract, to wit by the ſpace of fiftie miles or there about, full upon the Britiſh ſea, from Weſt to Eaſt.

Dwr what it ſignifieth.

Setta what it is.

DORSET-SHIRE.

THe Countie of Dorſet as it is on the Northſide bounded with Somerſetſhire and Wiltſhire, on the Weſt with Devonſhire and ſome part of Somerſetſhire, on the Eaſt with Hampſhire: ſo on the South part, where it carrieth the greateſt length, it lieth all open to the Sea, bearing upon the Britiſh Ocean as I ſaid erewhile for fiftie miles together or much thereabout. A fruitfull ſoile it is: The North part thereof being overſpred with woods and forreſts; from thence garniſhed with many a greene hill, whereon feede flocks of ſheepe in great number with pleaſant paſtures likewiſe and fruitfull vallies bearing corne: it hath a deſcent even to the very Sea ſhore, which in my deſcription I will follow as it leadeth me, for that I can find no better order.

Lime. In the very entrance into this, out of Denſhire the firſt place that ſheweth it ſelfe on this ſhore is Lime, a little towne ſcituate upon a ſteepe hill, ſo called of a ſmall river of the ſame name running hard by: which ſcarcely may challenge the name of a Port or Haven towne though it be frequented with fiſhermen, and hath a rode under it called the Cobbe, ſufficiently defended from the force of winds with rocks and high trees. In ancient bookes I can hardly find any mention thereof: onely thus much I have read, that King Kinwulfe in the yeare of our Lord 774. gave (by theſe words) the land of one Manſion unto the Church of Scireburne, hard by the Werſterne banks of the river Lime, not farre from the place where he hideth the courſe of his ſtreame within the Sea: to this end, that for the ſaid Church ſalt might be boyled to the ſuſtaining of manifold neceſſities,

Carmouth. Neere thereunto the river Carr diſchargeth it ſelfe into the Sea, and there ſtandeth Carmouth a little village: where the bold roving Danes having good ſucceſſe in ſea-fights, wonne two victories of the Engliſh, firſt vanquiſhed King Egbert in the yeare of Chriſt 831. and then eight yeares after King Aethelwolfe. Then there is Burtport. Burtport, or more truly Birtport, placed betweene two ſmall rivers which there meete together: In this towne, in the daies of King Edward the Confeſſor, there were reckoned one hundred and twenty houſes, but in William the Conquerors raigne, as we find in his booke of Doomeſday, one hundred and no more. In our time in reſpect of the ſoile yeilding the beſt hemp, and skill of the people for making ropes and cables for ſhips, it was provided by a ſpeciall ſtatute, to remaine in force for a certaine ſet time, that ropes for the Navie of England ſhould be twiſted no where elſe. Neither is this place able to maintaine the name of an haven, albeit in the mouth of the river being on both ſides encloſed within little hilles, nature ſeemes as it were of purpoſe to have begun an haven, and requireth in ſome ſort art and mans helpe to accompliſh the ſame.

Chefill. From hence the ſhore winding in and out ſhooteth far into the Sea: and a banke called Cheſil of ſands heaped up thick together (with a narrow frith betweene) lieth in length for nine miles which the South-wind when it is up, commonly cutteth aſunder and diſperſeth, but the Northerne wind bindeth, and hardneth againe. By this

Portland. Banke or Sand-ridge, Portland, ſometime an Iſland is now adjoyned to the main-land: The reaſon of which name is altogether unknowne, unleſſe it were ſo called becauſe it lyeth full againſt the Port Weymouth: but it ſoundeth more neere unto the truth, that this name was given it of one Port a noble Saxon, who about the yeare of our Hiſtorie of Wincheſter. Salvation 703. infeſted and ſore annoied theſe coaſts. This Portland in the declining ſtate of the Saxons Empire (for before-time writers never ſpake of it) felt as much as any other place, from time to time, the violent rage of the Danes. But when the Daniſh warre was ended, it fell to the poſſeſſion of the Church of Wincheſter. For, at what

A what time as Emme mother to King Edward the Confeſſor (whoſe name was called in queſtion, and ſhe charged for incontinencie with Alduin Biſhop of Wincheſter) had gone bare-foot upon nine culters red hot in Wincheſter Church without harme (an unuſuall kind of triall in thoſe daies, and then called Ordalium) and ſo cleered her ſelfe of that imputation, that ſhe made her chaſtitie by ſo great a miracle more famous to poſteritie: She for a memoriall thereof, gave nine Lordſhips to the Church of Wincheſter: and King Edward her ſonne, repenting that hee had ſo wrongfully brought his mothers name into queſtion beſtowed likewiſe upon the ſaid Church this Iſland with other revenues. It is in compaſſe ſcarce ſeven miles, riſing up about
B the ſides with high rocks, but lying flat and low in the midſt: Inhabited ſcatteringly heere and there: plentifull enough of corne, and good to feed ſheepe: but ſo ſcant of woods, that in default of other fewell they make their fire with oxe and cow dung dried. The Inhabitants, of all Engliſh-men were the cunningeſt ſlingers; and very often doe find among the weeds or reeds of the ſea, Iſidis Plocamos, that is, Iſis haire, which as Plinie reporteth out of Iuba, is a ſhrub growing in the Sea not unlike unto Corall without leafe: cut it up it turneth into a black colour, and if it fall, it ſoone breaketh. On the Eaſt-ſide it hath one onely Church, and very few houſes ſtanding cloſe thereto, and on the North a Caſtle built by King Henry the Eighth, which alſo defendeth the entrance into the haven of Weimouth. A little towne this is, upon the Weymouth.
C mouth of Wey a ſmall river; over againſt which on the other ſide of the banke ſtandeth Melcomb, ſurnamed Regis, that is, Kings Melcomb, divided from the other onely by the haven betweene. But the priviledges of the haven were awarded from them by ſentence of the Parliament; howbeit afterwards recovered.

Theſe ſtood both ſometimes proudly upon their owne ſeverall priviledges, and were in emulation one of another: but now (God turne it to the good of both) many they are by Authoritie of Parliament incorporated into one body, conjoyned of late by a bridge, and growne very much greater, and goodlier in buildings by ſea-adventures than heeretofore.

D From thence the ſhore ſtretcheth out directly along by the Iſle of Purbeck (as they call it) which for a great part of it is an heath and forreſt like indeed repleniſhed with Deere both red and fallow, having alſo veines of marble running ſcatteringly heere and there under the ground. In the midſt whereof, there is an old large caſtle named Corf ſeated upon a great ſlaty hill, which after a long combat with time ſomewhat yielded as overcome, unto time, untill of late it hath beene repaired, and is a notable teſtimony and memoriall of a Stepmothers hatred. For, Aelfrith to make way for A Stepdames hatred, that is, her husbands ſonne.
her owne ſonne Etheldred to the Crowne, when Edward her ſonne in law King of England, came to viſit her in this caſtle from his diſport of hunting, ſet ſome villaines and hackſters to murther him, and like a moſt wicked Stepdame fed her eies with his
E bloud. For which deed repenting herſelfe when it was too late, ſhe ſought afterward maruellouſly to waſh out that ſinfull ſtaine, by taking her ſelfe to the mantle, and ring in the habite of an holy Votarie, and to building religious houſes. This Purbeck is called an Iſle, although it be onely a Demy Iſland, compaſſed round about with the ſea, ſave onely on the Weſt-ſide: For, on the Eaſt, the ſea bendeth the bankes inward, and breakiug in at a very narrow ſtraight betweene the two ſhores (againſt which a ſmall Iſle with a block houſe called Brenſey ſtandeth) maketh a broad and wide bay. On the North ſide wherof in the ſaid Biland, there ſtandeth over it the towne Poole, ſo as it is wholly environed with waters except it be on the North-ſide, where it cloſeth with the continent & hath one gate and no more leading unto it. We may well thinke it ſo named, becauſe that bay aforeſaid lying under it, in calme weather whē the waters be F ſtill reſembleth a pond, ſuch as we call a poole in our language. This of a Sedgeplot, & of a few fiſhermens cotages, in the laſt foregoing age, grew to be a mercate towne exceeding rich and wealthy, beautified alſo with goodly houſes: and K. Henry the Sixth by conſent of the Parliament granted unto it the priviledges of a port or haven towne which he had taken from Melcomb, and licenſed the Major thereof, to wall it about: which worke afterward was begun at the haven, by King Richard the Third, a Prince who deſerved to be rancked among the worſt men and the beſt Kings. But ever ſince that time, by what fatall deſtinie, I know not, or rather through the idleneſſe and ſloth of the towneſmen, it is decaied: in ſo much as for want of Inhabitants, the very houſes at this day, runne to ruine. Into the Weſt Angle of this Bay falleth the greateſt, and moſt famous river of all this tract, commonly called Frome, but the Engliſh-Saxons, as witneſſeth Aerius, named it Frau; whereupon perhaps, for that this Bay was in old time called Fraumouth, the poſteritie enſuing tooke the rivers name to be Frome. The head thereof is at Eureſhot neere unto the Weſt limit of this ſhire: From whence he taketh his courſe Eaſtward by Frompton, whereto it gave the name, and from the North receiveth a little river running downe by Cerne Abbey: which Auguſtine the Apoſtle of the Engliſh nation built, when hee had broken there in pieces, * Heil the Idol of the heathen Engliſh-Saxons, and chaſed away the fog of paganiſh ſuperſtition. Here was firſt bred among the religious men (as I have read) Iohn Morton Cardinall, and Archbiſhop of Canterbury borne at S. Andrews Milborne, worthily advanced to ſo high places for his good ſervice in working Englands happineſſe by the union of the two houſes, of Lancaſter, and York; and of this family there hath iſſued both R. Biſhop of worceſter, and many gentlemen of very good note in this country, and elſewhere. Under this ſomewhat lower, the Frau or Frome (chuſe whether you will) maketh an Iſland, and ſo goeth to ſee that moſt ancient towne [Dorcheſter] which in Antoninus his Itinerarium is termed DVRNOVARIA, that is, the river Paſſage or Ferry, and ſeemeth by Ptolomee to be named untruly, in ſundry copies DVRNIVM and DVNIVM. This is the head Towne of the whole Shire, and yet is neither great nor beautifull, being long ſince deſpoiled of the walles by the Danes, who raiſed as it is thought certaine trenches; whereof one is called Maumbury being an acre inditched, an other Poundbury ſomewhat greater: and the third a mile off as a Camp, with five trenches containing ſome ten acres, called Maiden caſtle, which a man may eaſily conjecture to have beene a ſummer ſtation or campe of the Romans. But of her antiquitie it ſheweth daily expreſſe tokens, namely the Roman cauſey of the Foſſe high way, and coine of the Romans both copper and ſilver found there, and eſpecially at Fordington hard by which the common people there call King Dorn his pence, whom by ſome alluſion to the name, they dreame full ſweetly, to have beene the founder of the towne. It had anciently a caſtle in that place where the Grey-friers built their Convent out of the ruines thereof, and hath now but three pariſh Churches, whereas the compaſſe of the old towne ſeemeth to have beene very large. But the moſt grievous hurt that it tooke, was when Sueno the Dane had in moſt outrageous crueltie renewed the Daniſh warre: and Huſh the Norman who ruled theſe countries a man of a perfidious and treacherous mind, ſuffered all to be ſpoiled and harried. But in what eſtate it ſtood ſoone after the Normans firſt comming in, take knowledge if it pleaſe you, out of Domeſday booke being the Survey of England. In King Edwards daies there were in Dorcheſter 170. houſes, and theſe for all the Kings ſervice diſcharged themſelves, and paid according to ten Hides: but to the uſe of Houſcarles one marke of ſilver, excepting the cuſtomes which pertaine ad firmam noctis, that is, to the entertainment of the King for one night. There were in it two Mint Maſters. Now there be therein but 82. houſes: and one hundreth have beene utterly deſtroyed ſince the time of Sheriffe Hugh. If theſe termes ſeeme to be very obſcure (as Sextus Cecilus ſaid in the like matter) impute it not to the fault of the writers, but to their ignorance who cannot conceive the meaning.

From hence Frome runneth by Woodford, where in old time Guy Brient a Baron and renowned warriour had a little Caſtle of his owne: which afterward was the habitation of Hugh Stafford of Suthwick; by one of whoſe daughters Inheritrices, it came as I have heard to Thomas Strangwaies, who being borne in Lancaſhire, and brought hither by the firſt Marqueſſe Dorſet, obtained a great and rich inheritance in theſe parts, and his iſſue built a very faire houſe at Milbery. Then holdeth hee on his courſe beſides Byndon, in the Saxon tongue Beandun, which alſo had a monaſterie, where Kinegilſus in the yeare 614. in a doubtfull, and dangerous battell vanquiſhed the

A the Britaines. Not long ſince it was the ſeat of the Lord Marney: now it giveth the honourable title of Vicount unto the Lord Thomas Howard Knight of the order of S. George: whoſe father Thomas the ſecond ſonne of Thomas Howard, the ſecond of that name Duke of Norfolk, Queene Elizabeth created Vicount Howard of Bindon, when he having matched in marriage with the daughter and heire of Baron Marney, was ſeized heere of a very great inheritance of the Newborows. Theſe who were anciently named de Novo Burgo, and commonly Newboroughs, derive their pedigree from a younger ſoone of Henry the firſt Earle of Warwick of the Norman line: and held heere Winfrott, with the whole Hundred of the gift of King Henry the Firſt, per B ſervitium Camerarii (theſe be the words out of the booke of the Offices) in Capite de Domino Rege: that is, by ſervice of Chamberlaine, in Chef, from our ſoveraigne Lord the King. But under Edward the Third I have read, that this was held by Sergeantie, namely, by holding the Laver or Ewre for the King his Soveraigne Lord to waſh, upon his Coronation day. Alſo Raulph Moien held the Mannour of Owres neere adjoyning by ſervice of Serjeantie in the Kitchin, of the gift likewiſe of King Henry the Firſt: and R. de Welles the Mannour of Welles heereabout, ſince the Conqueſt of England, by the ſervice of the Kings Baker. Which I note, onely by the way.

Bindon. Newborough. Grand Serjeantie.

Where Frome maketh his iſſue into that Bay, whereupon Poole is ſcituate, hard by the very mouth is planted Warham, in the Saxon tongue Weapeham, a towne C ſtrongly ſeated on every ſide but Weſtward, as being fenced on all parts beſide, with the rivers Trent, Frome, and the Sea together: In King Edward the Confeſſors time, it had two Mint maiſters: but whiles William the Conquerour raigned it could not reckon above ſeven dwelling houſes in it. Yet afterwards it flouriſhed againe, fortified with the wall, furniſhed with a mint houſe, a great number of Inhabitants, and a moſt ſtrong Caſtle, which that King William the Firſt built, it continued in a moſt flouriſhing ſtate untill the daies of King Henry the Second, who when hee came to challenge the Crowne of England in the yeare 1142, hee arrived heere, beſieged and tooke the Caſtle which was defended by Robert Lacy, againſt him in behalfe of King Stephen, and afterward Robert of Lincolne a man of mightie poſſeſſions in theſe D parts defended the ſame againſt King Stephen. But from that time, by occaſion partly of warres, and partly of ſudden caſualtie by fires, by reaſon alſo that the ſea by little and little which draweth the commoditie of an haven, it is almoſt run to ruine: and in the very heart of the old towne it bringeth forth ſtore of garlick. At this mouth likewiſe is diſcharged another ſmall river with Frome, Aſſerius calleth it Trent, but now the Inhabitants thereby name it Piddle: From the North banke whereof ſcarce three miles off I ſaw the ruins of Middleton Abbey, which King Athelſtane founded as a ſatisfaction to appeaſe the ghoſt and ſoule of his brother Edwine, whom hee had deprived both of his Kingdome, and life. For when that ſolicitous deſire of raig- E ning had cauſed him quite to forget all Juſtice, hee put the young Prince heire apparant to the Crowne, with one page, into a little whirrey without any tackling or furniture thereto, to the end he might impute his wickedneſſe to the waves. And ſo the young Prince overcome with griefe of heart, and unable to maſter his owne paſſions, caſt himſelfe headlong into the ſea. Under this Middleton, there is voided alſo another river, which runneth hard by Bere a little mercate towne, where for a long time, that ancient, and famous family de Turbida villa, commonly, Turbervill had their chief habitation, whereof as ſome were famous, ſo Hugh Turburvill in the time of King Edward the Firſt was infamous for his traiterous practiſes with the French.

Middleton.

But to goe backe againe to the Weſt part of the ſhire: At the ſpring head of Frome, where the ſoile is moſt fruitfull, the forreſt of Blackmore ſometimes thicke, and full of F trees, but now thinner growne, yeildeth plentifull game for hunting. This by a more common, and better knowne name is called The Forreſt of white hart. The reaſon of which name, the Inhabitants by tradition from their forefathers report to be thus. When King Henry the Third came hither to hunt, and had taken other Deere, he ſpared a moſt beautifull and goodly White-Hart, which afterwards T. de la-Lynde a gentleman of this countrey with others in his company tooke and killed: but but how perillous a matter it was to bee twitching (as they ſay) of a lion they ſoone found and felt. For, the King conceived great indignation, and high diſpleaſure againſt them, put them to a grievous fine of money for it, and the very lands which they held, pay even to this day every yeare by way of amercement a piece of money into the Exchequer, which is called White hart ſilver. There joyneth neere to this forreſt Shirburne towne, named alſo Shirburne Caſtle, in old time Scipeburn, which by interpretation is Fons Limpidus, or as it is elſe where writen Fons clarus, that is, Pure fountaine or cleare well, ſcited on the hanging of an hill, a pleaſant and proper ſeate, as William of Malmesburie ſaith, as well for the frequent number of Inhabitants, as the ſcituation: and now it is the moſt populous, and beſt haunted towne of all this country, and gaineth exceeding much by clothing. In the yeare of our redemption 704, an Epiſcopall ſeat was heere erected, and Aldelme the firſt Biſhop there conſecrated: afterwards alſo in the raigne of Etheldred, Herman the Biſhop of Sunning, having obtained this Biſhoprick, tranſlated his Epiſcopall ſee hither, and joyned the ſaid Biſhoprick of Sunning unto this, which under William Conqueror the ſame Biſhop tranſlated to Sarisburie, and reſerved Shirburne to bee a retiring place for his Succeſſors, unto whom it belongeth as yet: And one of them, namely, Roger, built a ſtrong Caſtle in the Eaſt-part thereof, under which lay ſometime a wide meere, and many fiſh pooles: and now being filled up are converted into moſt pleaſant, and rich medow ground. As for the Cathedrall Church, preſently upon the tranſlation of the See, it became a monaſterie againe, and beareth ſhew of great antiquitie, although not many yeares paſt, in a broile betweene the townesmen and the Monks it was fired: which the burnt and ſcorched colour upon the ſtones doth as yet moſt evidently ſhew. Under this, the river Iuell, whereof I will ſpeake ſome where elſe, winding in and out with many curving reaches, runneth Weſtward to Chiſton, the ſeate ſometime of the linage de Maulbanch, from which it deſcended hereditarily unto the family of the Horſeies Knights, where it entreth into Sommerſetſhire.

More toward the Eaſt the moſt famous river Stoure paſſing full of tenches and Eeles eſpecially, ariſing in Wiltſhire out of ſix fountaines commeth downe to Stourton, the honor and ſeat of the Barons of Stourton. So ſoone as it entred in this Shire it paſſeth through Gillingham forreſt, in which Edmund ſurnamed Iron-ſide in a memorable battell put the Danes to flight: and three miles from thence ſaluteth Shaftsbury ſtanding upon an hill top, very defective of water, ſometimes called by the Britaines as it is commonly, but falſely thought, Caer Paladur, and in Latine by later writers Septonia: by the Saxons Sceaftuerbyryz, perhaps of the Churches Spire ſteeple, ſuch as they tearmed Scheafts. A little before the Normans time it had in it 104. houſes, and three Mint maſters, as we read in that * booke ſo often by me alleadged. And afterwards, it flouriſhed the more, by reaſon of a Nunnerie which Elfgiva a moſt godly and devout Lady, wife to Edmund that was King Aelfrids nephews ſonne had erected, and of ten pariſh Churches beſides, or there about. But moſt famous in this place, by occaſion of a prety fable that our Hiſtorians doe report of Aquila prophecying here of the converſion or change of the Britaines Empire: For, ſome will have the bird, Aquila, that is, an Eagle, others a man ſo named to have foretold here, that the Britiſh Empire after the Saxons and Normans ſhould returne againe to the ancient Britaines: and theſe men affirme and maintaine that this place is of greater antiquitie than Saturne himſelfe, whereas moſt certaine it is, that it was firſt built by Alfred. For, the Hiſtoriographer of Malmesbury hath recorded, that in his daies there was an old ſtone tranſlated from the ruines of the wall into the Chapter houſe of the Nuns, which had this Inſcription:

ANNO DOMINICÆ INCARNATIONIS ÆLFREDVS REX FECIT HANC VRBEM. DCCC. LXXX. REGNI SVI VIII. That is,
In the yeare of the incarnation of our Lord, King Aelfred built this Citie, 880. of his raigne the eighth.

B This Inſcription I have the more willingly put down here for proofe of the Truth, becauſe in all the copies which I have ſeen it is wanting, ſave only in that in the Libra-rie of the late Lord Burghley, high Treaſurer of England, and I have beene informed that it continued there untill the time of King Henry the Eighth. Yet the Inhabitants have a tradition that an old Citie ſtood upon the place which is called the Caſtle-Greene, and by ſome, Bolt-bury; now a faire plaine ſo ſcited that as of one ſide it joyneth to the Towne, ſo of another it is a ſtrange ſight to looke downe to the vale under it: whereby in the Weſt end of the old Chappell of S. Iohn, as I heare now, ſtandeth a Roman Inſcription reverſed. From thence the Stoure, by Marnhill, of which place L. Henry Howard brother of Thomas laſt Duke of Norfolke received of King Iames the C title of Baron Howard, of Mernhill, before that he was created Earle of Northamp-ton, makes ſpeed to Stourminſter, which is as much to ſay, as the Monaſterie or Min-ſter upon Stoure. A ſmall towne this is, ſtanding ſomewhat with the loweſt: from which there is a ſtone bridge built reaching to Newton Caſtle; where offreth it ſelfe to be ſeene a loftie mount caſt up (as they ſay) to that heighth with great labour, but of the Caſtle there remaineth nothing at all, but onely the bare name. Of theſe, I have nothing of more antiquitie to ſay than this, that King Aelfred bequeathed Stoureminſter to a younger ſonne of his. Hard by, at Silleſton there riſe two good great hilles, the one named Hameldon, the other Hodde, and both of them fortified with a three fold Ditch and rampier. And not far from thence (but the very place I cannot Barons Fitz-D preciſely ſet downe) ſtood Okeford, the Capitall honour of the Baronie of Robert, the ſonne of Pagan, commonly named Fitz-Payne, who married the daughter of Guido de Brient, who alſo in this Weſt part enjoyed the honor of a Baron under King Edward Baron Brient.
the Third: but for default of heire males of thoſe Fitz-Paynes, it came to the Poynings, Barons likewiſe in thoſe daies, and at length by a daughter and heire of Poynings in the raigne of Henry the Sixth, theſe Barons titles, Fitz-Payne, Brient, and Poinings Barons Poy-were conjoyned in the Percies Earles of Northumberland: Howbeit within our fathers nings.
remembrance through the favour of King Henry the Eighth, the title of Baron Poi-nings, reflouriſhed in Sir Thomas Poinings, ſonne of Sir Edward Poinings a martiall man and fruitfull father of much baſe brood; but with him it ſoone vaniſhed away, as E baſtardly ſlips ſeldome take deepe root.

From hence Stoure paſſeth on by Brienſton, that is, Brients towne, where the Ro-gerſes dwell, an ancient family of Knights degree, to Market Blandford, which Blandford.
ſince in our time it chanced to be burnt downe, aroſe againe, built more elegantly, and is better peopled with Inhabitants. Then Stoure from thence, by Tarrent, where Richard Poer Biſhop of Sarûbury founded a Cell, for Virgins Votaries, ſpeedeth himſelfe apace to that moſt ancient towne VINDOGLADIA, where Antoninus Vindogladia.
maketh mention. Which in the Saxons tongue is called ƿynburnham, commonly Winburne, and of the Monaſterie, Wenburnminſter: and from hence to Dorceſter are Winburn.
counted ſixteene miles juſt ſo many as the Emperour Antonine in his Itinerarie rec-F koneth betweene Vindogladia and Durnovaria. The name, as I conjecture, it taketh of the ſcituation, becauſe it is ſeated betweene two rivers: for, ſo in the Britiſh tongue Windugledy ſoundeth as much as betweene two Swords: now that the Britaines, by a peculiar phraſe of their owne, terme rivers, Swords, it appeareth by Aberdugledian, the Britiſh name of Milford Haven, which is as much to ſay, as the mouth of two ri-vers, for that two rivers named with them Gledian, that is, Swords, runne into it. The latter name alſo of this town ſeemeth to be fet from Rivers: For Winburn is compounded of Vin, a parcell of the old name, and the Saxon word Burne, which among them betokeneth a river: and by the addition thereof the Saxons were wont to name places ſtanding upon rivers. The very town it ſelfe is ſeated upon the piece of an hill large in compaſſe, & repleniſhed with Inhabitants, but few faire buildings. In the Saxons time right famous it was and much frequented for no other cauſe, I believe, but for that in thoſe daies there remained divers tokens of the Romans majeſtie. In the yeare 713. Cuthburga ſiſter to Ina King of the Weſt-Saxons, when upon a loathing wearineſſe of wedlocke ſhe had ſued out a Divorce from her owne husband King of Northumberland, built heere a Nunnerie: which yeilded unto the injurie of time, and fallen to decay, there aroſe in the very place thereof, a new Church with a faire Vault beneath under the quier, and an high ſpire beſides the Toure-ſteeple. In which were placed Prebendaries in liew of thoſe Nuns. Over whom, in our fathers daies Reginal Pole was Deane, who afterwards being Cardinal, and Archbiſhop of Canteburie, over and above the nobilitie of his houſe (for deſcended he was of the Royall bloud) became highly renowned for pietie, wiſedome, and eloquence. King Etheldred a right good and vertuous Prince brother of Aelfred, ſlaine in the battell at Wittingham againſt the Danes, lieth enterred in this Church: upon whoſe Tombe, which not long ſince hath beene repaired, this new Inſcription is to be read:

Burne in the Saxon tongue what it ſignifieth.

IN HOC LOCO QVIESCIT CORPVS S. ETHELDREDI REGIS WESTSAXONVM MARTYRIS, QVI ANNO DOMINI DCCC LXXII. XXIII. APRILIS PER MANVS DANORVM PAGANORVM OCCVBVIT.

That is,

Heere lieth at reſt the bodie of Etheldred King of the Weſt-Saxons, Martyr, who died in the yeare of our Lord, 872. the 23. of April, by the hands of the Danes, * Infidels.

* Or Painims: Paganorum.

Neere unto whom lieth entombed Gertrude Blunt Marchioneſſe of Exceſter, daughter to William Lord Montjoy, and mother to Edward Courtney the laſt Earle of Devonſhire of that houſe: and on the other ſide of the quier Iohn de Beaufort Duke of Somerſet with his wife Margaret daughter and heire to Sir Iohn Beauchamp of Bletneſhoe: whoſe daughter Margaret Counteſſe of Richmond, and mother of King Henry the Seventh, a moſt godly and vertuous Princeſſe, erected a Schoole heere for the training up of youth. But now will I turne my pen from the Church to the Towne; when the Danes by their crafty devices went about to ſet the Engliſhmen together by the eares, and would have broken that league, and unitie which was betweene King Edward the Elder, and his coſen Aethelwald; Aethelwald then luſting after the Kingdome and wholly ſet againſt his liege Prince, fortified this towne as ſtrongly as poſſibly he could: But ſo ſoone as Edward came towards him with his forces, and pitched his tents at Baddan-bipig, now called Badbury, he fled and conveied himſelfe to his confederates the Danes. This Badbury is a little hill upon a faire doune, ſcarce two miles off, environed about with a triple trench, and rampier, and had by report in times paſt a Caſtle, which was the ſeate of the Weſt-Saxon Kings: But now, if ever there were any ſuch, it lieth ſo buried in the owne ruines, and rubbiſh, that I could ſee not ſo much as one token thereof. But, hard by, a ſight I had of a village or mannour called Kingſton Lacy, becauſe together with Winburne it appurtained to the Lacies Earles of Lincolne: unto whom by covenant it came from the Earles of Leiceſter, by the meanes of Quincie Earle of Wincheſter. For King Henry the firſt had given it to Robert Earle of Mellent and of Leiceſter: and at the laſt, both places, from the Lacies fell unto the houſe of Lancaſter, whoſe bountie, and liberalitie Winburne had good triall of.

From this Winburne Stoure as it paſſeth, admitteth Alen a little brook, over which ſtandeth

A ſtandeth S. Giles Winburne, the habitation of the worſhipfull and ancient houſe of Aſtleys Knights, alſo Wickhampton, the inheritance ſometime of the Barons de Maltravers: of whom the laſt, in the raigne of Edward the Third, left behind him two daughters onely, the one wedded unto Iohn de Arundell, grandfather to Iohn Earle of Arundell, who left unto his poſteritie the title of Barons de Maltravers: the other, wife of Robert Le-Rous, and afterwards of Sir Iohn Keines, Knight. From hence the Stoure paſſeth on by Canford, under which not long ago, Iames Lord Montjoy, ſtudious in Minerall matters began to make Calcanthum or Vitriol (we call it Coperas) and to boile Alome: And out of which, in old time Iohn Earle of Warren, to
B the great diſteining of his owne good name, and the damage of England, tooke, as it were, by ſtrong hand and carried away, as it is to be ſeene in our Chronicles, Dame Alice Lacey, the wife of Thomas Earle of Lancaſter. And now by this time Stoure leaveth Dorſetſhire behind him, and after hee hath travelled through ſome part of Hantſhire, at length taketh up his lodging in the Ocean: and yet not before hee hath entertained a pretty river that runneth to Cranburne, a place well watered. Where in the yeare of Salvation 930. Aelward a noble Gentleman, ſurnamed for his whiteneſſe Meaw, founded a little monaſterie: which, Robert Fitz-Haimon a Norman, unto whom fell the poſſeſſions of the ſaid Aelward, leaving heere one or two Monkes in a cell, tranſlated to Theoksbury: From whom in order of ſucceſſion, by the Clares Earles
C of Gloceſter, and Burghs Earles of Ulſter, it came to Lionell Duke of Clarence, and by him to the Crowne. But now Cranborne hath his Uicount, now Earle of Saliſburie whom King Iames for his approved wiſedome and worth, honored firſt with the title of Baron or Lord Cecil of Eſſendon, and the next yeare after, of Vicount Cranborne. South from hence lieth Woodland emparked, ſometime the ſeat of the worſhipfull family of Filioll, the heires whereof were married to Edward Seimor after Duke of Somerſet, and Willoughby of Wallaton.

As touching the Earles and Marqueſſes of this ſhire, King William the Conqueror, having now by conqueſt attained to the Kingdome of England, made Oſmund that was Earle of Seez in Normandie, both Biſhop of Sariſbury, and afterward alſo the D firſt Earle of Dorſet, and his Chancellor; highly admiring the godly wiſedome of the man, and his notable good parts. Long after that, King Richard the Second in the one and twentieth yeare of his raigne, advanced Iohn de Beaufort, Iohn of Gaunt his ſonne and Earle of Sommerſet, to be Marqueſſe Dorſet, of which dignitie King Henry the Fourth in hatred of Richard the Second deprived him. And when as in the high Court of Parliament, the Commons of England there aſſembled, who loved him very dearely, made earneſt interceſſion that the ſaid dignitie of Marqueſſe might bee reſtored unto him, hee himſelfe diſtaſting this new title, and never heard of before thoſe daies, utterly refuſed it. And then his younger brother named Thomas Beaufort was created Earle of Dorſet: who afterward for his warlike proweſſe and valour
E was by King Henrie the Fifth adorned with the title of Duke of Exceſter, and with the Earledome of * Harcourt. For, he valiantly defended Harflew in Normandie againſt the Frenchmen, and in a pitched field encountring the Earle of Armignac put him to flight. After he was dead without iſſue, King Henry the Sixth nominated out of the ſame houſe of Lancaſter, Edmund, firſt Earle, afterwards Marqueſſe Dorſet, and laſtly Duke of Somerſet: whoſe ſonnes being ſlaine in the civill wars, Edward the Fourth, when as now the family of Lancaſter lay as it were, over troden in the duſt, created Thomas Grey out of the houſe of Ruthin, who was his ſonne in law (for the King had eſpouſed the mother of the ſaid Grey) Marqueſſe Dorſet: when in right of his wife he had entred upon a great ſtate, and inheritance of the Bonvilles in this coun-
F try, and the territories adjoyning. After him, ſucceeded in the ſame honour Thomas his ſonne, and Henrie his nephew, by the ſaid Thomas, who alſo was created by King Edward the Sixth Duke of Suffolk, having wedded Lady Frances daughter of Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, and Neece unto King Henry the Eighth by his ſiſter. BELGÆ.

BELGAE.

UPon the North and East side of the Durotriges, bordered in times past the Belgæ, who as it is by the name probable, and by authority of writers very likely, passed over from the Belgæ, a people in Gaule, into Britaine. For, those Belgæ having their beginning (as Cæsar according to the information he had from the men of Rhemes) of the Germans, and in old time being brought over the Rhene, finding the sweetnesse and fertility of the place, expelled the Gaules and planted themselves there: From whence, as the same Cæsar saith, they gat them over into Britaine for to spoile, and in warlicke manner to invade the country: and were all of them called after the name of those countryes from whence they came: where, after they had made warre they remained and began to till the grounds. But at what time they came hither to dwell, it is not certainly knowen, unlesse Divitiacus King of the Suessones, who flourished before Cæsars time, brought over the Belgæ hither: For, a great part as well of Gaule as of Britaine he had under him. Whence also they were named Belgæ, it is not sufficiently shewed. Hubert Thomas of Liege, a great learned man, supposed Belgæ to be a German word, for that the Germans use to call the French and the Italians Wallen, as strangers, yea and some of them Welgen. Iohn Goropius, himself a Belgian, maintaineth it to be derived of the word Belke, which in the Belgicke tongue signifieth wrath or anger, as if they would be sooner incensed with choler than others. But seeing that the name of the Belgæ, seemeth not to be sought for out of that tongue which the Germans of the Low-countries use at this day and is almost the same that our English-Saxon language (for from the Saxons it came, whom Charles the Great brought over into Brabant and Flanders) for my part I will in no wise diminish their credit, who fetch it forth of the ancient Gaules tongue, which remayneth in manner uncorrupt among our Welch-Britans, and will have them called Belgæ of Pell, which in that tongue betokeneth Remote or far off. For, of all Gaule they were the furthest, and as they were furthest from the civill behaviour and humanity of the Roman Province, so they were also in situation and seat: and the Poet hath shewed that the Morini were the people of all Belgica most remote, when he wrote thus: Extremiq; hominum Morini, that is, The morini of all men furthest. But come we now to our Belgæ, who inhabited far and wide in Somersetshire, Wiltshire, and the inner parts of Hantshire.

SOMERSETSHIRE.

THe Countie of Somerſet, commonly called, Somerſetſhire, is a verie large and wealthy Region: the North ſide whereof the Severne Sea beateth upon: the Weſt part confineth with Denſhire: in the South it bordereth firſt upon Devonſhire, and then upon Dorſetſhire: Eaſtward, upon Wiltſhire: and North-eaſt upon part of Gloceſterſhire. The Soile verie rich, yeelding for the moſt part thereof paſſing great plentie, both of paſture and corne, and yet not without ſtonie hilles: Exceeding populous, and full of Inhabitants: furniſhed alſo with commodious havens, and ports ſufficiently. Some thinke it was ſo called, for that the * aire there, is ſo mild and ſummer-like: and in that ſence the Welch Britans at this day terme it Gladerhaf, borrowing that name out of our Engliſh tongue. And verily, howſoever in ſummer time it is a right ſummer-like Country, yet ſurely, in winter it may worthily be called, a winteriſh Region, ſo wet, and weely, ſo miry and mooriſh it is, to the exceeding great trouble and encombrance of thoſe that travell in it. But I will beleeve, that this name without all queſtion grew from Somerton, a famous Towne in ancient time, and of all others in the ſhire moſt frequented, conſidering that Aſſerius a writer of great antiquitie, calleth this Countie in every place, Somertunenſis, that is Somertunſhire. In the very firſt limit of the ſhire Weſtward, where Ex riſeth in a ſolitarie and hilly moore, firſt appeareth Dulverton, a ſilly market, according to the ſoile, and neere unto it was a ſmall religious houſe of Black-chanons at Barelinch, who in latter times acknowledged the Fetyplaces their founders.

Denſhire.

Higher upward on the Severne ſide, where this ſhire confineth upon Devonſhire, firſt we meet with Porlock, (in the Engliſh-Saxon tongue Porloean, and Watchet) in times paſt Wecedpoort, roades both, aud harbours for ſhips, the which in the yeere 886. were moſt grievouſly afflicted by the Daniſh cruell piracies. Betwixt them ſtandeth Dunſter Caſtle upon a flat and low ground, encloſed round about with hilles, ſaving to the Sea-ward; built by the Moions, or Mohuns. From whoſe heires by agreements and compoſitions it came in the end to the Lutterels. A right noble and mightie houſe this of the Mohuns was for a long time, and flouriſhed from the verie Conquerours daies, (under whoſe raigne that Caſtle was built,) unto the time of King Richard the Second. Two Earles there were of this Countie out of that familie, as I ſhall ſhew hereafter, William and Reginald, who in the Barons warre loſt that honor. The Poſteritie afterwards were reputed Barons: of whom the laſt named Iohn, left three daughters, Philip wife to Edward Duke of Yorke; Elizabeth, wedded to William Montacute, Earle of Sarisburie, the ſecond of that name; and Maud, Joyned in marriage to the Lord Strange of Knokin: The Mother of which three Ladies, as the report goes, obtained of her husband ſo much paſture-ground in Common by the Towne ſide for the benefit of the Inhabitants, as ſhe could goe about in one day barefoot.

Neere to this Caſtle, there lie two little Villages conſecrate unto two peculiar Saints of thoſe places: the one of them is named Caranton, of Carantoc the Britan: the other, Saint Decombs of Decuman; who putting to ſea out of South-wales arrived here, in a waſte and Deſert Wilderneſſe, as we read, in an old * Agonel, overgrowen with ſhrubs, buſhes, and briers, among woods of great thickneſſe, reaching out farre in length and breadth, lying out with high and ſteepe hilles one way, and wonderfully uneven with as deepe and hollow vallyes another way, where he bidding worldly vanity farewell, was by a murderer ſtabbed to death, and of the people honoured as a Saint. And betweene theſe Clives, was an old Abbey of white Monkes, founded by William de Romara, Coſen to the Earle of Lincolne. Somewhat farther from the ſea

A ſea is ſeated Stoke-Curcy, a Barony ſo named of the Lords thereof, the dwelling place of William De Curcy, Sewer to King Henrie the Firſt. Out of which Familie, Iohn Curcy (as ſome write) iſſued, that conquered Vlſter in Ireland, whom nature framed for magnanimitie, gravitie, and all other vertues, a great perſon and a noble: the record and teſtimonie of whoſe approoved valour, is to bee fetched out of the antient Annals of Ireland. From thence the ſhore by little and little beareth out to Stertpoint, where the two greateſt Rivers of all this Shire, meeting in confluence together, at one mouth runne forth into the Severne ſea. Ptolomee calleth this confluence Uzella Æſtuarium, of the river Ivel, which now hath loſt his name alreadie before he came hither. It ſpringeth in Dorſetſhire, and no ſooner entreth into So-

B merſetſhire, but he giveth name to Evel a great market towne, which roſe by the decay of Ilcheſter, and taketh into him a rill, neere which is Camalet a ſteepe hill, and hard to get up: on the top whereof are to bee ſeene expreſſe tokens of a decayed Caſtle, with triple rampires of earth caſt up, encloſing within it many acres of ground; and there appeare about the hill five or ſix ditches, ſo ſteepe, that a man ſhall ſooner ſlide downe, than goe downe. The Inhabitants name it, King Arthurs Palace: That it was the Romans worke, appeareth by peeces of money of their coine daily digged out there. But what name it had among them, I know not, unleſſe it be the ſame which in Ninnius his Catalogue of ancient Cities, is called Caer Calemion, in

C ſtead of Camelion, by tranſpoſition of the letters. Hereby are two townes, Weſt Camalet, and Eaſt Camalet, or Queens Camalet, happily for that it hath been in dowrie to ſome Queene. As for Cadburie a little towne next unto it, we may gueſſe verie probably to have been that Cathbregion, where K. Arthur, (as Ninnius writeth) defeated the Engliſh-Saxons in a memorable battell. The other of that name, called, North Cadbury, K. Henry the Third, gave unto Nicolas de Moeles, who had married * Hawiſia, one of the heires of Iames of Newmarket, whoſe poſteritie continued a long time in great fame and honour, untill that Iohn dying in the time of Edward the Third, left two daughters, Muriel and Iſabel; the one wife to William Botereaux, and the

D former to Thomas Courtney. Here to digreſſe aſide from the River Ivel, Winecaunton, no meane market, is neighbour to this North Cadbury, and neere thereunto is Pen, an obſcure village now, but antiently famous, being ordained by deſtinie as it may ſeeme to the overthrow both of Britans and Danes. For at this verie place Keniwalch a Weſt Saxon, had ſuch a day of the Britans, that they would ſcarcely ever after abide to come into the field againſt the Engliſh-Saxons. And many a yeere after that, King Edmund ſurnamed Iron-ſide, gave there a notable foile to the Danes, as he purſued Canutus their King, then uſurping the Crowne of England from place to place. The houſe of Lorty, called in Latine Records, de Vrtiaco, was great hereabout, poſſeſſing Stoke Triske, Cocklington, and other Mannours, and Henrie Lorty of this houſe, was ſummoned a Baron to the Parliament, in the time of King Edward the E Firſt.

Now to returne: the river Ivel from hence runneth to Iſchalis, mentioned by Ptolomee, now Ivelceſter: named in the Catalogue of Ninnius (if I be not deceived) Pontavel Coit, for Pont-Ivel Coit, that is, Ivel bridge in the wood: by Florentius of Worceſter, Givelceſter: at this day of ſmall account, but onely for the antiquitie, and the market there kept: for, peeces of the Roman Cæſars, or Emperours money, of gold, * braſſe, and ſilver, are other whiles here digged up. That in old time it had been a great towne, and on ſome ſides ſtrengthned with a double wall, the ruines declare, and two towers upon the Bridge. About the time of the Normans comming in, well

F peopled it was, and much frequented: For, reckoned there were in it one hundred and ſeven Burgeſſes. A ſure place alſo in thoſe daies, and well fortified: for in the yeere of Grace 1088, when the Nobles of England had conſpired, & plotted againſt King William Rufus, to put him downe, and ſet up his brother Robert Duke of Normandie in his Royall throne, Robert Mowbray a warlike man, having burnt Bathe, forcibly aſſaulted this towne, but with loſt labour; yet, what hee could not doe then, long proceſſe of time hath now partly effected, and in ſome ſort over-maſtred it

A little beneath, by Langport a proper market town, the Rivers Ivel and Pedred running together, make betweene them an Iland, called Muchelney, that is to say, The great Iland, wherein are to bee seene the defaced walles and ruines of an old Abbey, built by King Athelstane, as writers reporr. This Pedred, commonly named Parret, hath his beginning in the verie edge or skirt of the shire southward, and holding on a crooked and winding course thorow Crockhorne, in the Saxon tongue, Cpuecepne, and Pedderton, to whom it gave the name, sometime Pedridan, the Roiall seat of King Ina, (which towne now adayes is of none account, unlesse it be for the market, and Faire there held, which Henrie Daubeney obtained of King Henrie the Sixth) at this place runneth into Ivel, and robbeth him of his name, when hee is come downe three miles Eastward, and hath bidden farewell to Montacute, so termed by the Earle of Moriton, brother by the Mothers side to King William the Conquerour, (who built a Castle upon the verie hill top, and at the foot thereof a Priorie) becaus the said hill riseth up by little and little to a sharpe point: for, before time it was called Logoresburgh, and Biscopeston. As for the Castle, it came to nothing many yeeres since: the stones thereof being had away to the repairing of the Monasterie and other houses. Upon the pitch of the said hill, there was a Chapell afterwards set, and dedicated unto Saint Michael, built with arch-worke, and an embowed roofe overhead all of stone, right artificially: to which for halfe a mile wel nere, men ascended upon stone-staires, which in their ascent fetched a compasse round about the hil. But now that the Priorie and chapell both be pulled down, the faire and goodly house, which Sir Edward Philips Knight, and the Kings Sargeant at Law built lately at the hill foote, maketh a very beautifull shew. This high place Mont-acute hath given surname to that right honourable family of Montacute, which had their beginning of Dru the younger. Out of which there were foure Earles of Sarisburie: the last of them left one daughter onely, Alice, who by Richard Nevil, pare Richard that renowned Earle of Warwick, who kept such stirres, and made all England to shake, also Iohn Nevil Marquesse Montacute, who were both slaine at Barnet field, in the yeere 1472. Afterward King Henrie the Eighth conferred the title of Lord Montacute, upon Henrie Poole, sonne of Margaret, daughter to George Duke of Clarence, that came of the daughter of that Richard Nevill aforesaid, Earle of Warwicke: and when hee had so done, straightwaies made him shorter by the head: afterwards Queene Marie advanced Anthonie Browne, whose Grandmother was a daughter of Iohn Nevill Marquesse Montacute, to the title and honour of Vicount Montacute, which his Grandchild Anthonie who succeeded him now honourably enjoyeth.

And here I must not forget neither, Preston, sometime the seat of Iohn Sturton younger sonne to the first Lord Sturton, one of whose heires was married to Sidenham of Brimton thereby; neither Odcombe adjoyning thereto, as small a towne as it is, seeing it had a Baron of the owne, William de Briewer (for so was his father named, in the Norman-French, becaus he was borne in an * heath) who being taken up in the new Forrest, by King Henrie the Second in a hunting journey, prooved a great man, and gratious in the Court (as whom King Richard the First highly favored as his minion, and all the world embraced and loved) grew unto a verie wealthy estate, married Beatrix of Vannes, widow to Reginald Earle of Cornwall, and his daughters, for that his sonne died without issue, by their marriages brought great possessions to their husbands Breos, Wake, Lafert, and Piercy. Under this towne hard by, lieth Stoke under Hamden, where the Gornaies had their Castle, and built a Colledge. This familie de Gornaico, commonly named Gornay, was verie ancient, and of good account, descended from the same stocke, out of which the Warrens Earles of Surrie, and the Mortimers are sprung: but in the fore-going age it failed, and some of their lands descended by the Hamptons, to the house of the Newtons Knights, who willigly acknowledge themselves to bee come out of Wales; and not long since to have beene named Caradocks. Neither must I passe over in silence, how Matthew Gournay, a most famous warriour in the raigne of Edward the Third, was Then * Pedred watereth Martocke, a litle market Towne, which in times paſt William of Boloigne King Stephens ſonne gave unto Faramuſe of Boloigne, whoſe ſole heire Sibyll, was wedded to Ingelraine Fienes, from whom deſcended the Fienes, Barons of Dacre, and Lords Say and Sele. * Parret.

Faramuſe of Bolen. Fienes.

Parret from hence thorow the mire and mooriſh plaine countrey, holding his courſe Northward, paſſed by Langport a market Towne well frequented, and Aulre,

B a Village conſiſting of a few poore Cottages, which ſeemeth to have beene a Towne of good account: for, when King Elfred had given the Danes ſuch an overthrow in battell, and by ſtrait ſiege compelled them to yeeld, ſo farre forth, that they tooke an oath immediatly to depart out of his dominions, and Godrus their King promiſed to become Chriſtian, (as writeth Aſſerius) at this very place he with great pompe was Godfather to the ſaid Godrus at the ſacred Font. Aulre.

Beneath this place from the Weſt, Parret receiveth into it the river Thone, which ſpringing farre of in the Weſt part of this Countrey, very neere unto Devonſhire, runneth thorow moſt rich and pleaſant fields, paſſing downe neere Wivelſcomb,

C aſſigned anciently to the Biſhops of Bathe, and by Wellington, which in the time of King Edward the elder was a land of ſix * Manentes, what time hee granted it together with Lediard, that had twelve Manentes, Hides, unto the Biſhop of Shirburne: Now, a prettie market Towne it is, and graced moſt by the habitation there of Sir Iohn Popham (For, vertuous men, and ſuch as have ſo well deſerved of their countrey, are not to bee paſſed in ſilence) a man of an ancient worſhipfull houſe, and withall a moſt upright Iuſticer, and of ſingular induſtry, who being Lord chiefe Iuſtice of the Kings Bench, adminiſtreth his office toward malefactours with ſuch holeſome and available ſeverity, that England hath beene beholden unto him a long time for a great part of her private peace, and home-ſecuritie. Wellington. * Hides. Lediard. Iohn Popham.

D For thence with a ſoft ſtreame, and gentle fall, Thone runneth by Thonton, commonly Taunton, and giveth it his name. A very fine and proper Towne this is indeed, and moſt pleaſantly ſeated: in a word, one of the eyes of this ſhire: where Ina King of the Weſt Saxons, built a Caſtle, which Desburgia his wife raced, and laid even with the ground after ſhee had expelled from thence Eadbritch, King of the South-Saxons, who now had made himſelfe Lord thereof, and uſed it as a bridle to keepe the countrey under, that he had ſubdued. When Edward the Confeſſour was King, it paid tribute (as wee find in the Kings Survey-Booke of England) after the rate of fiftie and foure Hides: and had in it threeſcore and three Burgers: The Biſhop of Wincheſter held it as Lord, and his courts or Pleas were kept heere thrice in the yeere. Taunton. * Penaltie for peace-breaking, Pacis Infraction.

E *And theſe Cuſtomes appertaine to Taunton, Burgheriſts, Theeves, * Breach of peace, hannifare, pence of the Hundred, and pence of Saint Peter de Circieto, thrice in the yeere to hold the Biſhops Pleas without warning, to goe forth to warfare with the Biſhops men.* The Countrey heere, moſt delectable on every ſide with greene medowes; flouriſhing with pleaſant Gardens and Orchards, and repleniſhed with faire Mannour houſes; wonderfully contenteth the eyes of the beholders. And among theſe houſes; thoſe of greateſt note are theſe: Orchard, which had in times paſt Lords of that name, from whom in right of Inheritance it deſcended unto the Portmans, men of Knights degree: Hach Beauchamp, and Cory Mallet, bearing thoſe additions of their Lords, For, this was the ſeat of the Mallets, that came of the Norman race, and from them in ſhort time, it fell by the female heire to the Pointzes. From among F whom in the raigne of Edward the Firſt, Hugh was ranged in the rank of Parliament Barons, and out of that familie ſome remaine at this day of great reputation, and Knights in their Countrey. As for thoſe Beauchamps, or de Bello Campo, they flouriſhed in high places of honour, from the time of King Henrie the Second: but eſpecially ſince, that Cecilie * de Fortibus, which derived her pedigree from the Earles de Ferrarijs, and that great Marſhall of England William Earle of Pembroke, matched Mallet. ed in marriage with this familie. But in the raigne of Edward the Third, the whole inheritance, was by the ſiſters divided betweene Roger de S. Mauro, or Seimore, I. Meriet, men of ancient deſcent, and great alliance. And hereupon it was, that King Henrie the Eight, when he had wedded Iane Seimor, mother to King Edward the Sixth, beſtowed upon Edward Seimor her brother, the titles of Vicount Beauchamp, and Earle of Hertfort, whom King Edward the Sixth afterwards honoured, firſt with the name of Lord and Baron Seimor to bee annexed to his other titles, leſt (as the King ſaith in the Patent) the name of his mothers familie ſhould bee overſhadowed with any other ſtile, and yet afterward created him Duke of Sommerſet.

Vicount Beauchamp.

As you goe from thence, where Thone windeth himſelfe into Parret, it maketh a pretty Iland betweene two rivers called in times paſt Æthelingey, that is, The Iſle of Nobles, now commonly knowen by the name of Athelney: a place no leſſe famous among us for King Alfreds ſhrowding himſelfe therein, what time as the Danes now had brought all into broile, then thoſe Mariſhes of Minturny among the Italians, wherein Marius lurked, and lay hidden. For, touching that King an ancient Poet, wrote thus:

——Mixta dolori
Gaudia ſemper erant, ſpes ſemper mixta timori.
Si modò victor erat, ad craſtiná bella pavebat,
Si modò victus erat, ad craſtina bella parabat.
Cui veſtes ſudore jugi, cui ſica cruore
Tincta jugi, quantum ſit onus regnare probarunt.

With dolour great his joyes were mixt, his hope was joyn'd with dread,
If now he victour were, next day of warres he ſtood affraid:
If vanquiſht now, the morrow next forthwith hee thought it good
For to prepare for warre: his ſword was aye begoard in blood.
His garments eke with painfull ſweat, were evermore beſtain'd.
Which well did ſhew what burden great he bare while that he raign'd.

And in truth, this Iſle afforded him a very fit ſhrowding corner: for that by reaſon of waters partly ſtanding there in plaſhes, and partly reſorting reflowing thither, which Aſſerius termed Gronnas, Latinizing a Saxon word) there is in manner no acceſſe into it. It had ſometime a bridge betweene two caſtles, built by Aelfred, and a very large grove of Alders, full of goates and wild beaſts: but of firme ground ſcarce two acres in breadth: on which, as ſaith William of Malmesbury (whoſe words theſe are and not mine) hee founded a little Monaſterie: the whole frame whereof, hanged upon foure maine poſts pitched faſt in the ground, with foure round iſles of Sphærick work contrived and brought round about the ſame. Not far from this Iſle Parret having received the ſaid river runneth alone ſwelling with certaine ſandy ſhelfes ſometime in his channell, by the Hundred of N. Pederton anciently acknowledging the Bluets to have beene Lords thereof, who are thought to have brought that name from Bluet in litle Britaine: Heere it taketh into him an other river from Eaſt to beare him company which openeth it ſelf neere Caſtle Cary which William Lovell Lord thereof held againſt K. Stephen in the behalfe of Mawd the Empreſſe right inheritrix of the Crown of England; whoſe iſſue male failing in the time of King Edward the Third, by heire female it came to Nicholas de S. Maure a Baron (of a diſtinct familie from that which was a few lines before mentioned) and ſhortly after about the time of Henrie the Fift by an heire female againe to the Lord Zouches of Harringworth: as a moitie of the lands of Lord Zouch of Aſhby de la Zouch came before by coheires to the houſe of this S. Maures. But when the Lord Zouch was attainted by K. Henrie the Seventh for aſſiſting King Richard the Third, this Caſtle was given by the K. to Robert Willoughby Lord Brooke as his lands at Bridge-water to the Lord Daubeney and then hee was reſtored in bloud. From Caſtle Cary this water paſſeth by Lites-Cary to bee remembred in reſpect of the late owner Thomas Lyte a gentleman ſtudious of all good knowledge, and ſo to Somerton, the Shire towne in times paſt, as which gave the name thereto. A Caſtle it had of the Weſt Saxon Kings, which Ethelbald King of Mercia forcing a breach through the

A the wals ſieged and kept: But now time hath gotten the maſtry of it ſo, as that there is no apparance at all thereof: and the very Towne it ſelfe would have much a doe to keepe that name, were it not for a Faire of oxen and other beaſts which is kept, there from Palme-Sunday untill the midſt of Iune, with much reſort of people; for that the countrimen all there about are very great Graſiers, breeders, and feeders of cattell.

No ſooner hath Parret entertained this river, but he ſpeeds him apace toward, a great and populous towne, commonly called Bridg-water: and is thought to have taken that name of the Bridge and water there: but the old records and evidences gaine ſay this opinion: wherein it is alwayes called in plaine words Burg-water, that
B is, Walters burgh or Burgh-walter: and (as we may very probably conjecture) of that Walter de Duaco, or Doway who ſerved under William Conqueror in his wars, and received at his hands many faire mannors in this ſhire. Neither carrieth it any other name in that grant or donation, whereby Fulke Paynes Lord of Bampton paſſed the poſſeſſion of the place over unto William Briwer, to curry favour with him, being ſo great a man and ſo gracious a favourite with King Richard the Firſt: This Williams ſonne and bearing his name, bettered this haven, having obtained licence of King Iohn to fortifie a Caſtle, built heere a Fortreſſe: which now time hath wrought her will of: and began a bridg which one Strivet a gentleman of Cornwall with infinite coſt finiſhed: founded alſo the Hoſpitall of S. Iohn heere, and Dunkeſwell Abbay.
C But when this William Briwer the younger left this life without iſſue, in the partition of his heritage it fell to Margaret his ſiſter, in right of whoſe daughter that ſhe had by William De la fort, it came to the houſe of Cadurci or Chaworths, and from it hereditarily to the Dukes of Lancaſter; as ſome lands heereabout by an other ſiſter came to Breos, and ſo by Cantalupe to Lord Zouch. But the greateſt honor that this place had, was by the title of an Earldome, that King Henrie the Eight adorned it withall, what time as he created Henrie Doubeney, Earle of Bridge-water, whoſe ſiſter Cecilie, was married unto Iohn Bourchier the firſt Earle of Bath out of that houſe. Earles of Bridge-water.

Beneath this, ſome few miles off, Parret voideth it ſelfe into the Severne ſea at a wide mouth, which, as we ſaid, Ptolomee called Vzella æſtuarium: and ſome even at Vzella.
D this day, Evelmouth: but the old Engliſh-Saxons Pedpeðan muð, at which place, as Marianus mine author writeth, Ealſtan Biſhop of Shirburne about the yeere of Salvation 845. diſcomfited the Daniſh forces as they were ſtragling abroad. At the ſame mouth where we ſaw Honiſpell an ancient Mannour of the Coganes, men of great fame in the conqueſt of Ireland, there meeteth it another river called of ſome Brius Selwood. which ariſeth out of that great and wide wood in the Eaſt-ſide of this ſhire, which the Britans named Cort Maur, the Saxons Selwood, that is, (by Aſſerius interpretation) The Bruiton. great wood, but now not ſo great. This river firſt viſiteth Bruiton, to which he leaveth his name: (a place memorable, for that the Mohuns there entombed, who built a religious houſe of the Fitz-Iames, runneth a long way by ſmall villages and encreaſed

Of which, a Poet of good antiquity writeth thus.

William Malmesbury, of Glaſtenburies antiquity.

In this Iſle under a great hill riſing in great height with a tower theron, which they call the Tor, flouriſhed the famous Abbay of Glaſtenbury, the beginning whereof is very ancient, ſetched even from that Ioſeph of Arimathea, who enterred the bodie of Ieſus Chriſt, and whom Philip the Apoſtle of the Gaules ſent into Britaine for to preach Chriſt. For, thus much both the moſt ancient records and monuments of this Monaſterie teſtifie, and alſo Patrick the Iriſh Apoſtle (who lived there a Monke thirtie yeeres) in an Epiſtle of his hath left to memorie. Whereupon this place was by our Anceſtors named, The firſt land of God, The firſt land of Saints in England, The beginning and fountaine of all religion in England, The tombe of Saints, The mother of Saints, The Church founded and built by the Lords Diſciples. Neither is there any cauſe why we ſhould much doubt thereof, ſithence I have ſhewed before, that the beames of Chriſtian religion in the very infancie of the primitive Church were ſpred and ſhined upon this Iland, yea and Freculphus Lexovienſis hath written, that the ſaid Philip conducted barbarous nations, neere unto darkneſſe and bordering juſt upon the Ocean, to the light of knowledge and port of faith. But to our Monaſterie, and that out of Malmesburie his booke touching this matter. When that old Cell or litle chappell which Ioſeph had built by continuance of time was in the end decaied, Devi Biſhop of Saint Davids erected a new one in the ſame place, which alſo in time falling to ruine, twelve men comming out of the North part of Britaine repaired it, and laſtly King Ina (who founded a ſchoole in Rome for the training up and inſtruction of Engliſh youth, & to the maintenance thereof, as alſo for almes to be diſtributed at Rome, had laid an impoſition of Peter-pence upon every houſe thorowout his realme) having demoliſhed it, built there a very faire and ſtately Church, to Chriſt, Peter, and Paul: and under the very higheſt coping thereof round about cauſed to bee written theſe verſes:

See Romans in Britanie. In confirm. Henric. 2.

Syderei montes, ſpecioſa cacumina Sion,
A Libano geminæ flore comante, cedri;
Cælorum portæ lati duo lumina mundi.
Ore tonat Paulus, fulgurat arce Petrus:

These verſes with ſome little change are found in the fourth booke of Venantius Fortunatus his Poems: in the praiſe partly of the Church in Paris and partly of Nants.

two

A Two mountaines high that reach the ſtars, two tops of Sion Faire,
From Libanon two cedar trees their flouring heads doe beare.
Two royall gates of higheſt heaven, two lights that men admire,
Paul thundreth with his voice aloft, Peter he flaſheth fire.
Of all the Apoſtles crowned crew, whoſe raies right glittering bee,
Paul for deepe learning doth excell, Peter for high degree.
The one doth open the hearts of men, the other heaven doore,
For Peter lets thoſe into heaven, whom Paul had taught before.
As one by meanes of doctrine ſhewes the way how heaven to win,
By vertue ſo of th' others Keys, men quickly enter in.
B Paul is a plaine and ready way for men to heaven hie,
And Peter is as ſure a gate, for them to paſſe thereby.
This is a rocke remaining firme: a Maſter builder hee:
Twixt theſe a Church and altar both, to pleaſe God, built we ſee.
Rejoice ô England willingly; For, Rome doth greet thee well,
The glorious Apoſtles light in Glaſton now doe dwell.
Two bulwarks ſtrong afront the Foe are raiſ'd; Theſe towres of faith
In that this Citie holds, the head even of the world it hath.
Theſe monuments King Ina gave of perfect meere good will
C Vnto his ſubjects; whoſe good deeds remaine and ſhall doe ſtill.
He with his whole affection in godlineſſe did live,
And holy Church to amplifie great riches alſo give.
Well might he our Melchiſedech, a Prieſt and King, be thought,
For he the true religious worke to full perfection brought.
The lawes in common weale he kept, and ſtate in Court beſide,
The onely Prince that prelats grac'd, and them eke rectifide.
And now departed hence to heaven, of right he there doth reigne,
Yet ſhall the praiſe of his good deeds, with us for ay remaine.

D In this firſt age of the primitive Church, very holy men and the Iriſh eſpecially applied the ſervice of God in this place diligently, who were maintained with allowances from Kings, and inſtructed youth in religion and liberall ſciences. Theſe men embraced a ſolitarie life, that they might the more quietly ſtudie the Scriptures, and by an auſtere kind of life exerciſe themſelves to the bearing of the croſſe. But at length, Dunſtane a man of a ſubtile wit and well experienced, when he had once by an opinion of his ſingular holineſſe and learning wound himſelfe into the inward acquaintance of Princes, in ſtead of theſe, brought in Monks of a later order, called Benedictines, and himſelfe firſt of all others became the Abbat or ruler heere of a great covent of them; who had formerly, and afterward gotten at the hands of good and godly Princes a royall revenue. And having reigned as it were in all affluence 600. E yeres (for all their neighbours round about were at their beck) they were by K. Henry the Eighth diſpoſſeſſed & thruſt out of all, & this their Monaſtery, which was growne now to be a prety Citie, environed with a large wall a mile about; & repleniſhed with ſtately buildings, was razed and made even with the ground: and now onely ſheweth evidently by the ruines thereof, how great and how magnificent a thing it was.

Now, I might be thought one of thoſe that in this age have vanities in admiration, if I ſhould tell you of a Walnut tree in the holy Churchyard heere, that never did put forth leafe before S. Barnabees feaſt, and upon that very day was rank and full of leaves; but that is now gone, and a young tree in the place: as alſo of the Hawthorne in F Wiral-park hard by, which upon Chriſtmaſday ſprouteth forth as well as in May. And yet there bee very many of good credit, if we may beleeve men of their word, who avouch theſe things to be moſt true. But, before I returne from hence, I wil briefly ſet downe unto you that, which Giraldus Cambrenſis an eie-witneſſe of the thing, hath more at large related touching Arthurs Sepulchre in the Churchyard there.

When Henrie the Second King of England, tooke knowledge out of the Songs of Britiſh Bards, or Rhythmers, how Arthur that moſt noble Worthy of the Britans who by Arthur, the warlike Worthy.

by his Martial proweſſe, had many a time daunted the fury of the Engliſh-Saxons, lay buried heere betweene two Pyramides, or ſharpe-headed pillars, hee cauſed the bodie to be ſearched for: and ſcarcely had they digged ſeven foot deepe into the earth, but they lighted upon a Tomb or Grave-ſtone, on the upper face whereof was faſtened a broad Croſſe of lead groſly wrought: which being taken forth ſhewed an inſcription of letters: and under the ſaid ſtone almoſt nine foot deeper, was found a Sepulchre of oake made hollow, wherin the bones of that famous Arthur were beſtowed, which Inſcription or Epitaph, as it was ſometime exemplified, and drawn out of the firſt Copie in the Abbey of Glaſcon, I thought good for the antiquitie of the characters here to put downe. The letters being made after a barbarous manér, & reſembling the Gothiſh Character, bewray plainely the barbariſme of that age, when ignorance (as it were) by fatall deſtinie bare ſuch ſway, that there was none to be found, by whoſe writings the renowne of Arthur might bee blazed, and commended to poſteritie. A matter and argument doubtleſſe, meet to have beene handled by the skill and eloquence of ſome right learned man, who in celebrating the praiſes of ſo great a prince, might have wonne due commendation alſo for his owne wit. For, the moſt valiant Champian of the Britiſh Empire, ſeemeth even in this behalfe onely, moſt unfortunate, that hee never met with ſuch a trumpetter, as might worthily have ſounded out the praiſe of his valour. But behold the ſaid Croſſe and Epitaph therein.

Hic iacet Sepultus inclitus Rex Arturius in Insula Avalonia.

Neither

A Neither will it be impertinent, if I annex hereunto what our Countrey man, Ioſeph, [a Monke] of Exceſter, no vulgar and triviall Poet, verſified, ſometime of Arthur in his Poeme Antiocheis, wherein he deſcribed the warres of the Chriſtians for recoverie of the Holy Land, and was there preſent with King Richard the Firſt, ſpeaking of Britaine.

For famous death, and happie birth, hence flouriſh'd next in place,
Arthur the flower of noble Kings: whoſe acts with lovely grace
C Accepted and admired were, in peoples mouth and eare,
No leſſe than if ſweet hony they, or pleaſant muſicke were.
See former Princes, and compare his worth even with them all:
That King in Pella borne, whom we great Alexander call,
The trumpe of fame doth ſound aloft. The Roman Stories eke Much praiſe and honour both, of their Triumphant Cæſars ſpeake.
And Hercules exalted is for taming Monſters fell:
But Pine-trees, hazels low, (as Sunne the Starres) doe farre excell:
Both Greeke and Latine Annals read: no former age his Peere,
D Nor future time his match can ſhew. For this is plaine and cleere,
In goodneſſe hee and greatneſſe both, ſurmounts Kings all and ſome, Better alone, than all before, greater than thoſe to come.

And this worthy Knight, (that I may note ſo much alſo by the way out of Ninnius the Britan, if it be worth the noting) was called, Mab uter, that is, A terrible or dreadfull Sonne, becauſe hee was from his childhood cruell; and Artur, which in the Britiſh tongue importeth as much as a horrible beare, or any yron mall, wherewith the Lions jawes are bruiſed and broken.

Lo here alſo, if it pleaſe you, other monuments of this place, though they bee not of the greateſt antiquitie, out of the foreſaid William of Malmesburie. That (quoth The Pyramides of Glaſtenburie.

The higheſt of them, and that which is neerer to the Church, than the reſt, hath five ſtories, and carrieth in height ſix and twentie foot: Which albeit for age it be ready to fall, yet hath it certaine antiquities to be ſeene, that plainly may be read, although they cannot ſo eaſily bee underſtood. Edgar the Peaceable.

To reckon up here the Kings of the Weſt-Saxons, that were buried in this place, would be but needleſſe: Howbeit, King Edgar the Peaceable, who alwaies tendred peace, in regard thereof, if there were nothing elſe, I cannot but remember, and put downe his Epitaph, not unbeſeeming that age wherein he lived.

Auctor opum, vindex ſcelerum, largitor honorum, Sceptriger Edgarus regna ſuperna petit.
Hic alter Salomón, legum pater, orbita pacis,
Quód caruit bellis, claruit inde magis.
Templa Deo, templis monachos, monachis dedit agros, Nequitiæ lapſum, Iuſtitiæq; locum.

That well of wealth, and ſcourge of ſinne, that honour-giver great,
King Edgar hence is gone to hold in heaven his royall ſeat:
This ſecond Salomon that was, laws-father, Prince of peace,
In that he wanted warres, the more his glorie had increaſe.
Churches to God, to Churches Monkes, to Monks faire Lands he gave, Downe went in his daies wickedneſſe, and Iuſtice place might have:
A pure crowne for a counterfeit he purchaſed once for all,
An endleſſe Kingdome for a ſhort, a boundleſſe for a ſmall.

Beneath Glaſcon three Rivers which there meete, doe make a meere, and iſſuing forth at one litle mouth, runne all in one channell Weſt-ward, to Uzella Frith, firſt by Gedney or (as others will have it) Godney more, which (they ſay) ſignifieth, Gods Iland, and was granted to Ioſeph of Arimathea: then, by Wead. moore, a Mannour of King AElfreds, which by his laſt Will and Teſtament, hee gave as a legacie to his ſonne Edward, and ſo by that moory or fenny-country Crentmaeſh, that runneth out verie farre, which the Monkes of Glaſtenburie interpreted to bee the Countrey of Fen Frogges, like as the litle Towne Brentknoll there, which ſignifieth, Frog-hill.

Mendip-hils.

From thence Eaſtward, Mendippe hils extend themſelves in length and bredth; Leland calleth them Minerarios, that is, the Minerall hills; and rightly (as I ſuppoſe) ſeing they be in old writings named Muneduppe: for, rich they are in lead mines, and good to feed cattell. Among theſe hils there is a cave or denne farre within the ground: wherein are to be ſeene certaine pits and rivelets, the place they call Ochie-hole, whereof the Inhabitants feine no fewer tales, nor deviſe leſſe dotages, than the Italians did of their Sibyls Cave in the mountaine Apenninus. The name (no doubt) grew of Ogo, a Britiſh word, that betokeneth, a Den: even of the like den, the Iſle Eubœa, was by ſuch another name ſometime called Ocha. Not far hence, in the raigne of K. Henrie the Eighth, was turned up with the plough, a table of lead ſomewhat long, which lay long at Lambith in the Duke of Norfolkes houſe, erected ſometime for a trophee in token of victorie, with this inſcription:

Ochy hole.

TI. CLAUDIUS CAESAR. AUG. P. M.
TRIB. P. VIIII. IMP. XVI. DE BRITAN.

This Tribuneſhip of Claudius here mentioned, fell out to be in the 802. yeere after the foundation of Rome, when Antiſtus and M. Suillius were Conſuls, what time P. Oſtorius Governour of Britaine as Vice-Pretour, was welcomed thither with many troubles. Out of this time, give me leave, I pray you, to frame certain conjectures: That in this yeere Claudius erected two Trophees, or monuments of victorie over the Britans, his owne ancient coine ſheweth as a moſt certaine witneſſe, in the forepart

A part whereof is this plaine Inſcription, TI. CLAVD. CÆSAR. AVG. P. M. TR. P. VIIII. IMP. XVI. P. P. and in the reverſe thereof, DE BRITAN. and there is expreſſely ſtamped a triumphall Arch, with an Image of one galloping on horſebacke, and with two triumphall pillars. What Britaines theſe were then vanquiſhed, Tacitus ſheweth, teſtifying that this yeare Claudius by the conduct of Oſtorius ſubdued two Nations of the Britans this yeare, to wit, The ICENI, and the CANGI. But foraſmuch as the Iceni, lay (as it were) in another climate. What if I ſaid, this Trophee was ſet up in token of victorie over the Cangi, a ſmaller nation among our Belgæ, and that thoſe CANGI, were ſeated in theſe parts. For, not far from hence is B the ſea, that lieth toward Ireland, neere which he placeth the Cangi, of whoſe name there ſeemeth as yet in certaine places of this tract, ſome ſhadow to remaine, namely, in Cannington, & Cannings, pettie countries and Hundreds: as alſo in Wincaunton, which elſewhere is called Cangton. But of theſe matters let the reader be judge; my ſelfe (as I ſaid) doth no more but conjecture, whiles I ſeeke to trace out theſe their footſteps, and hope to find them out ſome where-elſe.

See before among the Coines.

Cangi, a people of Britaine.

Among theſe hils ſtandeth Chuton, which was the habitation, (if I take not my markes amiſſe) of William Bonvill, whom King Henrie the Sixth called by his writ of Summons to the Parliament, by the name William de Bonvill and Chuton, among other Barons of the Realme, made him Knight of the Garter, and richly matched C his ſonne in marriage with the ſole daughter of Lord Harington. But when he (unthankefull man that he was) in the heate of civill warre, revolted, and tooke part with the houſe of Yorke, as if vengeance had purſued him hard at heeles, that onely ſonne of his he ſaw taken from him by untimely death, and his nephew by the ſame ſonne, Baron of Harington, ſlaine at the battell of Wakefield: and immediately after, (that his old age might want no kind of miſerie) whiles he waited ſtill, and long looked for better daies, was himſelfe taken priſoner in the ſecond battell of Saint Albans, and having now run through his full time by courſe of nature, loſt his head, leaving behind him for his heire, his Grand-childs daughter Cecilie, a Damſel of tender yeares, who afterwards with a great inheritance, was wedded to Thomas Greie, Marqueſſe D Dorſet. But his bloud after his death was by authoritie of Parliament reſtored.

1. Edward. 4.

Under Mendip hills northward, there is a little village, called, Congersburie, ſo named of one Congar, a man of ſingular holineſſe. Capgrave hath written, that hee was the Emperours ſonne of Conſtantinople who lived there an Eremite: alſo Harpetre, a Caſtle by right of inheritance, fell to the Gornaies, and from them deſcended to the Ab-Adams, who as I have read, reſtored it to the Gornaies again. Southward, not farre from the foreſaid hole, where Mendip ſlopeth downe with a ſtony deſcent, a little citie with an Epiſcopall See, is ſcituate beneath at the hill foot, ſometime called, (as ſaith Leland) but whence he had it, I wot not, Theodorodunum, now Welles, ſo named of the Springs, or Wels, which boile and walme up there: like as Suſa in Perſia, Croia E in Dalmatia; and Pagaſe in Macedonia, were named of the like fountaines; in their countrey ſpeech: whereupon this alſo in Latin, is called, Fontanenſis Eccleſia, as one would ſay, Fountain-Church. For multitude of Inhabitants, for faire and ſtately buildings, it may well and truely chalenge the preheminence of all this Province. A goodly Church it hath, and a Colledge, founded by King Ina, in honour of Saint Andrew, and ſoone after endowed by Princes, and great men with rich livings, and revenewes: among whom King Kinewolph by name, in the yeare of our Lord 766. granted unto it very many places lying thereabout. For, in a Charter of his wee reade thus, I Kinewolph, King of the Weſt-Saxons, for the love of God, and (that which is not openly to be ſpoken) for ſome vexation of our enemies, thoſe of the Corniſh Nation, with F *the conſent of my Biſhops and Nobles, will moſt humbly give and conſecrate ſome parcell of Land to Saint Andrew the Apoſtle, and ſervant of God, that is to ſay, as much as commeth to * Eleven Hides, neere to the River called Welwe, for the augmentation of that Monaſterie, which ſtandeth neere the great fountaine that they call Wiclea.* This Charter have I ſet downe, both for the antiquitie, and becauſe ſome have ſuppoſed, that the place tooke name of this River; verily, neere the Church there is a Spring, called Harpetre.

Monentium. XI.

Saint Andrewes Well, the faireſt, deepeſt, and moſt plentifull that I have ſeene, by and by making a ſwift Brooke. The Church it ſelfe all throughout is very beautifull, but the Frontiſpiece thereof, in the Weſt end, is a moſt excellent and goodly piece of worke indeede, for it ariſeth up ſtill from the foot to the top all of imagerie, in curious and antike wiſe wrought of ſtone carved, and embowed right artificially, and the Cloiſters adjoyning very faire and ſpacious.

A gorgeous pallace of the Biſhops, built in manner of a Caſtle, fortified with walles, and a maote ſtandeth hard by, Southward; and on the other ſide faire houſes of the Prebendaries. For, Seven and Twenty Prebends, with nineteene other petty Prebends, beſide a Deane, a Chaunter, a Chancellour, and three Archdeacons belong to this Church. In the time of K. Edward the elder, a Biſhops See was here placed. For, when the Pope had ſuſpended him, becauſe the Eccleſiaſticall diſcipline and juriſdiction in theſe weſterne parts of the Realme, began openly to decay, then he knowing himſelfe to be a maintainer, and Nurſe-father of the Church, ordained three new Biſhopricks, to wit, of * Cridie, Cornwall, and this of Welles, where hee made Eadulph the firſt Biſhop. But many yeares after, when Giſo ſate Biſhop there, Harold Earle of the Weſt-Saxons, and of Kent (who gaped ſo greedily for the goods of the Church) ſo diſquieted and vexed him, that hee went within a little off quite aboliſhing the dignitie thereof. But King William the Conquerour, after hee had overthrowne Harold, ſtretched out his helping hand to the ſuccour of baniſhed Giſo, and reliefe of his afflicted Church. At what time, (as witneſſeth Doomeſday booke) the Biſhop held the whole towne in his owne hands, which paid tribute after the proportion of fiftie Hides. Afterwards in the raigne of Henry the Firſt, Iohannes de Villula, of Tours in France, being now elected Biſhop, tranſlated his See to Bathe, ſince which time the two Sees growing into one, the Biſhop beareth the title of both; ſo that hee is called, The Biſhop of Bathe and Welles. Whereupon the Monkes of Bathe, and Canons of Welles, entred into a great quarrell, and skuffled, as it were, each with the other about the chooſing of their Biſhops: Meane while, Savanaricus Biſhop of Bathe, being alſo Abbat of Glaſtenbury, tranſlated the See of Glaſtenbury and was called Biſhop thereof: but when hee died, this title died with him: and the Monkes and Canons aforeſaid, were at length brought to accord, by that Robert, who divided the Patrimonie of Welles Church into Prebends, inſtituting a Deane, Sub-deane, &c. Joceline alſo, the Biſhop about the ſame time, repaired the Church with new buildings, and within remembrance of our Grand-fathers, Raulph of Shrewsburie, (ſo ſome call him) built a very fine Colledge for the Vicars and ſinging-men, faſt by the North ſide of the Church, and walled in the Biſhops Palace. But this rich Church, was diſpoiled of many faire poſſeſſions in the time of King Edward the Sixth, when England felt all miſeries which happen under a Child-King. As ye goe from the Palace to the market-place of the towne, Thomas Beckington the Biſhop built a moſt beautifull gate: who alſo adjoyned thereto paſſing faire houſes all of uniforme height neere the Market-place; in the middeſt whereof is to be ſeene a Market-place, ſupported with ſeven Columnes or pillar without, arched over-head right daintily, which William Knight the Biſhop, and Wolman the Deane founded for the uſe of people reſorting thither to the Market. Thus much of the Eaſt-part of the towne: In the Weſt-ſide thereof, I have ſeene the pariſh Church of Saint Cuthberts: next unto which ſtandeth an Hoſpitall, founded by Nicolas Burwith Biſhop for foure and twentie poore people..

Out of thoſe Mendip or Mine-hils, ſpringeth the River Frome, which running Eaſt-ward, by Cole-pits, before it hath held on a long courſe that way, turneth North-ward, and ſerveth in ſtead of a bound confining this ſhire and Gloceſterſhire, and paſſeth hard under Farley, a Caſtle not long ſince of the Lord Hungerfords, ſcituate upon a Rocke, where Humfrey Bohun built ſometime a Monkerie, not farre from Philips Norton, a greate Market-towne, which tooke the name of a Church, conſecrate to Saint Philip.

Farley. Philips Norton.

A Lower than it, Selwood, whereof I ſpake erewhile, ſpreadeth long and large: a wood ſtanding well and thicke of trees, whereof the country round about adjoyning was named (as Ethelward mine Author writeth, Selwoodſhire: and a towne ſteepely ſeated thereby is yet called Frome Selwood, which gaineth very much by the trade of cloathing: From which, Weſtward, not full two miles, there ſheweth it ſelfe, a Caſtle (little though it be) yet fine and trim conſiſting of foure round Turrets, which being built by the Delamares, and named thereupon Monney de la Mare, from them came by way of inheritance to the Powlets. And not farre from thence is Witham, where King Henry the Third erected a Nunnerie, which afterward was the firſt B houſe, and as it were, mother to the Carthuſians or Charter-houſe Monks in England, as Hinton not far off neere Farley Caſtle was the ſecond. And now by this time, Frome grown bigger by ſome rivelets iſſuing out of this wood, joyneth with the noble river Avon: which holding on a crooked courſe, runneth anone to that ancient Citie which of the hote Bathes Ptolomee called ΤΑΑΤΑΘΕΡΜΑ, that is, Hote waters: Antoninus, AQVAE SOLIS, that is, The waters of the Sunne: the Britaines Yr ennaint Twymin and Caer Badon, the Saxons Baþancerten, þæt Baþan, and of the concourſe thither of diſeaſed people Akmancheſter, that is, The Citie of ſickely folke: Stephanus nameth it Badiza, we at this day Bath, and the Latiniſts commonly, Bathonia. Seated it is low in a plaine, and the ſame not great; environed round about with hills al- C moſt all of one height, out of which certaine rilles of freſh river waters continually deſcend into the Citie, to the great commoditie of the Citizens. Within the Citie it ſelfe there bubble & boile up three ſprings of hote water, of a blewiſh or ſea-colour, ſending up from them thin vapours, and a kind of a ſtrong ſent withall, by reaſon that the water is drilled, and ſtrained through veines of Brimſtone, and a clammy kind of earth called Bitumen. Which ſprings are very medicinable, and of great vertue to cure bodies over-charged, and benummed (as it were) with corrupt humours: For, by their heat they procure ſweat, and ſubdue the rebellious ſtubbornneſſe of the ſaid humors. Yet are not they wholeſome at all houres: For, from eight of the clocke in the forenoone unto three after noone, they are in manner skalding hote, and doe D worke: and being thus troubled caſt up from the bottome certaine filth: during which time they are ſhut: neither may any body goe into them, untill by their ſluces they cleanſe themſelves, and rid away that filthineſſe. Of theſe three, The Croſſe Bath (ſo called of a croſſe ſtanding upright in old time in the midſt of it) is of a very mild and temperate warmth: and hath twelve ſeates of ſtone about the brinke or border thereof, and is encloſed within a wall. The ſecond, diſtant from this not fully 200. foot is much hotter: whereupon it is termed Hote Bathe: Adjoyning to theſe, is a Spittle or Lazar houſe, built by Reginald Biſhop of Bath for the reliefe of poore diſeaſed perſons. And thoſe two are in the midſt of a Street on the Weſt-ſide of the Citie. The third, which is the greateſt, and after a ſort in the very boſome and heart E of the Citie, is called the Kings Bath, neere unto the Cathedrall Church, walled alſo round about, and fitted with 32. ſeates of arched worke: wherein men and women may ſit apart, who when they enter in put upon their bodies linnen garments, and have their guides. Where the ſaid Cathedrall Church now ſtandeth, there was in ancient time, as the report goeth, a Temple conſecrated to Minerva. Certes, Solinus Polyhiſtor ſpeaking (no doubt) of theſe hote Bathes ſaith thus, In Britaine, there are hot ſprings very daintily adorned and kept for mens uſe: the patroneſſe of which fountaines is the Goddeſſe Minerva: in whoſe Temple the perpetuall fire never turneth aſhes, and dead coales, but when the fire beginneth to die, it turnes into round maſſes of ſtone. Howbeit Athenæus writeth, that all hote Bathes which naturally breake out of the bowels of F the earth are ſacred to Hercules. And in very deede, there is to bee ſeene in the walles of this Citie an ancient Image (ſuch as it is) of Hercules graſping in his hand a Snake, among other old monuments by the injurie of time now altogether defaced: But that we may not contend about this matter, let us grant (if it be ſo thought good) that Bathes were conſecrated to Hercules, and Minerva, joyntly. For the Greekes doe write that Pallas firſt miniſtred water unto Hercules for to bath him, after he had atchieved his labours. For my purpoſe it ſhall ſuffice, if I be able to proue by the authoritie of Solinus (who writeth that Pallas was the Patroneſſe of theſe Bathes) this Citie to be the ſame which the Britans in their tongue called Caer Palladur, that is, The Citie of Pallas-water, or Vrbs Palladia Aquæ, if a man turne it into Latine. For, the matter, the name, and ſignification doe moſt fitly agree. The finding out of theſe Bathes our Fables attribute to the King of Britans Bleyden Cloyth, that is, Bleyden the Magician; but with what probabilitie, that I leaue to others. Plinie indeed affirmeth, that the Britans in old time uſed the practice of magick with ſo great ceremonies, that it ſeemed they taught it the Perſians: yet dare I not aſcribe theſe Bathes to any art magicall. Some of our writers, when their minds were buſied in other matters, report Iulius Cæſar to haue beene the firſt finder of them: But my opinion is, that later it was ere the Romans had knowledge of them, ſeeing Solinus is the firſt that hath made mention of them. The Engliſh-Saxons about the 44. yeare after their comming into Britaine, when they had broken league and couenant, and kindled againe the coales of war which had already beene quenched, beſieged this Citie: But when the warlike Arthur came upon them, they tooke the hill named Mons Badonicus, where, when couragiouſly a long while they had fought it out to the uttermoſt, a great number of them were ſlaine. This hill ſeemeth to be the very ſame, which now is called Banneſdowne, ouer a little village neere this Citie, which they call Bathſtone, on which there are bankes, and a rampier as yet to be ſeene. Yet ſome there be, I know, who ſeeke for this hill in Yorkſhire: But Gildas may bring them backe againe to this place: For, in a manuſcript Copie within Cambridge-Librarie, where he writeth of the victorie of Aurelius Ambroſe, thus we read: Vntill that yeare wherein ſiege was laid to the hill of Badonicus, which is not farre from Seuerne mouth. But in caſe this may not perſwade them, know they, that the vale which runneth here along the river Auon, is named in Britiſh Nant Badon, that is, The Vale of Badon: and where we ſhould ſeeke for the hill Badonicus, but by the Vale Badonica, I cannot hitherto ſee. Neither durſt the Saxons for a long time after, ſet upon this Citie, but left it for a great while to the Britans. Howbeit in the yeare of Chriſt 577. when Cenalin King of the Weſt-Saxons, had defeated the Britans at Deorham, in Gloceſterſhire, being both ſtraightly beſieged, and alſo aſſaulted, it yeilded at firſt: and within few yeares recouering ſome ſtrength grew up to great dignity and therewith got a new name, Ackmanceſter, as I ſaid: For, Osbrich in the yeare 676. founded a Nunnery there: and immediately after, when the Mercians had gotten it under them, King Offa built another Church, both which in the time of the Daniſh broiles were ouerthrowne. Out of the ruines of theſe two, aroſe afterwards the Church of S. Peter, in which Edgar ſurnamed the Peace-maker, being crowned, and ſacred King, beſtowed upon the Citie very many Immunities, the memorie of which thing the Citizens yearely with Solemne plaies doe yet celebrate. In Edward the Confeſſors time, (as we read in Domeſ-booke of England) it paied tribute according to 20. Hides, when as the Shire paid. There, the King had 64. Burgers, and 30. Burgers of others. But this proſperitie of theirs endured not long: for, ſoone after the Normans comming in, Robert Mowbray Nephew to the Biſhop of Conſtance, who had raiſed no ſmall Sedition againſt King William Rufus, ſacked and burned it. Yet in ſhort ſpace it reuiued, and recouered it ſelfe, by meanes of Iohn de Villula of Tours in France, who being Biſhop of Welles, for five hundred markes (as ſaith William of Malmesburie) purchaſed this Citie of King Henry the Firſt, and tranſlated his Epiſcopall chaire hither, retaining alſo the title of Biſhop of Welles, and for his owne See built a new Church: which being not long ſince ready to fal, Oliuar Biſhop of Bathe began to found another hard by that old (a curious and ſtately piece of worke, I aſſure you) and almoſt finiſhed the ſame: Which if he had performed indeed, it would no doubt haue ſurpaſſed the moſt Cathedrall Churches of England. But the untimely death of ſo magnificent a Biſhop, the iniquitie and troubles of the time, and the ſuppreſſion of religious houſes enſuing, with the late auarice of ſome, who haue craftily conueied the money collected throughout England for that uſe, another way (if it be true that is reported) haue

A have envied it that glory. But nevertheleſſe this Citie hath flouriſhed as well by clothing, as by reaſon of uſuall concourſe thither for health twice every yeare, yea and hath fortified it ſelfe with walles, wherein there are ſet certaine Antique Images and Roman Inſcriptions for the proofe of their antiquitie, which now by age are ſo eaten into, and worne, that they can hardly be read. And that nothing might be wanting to the ſtate and dignitie of Bathe, ſome noble men it hath honoured with the title of Earle. For, we read, that Philibert of Chandew deſcended out of Bretaigne in France, was by King Henry the Seventh ſtiled with this honor. Afterwards, King Henrie the Eighth, in the 28. yeare of his reigne created Iohn Bourcher Lord Fitzwarin, Earle Earles of

And now for a farwell, loe heere Nechams verſes, ſuch as they bee, of theſe hot waters at Bathe, who lived 400. yeares ſince.

D Our Bathes at Bath, with Virgils to compare,
For their effects, I dare almoſt be bold:
For feeble folke, and craſie good they are,
For bruis'd, conſum'd, far-ſpent, and very old:
For thoſe likewiſe, whoſe ſickneſſe comes of cold.
Nature prevents the painfull skill of man;
Arts worke againe, helps nature what it can.
Men thinke theſe Baths of ours are made thus hot,
By reaſon of ſome ſecret force of fire,
Which under them as under brazen pot
E Makes more or leſſe, as reaſon doth require,
The waters boile, and walme to our deſire:
Such fancies vaine, uſe errors forth to bring,
But what? we know from Brimſtone veines they ſpring.

Have heere alſo, if you liſt to read them, two ancient Inſcriptions very lately digged up neere the Citie in Waldcot field, hard by the Kings high way ſide, which Robert Chambers, a ſtudious lover of antiquities, hath tranſlated into his garden: From whence I copied them out.

And Meduſaes head with haires all Snakes.

Along the ſaid river of Avon, which now is heere the bound between this ſhire and Gloceſterſhire, upon the banke Weſtward we have a ſight of Cainſham, ſo name of one Keina, a moſt devout and holy Britiſh virgine, who (as the credulous age beforetime, perſwaded many) transformed ſerpents into ſtones, becauſe there be found there in Stone quarries, ſuch ſtrange workes of nature, when ſhe is diſpoſed to diſport herſelfe. For, I have ſeene a ſtone brought from hence reſembling a ſerpent, winding round in manner of a wreath, the head whereof being ſomewhat unperfect bare up in the Circumference thereof, and the end of the taile tooke up the centre within. But moſt

A moſt of theſe are headleſſe. In the fields neere adjoyning, and other places beſide, is found Percepier, an hearbe peculiar unto England. Bitter it is in taſte, and hath a biting ſharpeneſſe withall: it never groweth above a ſpan high, and commeth up all the yeare long of it ſelfe: ſmall leavy flowers of a greeniſh hew it beares, without any ſtalke at all: Which herbe mightily, and ſpeedily provoketh urine: and of it the diſtilled water ſerveth for great uſe, as P. Pena in his Animadverſions or Commentaries of Plants hath noted. Percepier.

Scarce five miles from this place, the river Avon paſſeth through the midſt of Briſtow, in Welch-Britiſh, Caer oder, Nant Badon, that is, The Citie Oder, in the Vale of B Badon. In the Catalogue of ancient Cities, Caer Brito: In Saxon Bꝛiȝhtꝛtop, that is, A bright or ſhining place. But ſuch as have called it Venta Belgarum, have deceived both themſelves and others. This Citie ſtanding partly in Somerſet, and partly in Gloceſter-ſhires, is not to be reputed belonging either to this, or that, having Magiſtrates of the owne by it ſelfe, and being of it ſelfe entire, and a County incorporate. Scituate it is ſomewhat high betweene Avon and the little river Frome, ſufficiently defended with rivers and fortifications together: For, environed it was ſometime with a double wall. So faire to behold by reaſon of buildings as well publike as private, that it is fully correſpondent to the name of Bright ſtow: With common Sewes or Sinks, (they call them Goutes) ſo made to run under the ground for the con- C veiance, and waſhing away of all filth, that for cleanlineſſe, and holeſomneſſe a man would not deſire more: whereupon there is no uſe heere of carts: ſo well furniſhed with all things neceſſarie for a mans life, ſo populous, and well inhabited withall, that next after London, and Yorke, it may of all Cities in England juſtly challenge the chiefe place. For, the mutuall entercourſe of trafficke, and the commodious haven, which admitteth in ſhips under ſaile into the very boſome of the Citie, hath drawne people of many countries thither. For the Avon, ſo often as the Moone declineth downeward from the meridian point, and paſſeth by the oppoſite line unto it, ſo ſwelleth with the tide from the Ocean, that it raiſeth up the ſhips there riding, and lying in the oze 11. or 12. elles afloat in water. And the Citizens themſelves are rich Mer- D chants, and trafficke all over Europe, yea, and make Voyages at ſea ſo farre as into the moſt remote parts of America. But, when, and by whom it was built, it is hard to ſay. Old it ſeemeth not to be, for as much as in all thoſe ſpoiles, and ſackages that the Danes made, there is no mention of it in our Hiſtorians. And verily mine opinion is, that it firſt grew up to ſome name, when the Engliſh-Saxons Empire was much declining, ſeeing that it is no where named before the yeare of our Lord 1063; when Harold (as Florentinus of Worceſter writeth) embarqued himſelfe, and his armie, and put to ſea from Briſtow to Wales. In the firſt yeares of the Normans, Berton, a mannor adjoyning, And Briſtow paid unto the King (as we find in the booke of Domeſday) 110. markes of ſilver, and the Burgers ſaid, that Biſhop G. hath 33. markes, and one marke of E Gold. After this, Robert Biſhop of Conſtance that plotted ſeditious practiſes againſt King William Rufus, choſe it for the ſeate-towne of the whole warre, fortified it, being then but a ſmall Citie, with that inner (wall as I take it) which at this day is in part ſtanding. But a few yeares after, the circuit thereof was every way enlarged. For on the South, Radcliffe, wherein there ſtood ſome ſmall houſes under the Citie ſide, is by a ſtone bridge, with houſes on each hand built upon it, more like a ſtreete than a bridge, joyned to the Citie: encloſed within a wall, and the Inhabitants thereof enfranchiſed Citizens: yea & hoſpitals in every quarter thereof for the benefit of poore people, and faire Pariſh-Churches to the glorie of God were erected. The moſt beautifull of all which by farre, is S. Maries of Radcliffe without the walles, into which F there is a ſtately aſcent upon many ſtaires: ſo large withall, ſo finely, and curiouſly wrought, with an arched roofe over head of ſtone artificially embowed, a ſteeple alſo of an exceeding height, that all the Pariſh-Churches in England which hetherto I have ſeene, in my judgement it ſurpaſſeth many degrees. In it, William Cannings the founder, hath two faire monuments: upon the one lieth his image portraied in an Aldermans roabe: For, five times he had beene Major of this Citie: upon the other,

other, his image likewiſe in ſacerdotall habite; for that in this old age hee tooke the orders of prieſthood, and was Deane of that colledge which himſelfe inſtituted at Weſtburie. There is hard by, another Church alſo, which they call the Temple, the lanterne or tower whereof when the bell rings ſhaketh to and fro, ſo as it hath cloven and divided it ſelfe from the reſt of the building, and made ſuch a chinke from the bottome to the top, as it gapeth the bredth of three fingers, and both ſhutteth and openeth whenſoever the bell is rung. And heere I muſt not overpaſſe in ſilence S. Stephens Church, the tower ſteeple whereof being of a mightie heighth, one Shipward, alias Barſtable, a Citizen and Merchant, within the memorie of our grandfathers, right ſumptuouſly, and artificially built. From the Eaſt-ſide alſo & the North, augmented it was with a number of edifices, encloſed within a wall and fenced with the river Frome, which having runne by the wall ſide gently falleth into the Avon, and yieldeth a dainty harbour for ſhips, with a wharfe convenient for the ſhipping and unlading of Merchandiſe in and out, (they call it the Kay.) Under which betweene the confluences of Avon and Frome, there is a plaine beſet round about with trees, yielding a moſt pleaſant walking place: South-eaſt, where no rivers are to guard it, Robert the baſe ſonne of King Henry the Firſt, whom they commonly name Robert Rufus, and Conſull of Gloceſter, becauſe he was Earle of Gloceſter, built a large and ſtrong Caſtle for the defence of this Citie; and of a pious and devout affection appointed every tenth ſtone to the building of a Chappell neere unto the Priory of S. Iames, which he likewiſe founded by the Citie ſide. This Robert had to wife Mabile the onely daughter and heire of Robert Fitz-Hamon, who held this towne by vaſſalage in Capite, of King William Conquerour. This Caſtle was ſcarcely built, when King Stephen beſieged it, but with loſt labour: for, he was compelled to raiſe his ſiege and depart: and a few yeares after, was impriſoned in the ſame, giving thereby a teſtimony and proofe how uncertaine the chance of war is. Beyond the river Frome which hath a bridge over it, at Frome-gate there riſeth an high hill, with a ſteepe and crooked aſcent, ſo as it is painefull to goe up unto it: From whence ye have a moſt faire and goodly proſpect to the Citie and haven underneath. This hill in the very top and pitch thereof, ſpreadeth preſently into a large, greene and even plaine, which in the midſt is ſhadowed with a double row and courſe of trees, and among them ſtands a pulpit of Stone, and a Chapell, wherein (by report) lieth enterred Iordan the companion of Auguſtine the Engliſhmens Apoſtle. Now it is converted to a Schoole, and on both ſides (to ſay nothing of the neate and fine houſes of private men) beautified it is with publike and ſtately buildings. Of the one ſide was a Collegiat Church called Gaunts, of the founder one Henry Gaunt Knight, who relinquiſhing the world, in this place betooke himſelfe to the ſervice of God: but now through the bounty of Thomas Carr a wealthy Citizen, converted to the keeping of Orphans: on the other ſide directly over againſt it ſtand two Churches dedicated to S. Auguſtine, the one (which is the leſſe) a Pariſh-Church: the other, that is greater, the Biſhops Cathedrall Church, endowed with ſixe Prebendaries, by King Henrie the Eighth: the greateſt part whereof is now deſtroied, where the Colledge-gate workemanly built carrieth in the front this Inſcription.

REX HENRICVS II. ET DOMINVS ROBERTVS FILIVS HARDINGI FILII REGIS DACIÆ, HVIVS MONASTERII PRIMI FVNDATORES EXTITERVNT.

That is,

King Henry the Second, and Lord Robert the ſonne of Harding, the King of Denmarks ſonne, were the firſt founders of of this Monaſterie.

This

A This Robert, called by the Normans Fitz-Harding, descended of the bloud royall of Denmarke was an Alderman of Bristow, of King Henry the Second so entirely beloved, that by his meanes Maurice his sonne married the daughter of the Lord of Berkley. Whereby his posteritie, who flourished in great honor, are unto this day called Barons of Berkley; and some of them have beene buried in this Church. Barons de Berkley.

From hence as Avon holdeth on his course, there are on each side very high cliffes by nature set there (as it were) of purpose, the one of them which on the East-side overlooketh the river beareth the name of S. Vincents rocke, so full of Diamonds, that a man may fill whole sarkes or bushels of them. These are not so much set by, because B they be so plentious. For, in bright, and transparent colour they match the Indian Diamonds, if they passe them not: in hardnesse onely they are inferior to them; but in that nature her self hath framed them pointed with five cornered or foure cornerd smooth sides, I thinke them therefore worthy to be had in greater admiration. The other rock also on the West-side is likewise full of Diamonds, which by the wonderfull skill and worke of nature, are enclosed as young ones within the bowels of hollow, and reddish flints: for, here is the earth of a red colour. When Avon hath left these rocks behind him, with full channell at length he disemgorgeth himselfe into the Severn-sea.

Then remaineth now to reckon up the Earles and Dukes of this County. The first C Earle of Somerset, by tradition, was William de Mohun, or Moion, who may seeme to be the very same, whom Maud the Empresse in a charter whereby she created William de Mandevill Earle of Essex, taketh as a witnesse under this name, Comite W. de Moion. Neither from that time meete we with any expresse and apparent mention of Earles of Somerset, unlesse it be in these letters Patents of King Henrie the Third, unto Peter de Mawley*, which, that I may draw out the judgement of others, I will heere set downe literally. Know yee, that we have received the homage of our well beloved Uncle William Earle of Sarisbury for all the lands that he holdeth of us, & principally for the * County or Earledom of Somerset, which we have given unto him with all appurtenances for D his homage and service, saving the royaltie to our selves: and therefore we will & command you, that ye see he have full seisine of the foresaid Earledome, and all the appurtinances therto, and that ye entermeddle not in any thing from henceforth, as touching the County or Earledome aforesaid, &c. And commandement is given to all Earles, Barons, Knights, and Freeholders of the County of Somerset, that unto the same Earle they doe fealtie, and homage, saving their faith and allegiance unto their soveraigne Lord the King, and that from henceforth they be intentive and answerable unto him as their Lord. Whether by these words in the Patent he was Earle of Somerset, as also of Denshire (for, of the same William he wrote likewise in the very same words unto Robert de Courtney) I leave for other men to judge. Under this King Henry the third (as wee finde in a booke written in French, which pertaineth to the house of the Mohuns Knights) it is recorded, E that Pope Innocentius in a solemne feast, ordained Reginald Mohun Earle de Esis, (that is, as the Author doth interpret it, Of Somerset) by delivering unto him a golden consecrated rose, and an yearely pension to be paied upon the high Altar of S. Pauls, in London. So that this Reginald may seeme to have beene not properly an Earle; but an Apostolicall Earle. For, so were they termed in those daies who had their creation from the Bishop of Rome, (like as they were called Earles Imperiall whom the Emperor invested) and such had power to institute Notaries and Scribes, to legitimate such as were base borne, &c. under certaine conditions. A long time after Iohn de Beaufort the base sonne of Iohn of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster by Katherine Swineford, being made legitimate by King Richard the Second, together with his brethren and F sister, with consent of the Parliament, was preferred to the honor of Earle of Somerset, and afterwards created Marquesse Dorset; but soone after deprived thereof by King Henrie the Fourth, having the title onely of the Earle of Somerset left unto him. The said Iohn had three sonnes, Henry Earle of Somerset, who died in his tender age; Iohn, created by King Henry the Fifth, the first Duke of Somerset, who had one sole daughter named Margaret, mother to King Henry the Seventh: and Edmund

Edmund who ſucceeded after his brother in the Dukedome: and having beene a certaine time Regent of France, being called home, and accuſed for the loſſe of Normandie, after hee had ſuffred much grievance at the peoples hands in that regard, was in that wofull war betweene the houſes of Lancaſter and Yorke ſlaine in the firſt battaile of S. Albans. Henrie his ſonne being placed in his roome, whiles hee ſerved the times, ſiding one while with Yorke, and anotherwhile with Lancaſter, in the battaile at Exham was by thoſe of the houſes of Yorke: taken priſoner, and with the loſſe of his head paied for his unconſtant levitie. Edmund his brother ſucceeded him in his honor, who of this family was the laſt Duke of Somerſet, and when the whole power of the Lancaſtrians was diſcomfited at Tewkesbury, was forcibly pulled out of the Church into which all embrued with bloud he fled as into a Sanctuary, and then beheaded. Thus all the legitimate males of this family being dead and gone, firſt King Henry the Seventh honored with title Edmund his owne ſon a young child, who ſhortly departed this world: afterwards King Henry the Eighth, did the like for his baſe ſonne, named Henry Fitz-Roy. And ſeeing he had no children, King Edward the Sixth, inveſted Sir Edward de Sancto Mauro, commonly, Seimor, with the ſame honour, who being moſt power-able, honorable, and loaden with titles, for thus went his ſtile, Duke of Somerſet, Earle of Hertford Vicount Beauchamp, Baron Seimor, Vncle to the King, Governor of the King, Protector of his Realmes, Dominions, and ſubjects, Lieutenant of the forces by land and ſea, Lord high Treaſurer, and Earle Marſhall of England, Captaine of the Iſles Gernſey, and Iarſey, &c. Was ſodainely overwhelmed, as it were by a diſport of fortune which never ſuffereth ſuddaine over-greatneſſe to laſt long, and for a ſmall crime, and that upon a nice point ſubtlely deviſed, and packed by his enemies, bereaved both of thoſe dignities, and his life withall.

WILSHIRE.

VVILSHIRE.

Il-ſhire, which alſo pertained to the BELGAE, called in the Engliſh-Saxon tongue, Wil-ꝑeꝺa, in Latine commly termed, Wiltonia, taking that denomination of Wilton, ſometime the chiefe towne, like as it of the River Willy, is altogether a mediterranean or mid-land country. For, encloſed it is with Somerſetſhire on the Weſt, Berkſhire and Hampſhire on the Eaſt; on the North, with Glocesterſhire; and on the South, with Dorſetſhire, and a part of Hampſhire. A Region, which, as it breedeth a number of warlike and hardy men, who in old time, with Cornwall and Denſhire together challenged by reaſon of their manhood, and martiall proweſſe the prerogative in the Engliſh armie of that regiment, which ſhould ſecond the maine battell, (as ſaith Iohn of Sarisburie in his Polycraticon) ſo is it exceeding fertill, and plentifull of all things, yea, and for the varietie thereof, paſſing pleaſant and delightſome. The Northern and upper part, which they call, North-Wilſhire, riſeth up ſomewhat with delectable hils, attired in times paſt with large and great woods, (which now begin to grow thinne) and watered with cleare rivers. For, Iſis the principall, and, as it were Prince of all the Engliſh Rivers; which afterwards taketh to him the name of Tamiſis, that is, Thames, being now as yet but little and ſhallow, together with other Rivers of leſſe name, which I will ſpeake of in their proper places, water it plentifully. The South part with large graſſie plaines, feedeth innumerable flocks of ſheepe, having his Rivers, ſwelling Brookes, and rils of everliving fountaines. The middeſt of this ſhire, which for the moſt part alſo, lieth even and plain, is divided overthwart from Eaſt to Weſt, with a Dike of wonderfull worke, caſt up for many miles together in length: The people dwelling there about, call it Wanſdike, which upon an errour generall received, they talke, and tell to have beene made by the divell upon a Wedneſday. For in the Saxon tongue it is called, Woꝺeneſꝺic, that is to ſay, The Ditch of Wooden or Mercurie, and as it ſhould ſeeme, of Wooden that falſe imagined God, and Father of the Engliſh-Saxons. But I have alwaies beene perſwaded, that the Saxons made it, as a limit to divide the two Kingdomes of the Mercians, and Weſt-Saxons aſunder. For, this was the very place of battell betweene them, whiles they ſtrove one with another, to enlarge their Dominions. And neere unto this Dike ſtandeth, Woꝺenſburg a little Village, where Ceaulin, the moſt warlike King of the Weſt-Saxons, in the yeare of grace 590. whiles hee defended his Marches, in a bloudy fight, received ſuch a foile and overthrow by the Britans and Engliſhmen, that he was forced to flie his countrey, and to end his daies in exile, a pitious and lamentable ſpectacle, even to his very enemies. And at this Dike, to ſay nothing of other accidents, Ina the Weſt-Saxon, and Ceolred the Mercian, joyned battell, and departed the field on even hand: Like to this was that ditch, whereby King Offa kept the Britans off from his Mercians; called even at this day Offa-dike: others alſo are ſtill to be ſeene, among the Eaſt-Angles in Cambridgeſhire, and Suffolke, wherewith they limited their territory, and defended themſelves from the inrodes and invaſions of the Mercians.

Dikes of the Marches.

In the North-part of Wilſhire, which is watered with Iſis, or the Thames, there is a towne called Creckelade by Marianus, by others Greekelade of Grecke Philoſophers, as ſome are ready to beleeve; who, as the hiſtorie of Oxford reporteth, began there an Univerſitie, which afterwards was tranſlated to Oxford. Weſt from that is Highworth highly ſeated, a well knowne Market, but South from Creckelade, I ſaw Lediard Tregoze, the ſeat of the Familie of Saint-Iohn, Knights: the which Margaret de Bello Campo, or Beauchamp, afterwards Ducheſſe of Somerſet, gave to Oliver of Saint Iohn her ſecond ſonne. For, to her it came as an inheritance, by Patiſhul, Grandiſon, and and Tregoze, names of great honour. Wotton Baſſet bordeth hard upon this, having this primitive name from Wood, the addition doth prove, that it belonged to the Noble houſe of the Baſſets. But in the latter fore-going age, it was (as I have heard ſay, the habitation of the Duke of Yorke, who made there a verie large Parke, for to encloſe Deere in. From hence Breden wood, now Breden Forreſt, ſtretched it ſelfe farre and wide, which in the yeare 905. by Ethelwald Clyto*, and the Danes that aided him, was laid waſte, and the Inhabitants endured all calamities of warre.

* Prince of the bloud.

On the Weſt ſide whereof, the River Avon, above mentioned, gently runneth, which breaking forth almoſt in the North limit of this ſhire, keepeth his courſe ſouthward, and (as Aethelward noteth,) was ſometime the bound betweene the Kingdoms of the Weſt-Saxons, and the Mercians: upon which many great battels from time to time were fought: whiles it is but ſmall, he ſlideth under Malmesbury hill, and receiving another ſtreame, well neare encloſeth the place. A very proper towne this is, and hath a great name for clothing, which (as wee read in the Eulogie of Hiſtories) Cunwallow Mulmutius, King of the Britaines, built together with Lacok and Tetburie two Caſtles, and named it Caer Baldon, which being at length by heat of warres deſtroyed, out of the ruines thereof there aroſe, as writers record, a Caſtle which our Anceſtors in their tongue, called, Ingelborne: at which time, the Saxon petie Kings had their royall palace at Caerdurburge, now Brokenbridge, a little village ſcarce a mile off. Neither verily was this towne for a long time knowne by any other name than Ingelborne, untill one Maidulph an Iriſh Scot, a man of great learning, and ſingular holineſſe of life, taking delight to a pleaſant grove, that grew up heere under the hill, lived for a time a ſolitary Heremite there: and afterwards teaching a Schoole, and with his ſchollers betaking himſelfe to a monaſticall life, built him a little monaſterie, or Cell. From this time, of that Maidulph, the towne began to bee called, Maidulfesburge for Ingleborne, termed by Beda, Maidulphi Vrbs, that is, Maidulps Citie, and afterwards ſhort, Malmesburies and in ſome of our Hiſtories, and ancient Donations made unto this place, Meldunum, Malduburie, and Maldunsburg. Among the Diſciples of this Maidulph, flouriſhed chiefely Aldelme, who being elected his ſucceſſour, by the helpe of Eleutherius, Biſhop of the Weſt-Saxons, unto whom the place of right belonged, built there a very faire Monaſterie, and was himſelfe the firſt Abbat thereof: of whom alſo in a certaine manuſcript, this towne is called Aldelmesbirig. But this name ſoone periſhed, yet the memorie of the man continueth ſtill: for canonized he was a Saint: and on his feſtivall day, there was heere kept a great Faire, at which uſuall there is a band of armed men, appointed to keepe the peace among ſo many ſtrangers reſorting thither. And right worthy is he, that his memorie ſhould remaine freſh for ever, in regard, not onely of his Holineſſe, but of his learning alſo, as thoſe times were. For the firſt, he was of the Engliſh nation, who wrote in Latine, and the firſt that taught Engliſhmen the way, how to make a Latine verſe: the which in theſe verſes, hee both promiſed of himſelfe, and performed,

Primus ego in patriam mecum, modo vita ſuperſit,
Aonio rediens deducam vertice Muſas.

I will be firſt, God lending life, that into country mine,
From Aon top at my returne, ſhall bring the Muſes nine.

This Adelme after his death, Athelſtane that Noble Prince, choſe to be his peculiar protector and tutelar Saint, and for that cauſe beſtowed very great immunities upon this towne, and enriched the monaſterie with a large and ample endowments. In which he made choiſe to bee buried, and his monument the Inhabitants ſhew to this day. After Athelſtane, this Monaſterie flouriſhed long in continuall wealth, and among other famous Clerks, and great Scholars, brought forth William ſurnamed thereof Malmesburienſis, unto whom for his learned induſtry, the Hiſtories of England both Civill, and Eccleſiaſticall, are deepely indebted. The towne alſo maintained and upholden, as it were, by the meanes of the Monaſterie, was likewiſe fortified

William Malmesbury.

A tified by Roger Biſhop of Salisburie, who in the beginning of the warres betweene Henrie of Anjou, and King Stephen ſtrengthned it with walls, and a Caſtle, which being once beſieged by King Henrie the Second, defended it ſelfe. Moreover that magnificent Biſhop, both here and at Salisburie built houſes, for receit very large, for coſt as ſumptuous, and for ſhew right beautifull; ſo even and orderly were the ſtones couched, and laid together, that the joynts could not be ſeene, and the whole wall throughout ſeemed to the eie one entire ſtone. But the Caſtle not many yeares after by K. Iohns permiſſion, was pulled downe to the uſe of the Monkes (for enlarging their monaſterie) who encreaſed it ſtill continually both in buildings, livings,
B and revenue, untill that fatall thunder-clap overthrew all the Monaſteries of England. Then their lands, rents, and riches that had beene ſo many yeares in gathering, and heaping up together, which were (as our Forefathers reputed them) The vowes of the faithfull, the ranſome and redemption of ſinnes, and the patrimonies of poore people, were quite ſcattered: and the very Minſter it ſelfe ſhould have ſped no better than the reſt, but beene demoliſhed, had not T. Stumpes a wealthy clothier, by much ſuit, but with a greater piece of money, redeemed and bought it for the towneſmen his neighbours, by whom it was converted to a Pariſh-Church, and for a great part is yet ſtanding at this day. Councell at Aix.

From this Maidulphs Citie, or Malmesburie, as Avon runneth, it commeth to Danteſey, that gave name unto the poſſeſſions thereof, worſhipfull Knights of old time in this tract: from whom by the Eaſterlings, commonly called Stradlings, it came unto the family of the Danvers. Out of which, Henry Danvers, through the favor of King Iames, obtained of late the title and honour of Baron Danvers of Danteſey. Sixe miles from hence, Avon taketh unto him from the Eaſt, a Brooke, which runneth through Calne, an old little towne ſcituate upon a ſtony ground, having in it a faire Church to commend it: at which place when great adoe there was betweene the Monkes, and Prieſts about ſingle life, a frequent Provinciall Councell, or Synod was holden in the yeare of our redemption, 977. But behold, whiles they were debating the matter, the D Convocation houſe, wherein the States ſat, by breaking of the maine timber-worke, and falling aſunder of the floore, fell ſuddenly downe, together with the Prelates, Nobles, and Gentlemen there aſſembled: with the fall whereof many were hurt, and more ſlaine outright: onely Dunſtane, Preſident of the ſaid Counſell, and held with the Monkes, eſcaped without harme: which miracle (for ſo that age took it) is thought wonderfully to have credited the profeſſion of Monkerie, and weakened the cauſe of married Prieſts.
C Danteſey. Baron Danvers. Calne. A Synode as touching the ſingle life of Prieſts.

From hence Avon now growne greater, Chippenham, in Saxon Cỹppanham, of note at this day for the market there kept; whereof it tooke the name: For, Cỹppan, in the Saxon tongue, is as much to ſay as to buy, and Cỹppman, a buyer, like as E with us, Cheapen, and Chapman: and among the Germans, Coppman. But in thoſe daies, it was the Kings manour: and by King Elfred in his teſtament, bequeathed to a younger daughter of his. Nothing is there now worth the ſight but the Church, built by the Barons Hungerford, as appeareth every where by their coats of Armes ſet up thereon. Directly over againſt this, but ſomewhat farther from the banke, lieth Coſham, now a little village, but ſometime King Etheldreds manſion houſe, and for that the Earles of Cornwall, were wont to retire themſelves, and ſojourne there, it was of good account: within view whereof, is Caſtlecombe, an old Caſtle, ennobled ſometimes by the Lords of it, the Walters of Dunſtavill, men of great renowne in their time: out of whoſe houſe, the Writhoſleies Earles of Southampton are de-F ſcended, * Petronilla or Parnell daughter and ſole heire of the laſt Walter, was wedded unto Robert de Montfort, and bare unto him William his Sonne, who ſold this Caſtle, with the reſt of his lands, and poſſeſſions unto Bartholomew Badilſmer: from whom (as I have heard) it paſſed to the Scroopes, who ever ſince have held it. But now returne we unto the river: upon which are ſeated, Leckham, the poſſeſſion of the noble family of the Bainards, where pieces of Roman money have oftentimes beene found: and Lacocke, where the moſt godly and religious woman, Dame Ela

Counteſſe of Salisburie (being now a widdow) built a Monaſterie, (like as ſhee did another at Henton) in the yeare 1232. to the honour of the bleſſed Virgin Marie, and Saint Bernard, in which her ſelfe devoutly dedicated, both her bodie and ſoule to the ſervice of God.

Avon from hence ſhadowed with trees, holding on his courſe, not far from Brumham, an inhabitation (in times paſt) of the Baron Samond, or truly De Sancto Amando, Saint Amand, afterward of the Baintons from them: before hee admitteth to him a little rivelet from the Eaſt, that putteth forth his head neere unto the Caſtle De Vies, Devizes, or the Vies. Florentius of Worceſter calleth it Diviſio, and Neubergenſis, Diviſæ. Heretofore a ſtately place, I aſſure you, very ſtrong as well by naturall ſcituation, as by mans hand, but through the injurie of time, now decaied and defaced. This Caſtle, that it might diſgrace, and put downe all other Caſtles in England, Roger Biſhop of Salisburie (whom from a poore maſſe-Prieſt, Fortune had exalted unto the higheſt authoritie next the King) at his exceſſive charges built. But Fortune (as one ſaith) hath ſet no man ſo high, but ſhe threatneth to take from him as much, as ſhe hath permitted him to have. For, King Stephen upon a diſpleaſure, wrung from him both this Caſtle, and that alſo of Shirburne, together with all his wealth and riches, as great as it was, yea, and brought the ſilly old man ſo low in priſon, what with hunger, and what with other miſeries, that betweene the feare of death, and torments of this life, he had neither will to live, nor skill to die. At which time was handled, canvaſed, or rather toſſed to and fro, this queſtion, whether by the Canons and Decrees of Church, Biſhops might hold Caſtles; or if this be by indulgence tolerated, whether they ought not in dangerous and ſuſpected times, ſurrender them up into the Kings hands.

Saint Amand Barons. The Vies. Devizes.

Avon having received this rivelet to beare him company, maketh away weſtward: and ſtraight waies another brook from the South runneth into him, which hath given name to the houſe ſtanding upon it, called likewiſe Barons Brooke, which as it afforded habitation in old time to Iohn Pavely, Lord of Weſtburie Hundred, ſo afterwards it gave the title of Baron, to Robert Willoughby, becauſe by the Chenies hee derived his pedigree from Paveley, what time as King Henrie the Seventh, advanced him to a Barons dignitie, as being high in his favour, Steward of his houſe, and appointed (by report) for a while, Admirall. Whereupon he uſed the Helme of a ſhip for a ſeale in his ring, like as Pompey in times paſt, Governour of the Roman Navie, the ſtemme or Prow thereof in his coines. But this family fading, as it were, and dying in the verie blade, quickly came to an end. For, he left a ſonne Robert Lord Brooke, who of a former wife, begat Edward his ſonne that died before his father, leaving a daughter married to Sir Foulke Grevil, and of a ſecond wife two daughters, by whom a great inheritance, and rich eſtate, conveied to the Marqueſſe of Wincheſter, and Lord Montjoy.

Edindon.

Neere unto this, Eaſtward lieth Edindon, in old time Eathandune, where King Alfred in as memorable a battell as any time elſe, moſt fortunately vanquiſhed the bold, inſolent, and outragious Danes, and drave them to this hard paſſe, that they ſwore in a ſet forme of oath, forthwith to depart out of England. In which place alſo William de Edindon, Biſhop of Wincheſter, whom King Edward highly favoured, here borne and taking his name from hence, erected a Colledge, * Bonis hominibus, Bon homes, as they called them, that is, for good men. But at the little river aforeſaid, ſomewhat higher, ſtandeth upon a hill Trubridge, ſometimes Trupabpiz, that is, a ſure and truſty bridge. But for what cauſe this name was ſet upon it, it is not for certaine knowne. In great name and proſperitie it is in theſe daies, by reaſon of clothing, and ſheweth the remaines of a Caſtle, which belongeth to the Duchie of Lancaſter, and ſometime of the Earle of Salisburie. Avon thus increaſed by this rivelet, watereth Bradford, in the foregoing times Bradanford, (ſo named of a broad foard) ſcituate upon the deſcent or fall of an hill, and built all of ſtone: where Kenilwalch King of the Weſt-Britans, embrued his ſword wiuh bloud in civill warre againſt Cuthred his neere kinſman. Here Avon biddeth Wil-ſhire farewell, and entreth cloſely into the Countie of

A of Somerſet, minding to viſit the Bathes.

The Weſt limit of this ſhire goeth downe directly from hence Southward, by Long-leat, the dwelling place of the Thins, (deſcended from the Bottevils) a verie faire, neate, and elegant houſe, in a foule ſoile, which although once or twice it hath beene burnt, hath riſen eftſones more faire. Alſo, by Maiden Bradley, ſo called of one of the Inhabitants of Manaſſes Baſſet, a moſt noble perſonage in his time, who being her ſelfe a maiden infected with the leproſie, founded an houſe heere for maidens that were lepers, and endowed the ſame with her owne Patrimonie and Livetide, like as her Father before time had thereabout erected a Priorie: Likewiſe, by Stourton, the ſeate of the Lords Stourton, whom King Henry the Sixth raiſed to this dignitie, after their eſtate had beene much bettered in lands and revenues, by marriage with the Daughter and heire of the family, Le Moigne, or Monke of Eſſex, and not of Mohun, as ſome hitherto have beene falſely perſwaded: and hereupon it is, that they have borne for their Creſt, A Demi-Monke, with a whip in his hand. The place tooke his name of the River Stour, that under this towne walmeth out of ſixe fountaines: which the Stourtons Lords of the place, have brought into their ſhield ſables. Long-Leat. Maiden Bradley.

By Maiden Bradley above ſaid, glideth Dever-rill, a prettie ſmall Rill, ſo called, for that, like as Anas in Spaine, and Mole in Surrey, (which tooke their names thereupon) it divideth (as it were) under the ground, and a mile off riſing up here againe, haſteneth toward VERLVCIO, a moſt antient towne, whereof the Emperor Antonine maketh mention in his Itinerarie: which having not quite loſt the name, is called, Werminſter, compounded of that old name, and the Engliſh Saxon word, Mynſtep, which ſignifieth, a Monaſterie. In times paſt, it enjoyed great immunities and freedomes: For, as wee reade in the Booke of King William the Great, Nec geldavit, nec hidata fuit: that is, It paid no tribute, nor was rated by the Hide. Now onely, for a round Corn-market, it is exceeding much frequented: for hardly a man would believe what a mightie deale of Corne is weekely brought hither, and quickly ſold. But for remnants of Roman Antiquities, I could diſcover none here, onely on the Eaſt ſide are ſeene ſome trenches upon the hills, and on the Weſt, a naturall round and high copt hill, called, Clay-hill. Dever-rill. Verlucio. Werminſter.

Heere by beginneth, North, South, and Eaſtward through the midſt of the Shire, the Plaines ſo wide and open, that hardly a man can ſee from one ſide to another, and doe limit the Horizon; whereupon they are named, The Plaines, they are but rarely inhabited, and had in late time a bad name, for robberies there committed. On the South ſide thereof, there runne quietly two moſt ſtill Rivers, Willey-borne, which Aſſerius nameth Guilou, and Nadder, commonly called, Adder-bourne. Wille-bourne riſing at Werminſter, runneth neere Heitesburie, or Hegtresburie an ancient manſion place of the Family of Hungerford; but in the Church which hath beene Collegiate, there is ſeene but one defaced monument of them. The laſt Lord Hungerford, created by King Henry the Eighth, had his denomination of this place, but enjoyed that honour a ſhort while being condemned of a crime not to bee uttered. Hence it hieth to Willy, a Village ſome few miles diſtant: over againſt it a very large warlike fence or hold, and the ſame fortified with a deepe and duple Ditch: the neighbour-dwellers call it Yanesburie Caſtle. And by the forme and manner of making, a man may eaſily know it was a Roman Campe. There are, who verily thinke it was Veſpaſians Campe, conſidering that hee being Lieutenant of the twentieth Legion under Claudius the Emperour, ſubdued unto the Roman Empire, two nations in this tract: and they ſuppoſe that in the name Yanesburie, there remaine ſome reliques ſtill of Veſpaſians name. Oppoſit to this on the other ſide the water, is another leſſe campplace ſingly ditched, called Dun-ſhat, and about one mile and a halfe from Yanesburie, another likewiſe with a ſingle trench, named Woldsbury. I have noted the names as the country people tearme them, that other may collect ſome matter thereby more than I can. As for Nadder, that ſpringeth out of the South limit of the ſhire, it creepeth with Sarisburie Plaines. Lord Hungerford of Heitesburie. Yanesburie.

Wardour Caſtle.

crooked windings, like an Adder, (whereof it may ſeeme to have beene ſo called) not farre from Wardour, a proper fine Caſtle, appertaining ſometime to the Progenie, ſurnamed Saint Martins. But (to ſay nothing of many owners betweene, and amongſt them of the Lord Brooke, who repaired it, and died at it) now it belongeth to Thomas Arundell, who being of late by King Iames, created Baron Arundell of Wardour, is worthy to be with praiſe remembred: For, that being a young Gentleman, hee of a pious aud godly mind, undertaking a journey to ſerve in the warres againſt the Turkes, ſworne enemies of Chriſtendome, for his ſingular prowceſſe ſhewed at the winning of Strigonium in Hungarie, deſerved by honourable Charter, (from Rodolph the Second of that name, Emperour) to bee made a Count of the Empire, the tenour of which Patent, is thus: For that hee had borne himſelfe valiantly, and manfully in the field, and in aſſaults of Cities and Caſtles, and ſhewing good proofe of valour in forcing of the water tower neere Strigonium, tooke from the Turkes with his owne hand their Banner, both himſelfe, and all, and every one his children, heires and iſſue whatſoever of both ſexes, deſcending from him lawfully, either borne already, or that ever ſhall, from generation to generation bee borne, wee have created, made, and named Counts, and Counteſſes, have endowed, and adorned, and with the title, honour, and dignitie of a Count imperiall. Over againſt it lieth Hach, a place at this day of ſmall reckoning, but which in the time of King Edward the Firſt, had his Lord Euſtach de Hach, ſummoned among the Peeres of the Realme for a Baron, unto the high Court of Parliament. And a few miles from thence is Hindon a quicke marker, and knowne for nothing elſe that I could ſee.

Wilton.

At the meeting of theſe two rivers, Willey giveth his name to Wilton, a place well watered, and ſometime the head towne of the whole Shire, which thereof tooke the name. In ancient times it was called Ellandunum: for ſo we are enformed by the teſtimonie of old parchment records, which have in expreſſe termes Weolſthan Earle of Ellandunum, that is to ſay, of Wilton: and in another place, that hee founded a little Monaſterie at Ellandunum, that is, at Wilton. By this name Ellan, I am partly induced to thinke, that this is the river Alan, which Ptolomee mentioneth in this coaſt of the Countrey. At this towne it was, that in the yeare of our redemption 821. Egbert King of the Weſt-Saxons, obtained a victorie againſt Beor Wulf of Mercia, but ſo mortall a battell it was to both parties, that the river flowed commixt with the bloud of thoſe, who were allied in bloud, and diſſevered in faction. At this towne alſo in the yeare of ſalvation 871. Ælfrid joyning battell with the Danes, had the better hand at firſt, but immediatly the alternative fortune of war comming about, hee was put to the worſt, and driven to retire. In the Saxons time it flouriſhed with the beſt in numbers of Inhabitants, and King Eadgar, as our Chronicles beare witnes, beautified it with a Nunnery, whereof he made his owne daughter Edith, Prioreſſe. But by the ancient Charter of Eadgar himſelfe, bearing date, An. 874. it appeareth certainly to bee of more antiquitie. For, therein it is thus written: The Monaſterie which by King Edward my great Grandfathers Grandfather, was founded in a well frequented, and peopled place, that by a knowne name is by the Inhabitants called Wilton. And in the life of Saint Edward the Confeſſor, we read thus, Whiles S. Edward went in hand with the building of the Monaſterie of S. Peter in Weſtminſter, Editha his wife began at Wilton (where ſhee was brought up) a Monaſtery princely built of ſtone, in lieu of the Church, made of timber, following the Kings good affection with the like devotion of her owne. And albeit Sueno the Dane ſpoiled this towne moſt grievouſly in the raging heate of hoſtilitie, yet fell it not ſo greatly to decay, untill the Biſhops of Salisbury turned another way, the common paſſage that lay before through it, into the Weſt countries. For, then by little and little it fell to ruine, and is now, as it were, a ſmall Village, having nothing to boaſt of, but a Major, for the head Magiſtrate, and in it a paſſing fine houſe of the Earles of Pembrokes, raiſed out of the ruines of the old religious houſe. But moſt of all, it was over-topped, and ſhadowed firſt by SORBIODVNVM, and now by Salisburie, that is riſen out of the ruine thereof. For, ſo Antoninus in his Itinerarie, calleth that which the Saxons afterwards named, Sealȝyrbyriȝ, and the vulgar Latiniſts,

A Latiniſts Sarum, Sarisburia, & Saliſburialia. Moreover, the account taken by miles of diſtant places from it, and the tracts remaining of the name, teſtifie no leſſe, if I ſhould ſay never a word. For, who would ever make doubt, that Searesbirig proceeded from Sorbiodunum, by addition of the Saxon word, Byrȝ, which ſignifieth, a Burg or town, in ſtead of Dunum, which the Britaines and Gaules, both uſed to put unto places ſeated on higher grounds, ſuch as this Sorbiodunum was? In ſo much (as I have beene told by one right skilfull in the Britiſh tongue) that Sorviodunum, is by interpretation, as much, as The dry hill: a conjecture ſurely more probable that theirs, who with much adoe have derived the name from one Saron in Beroſus, or from the Emperour
B Severus, and have named it, forſooth, Severia. For it mounted upon a high hill, and as our Hiſtoriographer of Malmesburie ſaith, Inſtead of the Citie, there was a Caſtle fenced with a wall of no ſmall bigneſſe, indifferently well provided otherwiſe of neceſſaries, but ſo ſcant of water, that it is good chaffer there, ſold at a wonderfull price. Whereupon theſe verſes were made of old Sorbiodunum, by one living in thoſe daies.

What Dunum ſignifieth among the Britaines and Gaules.

Eſt tibi defectus lymphæ, ſed copia certæ,
Sævit ibi ventus, ſed philomela ſilet.

No water there, but chalke yee have at will:
The winds there ſound, but nightingales be ſtill.

C By the ruines yet remaining, it ſeemeth to have beene a ſtrong place ſufficiently fortified, and to have contained in circuite ſome halfe a mile. Kinric the Saxon, after he had wonne a moſt fortunate Victorie of the Britans, was the firſt of all the Saxons that forced it, in the yeare 553: and Canutus the Dane about the yeare 1003. by ſetting it on fire, did much harme unto it. But it revived, when by the authority of a Synode, and the aſcent of William the Conqueror, Herman Biſhop of Shirburne and Sunning, tranſlated his See hither: whoſe next ſucceſſour Oſmund built a Cathedrall Church. And King William the Conquerour, after he had taken the ſurvey of England ſummoned all the States of the Kingdome hither, to ſweare unto him fealtie: at which time (as it ſtands upon record in Domeſday booke) it payd after the rate of 50.
D hides. * Of the third penny of Saliſbury the King hath xx ſhillings. ad penſum, de Cremento, ix. libras ad pondus. Which I note therefore, becauſe in our forefathers daies, like as among the old Romans, money was wont to bee paied as well by the weight as tale. but not many yeares after, in the raigne of Richard the firſt, partly for the inſolencie and miſ-rule that the gariſon ſouldiers made there, againſt the Church-men, and in part for want of water, the Church-men firſt, and then the Inhabitants began to leave it, and planted themſelves in a lower ground ſcarce a mile off, South-Eaſt from it, where there is a receit, as it were, of many rivelets, and where Avon and Nadder meet. Of this their removing Petrus * Bleſenſis in his Epiſtles maketh mention. For, thus of old Saliſburie he wrote. A place that was, open to the winds, barraine, dry, and deſert: In it
E ſtood a towre, like that of Siloam, which oppreſſed the towneſ-men with the burthen of long ſervitude. And againe: The Church of Sarisburie was captive in that hill. Let us therefore in Gods name goe downe to the plaine countrey, where the valleies will yield ſtore of wheat and other corne, where alſo the large fields are rich fat in paſture. And the Poet afore-ſaid, in verſe thus:

* Or, for money weighed out and told.

* Of Bloys. New Sarisburie.

Quid Domini domus in caſtro? miſi fœderis arca
In templo Baalim; carcer uterque locus.

What is Gods houſe in Caſtle pent, but like the Arke of bliſſe
In Baalims temple Captivate? Each place a priſon is.

And the place whereunto they deſcended he thus deſcribeth:

F Eſt in valle locus nemori venatibus apto
Contiguus, celeber fructibus, uber aquis.
Tale Creatoris matri, natura creata
Hoſpitium toto quæsijt orbe diu.

Neere to a Parke well ſtor'd of game, there lies in vale, a ground,
Where corne and fruits in plentie grow, where water-ſtreames abound.

Such lodging long throughout the world, when nature daughter deere,
Had for Creatours mother ſought, at laſt ſhe found it heere.

When they were now come downe, becauſe they would begin firſt with the houſe of God, Richard Poore the Biſhop, in a moſt delectable place, named before Meriefield, began to found a moſt ſtately, and beautifull Minſter. Which with an exceeding high ſpired ſteeple, and double croſſe yles on both ſides, carrying with it a venerable ſhew as well of ſacred hilaritie as religious majeſtie, was with great coſt finiſhed forty yeares after: and in the yeare of our Lord 1258. dedicated even in the preſence of King Henrie the third: Whereof the ſaid old Poet hath theſe prety verſes:

Regis enim virtus templo ſpectabitur iſto.
Præſulis affectus, artificumq́ fides.

For why? This Church a Prelats zeale ſets forth unto the ſight,
The workmens truſty faithfulneſſe, a Princes power and might.

But much more elegantly the moſt learned Daniel Rogers, as concerning the ſaid Church:

Mira canam, Soles quot continet annus in una Tam numeroſa, ferunt, æde, feneſtra micat.
Marmoreaſq́ capit fuſas tot ab arte columnas,
Comprenſas horas quot vagus annus habet.
Totq́ patent portæ, quot menſibus annus abundat,
Res mira, at veræ res celebrata fide.

Wonders to tell: How many daies in one whole yeare there beene,
So many windows in one Church (men ſay) are to be ſeene.
So many pillars caſt by Art, of marble there appeare,
As houres doe flit and flie away throughout the running yeare.
So many gates doe entry give, as monthes one yeare doe make,
A thing well knowne for truth though moſt it for a wonder take.

For, the windowes as they reckon them anſwer juſt in number to the daies, the pillars great and ſmall, to the houres of a full yeare, and the gates to the twelve monethes. A cloiſter it hath beſide on the South ſide, for largeneſſe and fine workmanſhip inferiour to none: whereunto joyneth the Biſhops pallace, a very faire and goodly houſe: and on the other ſide a high bell towre and paſſing ſtrong withall, ſtanding by it ſelfe apart from the Minſter. Moreover, in ſhort time it grew to be ſo rich in goods, and endowed with ſo great revenewes, that it ſtill maintained a Deane, a Chaunter, a Chauncellor, a Treaſurer, and three and thirty Prebendaries: of whom the Reſidents, as they terme them, have very goodly houſes alſo adjoyning to the Church, and all theſe buildings ſtand within the cloſe wall ſevered from the Citie. As the Biſhop was buſied about erecting of Gods houſe, the Citizens likewiſe for their parts did their beſt to found the Citie, they eſtabliſhed their civill government, derived rilles and ſervers of waters into every ſtreet, and caſt a deepe ditch all along that ſide, on which it is not fenced with the running river, having obtained licence of Simon the Biſhop thus to ſtrengthen and fortifie the ſame. And in ſuch ſort grew up this new Salisburie by little an little, out of the ruines of old Sorbiodunum, that ſo ſoone as they by the Kings warrant, had turned hither the high-way, that leadeth into the Weſt parts, it became the ſecond Citie in all this tract, paſſing well inhabited and frequented, plentifull of all things, eſpecially of fiſh, adorned with a very ſtately market place, wherein ſtandeth their common Hall of timber worke, a very beautifull edifice. But nothing is there, whereof it may ſo much boaſt, as of Iohn Iewell not long ſince Biſhop there, a wonderfull great, and deepe Divine, a moſt ſtout and earneſt maintainer of our reformed religion againſt the adverſaries by his learned books. Old Sorbiodunum from thence forward decaied more and more, and in the raigne of King Henrie the Seventh, became utterly deſolate, ſo as at this day, there remaineth onely a towre or two of the Caſtle, which notwithſtanding a long time after the departure of the townesmen from thence, was the dwelling houſe of the Earles of Salisburie: and about which in King Edward the Thirds time, there aroſe a memorable

A ble controverſie and ſuite. For, Robert Biſhop of Salisburie ſtirred William Montacute Earle of Salisburie by vertue of a proceſſe which our Lawyers terme Breve de Recto, that is, A writ of right, for this Caſtle: and hee made anſwer that hee would defend his right by combat. Whereupon, at a day appointed, the Biſhop brought forth his champion to the railes or bars of the Liſts, clad in a white garment reaching downe to his mid-leg: upon which he had a mandilian or caſſocke garniſhed with the Biſhops Armes: at whoſe heeles followed a Knight carrying a ſtaffe, and a page with a ſhield: Immediately after, the Earle brought in by the hand his owne champion alſo, arraied in the like apparell, accompanied with two Knights bearing white ſtaves. 29. Edw. 3. Tearm. Hillarii. Combat for the Caſtle of Sarum or Shirburn, as ſome will have it.

B Now when theſe Champions were to enter the Liſts, commanded they were to withdraw themſelves aſide, that their weapons of both parts might be viewed, and they ſearched whether they had any Amulets or Enchantments about them. But all on a ſuddaine, unlooked for came the Kings precept, to reprive and defer the matter to a further day, that the King might looſe thereby none of his right. Meane while, they grew to this compoſition: That the Earle for the ſumme of 2500. markes paied and received, ſhould yield up all his title and intereſt in the Caſtle, to the Biſhop and his ſucceſſors for ever.

This Salisburie had long agoe Earles of that name, whoſe pedigree I will derive ſomewhat farther off and more truly out of the ſhort reports of Lacock Hiſtorie. Wil- Earles of Salisburie. Hiſtorie of Lacock Abbey.

His onely daughter Ela, through the favour of the ſaid King Richard, was married to William Long Eſpee, ſurnamed ſo of a long ſword that he did uſually weare, a baſe ſonne of King Henrie the ſecond; and her marriage honoured him with the title of Earle, and her owne coat of Armes be Azur: adorned with ſixe Lions Ceux. This Willam had a ſonne named likewiſe William Long-Eſpee, againſt whom King Henrie the Third conceiving great diſpleaſure, for that without licence obtained, he was gone to ſerve in the

Iohn a Knight, who died before his brother, leaving behind him a sonne named Iohn Earle of Salisburie, whom hee had by Margaret daughter and heire of Thomas de Mont-Hermer; who being of an unconstant and changeable nature, and plotting the destruction of King Henrie the Fourth, was in the yeare of our Lord 1400. killed at Chichester, and attainted afterwards of high treason. Howbeit, his sonne Thomas was fully restored, a man worthy to be ranged with the bravest Captaines and Commanders, whether you respect paines taking in his affaires, industrie in action, or expedition in dispatch, who lying at the siege before Orleance in France, was with
Pat. 2. Henr. 6. a bullet levelled out of a great piece of Ordnance wounded in the yeare 1428. and B 1461. thereof died. Alice his onely daughter, being wedded unto Richard Nevill augmented his honour with the title of Earle of Salisburie, who siding with the house of Yorke, was in the battell fought at Wakefield, taken prisoner and beheaded: leaving to succeede him Richard his sonne, Earle of Warwicke and Salisburie; who de-lighting in dangers and troubles enwrapped his native countrey within new broiles of Civill warre, wherein himselfe also left his life. The one of his daughters named Isabell was married unto George Duke of Clarence, brother to King Edward the Fourth, and shee bare him a sonne called Edward Earle of Warwicke who being a very child and innocent, was by King Henrie the Seventh beheaded, like as his sister Margaret suffered the same death under King Henrie the Eighth. An usuall C pollicie and practise among suspicious Princes: For the securitie of their own persons ther daughter of Richard Nevill Earle of Warwick and Salisburie, became wife to Richard Duke of Gloceſter, brother to King Edward the Fourth, and brought him a sonne, whom his uncle King Edward in the 17. of his reigne created Earle of Salisbu-rie, and Richard his father usurping the kingdome made Prince of Wales. But he departed this life in his tender yeares, about that time that his mother also died, not without suspition of poison. King Henry the Eighth afterward, about the fifth yeare of his raigne in a full Parliament restored and enabled in bloud Margaret daughter to George Duke of Clarence to the name, stile, title, honour, and dignitie of Counteſſe of D Salisburie, as sister and heire to Edward late Earle of Warwick and Salisburie. And about the 31. yeare of the said King, she was attainted in Parliament with divers others, and beheaded when she was 70. yeares old. Since which time that title of honour was discontinued untill in the yeare of our Lord 1605. our Soveraigne Lord King Iames honored therewith S. Robert Cecill second sonne of that Nestor of ours;

William Cecill: upon whom for his singular wisedome, great employments in the affaires of State to the good of Prince and Countrey, he had bestowed the honorable titles of Baron Cecill of Essendon, and Vicount Cranburn. Thus much of the Earles of Salisburie.

house therein of Beavois of Southampton, whom the people have enrolled in the number of their brave worthies for his valour commended so much in rhyme to posteritie.

This Salisburie is environed round about with open fields and plaines, unlesse it be Eastward, where lieth hard unto it Clarindon, a very large and goodly parke, passing fit for the keeping and feeding of wild beasts, and adorned in times past with an house of the Kings. Of which parke, and of the twentie groves inclosed therein Master Mi-

A famous Parke for Stag and Hind, neere Salisbury doth lie,
The name it hath of one faire downe or hill, that mounts on hie:
Within the ſame ſtand xx. groves enclos'd with ſeverall bound:
Of which, in compaſſe every one a mile containes in ground.

Famous is this Clarindon for that heere in the yeare 1164. was made a certaine recognition and record of the cuſtomes and liberties of the Kings of England, before the Prelates, and Peeres of the Kingdome, for the avoiding diſcentions betweene the Clergie, Iudges, and Barons of the Realme which were called The Conſtitutions of Clarnidon. Of the which ſo many as the Pope approved have beene ſet downe in the Tomes of the Councels, the reſt omitted; albeit Thomas Becket then Archbiſhop of Canterburie, and the reſt of the Biſhops approved them all. Heereby is Ivy Church ſometime a ſmall Priory, where as tradition runneth, in our grandfathers remembrance was found a grave, and therein a corps of twelve foote, and not farre of a ſtocke of wood hollowed, and the concave lined with lead with a booke therein of very thicke parchment, all written with Capitall Roman letters. But it had lien ſo long that when the leaves were touched they fouldred to duſt. S. Thomas Eliot who ſaw it judged it to be an Hiſtorie. No doubt hee that ſo carefully laied it up, hoped it ſhould be found, and diſcover ſomethings memorable to poſteritie.

An ancient booke.

Toward the North, about ſixe miles from Salisburie, in theſe plaines before named, is to bee ſeeene a huge and monſtrous piece of worke, ſuch as Cicero termeth Inſanam ſubſtructionem. For, within the circuit of a Ditch, there are erected in manner of a Crowne, in three rankes or courſes one within another certaine mightie and unwrought ſtones, whereof ſome are 28. foote high, and ſeven foote broad, upon the heads of which, others like overthwart pieces doe beare and reſt croſſe-wiſe, with a ſmall tenents and morteſcis, ſo as the whole frame ſeemeth to hang: whereof wee call it Stonehenge, like as our old Hiſtorians termed it for the greatneſſe Chorea Gigantum; The Giants Daunce. The deſcription, or draught whereof, ſuch as it is, becauſe it could not be ſo fitly expreſſed in words, I have cauſed by the gravers helpe to bee portraied heere underneath as it now ſtandeth weatherbeaten, and decaied.

A Our countrie-men reckon this for one of our wonders and miracles. And much they marvaile: from whence ſuch huge ſtones were brought, conſidering that in all thoſe quarters bordering thereupon, there is hardly to be found any common ſtone at all for building: as alſo by what meanes they were ſet up. For mine owne part, about theſe points I am not curiouſly to argue and diſpute, but rather to lament with much griefe that the Authors of ſo notable a monument are thus buried in oblivion. Yet ſome there are, that thinke them to bee no naturall ſtones hewne out of the rocke, but artificially made of pure ſand, and by ſome glewie and unctuous matter knit and incorporate together, like as thoſe ancient Trophies or monuments of victo- Made Stones.

forthwith a very ſtone: that the ceſternes in Rome of ſand digged out of the ground, and the ſtrongeſt kind of lime wrought together grow ſo hard, that they ſeeme ſtones indeed? and that Statues and images of marble chippings, and ſmall grit grow together ſo compact and firme, that they are deemed entire and ſolid marble: The common ſaying is, that Ambroſius Aurelianus, or his brother Vther did reare them up by the art of Merlin that great * Mathematician, in memorie of thoſe Britaines who by * Magician.

Returning

Returning thence, where he by martiall might
Had quel'd his foes in battell fiercely fought.
O worthy Wights, how many on that plaine,
Of you lie dead by Hengists treason slaine!
The Britans brave, that race of noble blood,
Entrap't by little heed and too much trust,
Were kild alas, in parley as they stood,
Through faithlesse fraud of enemies unjust.
But Eldol Earle his manhood excellent
Then shewed, to death who seventie persons sent.

Others say, that the Britaines erected this for a stately Sepulchre of the same Ambrose in the very place where hee was slaine by his enemies sword: that hee might have of his countries cost such a piece of worke, and tombe set over him as should for ever be permanent, as the Altar of his vertue and manhood. True it is, that mens bones have many times beene digged up heere, and the village lying now on Avons side, is called Ambresburie, that is to say, Ambrose his towne: where, certaine ancient Kings, by the report of the British Historie, lay interred. And the booke called Eulogium saith, that a Monasterie stood there of three hundred Monkes: which, one Gurmundus (I wot not what Pagan and Barbarian) spoiled and rifled. In that place afterward Alfritha King Edgar his wife, by repentance and some good deed to expiate, and make satisfaction for murthering of King Edward her sonne in Law, built a stately Nunnerie, and endowed it with livings: In which Queene Eleanor King Henrie the Thirds widdow, renouncing all royall pompe, and princely state, devoted her selfe unto God among other holy Nuns. The said Ambrose Aurelianus, who gave name unto the place, when the Romane Empire drew now to an end, tooke upon him the Imperiall purple Roabe in Britaine, (as saith Paulus Diaconus) succoured his decaying countrey, and the aide of that warlike Arthur represt the violent rage of the enemies, overthrew puissant armies, consisting of the most courageous Nations of Germany, and at the last in a battell fought upon this Plaine, lost his life in the defence of his countrey. Now, seeing both Gildas, and Bede do write, that his Parents wore the purple Roabe, and were slaine, why may not I suppose him to be descended of that Constantine, who in the Fourth Consulship of Theodosius the younger, was elected Emperour heere in Britaine in hope of his luckie name, and afterwards slaine at Arles. I have heard that in the time of King Henrie the Eighth, there was found neere this place a table of mettall, as it had beene tinne and lead commixt, inscribed with many letters, but in so strange a Caracter, that neither Sir Thomas Eliot, nor master Lilye Schoole-master of Pauls, could read it, and therefore neglected it. Had it beene preserved, somewhat happily might have beene discovered as concerning Stonehenge, which now lieth obscured.

Scarce foure miles from Ambresburie, (on this side Avon) there is a Warren of hares, commonly called Everlie Warren, where there is great increase of hares for Gentlemen in the countrey there dwelling, to disport themselves with game: yet not such store as that the neighbour Inhabitants should require the helpe of souldiers in their defence against them, as the men of the Isles Baleares sometime did, by Plinies relation: albeit, they did likewise much harme heere unto the Corne fields: and neere neighbour unto it is Lutgershall, where stood sometimes (as I read) the Castle of Geffrey Fitz-Peter, Lord chiefe Justice of England in his time, and Earle of Essex, a man of exceeding great wealth. Not much higher is Wolfhall, which was the house of the Noble Familie of Seimor, now Earle of Hertford, or of Saint Maur, to whom by marriage accrewed a great inheritance of the Esturmies in this tract, who bare argent three Demy-Lions Gules: and from the time of King Henrie the Second, were by right of inheritance, the Bailifes and Guardians of the Forrest of Savenac lying hard by, which is of great name for plenty of good game, and for a kind of Ferne there, that yieldeth a most pleasant savour. More somewhat into the East, the River Cunetio, in the Saxon tongue Cynetan, commonly Kenet, ariseth neere unto a little Village of the same name, which some would have to be that CVNETIO mentioned by Antoninus: but the distance of both sides gain-saieth it. Heere Selburie a round hill mounteth up aloft, to a great height, which by the forme of the hill it selfe, and the outward settling of the earth beneath, may seeme to have beene cast up by mans hand. And many of that sort, round and with sharpe tops are to bee seene in this tract: Burrowes they call them B and Barrowes, raised, happily in memoriall of Souldiers there slaine. For bones are found in them, and read I have, how an usuall thing it was with the Northerne nations, that every souldier remaining alive after a foughten field, should carry his head-piece full of earth toward the making of their fellowes tombes that were slaine. Although I am of opinion rather, that this of Selburie, was set there in stead of a limit, if not by the Romans, then certainly by the Saxons: Like as that fosse called Wodensdike, considering that betweene the Mercians and the West-Saxons there was much bickering in this Shire many a time, about their Marches: and both * Boetius and the * Grammaticall Writers have made mention of such Mounts raised for bounds. Within one mile of Selburie, is Aiburie, an up-landish C village built in an old Campe as it seemeth, but of no large compasse, for it is environed with a faire trench, and hath foure gappes as gates, in two of the which stand huge Stones as jambes, but so rude, that they seeme rather naturall than artificiall, of which sort, there are some other in the said village. This River Kenet runneth at the first Eastward, through certaine open fields, out of which there stand up aloft every where stones like rockes, and off them a little village there is, called, Rockley: among which there breaketh out sometimes at unawares water in manner of a streame or sudden Land-flood, reputed the messenger, as it were, and forerunner of a dearth, and is by the rusticall people of the countrey, called Hunger-borne. From hence * Kenet holdeth on his course to a towne bearing his name, called of Antoninus D CVNETIO, and is placed from Verlucio twenty miles. At which distance just, from thence, that ancient towne called by a new name Marleborow, in old time Marleberge, standeth upon this river * Cunetio, now Kenet, stretching out East and West on the pendant of an hill. Whether this name Marleborow came in latter ages of Marga, which in our language we call Marle, and use in stead of dung to manure our grounds, I am not ready to affirme. Certes, it lieth neere a chaulkey hill, which our Ancestours before they borrowed this name Chaulke of the Latine word Calx, named Marle, But the Etymologie thereof, that Alexander Necham in his Booke of divine wisedome hath coined and drawne from Merlins Tombe (as appeareth by this Distichon of his making) is ridiculous.

The fatall end of this towne Cunetio, and the name together, and the estate thereof with the ancient memorie also, from the comming in of the Saxons unto F the Normans time, is utterly vanished and gone: for, in all this space betweene, our histories doe not so much as once name it. But in the age next ensuing, wee reade, that Iohn * surnamed Sine terra, that is, Without Land, (who afterwards was King of England) had a Castle heere, which when hee revolted from his brother King Richard the First, Hubert Archbishop of Canterburie, tooke by force:

* Or nick-named, Iohn Lack-land.

and which afterwards was moſt famous by reaſon of a Parliament there holden, wherein by a generall conſent of the States of the Kingdome there aſſembled, a law paſſed for the appeaſing of all tumults, commonly called, the Satute of Marleborow. But now being daunted by time, there remaineth an heape of rammell and rubbiſh witneſſing the ruines thereof, and ſome few reliques of the walles remaine within the compaſſe of a drie ditch, and an Inne there is adjoyning thereto, which in ſtead of the Caſtle, hath the ſigne of a Caſtle hanging out at it: The Inhabitants of the place, have nothing to make greater ſhew of, than in the Church of Preſhut hard by, of a Chriſtning Font, as it ſeemeth, of Touchſtone, or of Obſidian ſtone, in which (by their report certaine Princes (I wot not who) were in times paſt baptized, and made Chriſtians. Neither verily can I conceale that which I have read, that every Burger heere admitted, is by an old order and cuſtome among them, to preſent unto the Major, a brace of hounds for the hare, a couple of white Capons, and a white Bull.

Ramesburie.

On the ſame River, and the ſame ſide thereof, is ſeated Ramsburie, a prettie village, having nothing now to commend it but pleaſant meadowes about it, howſoever in old time famous it was for the Biſhops See there, who had this Shire for their Dioceſſe: but that ſeate being by Herman the Eighth Biſhop, laid unto that of Shirburne, and at length (as I ſaid before) tranſlated to Saliburie, carried away with it all the name and reputation of this place, becauſe at Ramesburie, there was never any Covent of Clerkes, nor ought for their maintenance. From the other ſide of the River more Eaſtward, Littlecot ſheweth it ſelfe not long ſince a ſeate of the Darels, a place worthy to bee remembred, for the late Lord thereof Sir Iohn Popham, who being the chiefe Iudge in the Kings Bench executed juſtice, (as I have ſaid already) againſt malefactors, to his high praiſe and commendation. And heereby runneth the limit betweene this Shire, and Berkſhire.

Thus farre forth have we taken a ſlight view and ſurvey of Wilſhire, which (as wee find in the Domeſday booke, and worth the noting it is) *paide unto the King tenne pounds for an Hawke, twentie ſhillings for a ſtrong Steed, for hey one hundred ſhillings, and five ores: now what kind a piece of money, and of what kind that Ore was, I wot not; but out of a Regiſter of Burton Monaſterie, I have obſerved thus much, that twentie Ores, are worth two Markes of ſilver.

Earles of Wilſhire.

This province can reckon out of divers and ſundry houſes, but few Earles, beſides thoſe of Salisburie, whom I have named before: for to omit Westſthan before the Normans Conqueſt, it had none to my knowledge, unto King Richard the Second his daies, who preferred William le Scrope to that one honour. But this mans good fortunes ſtood and fell together with his Prince. For, when the one was depoſed, the other loſt his head. After whom, within ſhort time ſucceeded Iames Butler Earle of Ormund, advanced to that dignitie by King Henrie the Sixth. Howbeit, when the Lancaſtrians were downe the wind, and hee was attainted, his eſtate forfeited, and Iohn Stafford a younger ſonne of Humfrey Duke of Buckingham, by the favour of King Edward the Fourth received this title, whoſe ſonne Edward ſucceeded him, and died without iſſue. The ſame honour afterwards King Henrie the Eighth, beſtowed upon Henrie Stafford of the ſame houſe of Buckingham; who having enjoyed it a little while, departed likewiſe, and left no children behind him. In the end, the favour of the ſaid King brought it into the family of the Bullens: for Thomas Bullen Vicount Rochfort, Sonne to one of the Daughters and coheires of Thomas Butler Earle of Ormund, hee created Earle of Wilſhire: whoſe Daughter Anne, the King tooke to wife: A marriage this was to her ſelfe, and her brother unhappie and deadly, to her Parents wofull, but for all England right happy. For it brought forth to us Queene Elizabeth, a moſt gracious and excellent Prince, worthy of ſuperlative praiſe, for her moſt wiſe and politique government of the Common-wealth, and for her heroicke vertues farre above that ſexe. But when the ſaid Thomas Bullen, overcome with the griefe and ſorrow that hee tooke for the infortunate fall, and death of his children, he ended his daies without iſſue: this title lay ſtill, untill that King Edward the Sixth, conferred it upon William Powlet Lord Saint Iohn, whom ſoone after hee made Marqueſſe of Winchieſter, and Lord Treaſurer of England, in whoſe family it remaineth at this day.

HANTSHIRE.

NExt to Wilſhire is that Country which ſometimes the Saxons called Hantverchyn, and is now commonly named Hantſhire: of which, one part that beareth farther within the land, belonged, no doubt, to the Belgæ, the other which lieth upon the ſea appertained, without queſtion, to the Regni, an ancient people of Britaine. On the Weſt it hath Dorſetſhire, and Wilſhire, on the South the Ocean to bound it: on the Eaſt it joyneth to Suſſex, and Surrie, and on the North it bordereth upon Barkſhire. A ſmall province it is, fruitfull in corne, furniſhed in ſome places with pleaſant woods ſtanding thicke, and well growne; rich in plenteous paſture, and for all commodities of ſea moſt wealthy, and happie. It is thought that it was with the firſt brought under ſubjection to the Romans. For, our Hiſtories report, that Veſpaſian ſubdued it, and very probable reaſons there are inducing us to beleeve the ſame. For, Dio witneſſeth, that Plautius, and Veſpaſian, when they were ſent by the Emperour Claudius againſt the Britaines, did give the attempt upon this Iſland, with an armie divided into three parts, leaſt if they ſhould have ventured to land in one place onely they might have beene driven backe from the ſhore. Suetonius alſo writeth, that in this expedition Veſpaſian fought thirtie battailes with the enemie, and ſubdued the Iſle of Wight which lieth againſt this country, and two other right puiſſant nations with it. For which his victories, as alſo for paſſing over the Ocean ſo ſafely. Valerius Flaccus ſpeaketh unto Veſpaſian himſelfe, as one more fortunate than Iulius Cæſar, in this manner.

Tuq́, O Pelagi cui major aperti
Fama, Caledonius poſt quam tua Carbaſa vexit Oceanus, Phrigios prius indignatus Iulos.

And thou for Seas diſcoverie whoſe fame did more appeare,
Since that thy ſhips with ſailes full ſpred in Northren Ocean were,
Which skorn'd before, of Phrygian line the Julii to beare.

And of the very ſame Veſpaſian, Appolonius Collatius Novarienſis, the Poet verſified thus:

Ille quidem nuper fælici Marte Britannos Fuderat.

He verily of late by happy fiight.
Had won the field, and Britains put to flight.

But how in this war Titus delivered Veſpaſian his father, when he was very ſtreightly beſieged by the Britans: and how at the ſame time likewiſe, an adder graſped him about, and yet never hurt him, (which he tooke as a lucky foretoken of his Empire) you may learne out of Dio and Forcatulus. I, for my part, (to come to my purpoſe) beginning at the Weſt ſide of this province will make my perambulation along the ſea-coaſt, and the rivers that runne into the Ocean, and after that ſurvey the more in-land parts thereof.

Cerdici vadum Ceroicks ford.

Hard by the Weſterne bounds the river Avon carrieth a ſtill ſtreame, and no ſooner runneth into this ſhire, but it meeteth with the foard of Cerdicus, in old time Cerdicks-foard, afterward Cerdefoard, and now by contraction of the word, Chardfoard, ſo named of Cerdic that Warlike Engliſh-Saxon. For, heere the ſaid Cerdic in a ſet battaile ſo daunted the Britaines, that not onely he enlarged the bounds of his Empire, but alſo delivered an eaſie warre unto his poſteritie: having before time in the yeare of our Salvation 508. after great conflicts in this tract, vanquiſhed the moſt mightie King of the Britaines, Natanleod, called alſo Nazaleod by others, with many of his people. Of whoſe name likewiſe, a ſmall region reaching unto this place was termed

Natanleod or Nazaleod.

A termed Natanleod, as we reade in the Annales of the Engliſh Saxons: which I ſought very curiouſly for, but hitherto could not find ſo much as any ſmall ſigne or ſample of that name: neither can I gueſſe who that Natanleod ſhould be. But moſt certaine it is, that Aurelius Ambroſe, at the very ſame time skirmiſhed otherwhiles with the Saxons in this tract with alternative fortune: and thoſe Chronicles of the Engliſh Saxons no where made mention of him; as who, (a thing that I have obſerved) being overmuch affectionate to themſelves, reported onely their owne fortunate battailes, and victories, but never made words of their foiles and overthrowes. From thence the ſaid river runneth on by Regnewood or Ringwood, called in the Domeſday booke of B England Rincewood. Which, that it was the ſame REGNVM, the chiefe towne of the Regni whereof Antoninus maketh mention, the account of the diſtance from other places, the remaines of the name and the very ſignification thereof doe plainely prove. For, Ring-wed by that Saxon addition ſeemeth to ſignifie the Wood of the Regni. A towne in ancient time of great fame, as may bee gathered by the Hundred adjoyning, which is named thereof: but now it is a well frequented mercate towne and no better: Aven being departed from hence, entertaineth the river Stoure comming downe out of Dorſet ſhire, where betweene the meeting of theſe two ſtreames, there ſtandeth a pretty towne of trade and well peopled. At this day of a Church there dedicated unto Chriſt, named Chriſt-Church: but in old time Twinamburne, C becauſe it is ſcituate betweene the two rivers, right in the ſame ſenſe that Interamna in Italie hath his name. It was fortified in times paſt with a Caſtle, and beautified with an ancient Church of Prebendaries, which being built in the Saxons time and after repaired by Raulph Flammard Biſhop of Durham (who was Deane there) in the raigne of William Rufus, and by Richard de Riparijs Earle of Devonſhire (whom King Henry the Firſt enfeoffed in this place) endowed alſo with great rents and revenewes, continued in very great name untill the daies of King Henrie the Eighth, and that fatall and finall houre of the Monaſteries of England. Under this towne Stoure and Aven joyning together doe emptie themſelves into the ſea at one mouth, which Ptolomee called the mouth of the River Alaun; and rightly too: For I cannot re- D ſolve with my ſelfe to thinke, that that river properly was named Aven, conſidering this is a common name, and the Britaines by that terme, called all rivers. But I would take it, that ſome time it was called Alaun, becauſe there remaine yet ſome reliques (as it were) of that name in the villages upon it, to wit, in Allington, Allingham, &c.

Whether Natanleod and Aurelius Ambroſe be the ſame.

Chriſt-church.

A long the Eaſt banke of this river in this Shire, King William of Normandie pulled downe all the townes, villages, houſes, and Churches farre and neere, caſt out the poore Inhabitants, and when he had ſo done brought all within thirty miles compaſſe or there about into a forreſt and harbour for wild beaſts, which the Engliſhmen in thoſe daies termed Ytene, and we now call New forreſt. Of which Act of his, Gwalter E Maps who lived immediately after, wrote thus. The Conquerour tooke away land both from God and men, to dedicate the ſame unto wild beaſts, and Dogs-game: in which ſpace he threw downe ſixe and thirtie-Mother-Churches, and drave all the people thereto belonging quite away. And this did he, either that the Normans might have ſafer and more ſecure arrivall in England, (for it lieth over againſt Normandie) in caſe after that all his wars were thought ended, any new dangerous tempeſt ſhould ariſe in this Iſland againſt him: or for the pleaſure which he tooke in hunting: or elſe to ſcrape and rape money to himſelfe by what meanes ſoever he could: For, being better affected and more favourable to beaſts than to men, he impoſed verie heavie fines and penalties, yea and other more grievous puniſhments, upon thoſe that ſhould meddle with his F game. But Gods juſt judgement not long after followed this ſo unreaſonable and cruell act of the King. For, Richard his ſecond ſonne, and William Rufus King of England, another ſonne of his, periſhed both in this Forreſt: William by chance ſhot through with an arrow by Walter Tirell; the other blaſted with a peſtilent aire. Henrie likewiſe his Grand-child by Robert his eldeſt ſonne, whiles hee hotely purſued his game in this Chaſe was hanged amongſt the boughes and ſo died: that wee may learne thereby. How even childrens children beare the puniſhment of their Fathers ſonnes. There goe commonly abroad certaine verſes, that Iohn White Biſhop of Wincheſter made of this Forreſt: Which although they falſly make William Rufus to have ordained the ſame, yet becauſe they are well liked of many, I am likewiſe well content heere to ſet them downe.

Templa adimit Divis, fora civibus, arva colonis
Rufus, & inſtituit Beaulenſi in rure foreſtam:
Rex cervum inſequitur, Regem vindicta, Tirellus
Non bene proviſum transfixit acumine ferri.

From God and Saint King Rus did Churches take,
From Citizens town-court, and mercate place,
From Farmer lands: New forreſt for to make,
In Beaulew tract, where whiles the King in chaſe
Purſues the Hart, juſt vengeance comes apace,
And King purſues. Tirrell him ſeeing not,
Unawares him ſlew with dint of arrow ſhot.

He calleth it Beauley tract, for that King Iohn built hard by, a pretty Monaſterie, for the pleaſant ſcituation called Beaulieu, which continued ever unto our Fathers memorie, of great fame as being an unviolated ſanctuarie and a ſafe refuge for all that fled to it: in ſo much that in times paſt, our people heere thought it unlawfull, and an hainous offence by force to take from thence any perſons whatſoever, were they thought never ſo wicked murtherers or traitours: ſo that our Anceſtors when they erected ſuch Sanctuaries, or Temples (as they terme them) of Mercie, every where throughout England, ſeemed rather to have propoſed unto themſelves Romulus to imitate than Moſes: who commanded that wilfull murtherers ſhould bee plucked from the Altar and put to death: and for them onely appointed Sanctuarie, who by meere chance had killed any man.

Sanctuaries. Exod. 21. Ioſephus, Antiquitatum lib. 4.

But leaſt the ſea coaſt, for ſo long a tract as that forreſt is heere, ſhould lie without defence all open and expoſed to the enemie, King Henrie the Eighth began to ſtrengthen it with forts, for, in that foreland or promontorie ſhooting farre into the ſea: From whence we have the ſhorteſt cut into the Iſle of Wight. hee built Hurſt Caſtle, which commandeth ſea ward every way. And more toward the Eaſt hee ſet up alſo another fortreſſe or blockhouſe, they name it Calſhot Caſtle for Caldſhore, to defend the entrie of Southhampton Haven, as more inwardly on the other are the two Caſtles of S. Andrew, and Netly. For, heere the ſhores retiring as it were themſelves a great way backe into the land, and the Iſle of Wight alſo; butting full upon it doe make a very good harbour, which Ptolomee calleth The mouth of the river Triſanton, (as I take it) for Traith Anton: that is, Anton Bay. For Ninnius an old writer giveth it almoſt the ſame name when he termeth it Trahannon mouth. As for the river running into it, at this day is called Teſt, it was in the foregoing age (as wee reade in the Saints lives) named Terſtan, and in old time Ant, or Anton: as the townes ſtanding upon it, namely Ant port, Andover and Hanton in ſome ſort doe teſtifie.

Hurſt Caſtle.

So farre am I of (pardon me) from thinking that it tooke the name of one Hamon a Roman, (a name not uſed among Romans) who ſhould be there ſlaine. And yet Geffrey of Monmouth telleth ſuch a tale, and a Poet likewiſe his follower who pretily maketh theſe verſes of Hamon.

Ruit huc, illucque ruentem
Occupat Arviragus, ejuſque in margine ripæ
Amputat enſe caput, nomen tenet inde perempti
Hammonis Portus, longumque tenebit in ævum.

Whiles Hamon ruſheth here and there within the thickeſt ranke, Arviragus encountreth him, and on the rivers banke,
With ſword in hand ſtrikes of his head: the place of him thus ſlaine, Thence forth is named Hamons-Haven, and long ſhall ſo remaine.

South-Anton.

But upon this Haven ſtandeth South-hampton, a little Citie, neere unto which on the

A the North-east, there flouriſhed in old time another of that name: which may ſeeme to be Antonine his CLAVSENTVM, by the diſtance of it, as well on the one ſide from Ringwood, as from Venta on the other, And as Triſanton in the Britiſh language ſignifieth the Bay of Anton, ſo Clauſentum in the ſame tongue, is as much as the Haven of Entum. For, I have heard, that Claudh among the Britans, is that which the Græcians call χωμα λιμενος, that is, a forced Haven made by digging and caſting up the earth. Now, that this place was called Hanton, and Henton, no man needs to doubt, ſeeing in that booke wherein King William the firſt made a ſurvey of all England, this whole ſhire is expreſſely named Hanſcyre and in ſome places Hentſcyre,
B and the very towne it ſelfe for the South ſcituation of it, South-hanton. What manner of towne that Clauſentum was, it is hard to ſay: but ſeated it was in that place, where the field is which now they call S. Maries; and reached even to the Haven: and may ſeeme alſo to have taken up the other banke or ſtrand of the river: For, a little above at Bittern over againſt it, Francis Mills a right honeſt gentleman there dwelling, ſhewed unto me the rubbiſh, old broken walls, and trenches of an ancient caſtle, which carrieth halfe a mile in compaſſe, and at every tide is compaſſed for three parts of it with water a great breadth. The Romane Emperors ancient coines now and then there digged up, doe ſo evidently prove the antiquity thereof, that if it were
C not the Caſtle of old Clauſentum, you would judge it to be one of thoſe forts or fences which the Romans planted upon the South coaſt of the Ocean, to repreſſe, as Gildas writeth, the piracies and depredations of the Saxons. When all became waſted, by the Daniſh warres, old Hanton alſo was left as a prey in the yeere of our Lord 980. to be ſacked and rifled by them: and King William the Conqueror in his time had in it but foureſcore men and no more in his demaine. But above 200. yeeres ſince when Edward the Third King of England and Philip Valois buſtled for the very Kingdome of France, it was fired by the French and burnt to the gound. Out of the aſhes whereof, preſently ſprung the towne which now is to be ſeene, but ſituate in a more commodious place betweene two rivers: for number of houſes and thoſe
D faire built much renowned, for rich Inhabitants & concourſe of merchants wealthy: fenced round about with a double ditch, ſtrong wals, and turrets ſtanding thicke betweene: and for defence of the Haven a right ſtrong Caſtle it hath of ſquare ſtone, upon a Mount caſt up to a great height, built by King Richard the Second. And afterward King Henrie the Sixt granted to the Major, Balives and Burgeſſes that it ſhould be a Countie by it ſelfe, with other liberties. Memorable is that of the moſt puiſſant Canutus King of England and of Denmarke, by which he in this place repreſſed a flatterer who bare the King in hand that all things in the Realme were at his will and command. He commanded (ſaith Henrie of Huntingdon) that his chaire ſhould be
E ſet on the ſhore, when the ſea began to flow. And then in the preſence of many, ſaid he to the ſea as it flowed. Thou art part of my Dominion, and the ground on which I ſit is mine, neither was there ever any that durſt diſobey my commandement and went away free and unpuniſhed. Wherefore, I charge thee, that thou come not upon my land, neither that thou wet the clothes or body of thy Lord. But the ſea according to his uſuall courſe flowing ſtill, without any reverence of his perſon wet his feet. Then he retiring backe ſaid. Let all the Inhabitants of the world know, that vaine and frivolous is the power of Kings, and that none is worthy the name of King, but hee, to whoſe command the heaven earth and ſea by bond of an everlaſting law are ſubject and obedient, and never after that time ſet hee the crowne upon his head, &c.

Of thoſe two rivers, betweene which this South-anton ſtandeth, that in the Weſt now called Teſt, and in times paſt Anton, (as I ſuppoſe) ſpringing out of the forreſt of F Chate, goeth firſt to Andover, which in the Saxon language is Anoeaꝼapan, that is, The paſſage or Ferry over And: where in the yeare of our ſalvation 893. Aetheldred King of England, when the Danes harried and ſpoiled his Kingdome on every ſide, to the end that hee might at length refreſh and cheriſh his weakened and wearied countries with ſure and quiet peace, inſerted into his owne familie by way of adoption Aulaf the Dane: which not withſtanding ſoone after tooke ſmall or none effect:

For,

For, this great honour done to the barbabrous Dane, could not reclaime and ſtay his minde, from rapine and ſpoyling ſtill. From thence it runneth downe and receiveth from the Eaſt a brooke paſſing by Bullingdon, in whoſe pariſh is a place called Tibury hill, and containeth a ſquare field by eſtimation of ten acres ditched about, in ſome places deeper than other, wherein hath beene found tokens of Wells, and about which the ploughmen have found ſquared ſtones, and Roman coines, as they report, for the place I have not ſeene. This brooke entreth into Teſt neere Wornhell, where Queene Aelfrith built a Monaſterie to expiate and make ſatisfaction for that moſt foule and heinous fact, wherewith ſo wickedly ſhe had charged her ſoule by making away King Edward her husbands ſon: as alſo to waſh out the murthering of her former husband Aethelwold a moſt noble Earle, whom King Edgar trained forth hither a hunting, and then ſtrake him through with a dart, becauſe hee had deluded him in his love ſecrets, and by deceitfull and naughtie meanes prevented him and gotten for himſelf this ſame Aelfrith the moſt beautifull Lady that was in thoſe daies. After this Teſt having taken into it a little river from Wallop, or more truly Well-hop, that is, by interpretation out of our forefathers ancient language, A prety well in the ſide of an hill, whereof that right worſhipfull familie of the Wallops of Knights degree dwelling hard by, tooke name: ſeeketh for BRIGE or BRAGE, an ancient towne likewiſe placed by Antonine nine miles from Sorbiodunum: at which diſtance betweene Salisburie and Wincheſter he findeth not farre from his banke, Broughton a ſmall country towne: which if it were not that BRAGE, I verily believe it was then utterly deſtroyed when William of Normandie laid all even with the ground heere abouts to make that foreſt, before mentioned. Then goeth this river to ſee Rumſey, in Saxon ſpeech Rumrez. A nunnery founded by King Edgar, the large Church whereof yet ſtandeth; out of the which Mary daughter of King Stephen being there Abbeſſe, and his only heire ſurviving, was conveied ſecretly by Mathew of Alſace ſonne to the Earle of Flanders, and to him married. But after ſhe had borne to him two daughters, was enforced by ſentence of the Church to returne hither again according to her vow. Thence glideth this water ſtraight into Anton Haven, at Arundinis Vadum, as Bede called it, and interpreteth it himſelfe Reedeford: but now of the bridge where the foard was named, for Redeford, Redbridge: where, at the firſt ſpringing up of the Engliſh Saxon Church, there flouriſhed a Monaſterie, the Abbat whereof Cymbreth, as Bede writeth, baptized the two brethren being very little ones of Arvandus the pettie King of Wight, even as they were ready to be put to death. For, when Cedwalla the Saxon ſet upon the Iſle of Wight, theſe ſmall children to ſave their lives fled to a little town called Ad lapidem, and hid themſelves there, untill at length being betraied, they were at Cedwallaes commandement killed. If you aske mee, what this little towne Ad lapidem, ſhould bee, I would ſay it were Stoneham, a ſmall village next to Redbridge, which the very ſignification of the name may evidently prove for mee. The other river that runneth forth at the Eaſt-ſide of Southhampton, may ſeeme to have beene called Alre: For, the mercate towne ſtanding upon the banke thereof, not farre from ponds out of which it iſſueth, is called Alreſ-ford, that is, The foard of Alre. This towne, (to uſe the words of an old Record of Wincheſter): Kinewalch the religious King inſtructed in the Sacraments of faith by the Biſhop Birinus at the very beginning of Chriſtian religion (in this tract,) with great devotion of heart gave unto the Church of God at Wenta. In the yeare of grace 1220. Godfrey Lucy Biſhop of Wincheſter made a new market place heere, and called it Novum forum, that is, New mercate, in regard haply of old Alreſ-ford adjoyning thereto. But this new aime continued not long with the people, who in the matter of ſpeech carry the greateſt ſtroke. Neere heereunto is Tichburne, which I muſt not omit, for that it hath given name to a worſhipfull and ancient familie.

Vpon the Weſt banke of this river is ſcituate the moſt famous Citie of the Britiſh Belgians, called by Ptolomee and Antoninus Venta Belgarum, by the Britaines of Wales even at this day, Caer Gwent: by the Saxons in old time Wintancaeſtep, in Latine commonly Wintonia, and by us in theſe daies of Wincheſter. Yet there bee

A ſome which affirme this to be Venta Simenorum, and do grace Briſtow, with the name of Venta Belgarum. But that there were never any Simeni at all in this Iſland, I will prove when I come to the Iceni. In the meane ſeaſon, though they ſhould ſeeke all the townes that Antoninus placeth on every ſide in the way to, or from VENTA BELGARVM, as narrowly as Emmots paths, yet ſhall they find nothing for their purpoſe to make good this their aſſertion.

The Etymologie of this name Venta, ſome fetch from Ventus, that is, Wind, others from Vinum, that is, Wine, and ſome againe from Wina a Biſhop: who all of them be farre wide, and ſhould doe well to pray for better judgement. Yet like I rather the B opinion of Leland: who hath derived it from the Britiſh word Guin or Guen, that is, White, ſo that Caer Guin ſhould ſignifie as much, as the White Citie. And why not? ſeing the old Latines named theſe their Cities, Alba longa, and Alba regia, of whiteneſſe: yea, and the Grecians alſo had their Leuca, Leucas, and other nations alſo many places taking name of whiteneſſe. For, this Venta, like as the other two of the ſame name, to wit, VENTA SILVRVM, and VENTA ICENORVM, are ſeated all three in a ſoile that ſtandeth upon chalke, and a whitiſh clay.

A Citie it was no doubt, flouriſhing even in the Romans times, as in which the Emperours of Rome ſeeme to have had their ſacred of houſes weaving and embroi-
C dering peculiar to their owne perſons, and uſes: ſeeing among all the VENTAS in Britaine, it was both the chiefe, and alſo neareſt unto Italie. For, in the booke of Notitiæ, mention is made of the Procurator [Maſter or Governour] Cynegii VENTENSIS or BENTENSIS, in Britaine: where the onely flowre of Lawyers, Iames Cujacius readeth Cynacii, and in his Paratitles upon the Code interpreteth it, Sacrum textrinum, that is, The ſacred workhouſe or ſhop of embroidering and weaving. And right of his mind is Guidus Pancirolus, who writeth that thoſe Gynacia were inſtituted Cynacium. for the weaving of the Princes, and ſouldiers garments, of Ship-ſailes, of linnen ſheetes, or covering, and ſuch like cloaths, neceſſarie for the furniture of manſions. But Wolfangus Lazius was of opinion, that the Procurator aforeſaid, had the D charge heere of the Emperours dogs. And to ſay truth, of all the dogs in Europe, ours beare the name; in ſo much, as Strabo witneſſeth, our dogges ſerved as ſouldiers, and Britiſh dogs. the ancient Galles made ſpeciall uſe of them even in their wars. And of all others, they were in moſt requeſt both for thoſe baitings in the Amphitheaters, and alſo in all other publique huntings among the Romans. For as the ſame Strabo writeth, they were ἐφικτὰ πρὸς τὰς κυνηγέσιας, that is, of a generous kind and framed naturally for hunting. Whereupon Nemeſianus wrote thus:

diviſa Britannia mittit
Veloces, noſtrìque orbis venatibus aptos.

Though Britaine from this world of ours doth lie ſecluded farre, E Swift hounds it ſends which for our game moſt fitly framed are.

Gratius alſo, of their price and excellencie, ſaith thus:

Quod freta ſi Morinûm dubio refluentia ponto
Veneris, atque ipſos libeat penetrare Britannos,
O quanta eſt merces, & quantum impendia ſupra?

If that to Calice-ſtreights you goe,
Where tides uncertaine ebbe and flow.
And liſt to venture further more,
Croſſing the ſeas to Britiſh ſhore:
What meede would come to quite your paines:
What overdeale beſide, of gaines.

F Yea and that very dog with us, which of the old name Agaſæus, we call yet at this A Gaſe-hound. day a Gaſehound, thoſe ancient Greekes both knew, and alſo had in great price. And Agaſæus, a this will Oppian in his firſt booke of his Cynegeticks tell you, in theſe Greeke verſes. Britiſh hound.

And may be Engliſhed in this wiſe.

Stout hounds there are, and thoſe of finders kind,
Of bodie ſmall but doughtie for their deed:
The painted folke, fierce Britans as we find,
Them Gaſehounds call, for they with them doe breed.
In making, like houſe dogs, or at a word,
To lickerous curs that craven at our bord.

Claudian alſo, touching our Maſtives writeth in this ſort:

Magnaq́ taurorum fracturi colla Britanni.

And Britiſh maſtives downe that puls,
Or breake the necks of ſturdy bulls.

I have too far digreſſed about dogges, yet hope a favourable pardon.

In this Citie as our owne Hiſtoriographers doe report, in the time of the Romans, was that Conſtans the Monke, who by his father Conſtantine was firſt elect Cæſar, and afterwards Auguſtus: that Conſtantine I ſay, who upon hope of this name had aſſumed the Imperiall purple roabe, that is, uſurped the Empire againſt Honorius. For, long ſince, (as Zoſimus recordeth ſpeaking of thoſe times) as well in villages as in Cities, there were great colledges peopled (as it were) with Monks, who before time flying the light lived ſcattering heere and there among mountaines, woods, and forreſts all ſolitary by themſelues, whereof alſo they were ſo called. Now, of this Colledge wherein the ſaid Conſtans was, thoſe old broken walles which are ſeene of that thickneſſe and ſtrength, at the Weſt-gate of the Cathedrall Church, may ſeeme to be the ruines and reliques. But this imperiall Monke taken out from hence ſuffered ſoone after condigne puniſhment, both for his fathers ambition and alſo for the contempt of his profeſſed religion. During the Heptarchie of the Saxons, this Citie albeit once or twice it ſuffered much calamity and miſerie, yet it revived, and recovered againe: yea, and became the ſeat royall of the Weſt-Saxons Kings, adorned with magnificent Churches, and a Biſhops See: furniſhed likewiſe with ſix mint houſes by King Aethelſtane. In the Normans time alſo it flouriſhed very much, and in it was erected an office for keeping of all publike records and evidences of the Realme. In which proſperous eſtate it continued a long time: but that once or twice it was defaced by misfortune of ſuddaine fires, and in the civill war betweene Stephen, and Maude about the Kingdome of England, ſacked by the unruly and inſolent ſouldiers. Whereupon Necham our countriman who lived in that age, writeth thus:

See before in the Emperours.

Guintoniam titulis claram, gaziſque repletam
Noverunt veterum tempora priſca patrum.
Sed tam ſacra fames auri, jam cæcus habendi,
Vrbibus egregiis parcere neſcit amor.

Our anceſtours knew Wincheſter ſometimes a goodly Towne,
In treaſure rich and plentifull, in name of great renowne:
But now, for hunger after gold our men ſo greedy are;
That even ſuch Cities excellent, they know not how to ſpare.

But of theſe loſſes it recovered it ſelfe by the helpe of Edward the third, who heere appointed the Mart for wooll and cloth, which we commonly call the Staple. What was the face and outward ſhew of this Citie in theſe foregoing times, a man can hardly tell, conſidering that, as the ſaid Necham writeth:

——Flammis toties gens aliena dedit.
Hinc facies urbis toties mutata, dolorem
Prætendit, caſus nuntia vera ſui.

So

A So many times a nation ſtrange
Hath fir'd this towne, and made ſuch change;
That now her face and outward hue
Her griefe bewray's, and tels full true.

In theſe daies of ours it is indifferently well peopled and frequented, having water plentie, by reaſon of the River turned and conveighed divers waies into it, lying ſomewhat in length from Eaſt to Weſt, and containeth about a mile and a halfe in circuit within the walls: which open at ſixe gates, and have every one of them their ſuburbs reaching forth without, a good way. On the South ſide of the Weſt gate
B there mounteth up an old Caſtle, which oftentimes hath beene beſieged, but moſt ſore and ſtraightly, above the reſt what time as Mawd the Empreſſe held it againſt King Stephen, and at length by a rumour given out that ſhe was dead, and cauſing her ſelfe to be caried out in a coffin like a courſe deceived the enemie. As concerning that round table there, hanging up againſt the wall which the common ſort uſeth to gaze upon with great admiration, as if it had beene King Arthurs table, I have nothing to ſay but this, That, as a man which vieweth it well may eaſily perceive, it is nothing ſo ancient as King Arthur. For, in latter times when for the exerciſe of armes and feates of warlike proweſſe, thoſe runnings at tilt, and martiall juſtlings or torneaments, were much practiſed: they uſed ſuch tables, leaſt any contention or offence for
C prioritie of place ſhould through ambition ariſe among Nobles and Knights aſſembled together. And this was a cuſtome of great antiquitie, as it may ſeeme. For, the ancient Gaules, as Athenæus writeth, were wont to ſit about round tables; and their Eſquires ſtood at their backes, holding their ſhields. About the midſt of the citie, but more inclining to the South, Kenelwalch King of the Weſt-Saxons after the ſubverſion of that Colledge of Monkes which flouriſhed in the Romans time, (as William of Malmesburie ſaith) Firſt founded to the glory of God, the faireſt Church that was in thoſe daies; in which very place, the poſteritie afterwards in building of a Cathedrall ſeate for the Biſhop, although it were more ſtately than the firſt, yet followed juſt in D the very ſame ſteps. In this See, there have ſitten ſince Wina, whom the ſaid Kenelwalch ordained the firſt Biſhop there, Many Biſhops ſome renowned for their wealth and honourable port, and ſome for holineſſe of life. But among other, Saint Swithin continueth yet of greateſt fame, not ſo much for his ſanctitie, as for the raine which uſually falleth about the Feaſt of his tranſlation in Iuly, by reaſon the Sunne then Coſmically with Præſepe and Aſelli, noted by ancient writers to be rainie conſtellations, and not for his weeping, or other weeping Saints Margaret the Virgine, and Mary Magdalen, whoſe feaſts are ſhortly after, as ſome ſuperſtitiouſly-credulous have believed.

Biſhops of Wincheſter.

This by the way, pardon me I pray you, for I digreſſe licentiouſly. Thus E Biſhops of Wincheſter have beene anciently by a certaine peculiar prerogative that they have, Chancellours to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and for long time now Prelates to the order of the Garter: and they have from time to time to their great coſt reedified the Church, and by name, Edington and Walkelin, but Wickham eſpecially: who built all the Weſt part thereof downe from the quire, after a new kind of worke, I aſſure you, moſt ſumptuouſly. In the midſt of which building is to be ſeene his owne tombe of decent modeſtie betweene two pillars. And theſe Biſhops have ever and anon conſecrated it to new Patrons and Saints, as to Saint Amphibalus, Saint Peter, Saint Swithin, and laſt of all to the holy Trinitie: by which name it is knowne at this day. The Engliſh Saxons alſo, had this Church in great honour for the ſepulture of certaine Saints and Kings there, (whoſe bones F Richard Fox the Biſhop gathered, and ſhrining them in certaine little gilded coffers placed them orderly with their ſeverall Inſcriptions in the top of that wall which encloſeth the upper part of the quire) and they called it in times paſt Ealden Mynſter, that is, The old Minſter, for difference from another more lately built, which was named Neþan Mynſter, that is, The new Minſter; which Elfred founded; and for the building of houſes of office belonging to the ſame purchaſe of the Biſhop a plot

of ground; and for every foot of it paid him downe a marke after the publike weight. A

This monaſterie as alſo that other the older, was built for married Prieſts, who afterwards, upon I know not what miracle of a Croſſe that ſpoke, and diſliked their marriage, were thruſt out by Dunſtane Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Monkes put in their place. The walls of theſe two monaſteries ſtood ſo neere and cloſe together, that the voices of thoſe that ſung in the one troubled the chaunting of the other: whereupon there aroſe grudge and heart-burning betweene theſe Monkes, which afterwards brake out into open enmities: By occaſion whereof, and becauſe at this new monaſterie there gathered and ſtood much water which from the Weſterne gate came downe thither along the current of the ſtreets, and caſt forth from it an B unwholſome aire, the Minſter Church two hundred yeares after the firſt foundation of it, was removed into the Suburbs of the citie on the North part, which they call Hide Abbey. Hide. Where, by the permiſſion of King Henry the Firſt, the Monks built a moſt ſtately and beautifull monaſterie; which a few yeares after by the craftie practice of Henrie de Blois Biſhoppe of Wincheſter (as the private hiſtorie of this place witneſſeth) was pitiouſly burnt. In which fire, that Croſſe alſo was conſumed, which Canutus the Dane gave, and upon which, as old writings beare record, he beſtowed as much as his owne yeares revenewes of all England came unto. The monaſterie nevertheleſſe was raiſed up againe, and grew by little and little to wonderfull greatneſſe, as the very ruines thereof even at this day doe ſhew, untill C that generall ſubverſion, and finall period of our monaſteries. For then, was this monaſterie demoliſhed: and into that other of the holy Trinitie, which is the Cathedrall Church, when the monkes were thruſt out were brought in their ſtead, a Deane, twelve Prebendaries, and there placed. At the Eaſt ſide of this Cathedrall Church, ſtandeth the Biſhops palace, called Wolveſey: a right goodly thing, and ſumptuous; which being towred and compaſſed almoſt round with the ſtreame of a prety river, Wickham Colledge. reacheth even to the Citie walls: and in the South-ſuburbes, juſt over againſt it beholdeth a faire Colledge: which William Wickham Biſhop of this See, the greateſt William Wickham. father and Patron (of all Engliſhmen) of good literature, and whoſe praiſe for ever to the worlds end will continue, built for a Schoole, and thereto dedicated it: out of which, both for Church and Common-wealth there riſeth a moſt plentiful increaſe D of right learned men. For, in this Colledge, one warden, ten fellowes, two Schoolemaſters, and threeſcore and ten ſchollers, with divers others are plentifully maintained. There have beene alſo in this Citie, other faire and goodly buildings, (for Saint Mary Abbey. very many were here conſecrated to religion) which I liſt not now to recount, ſince time and avarice hath made an end of them. Onely, that Nunnery, or monaſterie of vailed Virgins, which Elfwida, the wife of King Elfred founded, I will not overpaſſe: ſeeing it was a moſt famous thing as the remainder of it now doth ſhew: and for that, out of it King Henrie the Firſt tooke to wife Mawde the daughter of Malcolne King * Matildis Mawde wife to King Henry the firſt. of Scots, by whom the Royall bloud of the ancient Kings of England became united E to the Normans, and he therefore wonne much love of the Engliſh nation. For, neiphew ſhee was in the ſecond degree of deſcent, unto Edmund Iron-ſide, by his ſonne Edward the Baniſhed. A woman, as adorned with all other vertues meet for a Queene, ſo eſpecially inflamed with an incredible love of true pietie and godlineſſe. Whereupon was this Tetraſtich made in her commendation:

Proſpera non lætam fecêrè, nec aſpera triſtem:
Aſpera riſus ei, proſpera terror erant.
Non decor effecit fragilem, non ſceptra ſuperbam,
Sola potens humilis, ſola pudica decens.

No proſp'rous ſtate did make her glad,
Nor adverſe chances made her ſad:
If fortune frown'd, ſhe then did ſmile;
If fortune frown'd, ſhe feard the while.
If beauty tempted, ſhe yet ſaid nay,
No pride ſhe tooke in ſcepters ſway:

Shee

A Shee onely high, her ſelfe debaſ'd,
A lady onely faire and chaſt.

Concerning Sir Guy of Warwick, of whom there goe ſo many prety tales, who in ſingle fight overcame here that Daniſh giant and Golias, Colbrand: and of Waltheof Earle of Huntingdon, that was here beheaded, where afterwards ſtood Saint Giles chappell: as alſo of that excellent Hoſpital of Saint Croſſe there adjoyning, founded by Henry of Blois bother to King Stephen, and Biſhop of this City, and augmented by Henry Beauford Cardinall, I need not to ſpeake: ſeeing every man may read of them in the common Chronicles.

B As touching the Earles of Wincheſter, to ſay nothing of * Clyto the Saxon whom the Normans deprived of his ancient honour King Iohn created Saier Quincy, Earle of Wincheſter, who uſed for his armes a military belt, they call it a Feſſe, with a labell of ſeven as I have ſeene upon his ſeales. After him ſucceeded Roger his ſonne, who bare, Gules, ſeven Maſcles voided, Or: but with him that honour vaniſhed and went away, ſeeing he died without iſſue male. For, he married the eldeſt daughter and one of the coheires of Alan Lord of Galloway in Scotland by a former wife, in right of whom he was Conſtable of Scotland. He had by her three onely daughters, the firſt married to William de Ferrariis Earle of Derbie, the ſecond to Alan de la Zouch, the third to Comine Earle of Bucqhanan in Scotland. A long time after Hugh C le Diſpencer, having that title beſtowed upon him for terme of his life, by King Edward the ſecond, whoſe minion he was, and only beloved, felt together with his ſonne what is the conſequence of Princes extraordinary favours: For both of them envied by moſt, were by the furious rage of the people put cruelly to ſhamefull death. And long it was after this, that through the bounty of King Edward the Fourth, Lewis of Bruges * a Netherland Lord of Gruthuſe, Prince of Steinhuſe, &c. Who had given him comfort and ſuccour in the Netherlands, when hee was fled his native countrey, received this honour with Armes reſembling thoſe of Roger Quincy, in theſe words, Azur a dix Maſcles D'or en orm d'un Canton de noſtie propre Armes d' Engleterre, ceſt- Pr. p. All which, after King Edwards death, he yeilded up into the hands of Henrie the ſeventh. But lately within our memorie King Edward the ſixth, honoured Sir William Pawlet Lord Treaſurer of England, Earle of Wilſhire, and Lord Saint Iohn of Baſing, with a new title of Marqueſſe of Wincheſter. A man prudently pliable to times, raiſed not ſodainely but by degrees in Court, exceſſive in vaſte informous buildings; temperate in all other things, full of yeares, for he lived nintie ſeven years, and fruitfull in his generation, for he ſaw one hundred and three, iſſued from him by Elizabeth his wife, daughter to Sir William Capell Knight. And now his grand-child William enjoyeth the ſaid honours: For the Geographicall poſition of Wincheſter, E it hath beene obſerved by former ages to be in longitude two and twenty degrees, and in latitude fiftie one.

From Wincheſter more Eaſtward the river Hamble at a great mouth emptieth it Hamble.
ſelfe into the Ocean. Beda calleth it Homelea, which, as he writeth, by the lands of the Solente frith.
Intæ entreth into Solente: for ſo termeth he that frith our narrow ſea, that runneth betweene the Iſle of Wight and the main land of Britain: in which the tides at ſet houres ruſhing in with great violence out of the Ocean at both ends, and ſo meeting one another in the midſt, ſeemed ſo ſtrange a matter to our men in old time, that they reckoned it among the wonders of Britaine. Whereof, read heere the very words of Beda. The two tides of the Ocean which about Britaine breake out of the vaſt Northern Ocean daily encounter and fight one againſt another, beyond the mouth of the river Homelea: F and when they have ended their conflict, returne backe, from whence they came and runne into the Ocean. Into this Frith that little river alſo ſheadeth it ſelfe, which having his head neere Warnford, paſſeth betweene the Forreſts of Waltham (where the Biſhop of Wincheſter hath a goodly houſe), and of Bere, whereby is Wickham a manſion of that ancient family of Vuedal, and then by Tichfield, ſometime a little monaſterie founded by Petre de Rupibus Biſhop of Wincheſter * where the mar- * Roche.

riage was ſolemnized betweene King Henry the ſixth, and Margaret of Anjou; and now the principall ſeate of the Lord Writheoſleies Earles of South-hampton. From thence forthwith, the ſhore with curving crookes draweth it ſelfe in, and the Iſland named Porteſey maketh a great creeke, within the more inward nooke or corner whereof ſometimes flouriſhed Port peris; (where, by report Veſpaſian landed) An haven towne which our Anceſtours by a new name called Port-cheſter, not of Porte the Saxon, but of the port or haven. For, Ptolomee tearmeth it Μέγας λιμήν, that is, THE GREAT HAVEN, for the wideneſſe of it, like as that Portus Magnus alſo in Africk, as Plinie witneſſeth. And verily there remaineth yet a great Caſtle which hath a faire and ſpacious proſpect into the haven underneath. But when as the Ocean by with-drawing it ſelfe, tooke away, by little and little the commoditie of the haven, the Inhabitants flitted from thence into the Iſland Portſey adjoyning, which taketh in circuit much about fourteene miles, being at every full ſea floated round about with ſalt-waters, out of which they boile ſalt, and by a bridge that hath a fortreſſe adjoyning unto it, is united to the Continent. This Iſland Athelſtede King Eadgars wife had given to the New monaſterie of Wincheſter. And in it at the very gullet, or mouth where the ſea entreth in, our fore-fathers built a towne, and thereupon named it Portſmouth, that is, the mouth of the haven. A place alwaies in time of warre well frequented, otherwiſe little reſort there is to it: as beeing more favourable, and better affected to Mars and Neptune, than to Mercurie, that is, to warre rather than to traffique. A Church it hath of the old building, and an Hoſpitall (Gods houſe they call it) founded by Peter de * Rupibus, Biſhop of Wincheſter. Fortified it was with a wall made of timber and the ſame well covered over with thicke bankes of earth: fenced with a platforme alſo or mount of earth in times paſt on the North-eaſt, nere to the gate: and two block-houſes at the entry of the haven made of new hewen ſtone: Which being by King Edward the fourth begunne, King Henrie the ſeventh as the Inhabitants report, did finiſh, and ſtrengthned the towne with a garriſon. But in our remembrance, Queene ELIZABETH at her great coſt and charges ſo armed it (as one would ſay) with new fortifications, as that now there is nothing wanting, that a man would require in a moſt ſtrong and fenced place. And of the garriſon-ſouldiers ſome keepe watch and ward both night and day at the gates: others upon the towre of the Church, who by the ringing or ſound of a bell give warning how many horſe or foote are comming, and by putting forth a banner ſhew from what quarter they come.

From hence as the ſhore fetcheth a compaſſe and windeth from Portes bridge, wee had the ſight of Havant a little mercate towne, and hard by it, of Wablington, a goodly faire houſe belonging ſome-times to the Earles of Salisbury; but now to the family of the Cottons Knights. Before which, there lie two Iſlands, the one greater, named Haling, the other leſſe, called Thorney, of thornes there growing: and both of them have their ſeverall pariſh Church. In many places along this ſhore, of the ſea-waters flowing up thither, is made ſalt of a paliſh or greene colour: the which by a certaine artificious deviſe, they boyle untill it bee exceeding white. And of this ſea, or Bay-ſalt, and not of ours made out of ſalt ſprings, is Saint Ambroſe to bee underſtood, when hee writeth thus; Conſider we thoſe things which are uſuall with many very grace-full: namely, how water is turned into ſalt, of ſuch hardneſſe and ſoliditie, that often times it is hewed with axes. This in the ſalts of Britaine is no wonder, as which carrying a ſhew of ſtrong marble, doe ſhine and glitter againe with the whiteneſſe of the ſame mettall, like unto ſnow, and bee holeſome to the bodie, &c.

Farther within the land, the MEANVARI dwelt, whoſe countrey togither with the Iſle of Wight Edilwalch King of the South Saxons received in token of Adoption from Wlpher King of Mercians, Godfather unto him at the Font, when he was baptized. The habitations of theſe Meanvari, ſcarce changing the name, at this day is divided into three hundreds; to wit, Means-borow, Eaſt-mean, and Weſt-mean: and amongſt them there mounteth up an high Hill, environed in the top with a large rampier, Meanvari Bede lib. 4. cap. 13.

A rampier, and they call it old Winchester: at which, by report, there stood in old time a citie, but now neither top nor toe, as they say, remaineth of it: so as a man would quickly judge it to have beene a summer standing campe, and nothing else. Under this is Warnford seated where Adam de Portu a mightie man, in this tract and of great wealth in the raigne of William the first, reedified the Church a new, as a couple of rude verses set fast upon the wall doe plainly shew. Upon these, more high into the land, those SEGONTIACI, who yeilded themselves unto Iulius Cæsar, had their seate toward the North limite of this shire, in and about the hundred of Holeshot: wherein are to bee seene Mercate Aulum, which King Elfred bequeathed by his B will unto the keeper of Leodre: also Basingstoke a mercate towne well frequented: upon the descent of an hill, on the North side whereof standeth solitarie a very faire Chappell consecrated unto the holy Ghost by William, the first Lord Sands, who was buried there. In the arched and embowed roofe whereof is to be seene the holy history of the Bible painted most artificially, with lively portraicts, and images representing the Prophets, the Apostles, and the Disciples of Christ. Beneath this, Eastward lieth Basing, a towne very well knowne, by reason of the Lords bearing the name of it, to wit, Saint Iohn, the Poinings, and the Powlets. For, when Adam de Portu, Lord of Basing matched in marriage with the daughter and heire of Roger de Aurevall, whose wife was likewise daughter and heire to the right noble house of Saint C Iohn, William his sonne, to doe honour unto that familie assumed to him the surname of Saint Iohn, and they who lineally descended from him have still retained the same. But when Edmund Saint Iohn departed out of this world without issue in King Edward the third his time, his sister Margaret, bettered the state of her husband Iohn, Saint Philibert, with the possessions of the Lord Saint Iohn: And when she was dead without children, Isabell the other sister wife unto Sir Luke Poinings, bare unto him Thomas, Lord of Basing, whose Neice Constance by his sonne Hugh, (unto whom this fell for her childs part of Inheritance) was wedded into the familie of the Powlets, and she was great Grandmother to that Sir William Powlet who being made Baron Saint Iohn of Basing by King Henrie the Eighth, D and created by King Edward the Sixth first Earle of Wilshire, and afterward Marquesse of Winchester, and withall was Lord Treasurer of England, having in a troublesome time runne through the highest honours, fulfilled the course of nature with the satietie of this life, and that in great prosperitie, as a rare blessing among Courtiers) after he had built a most sumptuous house heere, for the spacious largenesse thereof admirable to the beholders, untill for the great and chargeable reparations his successors pulled downe a good part of it. But of him I have spoken before.

Neere unto this house, the Vine sheweth it selfe, a very faire place, and Mansion E house of the Baron Sands, so named of the vines there, which wee have had in Britaine, since Probus the Emperours time, rather for shade than fruit. For, hee permitted the Britaines and others to have vines. The first of these Barons was Sir William Sands, whom King Henrie the Eighth advanced to that dignitie, being Lord Chamberlaine unto him, and having much amended his estate by marrying Margerie Bray, daughter and heire of Iohn Bray, and cousin to Sir Reinold Bray, a most worthy Knight of the Order of the Garter, and a right noble Baneret: whose Sonne Thomas Lord Sands, was Grandfather to William L. Sands that now liveth. Neighbouring hereunto is Odiam glorious in these daies for the Kings house there: and famous for that David the Second King of Scots, was there imprisoned: a Burrough corporate, belonging in times past to the Bishop of Winchester: the fortresse whereof in the F name of King John, thirteene Englishmen for fifteene daies defended most valiantly, and made good against Lewis of France, who with his whole armie besieged and afted it very hotly.

A little above, among these Segontiaci, toward the North side of the countrey, sometimes stood VINDONVM, the chiefe citie of the Segontiaci, which casting off his owne name, hath taken the name of the Nation, like as Lutetia hath assumed unto it the name of the Pariſians there inhabiting: for, called it was by the Britaines Caer Segonte, that is to ſay, the Citie of the Segontiaci. And ſo Ninnius in his catalogue of cities named it: wee at this day called it Sileceſter: and Higden ſeemeth to clepe it of the Britaines Britenden: that this was the ancient Vindonum, I am induced to thinke by reaſon of the diſtance of Vindonum in Antoninus, from Gallena, or Guallenford, and Venta or Wincheſter: and the rather, becauſe betweene this Vindonum and Venta, there is ſtill to bee ſeene a cauſey, or ſtreet-way. Ninnius recordeth, that it was built by Conſtantius the ſonne of Conſtantine the Great, and called ſometime Murimintum, haply, for Muri-vindum, that is, the wals of Vindon. For, this word Mur borrowed from the provinciall language, the Britaines retained ſtill, and V. the conſonant, they change oftentimes in their ſpeech, and writing into M. And to uſe the verie words of Aſinnius, though they ſeeme ridiculous, the ſaid Conſtantius, ſowed upon the ſoile of this citie three ſeedes, that none ſhould be poore that dwelt therein at any time. Like as Dinocrates, when Alexandria in Egypt was a building, ſtrewed it with meale or flower (as Marcellinus writeth) all the circular lines of the draught, which being done by chance, was taken for a fore-token, that the citie ſhould abound with al manner of victualls. He reporteth alſo, that Conſtantius died here, and that his Sepulchre was to be ſeene at one of the gates, as the Inſcription ſheweth. But in theſe matters let Ninnius cleere his owne credit; for, ſtuffed hee hath that little booke with many a pretty lie. Yet this I may be bold to affirme, that it flouriſhed in great honour about that time: and I my ſelfe have lighted here upon very many peeces, of the coine of Conſtantine, the younger ſonne to Conſtantine the Great: which in their reverſe have the portraict of an houſe with this Inſcription PROVIDENTIA CAES. Now that this Conſtantius whom he maketh the builder of this Citie, died at Mopſueſtia in Cilicia, and was interred in Conſtantinople in the Sepulchre of his Anceſtors, it is knowne for certaine, and confeſſed. Yet I will not denie, but that hee might have in this citie a monument erected in honour and remembrance of him. For, many there were that had ſuch monuments built, about which the ſouldiers, were wont yearely to juſt, and keepe ſolemne turneaments in honour of the dead.

Sepulchres of honour.

When the declining Roman Empire haſtened to an end, and barbarous nations began every where to waſte and ſpoile the Provinces: their Armies heere in Britaine, fearing leaſt the flame of this fire, wherewith their next neighbours in France were conſumed, would catch hold of them, ſet up and created Emperours to themſelves: firſt Marcus, then Gratian, whom they ſoone ſlew: and laſt of all in the yeare after Chriſts birth 407, our Conſtantine for his names ſake, they forced, wild he, nild he, to uſurpe the Empire, and to put on the Imperiall Purple robe in the citie Caer Segont, as both Ninnius, and Gervaſe of Canterburie, do witneſſe. This Conſtantine putting to ſea out of Britaine, landed at * Bologne in France, and drew all the Roman armies even as farre as the Alpes to ſide and joyne with him in his warres. Hee ſtoutly defended Valentia in France, againſt the power of Honorius the Emperour: the River Rhene which long before had beene neglected, hee fortified with a garriſon. Upon the Alpes, where any paſſage was, hee built fortreſſes. In Spaine, under the conduct of his ſonne Conſtans, whom of a Monke he had declared Emperour, he warred fortunately: and afterwards having ſent his letters unto Honorius, and craved pardon for ſuffering the ſouldiers, to put upon him the purple perforce, whether hee would or no; he accepted at his hands the Imperiall inveſture, which hee freely gave him. Whereupon being puffed up with pride, after hee had paſſed the Alpes, his mind was wholly ſet upon a journey to Rome. But hearing that Alaricus the Gothe who had favoured his part was dead, hee returned to Arles, where hee ſetled his Imperiall ſeat, cauſed the Citie to bee called Conſtantina, and commanded the courts and aſſemblies of ſeven Provinces, there to bee holden. In the meane time Gerontius excited the ſouldiers againſt their Lord, and when he had treacherouſly ſlaine his ſonne Conſtans at Vienna in France, beſieged Conſtantine alſo himſelfe within Arles. But after that one Conſtantius ſent by Honorius with a great armie, made head againſt him, Gerontius killed himſelfe. And Conſtantine being now ſtreit-

A ly beſieged, and by reaſon of the unhappie ſucceſſe of his men paſt all hope, laid aſide the Purple and his great eſtate entred into the Church, became a Prieſt: and ſtraight-waies when Arles was yeilded up, and hee carried into Italie, was himſelfe, together with his ſonne Julian (unto whom he had given the title of * Nobiliſſimus) and his brother Sebaſtian, beheaded. Thus much briefly of theſe occurrents, (which before are diſcourſed more at large) out of Zoſimus, Zoſomenus, Nicephorus, Oroſius, and Olympiodorus, to the end that Veritie may triumph over their vanitie, who have beſprinkled this ſtory with moſt ridiculous and fooliſh lies of their owne deviſing.

* Heire apparant. Julianus Nobiliſſimus.

B Moreover, in this citie (our Hiſtoriographers write) that our warlike Arthur was inveſted and crowned King. But not long after it was razed quite, either in the Saxons warres, or when Adelwolph being offended with his brother King Edward, upon a malicious mind, together with the helpe of the Daniſh Rovers, waſted this countrey even to Baſing-ſtoke. And now remaineth nothing ſave the wals, which although they want their battlements, Curtaine, and coppe, yet they ſeeme to have beene of a very great height. For, the earth is ſo growne up with the rubble, that I could ſcarce with ſtouping low paſſe through an old poſterne, which they call, Onions Hole. Theſe walles in ſome ſort continue whole, but that they be broken through in thoſe places where the gates were: and out of the very walles, I ſaw grow oakes of that C bigneſſe, and thoſe ſeeming (as it were) bredde with the very ſtones, with ſuch huge roots claſping one another a great way, and ſpreading forth ſo mightie armes and boughes all abroad, that it would make the beholders to wonder thereat. Theſe walles take in compaſſe about two Italian miles. Whereupon haply the Saxons called this citie Selceſter, as one would ſay, The great Citie: for Sel may ſeeme to ſound with them as much as Great, ſeeing Aſſerius hath interpreted the Saxon word, Selwood, The Great wood. And before the walles Weſtward, where is a plaine, there lieth a banke of a great length, raiſed and caſt up for a defence and fortification. The ſcite of this old citie, containeth about foureſcore acres of ground within, which being a ſoile ploughed up an tilled, are divided into corne-fields; with a little grove in D the Weſt-ſide: but on the Eaſt, neere unto the gappe in the wall, there ſtandeth a Farme-houſe, and a pretty Church more lately built, in which, while I ſearched for ancient inſcriptions, I found nothing, but onely in the windowes certaine armes, to wit, In a field ſable, ſeven Fuſils argent in Bend, likewiſe in a ſhield ſables, a Feſſe between two Cheverns, and in an Eſcutcheon Or, an Eagle diſplaied with two heads, gules. This laſt, I have heard ſay, was the coat of the Blewets, unto whom this land came, about the Conquerours time. The ſecond belonged unto the ancient houſe of the Bainards of Leckham: but the firſt to the Cuſanz, by whom from the Blewets it deſcended hereditarily, to the ſaid Bainards. But in the raigne of William the Conquerour, it was the poſſeſſion of William de Ow, a Norman, who being accuſed of high treaE ſon, and deſirous to prove his innocencie by combat, was overcome in fight, and by commandement of King William Rufus, had his two eies pluckt out of his head, and loſt both his genetals. This is found by continuall obſervation (as I have learned of the Inhabitants of this place) that although the ground bee fertile and fruitfull enough, yet in certaine places croſſing one another, the corne doth not thrive ſo well, but commeth up much thinner then elſe where, by which they ſuppoſe the ſtreets of the citie went in old time. There are heere daily digged up, bricks ſuch as wee call Britaine-bricks, and great ſtore of Roman coine which they terme Onions pennies. For, they dreame that this Onion was a Giant, and dwelt in this citie. There are digged up alſo many times inſcriptions, of which the unskilfull rurall people envie us F the having. Onely one was brought from hence to London, which was to be ſeene in the gardens of the right honourable Sir William Cecill, Lord Burghley, and high Treaſurer of England, to wit:

Sel, what it is.

Armes of the Blewets, Bainards, and Cuſantes.

That this Tombe was erected for that Victorina which was called Mater Castrorum, that is, The mother of the Campe, and who against Gallienus the Emperour, excited in Gaule, and Britaine, the two Victorini, her ſonne, and ſonnes ſonne, Poſthumus likewiſe, Lollianus, Marius, and Tetricus, Cæſars, I would not with others affirme. Yet I have read, that two of the VICTORS, were in ſome place here in Britaine, and thoſe at one and the ſelfe-ſame time, the one Maximus the Emperour his ſoone, the other Præfectus Prætorio to the ſame Emperour, of whom Saint Ambroſe maketh mention in his Epiſtles, but I dare avouch, that neither of theſe twaine reared this monument for his wife.

As one high way or ſtreet of the Romans went ſtraight from hence Southward to Wincheſter, ſo there was another ran weſt-ward through Pamber Forreſt, very full of trees, and other by-places now ſtanding out of the way, hard by Litchfield, that is, the field of dead bodies, to the Forreſt of Chute pleaſant for coole ſhade of trees, & plentifull game: in which the Hunters and Forreſters themſelves do wonder at the banke or ridge thereof, ſo evident to be ſeene, paved with ſtone, but broken here and there.

Kings-cleare. More toward the North, in the very edge and frontier of this Shire, we ſaw Kings-Cleare, a market towne in theſe daies well frequented, the reſidence in times paſt of the Saxon Kings, by it Fremantle in a parke where King Iohn much haunted, alſo Sidmanton. Sidmanton, the habitation of the Kingſmils, Knights: and Burgh-Cleare ſcituate under an high hill, in the top whereof a warlike rampire (ſuch as our countreymen called a Burgh) hath a trench taking a great compaſſe about it: from whence, there being a faire and open proſpect every way over the countrey lying underneath, there ſtandeth * Speçula. a * Beacon, that by light burning fire the enemies comming, may bee ſhewed to all Beacon. the neighbour-Inhabitants round about. And verily ſuch watches or ſignals as this, we terme in common ſpeech Beacons, of the old word Beacnian, that is, to ſhew by a ſigne, and for theſe many hundred yeares, they have beene in right great requeſt, and much uſed among us: in ſome places, by heaping up a deale of wood, in others by barrels full of pitch faſtened to the top of a maſt or pole in the higheſt places of the countrey, at which, by night ſome doe evermore watch: and in old time, there were ſet horſemen as poſts in many places, whom our Anceſtors called Hobelers, who in the day time ſhould give notice of the enemies approach.

This ſhire, like as the reſt which hitherto we have run over, belonged to the weſt-Saxon Kings: and when they had depoſed Sigebert from his Kingdome, for his tyrannie, evill entreating and lewd managing of his province, this countrey, as Marianus writeth, was aſſigned unto him, leaſt hee ſhould ſeeme altogether a private perſon. Whom notwithſtanding afterward, for his wicked deeds, they likewiſe expelled from hence: and ſo far was it off, that this afflicted ſtate of a King moved any man to take pitie of him, that a Swine-heard in the end, ſlew him in the wood Anderida, where he had lurked, and hidden himſelfe.

This Shire can reckon but very few Earles, beſides thoſe of Wincheſter which I have already named. In the firſt time of the Normans, Bogo or Beavoſe the Engliſh man, who fought againſt the Normans in the battell at Cardiff in Wales, is reputed to have beene Earle of South-hampton, a man for warlike proweſſe much renowned, whom while the Monks laboured to ſet out with their fained fables, they have obſcured his doughtie deeds in greater darkeneſſe. From which time unto the daies of K. Henry the Eight, there was no Earle of South-hampton that I read of: but he created

A William Fitz-williams deſcended from the daughter of Marqueſſe Montacute, both Earle of South-hampton, and alſo Admirall of England, when he was now well ſtricken in yeares. Who dying ſtraight after without iſſue; King Edward the Sixth, in the firſt yeare of his raigne conferred the ſaid honour upon Thomas Wriotheſley Lord Chancellor, whoſe grand-child Henrie by his ſonne Henrie, enjoyeth the ſame at this day: and in the prime and flowre of his age hath by good literature and militarie experience ſtrengthned his honorable parentage, that in riper yeares he might be more ſerviceable to his Prince and countrey.

VECTA INSVLA
ISLE OF WIGHT.

C TO this Countie of South-hampton belongeth that Iſland which lieth out in length over againſt the midſt of it South-ward, called by the Romans in times paſt VECTA, VECTIS, and VICTESIS, by Ptolomee ΟΥΙΚΤΗΣΙΣ, by Britaines Guith, by Engliſh-Saxons Wuic-land, and Wicp-ea; (For, an Iſland they termed ea) and by us in theſe daies, the Iſle of Wight and the Whight; by ſo ſmall a ſtreight running betweene, anciently called Solent. It is ſevered from the maine land, that it may ſeeme to have beene conjoyned to it: whereof that Britiſh name of it Guith, which betokeneth a ſeparation; as Ninnius ſaith, is thought to have beene given: even as Sicilie alſo being broken off (as it were) and cut from Italie got the name from Secando the Latin word (which ſignifieth cutting) as the right learned Iulius Scaliger is of opinion. Whereupon, (under correction alwaies of the Iudicious Criticks) I would read in the ſixt Queſt. Naturall. of Seneca, thus; Ab Italia Siciliarefecta, that is, Sicilie cut from Italie: wheras it is commonly read there, rejecta. By this Vicinitie of ſcite, & Affinitie of name, we may well thinke, this Vecta to be that Icta, which as Diodorus Siculus writeth, ſeemed at every tide to be an Iſland, but when it was ebbe, the ancient Britaines were wont that way to carry tinne thither by carts, which ſhould bee tranſported into France. But yet I would not deeme it to be that MICTIS in Plinie, which likewiſe commeth very neere unto VECTA: For that in it there was plentie of tinne, but in this of ours there is not to my knowledge any veine at all of mettall.

This Iſle, betweene Eaſt and Weſt in ovall forme, ſtretcheth out twentie miles in length: and ſpreadeth in the midſt, where it is broadeſt twelve miles: having the one ſide turning to the North, and the other Southward. The ground (to ſay nothing of the ſea exceeding full of fiſh) conſiſteth of ſoile very fruitfull, and is thankefull to the husbandman, in ſo much as it doth affoord corne to be carried forth: breeding every where ſtore of conies, hares, partridges and pheſants. One little forreſt it hath likewiſe, and two parkes repleniſhed with deere, for game and hunting pleaſure. Through the midſt thereof runs a long tract or chaine of hils, yeilding plentie of paſture, and forrage for ſheepe. The wool of which, next unto that of Lemſter and Coteſwold, is eſtemed beſt, and in ſpeciall requeſt with Clothiers, whereby there groweth to the Inhabitants much gaine and profit: The North part is all over greene with meddows, paſtures, and woods: the South ſide lieth wholly in manner, bedecked bedecked with cornefields encloſed, where at each end the ſea on the North-ſide doth ſo inboſome, encroach within it ſelfe, that it maketh almoſt two Iſlands: and verily ſo the Iſlanders call them: namely, Freſh-water Iſle which looketh Weſt, and Binbrige Iſle, Eaſtward. In Bedas daies it was counted to containe a thouſand and two hundred Hides: now it reckoneth upon 36. townes, villages and Caſtles: which for Eccleſiaſticall juriſdiction belong to the Biſhop of Wincheſter, and for civill government, to the County of South-hanton. The Inhabitants of this Iſle were wont merrily to make their boaſt, that their caſe was happier than all others, becauſe they had neither hooded monks, nor cavilling Lawyers, nor yet crafty foxes.

Newport. The places of greater name be theſe, Newport, the principall mercate towne of the whole Iſle, called in times paſt Medena, and Novus Burgus de Meden, that is, The new Burgh of Meden: whereof the whole country is divided into Eaſt Meden, and Weſt Meden, an ordering as to their ſcituation Eaſt or Weſt either way. Caeres-brooke an old Caſtle, ſo clepid and clipped ſhort for White garesburg, is in the very heart and midſt of the Iſle, taking the name of Whitgar the Saxon, of whom more heereafter: and of late magnificently reedified by the meanes of the Captaine: unto which Caſtle there belonged very many Knights Fees, and above all other places it hath heere the glory for antiquitie: Brading, another mercate Towne, Newton and Yarmouth anciently called Eremue, which have their Majors, and ſend Burgeſſes to the Parliament. This Yarmouth and Sharpnore have Caſtles in them, which together with Worſleys fort or Blockehouſe (ſo named of a worſhipfull familie) defend the Sea-ſhore at the North-weſt. Juſt over againſt it, ſcarcely two miles off ſtandeth Hurſt a fortification of South-Hamptonſhire, ſcituate upon a little necke of land lying into the Sea: Quarre, where was founded a Nunnerie in the yeare of our Lord 1131: Gods-Hill, in which Iohn Worſley erected a Schoole for the training up of young wits, Weſt-Cowe and Eaſt-Cowe, that is now ruinous: both which, King Henry the Eighth built at the very entrie of New port: and concerning them Leland wrote in this wiſe:

Covæ fulmineæ duæ coruſcant
Hæc caſum colit, ille Solis ortum
Vectam quà Neoportus intrat altam,
Two Cowes full oppoſite there ſtand,
At Weſt and Eaſt, in all mens ſight:
Then flaſhen fire from either hand,
Where Newport, entreth Iſle of Wight.

Alſo on the North-Eaſt ſide Sandham Caſtle, furniſhed as the reſt, with great ordnance. Neither are there wanting for the defence of this Iſle naturall fences. For, encircled it is with a continuall ridge and raunge as it were of craggy clifts; there are under the waters likewiſe hidden ſtones: and every where there lie againſt it, bankes and rockes perilous for ſailers: but the moſt dangerous of all the reſt are the Needles, ſo called becauſe they are ſo ſharpe, and the Shingles; which ſtand forth againſt the Weſt angle of the Iſle: as alſo the Owers and Mixon that lie before the Eaſt. Beſides theſe, The Brambles, which are Shelves and perilous for Sailers, in the North-coaſt. Moreover if there be any place that ſeemeth open and meete for a landing place, the ſame by an old order and cuſtome among them is piled with ſtrong ſtakes driven and pitched deepe into the ground.

The Inhabitants. But verily this Iſle is neither with theſe rockes, nor with thoſe fortreſſes above ſaid ſo well fenced, as with the very Inhabitants themſelves, who naturally being moſt warlike, bold, and adventurous, are through the diligence and care of the Captaine of the Iſle, confirmed ſo by continuall exerciſe in ſtrength and militarie diſcipline, that they exactly know before hand, (what accidents of ſervice ſoever may happen in warre) namely with their peeces to ſhoot point-blanke and not miſſe the marke, to keepe their rankes, to march orderly, and in ray, to caſt their ſquadrons if need be cloſe into a ring, or to diſplay and ſpred the ſame at large, to take paines, to runne, and ride, to endure both Sunne and duſt, and fully to performe whatſoever warfare doth

A doth require. Of theſe ſouldiers thus trained the Iſle it ſelfe is able to bring forth into the field 4000. and at the inſtant of all aſſaies appointed there bee three thouſand more of moſt expert and practiſed ſervitours out of Hampſhire, and two thouſand beſide out of Wilſhire, to bee ever preſt, and in readineſſe for the defence of the Iſle. And to the end that all hoſtile forces whatſoever might bee withſtood more ſpeedily, and with greater facilitie, the whole countrey is divided into eleven parts: and every of them hath their ſeverall Centoner, as one would ſay, Centurion, their Vintons alſo, leaders as it were, of twenty, their great pieces of Ordnance, their Sentinels and warders. Who keepe watch and ward at the Beacons ſtanding on the higher grounds:
B their Poſts alſo, or runners, whom by an old name growne almoſt out of uſe, they terme ſtill Hoblers, who preſently give intelligence of all occurrents to the Captaine and Governour of the Iſle.

The firſt that brought it in ſubjection to the Romans, was Veſpatian, whiles he ſerved as a private perſon under Claudius Caſar: For, thus writeth Suetonius of him. Vnder the Emperour Claudius, by ſpeciall favour of Narciſſus, he was ſent into Germanie as Lieutenant of a Legion: and from thence being remooved into Britaine, he fought thirtie battailes with the enemie. Two moſt mightie nations, and above twentie townes, together with the Iſle of Wight, lying next to the ſaid Britaine hee ſubdued, under the conduct partly of A. Plautius a Conſular Lieutenant, and in part of Claudius himſelfe. For which ſervice he re-
C ceived triumphall ornaments, and in ſhort ſpace two ſacerdotall dignities, &c. At this Iſle alſo, the navie of Allectus; after he had uſurped the Imperiall dignitie in Britaine, lying in eſpiall and ambuſh, awaited the Romans comming againſt him, who notwithſtanding by the happy meanes of a miſt paſſed by their enemies undeſcried, gat to land, and ſet fire on their owne ſhips, that there might bee no refuge for them, to eſcape unto by flight. Lord Cerdic was the firſt Engliſh-Saxon that ſubdued it, and he granted it unto Stuffa, and Whitgar, who joyntly togither ſlew well-neare all the Britiſh Inhabitants (for few there were of them remaining) in Whitgaraburge a towne ſo called of his name, and now by contraction ſhortned into Caresbroke. After, Wolpher King of the Mercians reduced the Iſle of Wight under his obedience, and aſ-
D ſigned it over to Edelwalch King of the South-Saxons, together with the province of the Menvari, what time as hee became his Godfather, and anſwered for him at his Baptiſme. Then, Ceadwalla King of the Weſt-Saxons, when the ſaid Edelwalch was ſlaine, and Aruandus the petty King of the Iſland made away, annexed to it the Dominion, and in a tragicall, and lamentable maſſacre killed every mothers child almoſt of the inborne Inhabitants, and the fourth part of the Iſle, to wit as much land as contained 300. Hides, hee gave unto Biſhop Wilfrid. The firſt that inſtructed the Iſlanders in the knowledge of Chriſtian religion. But theſe matters Beda will informe you beſt, writing as he doth, in theſe words.

In Veſpatia. cap. 4.

Anno D. 530.

Bede lib. 4. cap. 13.

After then that Ceadwalla had obtained the kingdome of the Geviſſi, hee wonne alſo the E Iſle of Wight: which unto that time had beene wholly given to Idolatrie; and then endeavoured what he could to make a generall maſſacre and tragicall ſlaughter of all the native Inhabitants thereof, and in ſtead of them to plant there people of his owne province; binding himſelfe with a vow, although he was not yet regenerate and become Chriſtened, and in caſe he wonne the Iſle, he would give unto God a fourth part both of it and alſo of the whole booty. Which vow he ſo paied, as that he offered this Iſle, unto Wilfrid the Biſhop (who being of his nation hapened then to come thither & be preſent) to the uſe and glory of God. The meaſure of the ſame Iſland according to the Engliſh mens eſtimation is proportionable to one thouſand and two hundred hides of land. Whereupon the Biſhop had poſſeſſion given him of ſo much
F Land as roſe to three hundred Hides. But hee, commended that portion which hee received unto one of his Clarkes named Bernwin, and his ſiſters ſonne he was, giving unto him a prieſt named Hildila, for to miniſter unto all that were deſirous of ſalvation, the word and laver of life. Where I thinke it not good to paſſe over in ſilence, how, for the firſt fruits (as one would ſay) of thoſe who of the ſame Iſle were ſaved by their beleife, two young children brethren, of the Royall bloud, to wit, the ſonnes of Arvandus King of the Iſle, were by the eſpeciall favour of GOD crowned with martyrdome) For, when the enemies approached proached hard unto the Iſland, theſe children ſlipt ſecretly out of the Iſle, and were remoo- A ved into the province next adjoyning; where being brought to a place called Ad Lapidem, when they had committed themſelves upon truſt, to be hidden from the face of the King that was conquerour, betraied they were and commanded to be killed. Which when a certaine Abbat and Prieſt named Cynbreth heard, who not farre from thence had his monaſterie in a place named Reodford, that is the Ford of reed, hee came unto the King, who then in thoſe parts lay ſecretly at cure of thoſe wounds which hee had received whiles hee fought in the Iſle of Wight, and requeſted of him, that if there were no remedie but that the children muſt bee murthered, they might yet bee firſt taught the Sacraments of Chriſtian faith before their death. The King granted his petition, and hee then having catechiſed them in the B word of truth, and bathed them in the fount of ſalvation, aſſured them of their entrance into the everlaſting Kingdome of heaven. And ſo within a while after, when the executioner, called inſtantly for them, they joyfully ſuffered that temporall death of the body, by which they made no doubt of their paſſe unto the eternall life of their ſoules. In this order and manner therefore after all the Provinces of Britaine had embraced the faith of Chriſt, the Iſle of Wight alſo received the ſame: in which notwithſtanding for the calamitie and trouble of forraine ſubjection, no man tooke the degree of Miniſterie, and See Epiſcopall before Daniell, who at this day is the Biſhop of the Weſt Saxons and the Geviſſj. Thus much Beda.

Bede lib. 4. cap. 16.

From this time forward our writers for a great while have not one word of Wight C unto the yeare of our Lord, one thouſand ſixtie ſix, in which, Toſtie Hing Haralds brother with certaine men of warre, and Rovers ſhips out of Flanders in hatred of his brother invaded it, and after he had compelled the Iſlanders to pay him tribute, departed. Some few yeares after, as we read in the old booke of Careſ. broke Priorie, which Maſter Robert Glover Somerſet, ſhewed me, who carried as it were the Sunne light of ancient Genealogies and Pedigrees in his hand. Like as, ſaith this booke, William the Baſtard conquered England, even ſo William Fitz-Osbern his Mareſchal and Earle of Hereford, conquered the Iſle of Wight, and was the firſt Lord of Wight. Long after this, the Frenchmen in the yeare 1377. came ſuddenly at unawares under ſaile, invaded and ſpoiled it: and the ſame French in the yeare 1403. gave the like attempt, but in vaine: For valiantly D they were drived from landing even as in our fathers daies, when the French Gallies ſet one or two ſmall cottages on fire and went their way.

Lords of the Iſle of Wight.

As touching the Lords of this Iſle, after that William Fitz-Osbern was forth-with ſlaine in the warre of Flanders, and his ſonne Roger outlawed and driven unto exile, it fell into the Kings hands: and Henrie the Firſt, King of England gave it unto Richard Ridvers (otherwiſe called Redvers and de Ripariis) Earle of Deuſhire, and withall, the Fee or Inheritance of the Towne Chriſt-Church. Where, like as at Careſbroke, that Richard built certaine Fortreſſes: but Baldwin his ſonne, in the troubleſome time of King Stephen, when there were in England ſo many Tyrants, as there were Lords of Forts and Caſtles, who tooke upon them every one to ſtampe money E and challenged other rights of Regall Majeſtie, was by Stephen diſſeized and expelled from hence. Howbeit, his poſteritie recovered their ancient right, whoſe Genealogie wee have already put downe when wee treated of the Earles of Deuſhire.

Chriſt-Church.

But in the end, Iſabell widow to William de Fortibus, Earle of Albemarle and Holderneſſe, ſiſter and heire of Baldwin the laſt Earle of Devonſhire of that houſe, after much intreatie was overcome to make over by charter all her right and intereſt, and to ſettle it upon King Edward the Firſt, with the Manours of Chriſt-Church, and Fawkeshaul, &c. For foure thouſand Markes.

Ever ſince which time, the Kings of England held the Iſle, and Henry de Beauchamp Earle of Warwicke was by King Henrie the Sixth, unto whom hee was moſt F deere, crowned King of Wight, and afterwards nominated, The firſt or principall Earle of all England. But together with him this new and unuſuall title died and vaniſhed quite. Afterwards Richard Widevile Earle Rivers was by King Edward the fourth ſtiled Lord of the Iſle of Wight, & Sir Reginald Bray took it of King Henry the

Seventh

A Seventh, (with whom he was moſt inward) in Fee farme, for a rent charg'd, of three hundred markes yearely to be paid. Alſo, beſide theſe Lords, this Iſle had a noble Familie, named de Inſula, or Liſle, out of which in the raigne of King Edward the Second, one was ſummoned unto the Parliament by the name of Sir Iohn Liſle, of the Iſle of Wight.

ATTREBATII.

AS in * France, ſo alſo in Britaine, next adjoyning unto the Belgæ, are ATTREBATII, which name being now altogether out of uſe, the place which they inhabite is commonly called Barkſhire. For, let this ſtand as granted, (ſeeing Ceſar writeth the forrainers comming out of Gallia Belgica inhabited the ſea coaſts of Britaine, and retained ſtill the names of their countries) that theſe our ATTREBATII, ATTREBATES of Gaule: who as Ptolomee recordeth, held the maritime part of Gaule, lying upon the river Sein, and namely, that very countrey, which after a ſort lieth full oppoſite and over againſt our Attrebatii. It was not therefore without good cauſe, if Ceſar wrote, that Comius Attrebatenſis was of great authority in theſe countries, namely among his owne countrimen; and that after hee was by Ceſar vanquiſhed, he fled hither: what time, as Frontinus writeth, whiles his ſhips were grounded upon a ſhelfe, he commanded his ſailes to be hoiſed up, and ſo diſappointed Ceſar (who purſued him) of his purpoſe: who kenning a farre of, his full ſailes, and ſuppoſing that with a good gale of forewind he ſailed away, gave over further purſuit. Whence theſe Attrebatii were ſo called, it reſteth doubtfull: For whereas ſome fetch the originall from Attrech, which in the old Gauls tongue they would have to ſignifie a land of Bread, I neither approve nor diſprove their opinion Sufficient it may be for us, to have ſhewed from whence they came into Britaine; as for the derivation of their name, let others ſearch into it.

BARKSHIRE.

THat countrie which we call Barkſhire, the late Latine writers terme Bercheria, and was ſomtime by the Engliſh Saxons named Beonnocrcýne. Which name Aſſerius Menevenſis deriveth from a certaine wood called Berroc where grew good ſtore of box: others from a naked, or bare oake (for ſo much the name Beroke it ſelfe importeh) unto which, the Inhabitants in dangers and troublefome times of the commonwealth were wont in old time to reſort, there to conſult about their publike affaires. The North part hereof the river Iſis which afterwards is called Tamiſis, that is, the Tamis, running with a winding channell full of reaches, but carrying a very gentle ſtreame, doth pleaſantly water it, and firſt ſevereth it from Oxfordſhire, afterwards from Buckinghamſhire. The South ſide, where it beareth toward Hantſhire, the river Kenet cutteth through, untill it runnes into the Tamis. In the Weſt, where it bordereth upon Wiltſhire and carrieth the greateſt breadth, as alſo in the middle part, rich it is of it ſelfe and full of commodities, yeelding corne in plenty; eſpecially where it falleth lower to a valley: which I wotte not from what ſhape of a white horſe imagined to appeare in a whitiſh chalky hill, they terme, The vale of Whitehorſe. As for the Eaſt part that confineth with Surrie, it groweth very barraine, or at leaſt wiſe the ſoile is leſſe fertile, as ſtanding upon forreſts and woods that take up a great ground in length and breadth.

Aſſerius.

In the Weſt march thereof neere unto * Iſis, ſtandeth Farendon, ſeated high: famous now, for a mercate there kept, but in times paſt, for a certaine Fort, which Robert Earle of Gloceſter built againſt King Stephen, who notwithſtanding wonne it with bloudy aſſaults, and laid it ſo levell with the ground, that now it is not to bee ſeene. But the plot of ground whereon it ſtood, as we finde in the Chronicle of Waverley Abbay, King Iohn in the yeere of our Lord 1202. prevented by divine inſpiration granted with all the appurtenances to the building of an Abbay for the Ciſtercians order.

* Ouze.

Farendon.

Guil. New brigenſis.

From hence the river having with a great turning compaſſe after much wreſtling, gotten out towards the North, paſſeth a long hard by many villages of ſmall reckoning till at length with a returne, and diſporting it ſelfe with winding branches and diviſions, he commeth to Abbendon, a proper towne, and populous: called at firſt by the Engliſh Saxons Sheoverham, then Abbandune, no doubt, of the Abbay, rather then of one Abben I wote not what Iriſh Eremite, as ſome have written. A place this was (as we finde in an old booke of Abbendon) upon the plaine of an hill very faire and delectable to ſee too a little beyond the town which now is called Suniggewelle, betweene two moſt pleaſant rivelets, which encloſing within them the place it ſelfe (as it were a certaine nooke) yeeld a delightſome ſight to the beholders, and a meete ſuccour to the Inhabitants. The very ſame was in times paſt called Sheoveſham, a Citie famous, goodly to behold, full of riches, compaſſed about with moſt plentuous fields, with greene medowes, ſpatious paſtures, and flockes of cattell ſpinning forth milke abundantly. Heere was the Kings ſeat: hither reſorted and aſſembled the people, whenſoever there was any treaty about the chiefe, and higheſt affaires of the kingdome. But ſo ſoone as Ciſſa King of the Weſt Saxons had built the Abbay, it beganne by little and little to lay downe the old name, and to be called Abbendon, and Abbington, that is, Abbay-towne.

Abbendune or Abington.

This Abbay had not long flouriſhed, when all of a ſodaine in a tempeſtuous fury of the Danes it was ſubverted; Yet ſoone after it was reared againe through the bounty of King Edgar, and afterwards by the meanes, & travaile of the Norman Abbats grew by little and little to ſuch magnificence, that among all the Abbaies of Britaine for riches, and ſtatelineſſe it would hardly give place to any. Which the very rubble and ruines at this day doe teſtifie. As for the towne, albeit along time it had a great ſtay of the Abbay, yet ſince the yeere of our ſalvation 1416. in which King Henrie the Fifth built Bridges over the River Iſis or Ouſe (as witneſſeth a verſe written in a window of Saint Helens Church there) and turned the Kings high way hither for to make a ſhorter paſſage, it beganne to bee frequented and traded ſo, that among all the townes of this ſhire, it goes for the chiefe, hath a Major in it, and maketh great gaine by that ſteeped barly ſprouting and chitting againe, which the Greekes terme Byne and wee Malt: and beſides, hath a Croſſe, of ſingular workemanſhip in the mids of their mercate place (which by report,) in the reigne of King Henrie the ſixth, the Brotherhood of Saint Croſſe inſtituted by him, did erect.

Hericus Quintus quarto fundaverat anno. Rex, pontem Burford ſuper undas, atq; Culhamford.

K. Henry of that name the fifth the fourth yeare of his reigne, both Burford Bridge and Culhamford, did found on River mayne.

As Ciſſa founded this monaſterie for Monkes: ſo Cilla (out of an old booke I ſpeake) the ſiſter of King Cedwalla built the Nunnerie at Helneſtowe neere the Tamis, where her ſelfe was Ladie Abbaſſe over the Virgins, who afterwards were tranſlated to Witham. And whiles the warre grew hote betweene Offa and Kinulphe, when a Caſtle was there built, the Nunnes retired themſelves out of the way. For, after that Kinulph was overthrowne, whatſoever lay under his juriſdiction from the towne of Wallengford in the South part, from Ichnildſtreete unto Eſſebury, and in the North ſide to the river Tamis, King Offa uſurped and ſeized into his owne hands.

Now, Aſhbury neere to White horſe hill.

Neere unto it, Northweſt lieth Lee, which by the daughter of a certaine worſhipfull Knight ſurnamed thereupon, de Lee, fell to the familie of Beſiles, and thereof it came to bee called Beſiles Lee: and from that houſe in right of marriage, to Richard Fetiplace: whoſe Progenitor Thomas brought ſome honor to his poſterity by matching with Beatrice the baſe daughter of Iohn the firſt, King of Portugall, and widdow to Gilbert Lord Talbot, of whom they are deſcended. But now, let us returne. Hard by Abendon, Ocke a little river that runneth by the South ſide of the towne, (over which in times paſt Sir Iohn of Saint Helenes, Knight, built a bridge,) gently falleth into * Iſis: This Ocke ſpringeth in that vale of Whitehorſe ſcarce a mile or two from Kingſton-Liſle, in olde time the poſſeſſion of Warin de Inſulâ, or Liſle, a noble Baron. From whom when as Sir Iohn Talbot the younger ſonne of that renowned warrior, Iohn Earle of Shrewsburie was deſcended by his mother, hee was created by King Henrie the Sixth Lord Liſle, like as Warin de Inſula in times paſt in regard of the poſſeſſion of this place, (as if that dignity were annexed thereto) and afterwards Vicount Liſle: by a Patent without any ſuch regard. This title through the gratious favor of Kings flouriſhed ſtill in his poſterity one after another ſucceſſively. For, breifly to knit up their ſucceſſion, When Sir Thomas Talbot ſonne of the ſaid Iohn departed this life without iſſue, beeing deadly ſhot into the mouth with an arrow in a skirmiſh defending his poſſeſſions againſt the Lord Barkley, Sir Edward Grey who had married his ſiſter, received the ſame at the hands of King Richard the third, and left it to Iohn his ſonne, and ſucceſſour. Whoſe onely daughter and heire King Henrie the Eighth aſſured to Sir Charles Brandon, and thereupon created him Vicount Liſle. But when as ſhee died in tender yeeres before the marriage was ſolemnized, hee alſo relinquiſhed that title. Which King Henrie afterward beſtowed upon Sir Arthur Plantagenet baſe ſonne to King Edward the fourth. Who had wedded Elizabeth ſiſter to Sir Iohn Grey Vicount Liſle, and widdow of Edmund Dudley. And when hee deceaſed without heires male, the ſaid King honoured therewith Sir Iohn Dudley ſonne of Edmund by the ſame Elizabeth Grey, who in the time of King Edward the ſixth was created Duke of Northumberland, and afterward attainted by Queene Marie. His ſonne Sir Ambroſe Dudley beeing reſtored in bloud, was by Queene Elizabeth on one and the ſelfe ſame day created Lord Liſle, and Earle of Warwicke, who ended his life iſſueleſſe. And now lately Sir Robert Sidney his ſiſters ſonne was honoured with the ſtile of Vicoun Liſle by King Iames, who had before created him (beeing Chamberlaine to the Queene his wife) Baron Sidney of Penſherſt.

Then runneth the river Ocke aforeſaid, betweene Puſey, which they that are named

A med de Puſey hold it yet by the horn from their anceſtors, as given unto them in ancient time by K. Canutus the Dane, and the two Dencheworths the one and the other; where flouriſhed for a long time two noble and auncient houſes, to wit, de Hide at the one, and Fetiplace at the other, which families may ſeeme to have ſprung out of one and the ſame ſtocke, conſidering they both beare one and the ſame coat of armes. Then entertaineth Ock a nameleſſe river, which iſſueth out of the ſame vale, at Wantage called in the Engliſh Saxon tongue Wanaƿinʒ, where ſome time there was a Manour houſe of the Kings, and the place wherein Aelfred that moſt noble and renowned King was borne and bred, which at his death he bequeathed to Alfrith. Long time
B after, it became a mercate towne by the meanes and helpe of Sir Fulke Fitzwarin that moſt warlike Knight, upon whom Roger Bigod Mareſchall of England had beſtowed it for his martiall proweſſe, and at this daie it acknowledgeth for Lords thereof the Bourchiers, Earles of Bath deſcended from the race of the Fitzwarins, of whoſe familie ſome were here buried.

Puſey. Denchworth. Wantage. Fitzwarin.

Iſis being departed once from Abbendon, ſtraight waies receiveth into it out of Oxfordſhire, the river Tame (of which elſewhere) and now by a compound word being called Tamiſis; firſt directeth his courſe to Sinodun an high hill, and fenced with a deepe trench, were ſtood, for certaine, in old time a fortreſſe of the Romanes: for, the ground being now broken up with the plough, yeeldeth otherwhiles to the C ploughmen, ſtore of Roman pieces of coine, as tokens of antiquitie. Under it at Bretwell, there was a Caſtle, (if it were not that upon this hill) which King Henry the Second wonne by force, a little before that he made peace with King Stephen. From hence Tamis, holdeth on his way to the chiefe Citie in times paſt of the Attrebatians, which Antonius termeth, GALLEVA of Attrebats, Ptolomee GALEVA, but both of them through the careleſſneſſe of the Scriveners name it wrong, for, GALLENA: and they likewiſe in their Greeke copies have thruſt upon us, Νάλλνα, for, Gallena, by tranſpoſition of letters. I have thought it was ſo named in the Britiſh tongue, as it were, Guall hen, that is, The old rampier or fort. Which name being ſtill kept, and [Ford] added thereto, which is a ſhallow place in the river,: the Engliſhmen in old
D time called it Guallenʒaforo, and Wallenʒaforo, and we at this day, ſhorter Wallengford. In King Edward the Confeſſors time, it was counted a Burgh), and contained (as we find in that Booke wherein K. William the Frſt, tooke the Survey of all England two hundred, threeſcore, and ſixteene Hages, that is to ſay, Houſes, yielding nine poundsde Gablo, and thoſe that dwelt there, did the King ſervice on horſebacke, or by water. Of thoſe Hages eight were deſtroyed for the Caſtle. In old time it was compaſſed about with walles, which, as men may ſee by their tract, tooke up a mile in circuit. It hath a Caſtle ſcituate upon the river, very large (I aſſure you) and ſtately, ſo fortified in times paſt, that the hope in it, (as impregnable and invincible) made divers over-bold and ſtout. For, when England burned (as a man may ſay) in a gene-
E rall flame of warres, we read, that it was by King Stephen belaied once or twiſe with ſieges, but all in vaine. The greatneſſe and magnificence thereof I much wondered at when I was young, and removed thither from Oxford (for a place it is now for the Students there of Chriſt Church, to retire unto) as having a double range of walles about it, and being compaſſed round likewiſe with a duple rampier and ditch: and in the midſt of it, there ſtandeth a tower to keepe, raiſed upon a mightie high mount: in the ſteepe aſcent whereof by ſteps, we ſaw a Well of an exceeding depth. The Inhabitants are verily perſwaded, that it was built by the Danes; but I ſhould rather judge, that ſomething was here erected by the Romans, and afterwards raſed by Saxons, and Danes, what time as Sueno the Dane, ranging and roving this way ſpoi-
F led, and harried the countrey. That it was at length reedified under King William the firſt, we know aſſuredly by Domeſday book, ſeeing that it yeeldeth record (as even now I noted) of eight Hages or Houſes deſtroyed for the Caſtle. Yet William Gemeticenſis makes no mention of this Caſtle, when he writeth, that William of Normandie having defeited Harold, led his armie forthwith to this citie (ſo he termeth it) and after he had paſſed over the Tamis at the ford, pitched his tents heere before hee came to London. At which time Wigod an Englishman was Lord of Wallengford, A Records of Wallengford. who had one onely daughter given in marriage to Robert D'Oyley, of whom he begat Mawd his sole heire, first wedded to Miles Crispin, and after his death, through the goodnesse and favour of K. Henrie the first, married unto Brient, called Fitz Count, Filius comitis. Who being brought up in warlike feates, and taking part with Mawde the Empresse, most manfully defended this Castle against King Stephen, who had raised a fort just over against it at Craumesh: and he made it good, untill that peace so much wished of all England, was concluded in this place: and that most grievous dissention about the Crowne, betweene K. Stephen, and Henrie the Second ended. For, then the love of God tooke such place in the hearts of the said Brient, and his wife, that they cast B of this fraile and transitorie world, and devoted themselves in religious life unto Christ: so was this Honour of Wallengford escheated into the Kings hand. Which

Of the honor of Wallengford, in Testa. Nevill in the Exchequer. appeareth out of an old Inquisition in the Exchequer, by these words. To his most beloved Lords, the King our soveraigne Lord, his Iustices, and Barons of the Exchequer, the Constable of Wallengford sendeth greeting. Know ye, that I have made diligent enquiry by the Knights of my Bayliwicke, according to a commandement of my Lord the King, directed unto me by the Sheriffe: and of the Inquisition thus made, this is the summe. Wigod of Wallengford, held the honour of Wallengford in King Harolds time, and afterwards in the daies of King William the First: He had by his wife a certaine daughter whom he gave in marriage to Robert D'Oyly. This Robert begat of her a daughter, named Mawd, who was C his heire. Miles Crispin espoused her, and had with her the honour aforesaid of Wallengford. After the decease of Miles, our soveraigne Lord King Henrie the first, bestowed the aforesaid Mawd upon Brient Fitz Count, who both tooke themselves to a religious life, and King Henrie the Second seized the honour into his hand, &c. Yet afterwards in the time of King Henrie the Third, it belonged to the Earles of Chester: and then to Richard King of the Romans, and Earle of Cornwall, who repaired it, and unto his sonne Edmond, who within the inner Court founded a Collegiate Chappell, who dying without issue, it fell againe to the Crowne, and was annexed to the Dukedome of Cornwall: since which time it hath by little and little decaied. And verily about the time when that most mortall Plague which followed the conjunction of Saturne and Mars D
A most grievous Pestilence. in Capricorne, reigned hotely throughout all Europe, in the yeare of our Lord 1348. This towne was so dispeopled by reason of continuall mortalitie there, that whereas before time it was passing well Inhabited, and had twelve Churches in it, it can shew now no more than one or two. But the cause of this desolation the Inhabitants lay rather upon the bridges of Abbindon and Dorchester, whereby London portway was turned from thence.

But Walter, brother to the ſaid Thomas, begat Edward Hungerford, father of that Walter, whom King Henrie the Eighth created Baron Hungerford of Heitesbury, and condemned him afterwards for a crime not to be ſpoken of: howbeit, Queene Marie reſtored his children unto all his eſtate, ſave onely the name and title of Barons. So the river paſſeth on to that old town Spinæ, wherof Antonine made mention: which retaining ſtill the name is at this day called Spene: but now in ſteed of a towne it is a very little village ſtanding ſcarce a mile off from Newbury a famous towne that aroſe and had beginning out of the ruins of it. For Newbury with us is as much to ſay, as the Newburgh, in reſpect no doubt, of that more ancient place of habitation which is quite decayed and gone, and hath left the name alſo in a peece of Newburie it ſelfe which is called Spinham Lands. And if nothing elſe, yet this verily might prove that Newburie ſprang out of Spine, becauſe the inhabitants of Newbury acknowledge the E village Spene as their mother, although in compariſon of Spene it be paſſing faire and goodly, as well for buildings as furniture: become rich alſo by clothing, and very well ſeated in a champian plaine, having the river Kenet to water it. This towne at the time that the Normans conquered England, fell to Ernulph de Heſdin Earle of Perch: whoſe ſucceſſour Thomas Earle of Perch, being ſlaine at the ſiege of Lincolne, the Biſhop of Chalons his heire ſold it unto William Mareſcall Earle of Pembroke, who alſo held the Manour of Hempſted hard by (whereof I have ſpoken) and his ſucceſſors alſo Mareſchals of England, untill that Roger Bigod for his obſtinacie loſt his honor and poſſeſſions both, which notwithſtanding by intreaty he obtained againe for his life time.

Kenet paſſeth on hence and taketh into him Lamborn a little river, which at the F head and ſpring thereof imparteth his name to a ſmall mercate towne, that in old time by vertue of King Aelfreds teſtament belonged unto his couſin Alfrith, and afterward to the Fitz Warens, who of King Henrie the Third obtained libertie of holding a mercate, but now appertaineth unto the Eſſexes, Knights: A familie that fetcheth their pedigree from William Eſſex Vnder-treaſurer of England under

From thence he runneth under Dennington, which others call Dunnington a little caſtle, but a fine and proper one, ſituate with a faire proſpect upon the brow of a prety hill full of groves, and which inwardly for the moſt part letteth in all the light. Built, they ſay, it was by Sir Richard de Abberbury Knight, who alſo under it founded for poore people a * Gods-houſe. Afterward, it was the reſidence of Chaucer, then of the Dela Poles, and in our fathers daies of Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolke.

Kenet having now finiſhed a long courſe, by Aldermaſton which King Henrie the Firſt gave unto Robert Achard: From whoſe poſterity by the Delamares it came at length in right of marriage to the Foſters a familie of Knights degree, falleth at the laſt into Tamis, preſently after it hath with his winding branches compaſſed a great part of Reading. This towne Reading, called in the Engliſh Saxon tongue Rheaðyge, of Rhea; that is, The River, or of the Britiſh word Redin, that ſignifieth Fearne, (which groweth heere in great plentie) excelleth at this day all other townes of this ſhire in faire ſtreets, and goodly houſes: for wealth alſo of the Townſmen, and their name in making of cloth, although it hath loſt the greateſt ornaments it had, to wit, a beautifull Church and a moſt ancient Caſtle. For this the Danes kept as their hold, (ſo Aſſerius writeth) when they made a rampier betweene Kenet and Tamis, and into this they retired themſelves for ſafety when at Inglefield (a village neere unto it, which gave name to an ancient familie) they were by King Aethelwolfe diſcomfited, and put to flight.

But King Henrie the Second ſo raſed it (becauſe it was a place of refuge for King Stephens followers) that nothing now remaineth of it but the bare name in the next ſtreet. Nigh whereunto, King Henrie the Firſt having plucked downe a little Nunnerie that Queene Alfrith had founded in former times, to make ſatisfaction for her wicked deeds, built for Monks a ſtately and ſumptuous Abbay, and enriched it with great revenewes. Which Prince, to ſpeake out of his very Charter of the foundation, Becauſe three Abbaies in the Realme of England were in old time for their ſinnes deſtroied, to wit, Reading, Chelſeie, and Leonminſter, which a long time were held in Lay mens hands: by the adviſe of the Biſhops, built a new Monaſterie of Reading and gave unto it Reading, Chelſeie, and Leonminſter. In this Abbay was the founder himſelfe King Henrie, buried with his wife both vailed and crowned for that ſhee had beene a Queene, and a profeſſed Nunne, and with them their daughter Mawde, as witneſſeth the private Hiſtorie of this place, although ſome report, that ſhe was enterred at Becc in Normandie. This Mawde as well as that Lacedemonian Ladie Lampido, whom Plinie maketh mention of, was a Kings daughter, a Kings wife, and a Kings mother: that is to ſay, daughter of this Henrie the Firſt, King of England, wife of Henrie the Fourth, Emperour of Almaine, and mother to Henrie the Second, King of England. Concerning which matter have you here a Diſtichon engraven on her tombe, and the ſame verily in my judgment conceived in ſome gracious aſpect of the Muſes.

The daughter, wife, the mother eke, of Henrie, lieth heere;
Much bleſt by birth, by marriage more, but moſt by iſſue deere.

And well might ſhe be counted greateſt by her iſſue: For, Henrie the Second her ſonne, as Iohn of Salisburie who lived in thoſe daies wrote; was the beſt and moſt vertuous King of Britaine, the moſt fortunate Duke of Normandie and Aquitain: and as well for valiant exploits, as for excellent vertues highly renowned. How courageous, how magnificent, how wiſe and modeſt he was even from his tender yeeres, envy it ſelfe can neither conceale nor diſſemble: ſeeing that his acts bee freſh and conſpicuous: ſeeing alſo, that he hath extended forward and held on in a continued traine, the titles of his vertue from the bounds of Britaine unto the marches of Spaine. And in another place of the ſame King, Henrie the Second the moſt mighty King that ever was of Britaine, ſhewed his

From the Pyrenean mountaines, ſaith hee, unto the Weſterne bounds, and furtheſt limits of the North Ocean, This our Alexander of the Weſt hath ſtretched forth his arme. For where there is a valiant and courageous minde, howſoever earth and land faile, victories cannot faile: well may there bee wanting matter of triumph, but triumphs will never bee wanting. How great an addition to his glorious titles and triumphs was Ireland? with how great valour and praiſe-worthy proweſſe pearced he through the very ſecrets and hidden places of the Ocean?* But lo heere an old verſe of his death, which briefely in one word containeth fully both all this, and alſo the renowne of his ſonne King Richard the firſt.

Mira cano, Sol occubuit, nox nulla ſequuta eſt.

A wonder great, the Sunne was ſet, and night there followed none.

For, ſo farre was King Richard his ſonne from bringing darkneſſe with him, that King Richard the firſt.
C with the beames of his victories atchieved in Cypres and Syria, he made our countrey of England moſt famous and renowned through the world. But theſe are things without our Element. Let us returne againe from perſons to places. This Monaſtery wherein that noble King Henrie the firſt was buried is now converted to bee the Kings houſe, which hath adjoyning unto it a very goodly ſtable ſtored to the full with princelike and moſt generous ſteeds. But as touching this place, liſten alſo to the Poet deſcribing the Tamis as he paſſeth heereby.

Scarce

Scarce halfe a mile from Reading, betwixt moſt greene and flowring medowes, A the Kenet is coupled with the Tamis, who now runneth with a broader ſtreame by Sunning. a ſmall village called Sunning, which a man would mervaile to have beene the See of eight Biſhops who had this ſhire & Wiltſhire for their Dioceſſe (yet our Hiſtories report as much) the ſame afterwards by Herman was tranſlated to Shirburne, and in the end to Salisburie, unto which Biſhopricke this place ſtill belongeth. Heereby falleth Ladden a ſmall water into the Tamis, and not farre off ſtandeth Laurents Wal- tham, where are to be ſeene the foote foundations of an old fort, and divers Romane coines often times digged up; and next to it Billingsbere the inhabitation of Sir Henry Nevill iſſued from the Lords Abergevenny. From Sunning the Tamis paſſeth B Biſham. by Biſtleham, now called ſhort, Biſham, at firſt a Lordſhip of the Knights Templars, then of the Montacutes, and amongſt them, William the firſt Earle of Salisburie of his familie founded a Priory, wherein, ſome ſay, hee was buried. Certes his wife the Grandiſon. daughter of the Lord Grandiſon was buried there, and in the Inſcription of her tombe it was ſpecified, that her father was deſcended out of Burgundie, coſin-german to the Emperour of Conſtantinople, the King of Hungary, and Duke of Baveire, and brought into England by Edmund Earle of Lancaſter. Now is the poſſeſſion of Sir Edward Hoby Knight, of me eſpecially to be obſerved, whoſe ſingular kindneſſe toward me the often conſideration thereof ſhall keepe ſo freſh, that it ſhall never vaniſh out of my remembrance. C

Tamis having now left Biſham behind it, fetcheth it ſelfe with a compaſſe about to a little towne named in the former ages Southe-alington afterward Maiden-hith, and at this day Maindenhead, of the ſuperſtitious worſhipping of I wote not what Britiſh Maidenhead. Maidens-head, one of thoſe eleven thouſand Virgins, who as they returned from Rome into their country with Vrſula their leader, ſuffered as Martyrs at Colein in Germanie, under that ſcourge of God, Attila. Neither is this towne of any antiquity: for, no longer agoe then in our great Grandfathers daies, there was a Ferry in a place ſomewhat higher, at Babhams end. But after they had built heere a bridge of timber piles, it beganne to flouriſh with Innes, and goe beyond her mother Bray hard by, which notwithſtanding is farre more ancient, as having given name to the whole D Hundred. This parcell of the ſhire, I have beene of opinion that the BIBROCI, who Bibroci. yeelded themſelves under Ceſars protection, inhabited in times paſt: And why ſhould I thinke otherwiſe? The reliques of them remaine yet moſt evidently in the name. For, BIBRACTE in France is now alſo drawen ſhorter into Bray: and not far from hence Cæſar paſſed over the Tamis with his armie, as I will ſhew in due place, what time as the people of that ſmall Canton put themſelves to the devotion of Cæſar. Certes, If a man ſhould hunt for theſe Bibroci elſewhere, he ſhould I beleeve, hardly find them.

Within this Hundred of the * Bibroci, Windeſore beareth a goodly ſhew: in Windeſore. the Saxon tongue, haply of the winding ſhore called Wyndlerhora for ſo it is named E
* Bray. downe in the Charter of King Edward the Confeſſour, who in this forme of words made a grant unto the Monks of Weſtminſter. To the praiſe of almighty God, I have granted as an endowment and a perpetuall Inheritance to the uſe and behoofe of thoſe that ſerve the Lord, Windle-ſhore with the appurtenances. And I have read nothing more ancient, concerning Windſore. But the Monks had not long held it in poſſeſſion, when William of Normandie by making an exchange drew it backe to himſelfe.
For in this tenure goeth his Charter. With the conſent and favour of the venerable Ab- bat of Weſtminſter, I have made a compoſition for Windleſor to be the Kings poſſeſsion, becauſe that place ſeemed profitable and commodious by reaſon of water hard adjoyning to it: and the wood fit for game, & many other particulars lying there meet & neceſſary for Kings: F yea, and a place very convenient to receive and entertaine the King: in lieu whereof I have granted to the Monks Wokendune and Ferings.

Surely a Princes ſeat cannot lightly have a more pleaſant ſite, For, from an high hill that riſeth with a gentle aſcent, it enjoyeth a moſt delightfull proſpect round about. Fore-right in the Front it overlooketh a vale lying out farre and wide, garniſhed

A garniſhed with corne-fields flouriſhing greene with medowes, decked with groves on either ſide, and watered with the moſt mild and calme river Tamis. Behind it ariſe hils every where, neither rough nor over-high, attired, as it were with woods and even dedicated as one would ſay by nature to hunting game. With the pleaſantnes of this place Princes were allured, very often to retire themſelves hither: and heere was Edward the Third that moſt puiſſant King borne to conquer France: who heere built new out of the ground a moſt ſtrong Caſtle in bigneſſe equall to a pretie Citie, fortified with ditches and bulwarks made of ſtone: and forthwith after he had ſubdued the French and Scots, held at one and the ſelfe ſame time Iohn King of France, and
B David King of Scotland priſoners together in the ſame. This Caſtle is divided into courts: the inner more toward the Eaſt, containeth in it the Kings pallace, than which for the order and contriving, there can be no building more lightſome, nor more magnificent. On the north ſide, where it looketh downe to the river, Q. Elizabeth adjoyned a moſt pleaſant Terrace, or open walking place. The utter baſe court hath at the very firſt entrance a moſt ſtately Church conſecrated by King Edward the Third unto the bleſſed Virgine Marie and to Saint George of Cappadocia: but brought unto that ſumptuous magnificence, which now we ſee it carrie, by King Edward the fourth, and Sir Reginald Bray.

Order of the Garter.

C In this place, king Edward the third, for to adorne martiall proweſſe, with honors, the guerdon of vertue, ordained that moſt noble order and ſociety of Knights, whom (as ſome report) for his owne garter given forth as ſignall of a battaile that ſped fortunately, hee called Knights of the Garter: who weare on their left legge ſomewhat under the knee a blew garter: carying this Impreſſe wrought with golden letters in French; HONY SOIT QVI MALY PENSE, and faſten the ſame with a buckle of gold as with the bond of a moſt inward ſociety, in token of concord and unity, that there might bee among them a certaine conſociation and communion of vertues. But others there be, that doe attribute it unto the garter of the Queene, or rather of Ioan Counteſſe of Salisburie, a Lady of incomparable beauty, which fell from her as D ſhee daunced, and the King tooke up from the floore: for, when a number of Nobles and Gentle men ſtanding by laughed thereat, he made anſwere againe, that ſhortly it would come to paſſe that garter ſhould be in high honour and eſtimation. This is the common and moſt received report: Neither need this ſeeme to be a baſe originall thereof, conſidering how, as one ſaith, Shame to him that evill thinketh.

Nobilitas ſub amore jacet.
Nobility lies under love.

There be alſo, that would have the invention of this order to be much more ancient; fathering it upon King Richard the firſt, and are verily perſwaded, that King Edward at length brought it into uſe againe: but how truely, I know not. Yet in E the verie booke of the firſt Inſtitution, which William Dethicke Garter, principall King of armes, a Gentleman moſt ſtudious in all ſuch things as concerne Honour, ſhewed unto me, thus we read. Richardo cum contra Turcas & Agarenos, &c. that is, when K. Richard warred upon the Turkes and Saracens, Cypres and Acon, and was wearie of ſo lingring delay, whiles the ſiege continued long in wonderfull care & anxiety, at length upon a divine inſpiration, by the comming in & apparition (as it was thought) of S. George, it came into his mind to draw upon the legs of certaine choiſe Knights of his a certaine Garter or tach of leather, ſuch onely as he had then readie at hand, whereby they being diſtinguiſhed, and put in minde of future glorie promiſed unto them, if they wonne the victorie, they might be ſtirred up, and provoked to performe their ſervice bravely, and fight more valiantly: in imitation of the Romans, who had ſuch varietie of Coronets, wherewith militarie men for divers and ſundry cauſes, were rewarded accordingly: to the end that by theſe
F inſtigations (as it were) cowardiſe being ſhaken of, the valour of mind and courage of heart might ariſe and ſhew it ſelfe more reſolute. But upon what occaſion ſoever it beganne, the mightieſt Princes of Chriſtendome, reputed it amongſt their greateſt honour to be choſen and admitted into this companie: and ſince the firſt inſtitution thereof, there have been alreadie received, and enrolled into this order, which conſiſteth of ſix six and twentie Knights, two and twentie Kings, or thereabout, besides our Kings of England, who are named Soveraignes thereof: to speake nothing of Dukes, and others of most high calling, verie many. And here I am willing to set downe their names that were first chosen into this order, and be commonly called, the Founders of the Order: for, their renowne is not to be abolished, who in those daies for stowt courage, and warlike prowesse, had few or no peeres, and were in that regard advanced to this honour.

On the left side of the Church, are the houses of the Custos, or Deane, and twelve Prebendaries. On the right side standeth an house, not unlike to the Græcians Prytaneum: wherein twelve aged militarie men, Gentlemen borne, are maintained: who wearing every day a red or skarlet kirtle, reaching down to there ankles, with an upper mantle of purple over it, are bound daily to be present at divine service, there to commend unto God in their prayers, the Knights of this Order. Betwixt the two Courts before said, there riseth up an high mount, on which is set a round tower: and hard by it ariseth another loftie tower, called Wincheſter tower, of William Wickham Bishop of Wincheſter, whom King Edward the Third made overseer of the worke, when he built the Castle. Some report, that the said Wickham, after he had built and finished this Tower, in a certaine inner wall, engraved these words, This made Wickham: which maner of speech in the English tongue, that seldome maketh distinction of cases, carrieth such a doubtfull construction, that uncertaine it is, whether he made these buildings, or the buildings made him. Hereof information was given to the King by some privie back-biters for to worke him a displeasure; and that in such termes, as if Wickham did arrogantly challenge to himselfe all the honour of the building. Which when the King tooke in verie evill part, and sharply rebuked him for it: he made this answer, That he had not arrogated, and ascribed to himselfe the praise of so sumptuous, and princely an ædifice, but accounted this building, and peece of worke to have beene the meanes of all his dignities and preferments: neither have I (quoth he) made this Castle, but this Castle hath made me, and from low estate raised me unto the Kings favour, unto wealth, and dignitie. Under the Castle toward the West and South, lieth the towne of good bignesse and populous withall, which from the time of King Edward the Third began to flourish: and the other which standeth farther of, and is now called, Old Windsore, fell by little and little to decay, In which, (whiles William the First raigned, as we read in his booke) *there were an hundred Hages, or houses, whereof two and twentie were * quit from Gable, out of the rest there went thirtie shillings.* No other memorable thing is here to be found, but Eton, which is hereto adjoyned by a wooden bridge over the Tamis, and in it a faire Colledge, and a famous Schoole of good literature, founded and built by King Henrie the Sixth: wherein, besides the Provost, Eight fellowes, and the singing Choristers, there are threescore Schollers, instructed in Grammar, and in due time preferred to the Universitie of Cambridge

And now the tour-ſupporting bankes, at Windſore mount on hie,
That with their loftie-headed tops reach to the cloudy kie.
Which when * he ſaw, and had withall greeted that learned Eaton,
Where Maſters too too rigorous, have ſchollers overbeaten.
His Sea-like head he lifting up in this wiſe gan to ſay;
Thy long diſcourſe (O Windſor) I wiſh thee now to ſtay,
Of high rais'd mounts, of temples tall that riſe with ſtately ſtaire,
Of yron-bound beames, of battlements, and pinnacles ſo faire:
Of gamefull parks, of meadowes freſh, ay-ſpring-like pleaſant fields,
Of goodly gardens clad with flowers, that holeſome Zephyrus yields,
Of nurſeries, gilt-marriage bowers, and ſumptuous tombes of Kings,
Relate no more, but make an end of all ſuch glorious things.
What though thou much renowned be, by many a Georgian Knight,
And Nobles clad in mantles rich, with coſtly garter dight,
Doe cauſe thy name to ſhine ſo much, and thence to thy great praiſe
Through out the world are ſpred abrode ſo bright and glittering raies,
That Burgundie deſpiſeth now his goodly Toiſon D'or,
And France of colars garriſht faire with cockles ſets no ſtore,
Nor Rhodes, with Alcal and Elba, regard the robes with Croſſe
Sightly beſet; ſo that they count their Orders all but droſſe, Compar'd with Knighthood this of thine, which onely beares the name;
Ceaſe now to joy, ceaſe now at length to wonder at the ſame.
All yeeld to one, what ev'r thou haſt in one is drowned all,
For greater glorie grow's to thee, and honour more doth fall,
In that there dwels upon my banke, and ſeated is in thee, Queene Elizabeth. Elizabeth (and therewith Tamis ſeeming to bow his knee,
And gently crouch, obeiſance made, and then he thus went on)
Elizabeth, of Engliſhmen ſole Goddeſſe, Saint alone.
Whoſe praiſe-worth vertues, if in verſe I now ſhould take in hand
For to comprize, on Meliboc an hill that high doth ſtand,
I might as eaſily ſet the Alps, or number all my ſand.
If ſome I would in ſilence paſſe, what ever I ſuppreſſe,
Will greater proove than all the reſt: If I my ſelfe addreſſe,
Her formoſt acts, and travailes old to count, I then ſhall find,
That thoſe of preſent times, to them will draw away my mind.
Say, that of juſtice I relate; more ſhin's her mercies lore;
Speake I of her victorious armes; unarm'd ſhe gained more.
That piety now flouriſheth, that England feares no warre,
That none rules law, but unto law all men obedient are,
That neighbour Scots be not enthral'd to Frenchmen rigorous,
That Iriſh wild doe now caſt of their faſhions barbarous,
That ſhag-hair'd Ulſter Kern, doth learne civility anew,
The praiſe and thanks is hers alone. What is not to her due?
Thoſe Goddeſſes that vices chaſe, and are beſeeming beſt
A Prince ſo rare, are ſeated all, and ſhrined in her breſt.
Religion Firſt, puts her in mind to worſhip God aright,

A And Iuſtice teacheth to preferre before all gaine, the right.
Prudence adviſeth naught to doe raſhly without fore-caſt.
Then Temperance perſwades to love all things both pure and chaſt.
And Conſtancie her reſolute mind doth ſettle firme and faſt.
Hence juſtly ſhe, A LVVAYS THE SAME, claimes and keepes to the laſt.
Who can diſcribe in * in waving verſe ſuch noble vertues all?
Praiſe-worthy parts ſhe hath alone, what all ye reckon ſhall.
Then happineſſe, long life and health, praiſe, love, may her betide,
So long as waves of mine ſhall laſt, or ſtreame and bankes abide;
B So long may ſhee, moſt bleſſed Prince, all Englands ſcepter ſway,
Let both my courſe, and her life end, in one and ſelfe-ſame day.

Queene Elizabeths Mot, or Empreſſe.

* Flowing or rolling.

The reſt of * Barkſhire which lieth Southward from Windſor, is ſhadowed with woods, and thickets, commonly called, the Forreſt of Windleſor, in which the townes and villages ſtand but thinne (whereof Ockingham is of greateſt name, by reaſon of the bigneſſe thereof, and trade of clothing:) but very full it is of game in everie place. Now, for as much as we have oftentimes made mention, and ſhall ſtill, of the Forreſts: what a Forreſt is, and the reaſon of that name, if you deſire to know, (but ſee you laugh not thereat) take it heere out of the blacke booke of the Exchequer.

* Or, the Atrebatii.

Windſor Forreſt.

Chaſes or Forreſts.

Forreſt, what it is, and whence ſo called.

C A Forreſt is a ſafe harbor, and abiding place of deere or beaſts, not of any whatſoever, but of wilde, and ſuch as delight in woods: not in every place, but in ſome certaine and meet for that purpoſe, and hereupon a forreſt hath the name, as one would ſay, Fereſta, that is, a ſtation of wild beaſts. And incredible it is how much ground the kings of England have ſuffered every where to lie untilled, and ſet a part for to empale & encloſe ſuch deere, or, as they uſe to ſay, have afforeſted. Neither can I think, that any thing elſe was the cauſe thereof, but onely the overmuch delight in hunting, or to maintaine the Kings houſhold (although ſome attribute it to the infrequencie of the people to inhabit the countrey) ſeeing that ſince the Danes were heere, they for a long time afforeſted more and more, and for the maintenance, and keeping of ſuch places ordained moſt ſtraight lawes, and an overſeer, whom they cal, Protoforeſtarius, that is, Chiefe forreſter, Protoforeſtarius.

D or Maſter of the Forreſts, who ſhould heare cauſes belonging unto Forreſts, and puniſh either by death or loſſe of limb, whoſoever killed Deere within any parke or chaſe. But Iohn of Sarisburie ſhal in his own words tell you theſe things briefely out of his Polycraticon; that which you may marvell more at, to lay grins for birds, to ſet ſnares to allure them with nooze or pipe, or by any waies laying whatſoever to entrap or take them, is oftentimes by vertue of an Edict, made a crime, and either amerced with forfeiture of goods, or puniſhed with loſſe of limbe and life. You have heard that the fowles of the aire, and fiſhes of the ſea are common: But theſe ywis belong unto the King, which the Forreſt Law taketh hold of, and claimeth whereſoever they flie. With-hold thy hand, forbeare and

E abſtaine leſt thou alſo bee puniſhed for treaſon, fall into the hunters hand as a prey. Husbandmen are debarred their fallow fields whiles Deere have libertie to ſtray abroad, and that their paſture may bee augmented, the poore farmer is abridged, and cut ſhort of his grounds. What is ſowne, planted, or graffed, they keepe from the husbandmen that bee tenants: both paſturage from heardmen, drovers and graziers, and Bee-hives they exclude from floury plots: yea, the very Bees themſelves are ſcarcely permitted to uſe their naturall libertie. Which courſes ſeeming too inhumane, were the occaſion otherwhiles of great troubles and uproares, ſo long, untill in the end by the riſing and revolt of the Barons, there was wreſted from King Henry the third, the Charter de Foreſta: wherin thoſe rigorous laws being made void he granted others more indifferent, whereunto they are bound even at this day, who dwell within compaſſe of the Forreſts. And from that time, Iuſtices of the Forreſts.

F two Iuſtices were appointed for theſe cauſes, whereof the one overſeeth all Forreſts on this ſide the river Trent, the other, all the reſt beyond Trent as farre as Scotland, with great authoritie. Throughout all this Province or county (as wee find in the Survey booke of England,) The Taine or Kings Knight, holding of him as Lord, whenſoever he died, left unto the King for a reliefe all his armour, one horſe with a ſaddle, and another without a ſaddle. And if he had either hounds or hawkes, they were tendred and preſented unto the King, that hee might take them if he would. When Gelt was given in the time of King Edward [the Confeſſour] generally throughout all Barkſhire, an Hide of Land yeilded three-pence halfe-penny before Chriſtmas, and as much at Whitſontide. Thus much of Barkſhire, which (as yet) hath given the title of Earle to no man.

Within the compaſſe of this ſhire, are pariſhes. 140.

THeſe Regions which hitherto we have travailed thorow, that is to ſay, of the Danmonij, Durotriges, Belgæ, and Attrebatij; what time as the Saxons bare Soveraigne rule in Britaine, fell to the Kingdome of the Weſt-Saxons, which they in their language, called, Wæſt-ſeaxanrice, and themſelves Geguÿriſr, of Cerdics Grandfather, who firſt erected this Kingdome. Whence they were termed Geviſſi, and by others alſo Viſi-Saxones, from their Weſt ſituation, like as the Weſterne Gothes, are named Viſi-Gothi. Theſe at the length in the beſt and flouriſhing time of the Empire, reduced the Engliſh Heptarchie into the Saxons Monarchie: which notwithſtanding afterward, through the lither cowardiſe of their Kings, quickly aged, and ſoone vaniſhed. So that herein, that may bee verified which we daily ſee. The race or iſſue of the moſt valiant men, and nobleſt Families, like as the of-ſpring of plants, hath their ſpringing up. their flowring and maturitie: and in the end begin to fade, and by little and little to die utterly.

The Kingdome of Weſt-Saxons.

REGNI.

NExt unto the Attrebatii Eaſtward, called the people in Latine REGNI, by Ptolomee PHrNOI, inhabited thoſe Regions which we at this day, doe commonly terme Surry, and South-ſex, with the Sea-coaſt of Hantſhire. As touching the Etymologie of this named, I will paſſe over my conceits in ſilence, becauſe peradventure they would carry no more truth with them, than if I ſhould thinke they were by Ptolomey, PHrNOI, for that it was Regnum, that is, a Kingdome, and the Romans permitted the people thereof to remaine under a regall government. For, in this tract it was, that as Tacitus writeth, certaine Cities according to an old Cuſtome of the people of Rome, were given to Cogidunus, a Britiſh King, that they might have even Kings alſo, as inſtruments to draw others into bondage and ſervitude. But this conjecture ſeemeth to my ſelfe not probable, and haply to others abſurd, I utterly reject: and willingly embrace the Saxon original of theſe latter names: to wit, that South-ſex, taketh denomination of the South-Saxons, and Suthrey of the South ſituation upon the River, for, no man may denie, that Suth-rey importeth ſo much, conſidering that Over-rhey, in the old Engliſh tongue, ſignifieth, Over, or beyond the river. Rhey:

SVRRIA, which Bede nameth Suthriona, commonly called Suthrey, and Surrey, and by the Saxons, of bordering South (upon the river, Suð-þea, for Suð, with them betokeneth the South, and þea a river or floud) from the Weſt, boundeth partly upon Barkſhire and Hantſhire, from the South upon Suſſex: and from the Eaſt on Kent: toward the North it is watered with the River Tamis, and by it divided from Middleſex. A country it is not very large, yet wealthy enough, where it beareth upon Tamis, and lieth as a plaine and champion country: it yieldeth corne meetely wel, and forrage abundantly, eſpecially towards the South, where a continuall valley falling lowe by little and little, called in times paſt Holmeſdale of the woods therein, runneth downe very pleaſant to behold, by reaſon of the delectable variety of groves, fields, and medowes. On each ſide there be prety hills riſing up a great way along in the country, parkes every where repleniſhed with Deere, rivers alſo full of fiſh: whereby it affordeth for pleaſure faire game of hunting, and as delightſome fiſhing. Likened it is by ſome unto a courſe freeze garment with a green guard, or to a cloath of a great ſpinning and thin woven, with a greene liſt about it, for that the inner part is but baraine, the outward edge or skirt more fertill. In my perambulation through this ſhire, I will follow the Tamis and the rivers running into it as guides of my journey: ſo ſhall I be ſure to omit no memorable thing, ſeeing that the places which are of greater marke and antiquitie doe all a-butte upon theſe rivers.

Chertſey.

The Tamis (that we may follow his courſe with the ſtreame, as it runneth downe) ſo ſoone as hee hath taken his leave of Barkſhire paſſeth hard by Chertſey, which Beda calleth the Iſle of Cerotus. Now ſcarce halfe an Iſland, unleſſe it bee by winter waters: wherein, as in a place ſevered from all intercourſe and commerce with men, Frithwald, as he calleth himſelfe in the charter of the foundation, a petty Prince or Regent of the Province of Surrey, under Woilpher King of the Mercians, and Erkenwald Biſhop of London in the firſt riſing of the Engliſh primitive Church, founded a little monaſterie, wherein for a time that moſt devout King Henry the ſixt lay interred, whom, being depoſed from his Regal dignitie, the houſe of Yorke to eſtabliſh their kingdome ſecurely, deprived alſo of his life, and here without any honour, buried him. But King Henry the Seventh afterwards having tranſlated his body to Windſor, and beſtowed it in a new tombe, ſolemnized his funeralls after a princely manner, and ſo much admired his Godly and holy vertues (for, hee was the lively patterne of Chriſtian piety and patience) that he dealt with Pope Iulius, to have him made a Saint. But the reaſon why this tooke no effect was the Popes covetouſneſſe, who demanded too great a ſumme of money for a Kings Canonization, as they terme it, ſo that hee might ſeeme ready to grant thoſe kind of honours not for the Princes holineſſe ſake, but for gold. A little beneath this, the river Wey runneth into Tamis, which flowing forth out of Hantſhire, ſo ſoone as it is come into Suthrey viſiteth Feornham, commonly termed Farnham, ſo named of much ferne growing in that place: which Ethelbald King of the Weſt Saxons to uſe his owne words *Gave unto the Biſhop and * Congregation of Wincheſter Church*. Here, about the yeare of our Lord 893. King Elfred with a ſmall power put to flight the Danes as they ſpoiled and harried the country: and afterwards when King Stephen, had granted leave to as many as ſided with him to build Caſtles, Henry of Bloys brother to King Stephen erected a ſpacious Caſtle upon an hill that overtopped the towne: which being a place of refuge for rebellious and ſeditious perſons, King Henry the Third caſt it downe: howbeit the Biſhops of Wincheſter, unto whom it belonged built it up againe. And not farre from hence, at Waverley, 666.

A William Giffard Biſhop of Wincheſter founded an Abbey for Monkes of the Ciſtercian order commonly called, White Monkes. Which Abbey being a grand child as they termed it from Ciſterce in Burgundy, was ſo fruitfull here in England that it was mother to the Abbeies of Gerondon, Ford, Tame, Cumb, and grandmother to Bordeſley, Bidleſden, Bruer, Bindon, and Dunkeſwell. For ſo religious orders were wont to keepe in pedegree manner the propagation of their Orders, as a deduction of Colonies out of them. From thence, Wey holding on his courſe by Godelming, which King Elfred bequeathed unto Ethelwald his brothers ſonne, not farre from the Manour of Cateſhull, which Hamon of Gatton held to bee the Mareſhall of harB lots when the King came into thoſe parts: not farre from Loſeley, where wee ſaw a large faire houſe belonging to the family of the Mores, knights, within a parke; it commeth to Guilford, in the Saxon tongne Gulde-ford, and in ſome copies, written Gegldford. A mercate towne it is now well frequented, and full of faire Innes, but in old time it was a royall manſion of the Engliſh Saxon Kings, which alſo that noble Ethelwald held as a legacie from his Uncle by the fathers ſide. The King hath now thereby a decaying houſe, and not farre from the river are to be ſeene the broken walles of an old large Caſtle. But in the midſt of the towne there is a Church, the weſt end whereof made of arched worke, and embowed over head ſeemeth to bee very ancient. Heere, as it is to bee ſeene in William the firſt his booke, the King had
C ſeventy five Hages, that is, houſes, wherein remained one hundred ſeventy and five men. But for nothing it is ſo famous, as for the treacherie, and crueltie of Goodwin Earle of Kent, who in the yeare of Chriſt 1036. When Elfrid King Etheldreds ſon, and heire apparent to the Crowne of England came out of Normandie to claime his right, entertained him with faithfull promiſe of ſafety, but forthwith hardly entreated him contrary to his word: For, ſodainly in the dead of the night, hee ſurpriſed and put to death in this place ſixe hundred Normans, who had accompanied the young Prince, by tithing them, as our Writers report. Neither ſlew hee every tenth man of them drawne by lot according to the old militarie cuſtome, but even as hee had killed nine, he let the tenth man goe by: and even theſe tenth men thus reſerved
D hee went over againe, and moſt cruelly retithed them. As for Elfred himſelfe hee delivered him into the hands of Harold the Dane, who after hee had pulled both eies out of his head, over-layed him with irons, and kept him in cloſe priſon, even unto his dying day.

Wey beeing paſſed from hence with a long courſe Northward, ſheweth nothing memorable beſides Sutton, the reſidence of the Weſtons an ancient family of Knights degree bettered by an heire of T. Camel, Oking, where King Henry the ſeventh repaired and enlarged the Manour houſe beeing the inheritance of the Lady Margaret Counteſſe of Richmont his mother, who lived there in her later time, Newark ſometime a ſmall Priory invironed with divided ſtreames: Pyriford, where
E in our remembrance Edward Earle of Lincolne Lord Clinton, and Admirall of England built him an houſe; and Ockham hard by, where that great Philoſopher and father of the Nominals William de Ockham was borne and whereof hee tooke that name: as of the next village Ripley, G. de Ripley a ringleader of our Alchimiſts, and a myſticall impoſtor. But where this Wey is diſcharged into Tamis at a double mouth, Otelands a proper houſe of the Kings offereth it ſelfe to bee ſeene within a parke: neere unto which, Cæſar paſſed over Tamis into the borders of Caſſivelannus. For, this was the onely place where a man might in times paſt goe over the Tamis on foote and that hardly too, which the Britaines themſelves improvidently bewraied unto Cæſar. For, on the other ſide of the river, there was a great power
F of the Britaines well appointed and in readineſſe: and the very banke it ſelfe was fenced with ſharpe ſtakes faſtned affront againſt the enemie, and others of the ſame ſort pitched downe in the channell, ſtucke covered with the river. The tokens whereof, ſaith Beda, Are ſeene this day, and it ſeemeth to the beholders that every one of them carrying the thickneſſe of a mans thigh and covered over with lead, ſtucke unmoveable, as being driven hard into the bottome of the river. But the Romans entred the river with ſuch force, when the water reached up to their verie chinnes, that the Britaines could not abide their violence, but left the banke and betooke themſelves to flight. In this thing, I cannot bee deceived, conſidering that the river heere is ſcarce ſixe foote deepe, the place at this day of thoſe ſtakes is called Coway-ſtakes, and Cæſar maketh the borders of Caſſivelanus where hee ſetteth downe his paſſage over the river to be about foureſcore Italian miles from the ſea which beateth upon the Eaſt-coaſt of Kent, where he landed: and at the very ſame diſtance is this paſſage of ours.

Coway-ſtakes.

Within ſome few miles from thence the river Mole, having from the South ſide paſſed through the whole country, haſteneth to joyne with the Tamis; but at length beeing letted by overthwart hils, maketh himſelfe a way under the ground in manner of mouldwarpe, like unto that famous river Anas in Spaine: whereof it may ſeeme it tooke name, ſeeing that creature living within the ground, is called alſo in Engliſh a Mole. But upon this river, there is not any thing of note, ſave onely a good way off from the ſpring and head of it, and neere unto an old port way of the Romans making which men call Stanyſtreet) there ſtands the towne Acles, commonly Ockley: ſo-named of Okes where Ethelwolph the ſonne of Egbert, who having beene profeſſeed in the holy Orders and releaſed by the Popes authority, when hee had poſſeſſion of his fathers kingdome by right of inheritance, joyned battaile with the Danes, fought with good ſucceſſe, and ſlew all the valianteſt men amongſt them: Yet did hee little, or no good to his native country, the Danes evermore renewing their forces ſtill as they were overthrowne, like unto that ſerpent Hydra. A little from the fountaines where this river ſpringeth, ſtandeth Gatton which now is ſcarce a ſmall village, though in times paſt it hath beene a famous towne. To prove the antiquitie thereof, it ſheweth Roman coines digged forth of the ground, and ſendeth unto the Parliament two Burgeſſes. Lower than it, is ſeated Rhie gat, (which if a man interpret according to our ancient language, is as much as the Rivers courſe), in a vale running out farre into the Eaſt, called Holmeſdale; the Inhabitants whereof, for that once or twice they vanquiſhed the Danes as they waſted the country, are wont in their owne praiſe to chaunt this Rythme.

The vale of Holmeſdall,
Never wonne, ne never ſhall.

This Rhie-gate carrying a greater ſhew for largeneſſe than faire buildings, hath on the South-ſide a Parke thicke ſette with faire groves, wherein the right Noble Charles, Earle of Nottingham, Baron of Effingham, and Lord Admirall of England, hath a houſe; where the Earles of Warren and Southrey had founded a prety Monaſterie. On the Eaſt-ſide, ſtandeth a Caſtle mounted aloft, now forlorne and for age ready to fall; built by the ſame Earles and of the vale wherein it ſtandeth, commonly called Holmecaſtle: under which I ſaw a wonderfull vault carried under the ground of arch-worke over head, hollowed with great labour out of a ſoft gritte and crombling ſtone, ſuch as the whole hill ſtandeth of. Theſe Earles of Warren, as wee finde in the Offices or inquiſitions held it in chiefe of the King * in their Baronie, † from the conqueſt of England. Hence runneth this river downe by Bechworth Caſtle, for which Sir Thomas Browne obtained of King Henry the Sixth the libertie of holding a Faire. For it is the habitation of the Brownes, Knights: out of which family ſince our grand-father can remember, when Sir Anthony Browne had married Lady Lucie the fourth daughter of Iohn Nevil Marqueſſe Mont-a-cute, Queene Mary honoured his ſonnes ſonne with the title of Vicount Mont-a-cute. Some few miles from hence Weſtward Effingham ſheweth it ſelfe, the poſſeſſion not long ſince of William Howard (ſon to that Noble Thomas Duke of Norfolke that triumphed over the Scots) who being created by Queene Mary Baron Howard of Effingham, & made Lord High-Admirall of England, was firſt Lord Chamberlain unto Queene Elizabeth of moſt happy memorie, and then Lord privie Seale: whoſe ſonne Charles now flouriſheth, Lord great Admirall of England, whom in the yeare of our

The Mole now being come as farre as Whitehill, whereon the Box tree groweth in great plenty, at the foote thereof hideth himſelfe, or rather is ſwallowed up, and thereof the place is called the Swallow: but after a mile or two neere unto Letherhed bridge boyling up and breaking forth, taketh joy to ſpring out againe. So that the Inhabitants of this tract may boaſt as well as the Spaniards, that they have a bridge which feedeth many flockes of ſheepe: For, this is a common by-word, moſt rife in the Spaniards mouthes, as touching the place where their river Anas, now called B Guadiana, hideth himſelfe for ten miles together. Thus our Mole riſing up a freſh haſteneth faire and ſoftly by Stoke Dabernoun ſo named of the ancient poſſeſſors the Dabernouns gentlemen of great good note, afterward by inheritance from them the poſſeſſion of the Lord Bray; and by Aeſher ſometimes a retyring place belonging to the Biſhops of Wincheſter. And then very neare Moleſey whereunto it giveth name, ſheddeth himſelfe into the Tamis.

After Tamis hath taken unto him the Mole, hee carrieth his ſtreame Northwardly and runneth faſt by Kingſtone, called in times paſt Moreford, as ſome will have it; a very good mercate towne for the bigneſſe, and well frequented; well knowne alſo in old time by reaſon of a Caſtle there belonging to the Clares Earles of Gloceſter. C Which towne had beginning from a little towne more ancient then it of the ſame name, ſtanding upon a flat ground and ſubject to the inundation of Tamis. In which when England was almoſt ruinated by the Daniſh warres, Athelſtan, Edwin, and Etheldred were crowned Kings upon an open ſtage in the Market place, and of theſe Kings heere crowned, it came to be named Kingſtone, as one would ſay, The Kings Towne. Tamis now turning his courſe directly Northward, viſiteth another place: which the Kings choſe for themſelves ſometimes to ſojourne at, which of the ſhining brightneſſe they call Shene: but now it is named Richmond, wherein, the moſt mighty Prince, King Edward the Third when he had lived ſufficiently both to glory and nature, died; with ſorrow that hee conceived for the death of that moſt valiant and Martiall D prince his ſonne, which ſorrow pierced ſo deepe, and ſtucke ſo neere him and all England beſide, that it farre exceeded all comfort. And verily at this time if ever elſe, England had a good cauſe to grieve: For, within one yeare after, it loſt the true praiſe of military proweſſe and of accompliſhed vertue: For, both of them by bearing their victorious armes throughout all France, ſtruke ſo great a terrour whereſoever they came, that as the father might moſt worthily with King Antiochus carrie the name of Thunder-bolt, ſo his ſonne with Pyrrhus deſerved to bee named the Eagle. Heere alſo departed Anne wife to King Richard the Second, ſiſter of the Emperour Wenzelaus, and daughter to the Emperour Charles the fourth, who firſt taught Engliſh women the manner of ſitting on horſebacke which now is uſed: whereas be- E fore time, they rode very unſeemely aſtride, like as men doe. Whoſe death alſo her paſſionate husband tooke ſo to the heart, that he altogether neglected the ſaid houſe, and could not abide it.

Richmond. Both the place and the village before the time of King Henry the Seventh called Shene.

Edward the Third.

Howbeit King Henry the Fifth readorned it with new buildings, and in Shene a pretty village hard by, he joyned thereto a little religious houſe of Carthuſian Monks, which he called, The houſe of Ieſu of Bethelem. But in the raigne of Henry the ſeventh, this Princely place was with a woefull ſudden fire conſumed almoſt to aſhes; Howbeit riſing up againe forthwith farre more beautifull and glorious as it were a Phœnix out of her owne aſhes, by the meanes of the ſame King Henry: it tooke this new name Richmond, of the title hee bare, being Earle of Richmond, before he obtained the F Crowne of England. Scarce had that Noble King Henry the Seventh finiſhed this new worke, when in this place he yeilded unto nature, and ended his life; through whoſe care, vigilancy, policy, and forecaſting wiſedome for time to come, the State and common-weale of England hath to this day ſtood eſtabliſhed and invincible. From hence likewiſe his ſonnes daughter Queene Elizabeth a moſt gracious Ladie ninetie and foure yeares after, having lived fully to the contentment of nature, (For, 70. yeare old ſhe was or much thereabout) when it pleaſed God to call her out of this world, was received into the ſacred and cœleſtiall ſociety. A Prince above her ſex of manly courage, and high conceit, who lively reſembled as well the royall qualities of her Grandfather, as ſhe did his princely preſence and countenance, the Worlds love, and joy of Britaine. And ſo farre was ſhe, a woman though ſhee were, from degenerating and growing unlike her noble Progenitors in that continued courſe of their vertues, that if ſhe ſurmounted them not, ſurely ſhe equalled them to the full. Well, poſteritie may one day hereafter be ſo thankefull as to yield heereto a gracious credit (neither doe I heere by way of flatterie ſet a falſe colour and gloſſe upon the truth) that a Virgin for the ſpace of fortie foure yeares, ſo ruled the royall Scepter, as that her ſubjects loved her, enemies feared her, and every one with admiration honored her, a thing in all foregoing ages of rare example. For, whoſe death England throughout, running all to teares, amid mones, and grones ſhould have lien forlorne in moſt piteous caſe comfortleſſe, had not preſently upon her departure out of this world, the moſt mild and gracious King Iames (on whom as the true and undoubted heire to her Crowne all mens minds were ſet, and eies fixed) with his ſacred and bright beames ſhone unto us, and thereby put us into moſt comfortable hope of endleſſe joy. Whom ſo long as we behold heere, wee beleeve not that ſhee is deceaſed. And why ſhould we once ſay that ſhe is deceaſed? whoſe vertues live ſtill immortall, and the memoriall of whoſe name conſecrated in mens hearts, and in eternitie of times, ſhall ſurvive for ever.

How farre the Tamis ebbeth and floweth.

Thus farre ſwelleth the Tamis with the acceſſe of the flowing tide of the ſea, about lx. Italian miles by water from his mouth. Neither to my knowledge is there any other river in all Europe, that for ſo many miles within land feeleth the violence of the Ocean forcing and ruſhing in upon it, and ſo driving backe and with-holding his waters, to the exceeding great commodity of the inhabitants bordering thereupon. Whither this commeth by reaſon that from hence he hath in manner no crooked turnings and winding reaches, but with a more ſtreight and direct channell carrieth his currant into the Eaſt, as being for the moſt part reſtrained, and kept in with higher bankes, and dilating himſelfe with a wider mouth than all other rivers, lyeth more expoſed and open to the Ocean, which by that moſt ſwift whirling about of the cœleſtiall Spheres from Eaſt to Weſt is forceably driven and carried that way (as ſometimes I have beene of opinion) let Philoſophers diſcuſſe, unto whom I willingly leave theſe matters and ſuch like to handle. Yet ſome few verſes as touching theſe places and this argument, have heere out of the Marriage betweene Tame and Iſis, if haply they may content your taſte:

Why Tamis ebbeth and floweth ſo far within Land.

Tamis heere by turnes alternative doth feele both ebbe, and flow
Of Sea, by courſe of wandring Moone that rules tide heere below.
As oft as ſhe with each eight point of heaven above doth meete,
Or holds the points full oppoſit, as lights doe change and fleete.
C He growes more full, and ſooner hath recourſe to flowing tide:
And then in pride of heart he ſaith. All rivers elſe beſide

His tide ſo juſt, unleſſe the Scheld, and Elb my brethren twaine.

About foure miles from the Tamis within the Country, Noneſuch a retiring place of the Princes putteth downe, and ſurpaſſeth all other houſes round about: which, the moſt magnificent Prince King Henry the Eighth, in a very healthfull place called Cuddington before, ſelected for his owne delight and eaſe, and built with ſo great ſumptuouſneſſe and rare workemanſhip, that it aſpireth to the very top of oſtentation for ſhew; ſo as a man may thinke, that all the skill of Architecture D is in this one piece of worke beſtowed, and heaped up together. So many ſtatues, and lively images there are in every place, ſo many wonders of abſolute workemanſhip, and workes ſeeming to contend with Romane antiquities, that moſt worthily it may have, and maintaine ſtill this name that it hath of [Noneſuch] according as Leland hath written of it: None-ſuch.

Hanc quia non habeant ſimilem laudare Britanni
Sæpè ſolent, Nulliq; parem, cognomine dicunt.
The Britans oft are wont to praiſe this place, For that through all
The Realme they cannot ſhew the like, and Noneſuch they it call.

As for the very houſe ſelfe, ſo invironed it is about with Parkes full of Deere, E ſuch daintie gardens and delicate orchards it hath, ſuch groves adorned with curious Arbors, ſo pretty quarters, beds, and Alleys, ſuch walkes ſo ſhadowed with trees, that Amenitie or Pleaſantneſſe it ſelfe may ſeeme to have choſen no other place but it: where ſhe might dwell together with healthfulneſſe. Yet Queene Mary made it over to Henry Fitz-Alan Earle of Arundell for other Lands: and he, when he had enlarged it with a Librarie paſſing well furniſhed, and other new buildings, paſſed over all his right when he died to the L. Lumley, who for his part ſpared no coſt, that it might be truely anſwerable to the name: and from him now is it returned againe by compoſitions and conveiances to the Crowne. Neere hereunto (and worth the noting it is) there is a vaine of potters earth highly commended, and therefore the F dearer ſold, for the making of thoſe crucibles and ſmall veſſels which Gold-ſmiths uſe in melting their gold.

Nor farre from hence the cleare rivelet Wandle in Latin * Vandalis, ſo full of the beſt Trouts, iſſueth forth from his head neare Caſhalton and Wodcot where by a tuft of trees upon an hill-top there are to bee ſeene manifeſt ſignes of a pretty towne, and diverſe wels built of flint ſtones: Concerning the populouſneſſe and wealth whereof * Vandalis. the neighbour Inhabitants report very much: This in my conceit was that Citie which Ptolomee called NOIOMAGVS, and the Emperour Antonine NOVIOMAGVS. Neither neede wee to seeke from elſe where proofe heereof, but from the correſpondencie of diſtance. For as the old Itinerary noteth, it is ten miles from London, and twenty eight from Vagniacj now Maidſton. Many a mile therefore went they out of the way that placed Noviomagus either at Buckingham, or at Guildford. This was a principall Citie of the REGNI not knowne to Marinus Tyrius a moſt ancient Geographer, whom Ptolomee taking upon him to cenſure, taxeth for that he had ſet NOVIOMAGVS of Britaine by Climate more North, and by account of miles more South than London. A Croidon. Wandle while it is yet ſmall receiveth his firſt increaſe by a rill ſpringing at Croidon, in times paſt called Cradiden: which ſtandeth under the hils is very well known, as well for the houſe of the Archbiſhops of Canterbury, unto whom it hath belonged now this long time; as for Char-coles which the towneſmen make good chaffer of: The inhabitants report, that in old time there ſtood an houſe of the Kings in the Weſt part of the towne neere unto Haling, where the husbandmen dig up otherwhiles rubble ſtone, which houſe the Archbiſhops having received it by gift from the King, tranſlated unto their owne neerer the river. And neere unto this, the right reverend father in God D. Iohn Whitgift Archbiſhop of Canterbury of moſt praiſe worthy Memory in his pious affection founded and endowed with living a very faire Hoſpitall for the reliefe of poore people, and a ſchoole for the furtherance of learning. As for that ſudden ſwelling water or Bourne which the common people report, to breake forth heere out of the ground, preſaging, I wote not how, either dearth of corne, or the peſtilence, may ſeeme not worthy once the naming, and yet the events ſometime enſuing hath procured it credit. Neere unto this place ſtands Beddington, wherein is to be ſeene a very faire houſe beautified with a delightfull ſhew of right pleaſant gardens and orchards, by Sir Francis Carew Knight: For, the ancient ſeat it is of the Carews, who being deſcended from the Carews of Moulesford (of whom alſo are come the Carews of Devonſhire) have for a long time flouriſhed in this country: but eſpecially ſince Sir Iames Carew matched in marriage with the daughter and one of the coheires of the Baron Hoo and Haſtings. To digreſſe a little from the river, Eaſtward from Croidon ſtandeth Addington now the habitation of Sir Oliff Leigh wherby is to be ſeene the ruble of a Caſtle, of Sir Robert Agvilon, and from him of the Lords Bardolph, who held certaine lands here in fee by Serianty to find in the Kings kitchin at the Coronation one to make a dainty diſh which they called Mapigernoun, and Dilgerunt. What that was I leave to the skilfull in ancient Cookerie, and returne to the river. Wandle increaſed with Croidon water paſſing by Morden, divideth it ſelfe to water Merton, in the old Engliſh tongue Mepedun, ſituate in a moſt fruitfull ſoile. A towne made famous in times paſt by the death of Kinulph King of the Weſt Saxons who was by a Clito, that is, a Prince of the bloud, ſlaine here in a ſmall cottage of an harlot upon whom hee was enamoured, and Clito himſelf by K. Kinulphs followers immediately ſtabbed, ſuffered condigne puniſhment for his diſloyall treachery. Now it ſheweth onely the ruines of a Monaſtery, that K. Henry the Firſt founded for blacke Chanons by the procurement of Gilbert High Sheriffe of Surry in the yeare 1127. which was famous for the Statute of Merton enacted here in the 21. of King Henrie the Third, and alſo for Water de Merton founder of Merton Colledge in Oxford borne and bred heere. Above Merton farther from the river is ſeated Wibandune, now commonly Wimbledon: where, when over much proſperitie had hatched civill broiles among the Engliſh Saxons; after the Britiſh warres were now ceaſed; Ethelbert King of Kent ſtruck up the firſt Alarme of civill warre againſt his owne country men: but Ceaulin King of the Weſt Saxons diſcomfited him in this place with a mightie great ſlaughter and loſſe of his men having ſlaine his principall leaders Oſlan and Kneben, of whom peradventure that entrenched rampier or fort which wee have heere ſeene of a round forme, is called Bensbury for Knebensburie. A But now, the greateſt ornament of this place is that goodly houſe ſo beautifull for building, and ſo delectable for faire proſpect and right pleaſant gardens, which Sir Thomas Cecill Knight, ſonne to that moſt prudent Counſellour of State Lord Burleygh, built in the yeare 1588. when the Spaniſh Armado made ſaile upon the coaſt of England.

Wandle now after a few miles entreth the Tamis, when it hath given name to Wandleſworth, betweene Putney the native ſoile of Thomas Cromwell one of the flowting-ſtocks of fortune, and Baterſey, ſometimes in the Saxon tongue called Paupp-jea, and in latine Patricii Inſula, that is, Patrickes Iſle: and, which now we ſeeke, Putney. See Earles of Eſſex.

B an houſe of the Kings termed Kennington, whereunto the Kings of England in old time were wont to retire themſelves, but now finde wee neither the name nor the rammell thereof. Then, is there Lambith or Lomehith, that is to ſay, a Lomy or clayiſh rode, or hith, famous in former times for the death of * Canutus the Hardie, King of England, who there amid his cups yielded up his vitall breath. For hee, beeing given wholly to banqueting and feaſting, cauſed royall dinners foure times every day, (as Henry of Huntingdon, reporteth) to be ſerved up for all his court, chooſing rather to have his invited gueſts, to ſend away whole diſhes untouched, than other commers unbidden to call for more viands to be upon his table. But now this place is of the greater name and more frequented by reaſon of the Archbi-

C ſhop of Canterburie his palace. For, Baldwine Archbiſhop of Canterbury about the yeare of Chriſt 1183. having made an exchange with the Biſhop of Rocheſter, purchaſed a manour in this place wherein hee began to build a palace for himſelfe and his ſucceſſours: which they by little and little encreaſed. But when they went about to erect a collegiat Church heere alſo, good GOD, what poſting was there to Rome with complaints and appeales, from the Monkes of Canterburie, how many fiery thunderbolts, menaces and cenſures were ſent out from the Biſhop of Rome againſt theſe Archbiſhops? For theſe Monkes were in bodily feare, leaſt this would bee their utter undoing, and a prejudice unto them in the Elections of the D Archbiſhops. Neither were theſe bluſtering ſtormes allaied, untill the ſaid Church newly begunne was laid levell with the ground. Adjoyning hard to this, is the moſt famous mercate towne and place of trade, in all this ſhire which at this day they call, The Burrough of Southwarke, in Saxon ſpeech Suðþeꝑke, which is the South- Southworke.

worke or building; becauſe it ſtandeth South over againſt London, the Suburbs whereof it may ſeeme in ſome ſort to bee: but ſo large it is and populous, that it gives place to few Cities of England, having beene as it were a corporation by it ſelfe, it had in our fathers daies Bayliffes, but in the reigne of King Edward the Sixth it was annexed to the Citie of London, and is at this day taken for a member as it were of it: and therefore, when wee are come to London, wee will ſpeake more at

E large thereof.

Beneath this Burrough, the Tamis forſaketh Surry, the Eaſt bound whereof paſ- Barons Saint Iohn of Lagham.

And his ſonne Thomas a great favourer of learning, and Lord Governour of Earles of Surrie, who alſo are called Earles of Warren.

Now are wee to reckon up the Earles of this ſhire, William Rufus King of England made William de Warrena, who had married his ſiſter, the firſt Earle of Surrey: For in that Charter of his, by which hee founded the Priory of Lewis, thus wee read: Donavi, &c. that is, I have given and granted, &c. For the life and health of my Lord King William who brought mee into England, and for the health of my Lady Queene Mawd, my wives mother: and for the life and health of my Lord King William her ſonne, after whoſe comming into England I made this charter, who alſo created me Earle of Surry, &c. whoſe ſonne William ſucceeded and married the daughter of Hugh Earle of Vermandois, whereupon his poſteritie (as ſome ſuppoſe) uſed the Armes of Vermandois, vz. Chequy Or and Azure. His ſonne VVilliam dying in the Holy-land about the yeare 1148. had iſſue, a daughter onely, who adorned firſt William, King Stephens ſonne, and afterward Hamelin the baſe ſonne of Gefferey Plantagenet Earle of Anjou, both her husbands, with the ſame title. But whereas her former husband died without iſſue, William her ſonne by Hamelin was Earle of Surry, whoſe poſterie aſſuming unto them the name of Warrens bare the ſame title. This William eſpouſed the eldeſt daughter, and a coheire of William Mareſcall Earle of Pembroch, the widow of Hugh Bigod, who bare unto him Iohn, who ſlew Alan de la Zouch, in preſence of the Judges of the Realme. This Iohn, of Alice the daughter of Hugh le Brune, halfe ſiſter by the mothers ſide of King Henry the third, begat William, who died before his father: and hee of Ioan Vere the Earle of Oxfords daughter begat Iohn Poſthumus, borne after his deceaſe, and the laſt Earle of this houſe, who was ſtiled, as I have ſeene in the circumſcription of his ſeale, Earle of Warren, of Surry and of Strathern in Scotland, Lord of Bromfield and of Yale, and Count-palatine. But hee dying without lawfull iſſue in the twelfth yeare of Edward the thirds raigne, Alice his ſiſter and heire wedded unto Edmund Earle of Arundell, by her marriage brought this honour of Surrey into the houſe of Arundells. For Richard their ſonne who married in the houſe of Lancaſter (after his father was wickedly beheaded for ſiding with his Soveraigne King Edward the Second, by the malignant envie of the Queene) was both Earle of Arundell and Surrey, and left both Earledomes to Richard his ſonne, who contrary-wiſe loſt his head for ſiding againſt his ſoveraigne King Richard the Second. But, Thomas his ſonne, to repaire his fathers diſhonour, loſt his life for his Prince and country in France leaving his ſiſters his heires for the lands not entailed, who were married to Thomas Mowbraie Duke of Norfolke, &c. to Sir Powland Lenthall, and Sir William Beauchampe, Lord of Abergeveny. After by the Mowbraies, the title of Surrey, came at length to the Howards. Howbeit, in the meane while after the execution of Richard Earle of Arundell, King Richard the Second beſtowed the title of Duke of Surry upon Thomas Holland Earle of Kent, which honour he enjoyed not long; For, while hee combined with others, by privie conſpiracies to reſtore the ſame King Richard to his libertie and kingdome, the conſpiracie was not carried ſo ſecretly, but contrary to his expectation brake forth and came to light: then fled hee, and by the people of Cirenceſter was intercepted and cut ſhorter by the head. After him Thomas Beaufort, Chancellour to the King, (if we give credit to Thomas Walſingham) bare this dignity. For, in the yeare of our Lord (as hee ſaith) 1410. The Lord Thomas Beaufort Earle of Surrey left this world. Now, let Walſingham in this point make good that which he writeth: for, in the Kings Records there is no ſuch thing found, but onely this, that Thomas Beaufort about that time was made Lord Chancellour. But certaine it is, and that out of the Records of the Kingdome, that King Henry the Sixth, in the nine and twentie yeare of his raigne, created Iohn Mowbray, the ſonne of Iohn Duke of Norfolke, Earle Warren and of Surry.

Earles of March in France.

And

A And Richard ſecond ſonne of King Edward the Fourth having married the heire of Mowbray, received all the titles due to the Mowbraies by creation from his father. Afterward King Richard the Third, having diſpatched the ſaid Richard and by impious cruell meanes uſurped the kingdome, that hee might by his benefits oblige unto him the houſe of the Howards, created in one, and the ſame day Iohn Lord Howard, Duke of Norfolke as next coſin and heire to the Mowbraies and his ſonne Thomas, Earle of Surrie: in whoſe of-ſpring this honour hath ever ſince beene reſplendent, and ſo continueth at this day.

SVSSEX.

VNder Suth-rey toward the South lieth ſtretched out in a great length Suth-ſex, which alſo in times paſt the Regni inhabited, in the Saxon tongue called Suð-ſex, & at this day Suſſex, which is as much to ſay, as the Region of the South Saxons, a word compounded of the ſite thereof Southward, and of the Saxons who in their Heptarchie placed here the ſecond kingdome. It lieth upon the Britiſh Ocean all Southward with a ſtreight ſhore (as it were) farre more in length than bredth. Howbeit it hath few harbours, by reaſon that the ſea is dangerous for ſhelves, and therefore rough, and troublous, the ſhore alſo it ſelfe full of rocks, and the South-weſt wind doth tyrannize thereon, caſting up beach infinitely. The ſea coaſt of this countrie, hath greene hils on it mounting to a greater height, called the Downes, which becauſe they ſtand upon a fat chalke or kinde of marle yeeldeth corne aboundantly.

Downes.

The middle tract, garniſhed with medowes, paſtures, corne-fields, and groves, maketh a very lovely ſhew. The hithermore and Northern ſide thereof, is ſhaded moſt pleaſantly with woods, like as in times paſt the whole country throughout, which by reaſon of the woods was hardly paſſable. For, the wood Andradſwald, in the Britiſh language Coid Andred, taking the name of Anderida the City next adjoyning, tooke up in this quarter, a hundred and twentie miles in length, and thirtie in bredth; memorable for the death of Sigebert King of Weſt Saxons, who being depoſed from his royall throne, was in this place ſtabbed by a Swineheard, and ſo died. Many pretty rivers it hath, but ſuch as ſpringing out of the North-ſide of the ſhire forthwith take their courſe to the Ocean, and therefore not able to beare any veſſell of burden.

Anderida wood.

Iron.

Full of iron mines it is in ſundry places, where for the making and fining whereof, there bee furnaces on every ſide, and a huge deale of wood is yearely ſpent, to which purpoſe divers brookes in many places are brought to runne in one channell, and ſundry medowes turned into pooles and waters, that they might bee of power ſufficient to drive hammer milles, which beating upon the iron, reſound all over the places adjoyning. And yet the iron here wrought, is not in every place of like goodneſſe, but generally more brittle than is the Spaniſh iron, whether it be by the nature, or tincture and temper thereof. Howbeit, commodious enough to the iron Maiſters who caſt much great ordnance thereof, and other things to their no ſmall gaine: Now whether it bee as gainefull and profitable to the common-wealth may bee doubted, but the age enſuing will bee better able to tell you. Neither want here glaſſe-houſes, but the Glaſſe there made, by reaſon of the matter or making, I wot not whether, is likewiſe nothing ſo pure and cleare, and therefore uſed of the common ſort onely.

Glaſſes.

This whole region throughout, after the civill manner of partition is divided into ſixe parts, which by a peculiar name they call Rapes, to wit, of Chicheſter, Arundel, Brembre, Lewis, Pevenſey and Haſtings, every of which beſide their hundreds, hath a caſtle, river, and forreſt of their owne. But for as much as the limits within which they are bounded bee not ſo well knowne unto mee, I am determined to take my way along the ſhore from Weſt to Eaſt. For, the inner parts beſprinkled with villages, have in manner nothing therein worth relation. In the very confines of Hantſhire and this county, ſtandeth Boſenham, commonly called Boſcham, a place environed round about with woods and the ſea together; where (as Bede ſaith) Dicul the Scotiſh Monke had a verie ſmall Cell, and in it, five or ſixe religious men living poorely, in ſervice of the Lord, which many yeeres after was converted into a retyring place of eaſe, for King Harold. Whence hee when upon a time for his recrea-

A tion, hee made out with a little barke into the maine ſea, was with a contrary pirrie carried violently into Normandie, and there detained in hold, until he had by oth aſſured the Kingdome of England unto William of Normandie, after the death of King Edward the Confeſſor. Whereby he preſently drew upon himſelfe his owne ruine and upon England the danger of finall deſtruction. But, with what a crafty Amphibolie or Aequivocation, that ſubtill and captious catcher of ſyllables Goodwin Earle of Kent this Harolds father, caught this place, and how with a wily word-trap, hee deceived the Archbiſhop of Canterburie, Walter Mapæus, who lived not many yeares after ſhall out of his booke entituled Of Courters toies tell you in his owne verie words. This Boſeam underneath Chicheſter, ſaith hee, Goodwin ſaw and

Earle Goodwin doth æquivocate.

B had a minde to it: beeing accompanied therefore with a great traine of Gentlemen, hee comes ſmiling and jeſting unto the Archbiſhop of Canterburie, whoſe towne then it was, My Lord, ſaith he, Give you mee Boſeam? The Archbiſhop mervailing much what hee demaunded by that queſtion: I give you, anſwered, Boſeam. Then he forthwith, with that company of his Knights and Souldiours, fell downe, (as he had before taken order) at his feete, and kiſsing them with many thankes went backe to Boſeham, kept poſſeſſion of it as Lord by ſtrong hand, and having the Teſtimony of his friends and followers, praiſed in preſence of the King the Archbiſhop as Donor thereof, and ſo held it peaceably.* Afterwards as wee read in Teſta Nevilli (which was an Inquiſition of Lands made in King Iohns

A Cittie large enough, and walled about, built by Ciſſa a Saxon the ſecond King of this Province and of him ſo named. For Ciſſan-Ceaſter is nothing els, but the Cittie of Ciſſa: whoſe father Ælla, was the firſt Saxon that here erected a Kingdome. Yet was it before the conqueſt of ſmall or

D no name, ahd knowne onely by a monaſterie of Saint Peter and a little Nunnerie. But in the reigne of William the firſt, as wee read in the Domeſ-day-booke, there were in this, one hundred Hages, and this Cittie was in the hand of Earle Roger* and there are in the ſaid three ſcore Manſions houſes more than had beene before*, It paid fifteene pounds to the King, and ten to the Earle. After this, when during the reigne of the ſaid William the firſt, a decree was enacted, that Biſhops Sees ſhould bee tranſlated out of ſmall townes unto places of greater name and reſort, it was graced with the Biſhops reſidence which was before at Selſey, and beganne to flouriſh: not many yeares after Biſhop Raulfe built there a Cathedrall church, which before hee had fully finiſhed it, was ſodainely by miſhap of a fearce fire burnt downe. Yet by his endeavour and the bounteous liberality of King Henrie the firſt, it was raiſed

E up againe, and now, beſide a Biſhop, it hath alſo a Deane, a Chaunter, a Chancellor, a Treaſurer, two Archdeacons and thirty Prebendaries. And at the ſame time the verie Cittie it ſelfe beganne to flouriſh, and had growne indeede to a moſt wealthie eſtate, but that the haven is badde and ſomewhat to farre off, and in that regard not ſo commodious: which nevertheleſſe the Cittizens goe now in hand to make more convenient by digging of a new channell. It is walled about in a circular round forme. The Lavant a pretty riveret running hard by it, on the Weſt and South ſides. Foure gates it hath opening to the foure quarters of the world: from whence the ſtreets lead directly and croſſe themſelves in the mids,

F where the market is kept, and where Biſhop Robert Read, erected a faire ſtone market place, ſupported with pillars round about. As for the Caſtle that ſtood not farre from the North gate, it was in times paſt the habitation of the Earles of Arundell, who hereupon ſtiled themſelves, Earles of Chicheſter: but afterwards it became converted into an houſe of the Franciſcan Friers. All that ſpace which lieth betweene the Weſt and South gates, is taken up with the Cathedrall Church, the Biſhops palace, and the Deanes and Prebendaries houſes. All which about King Richard the First his time were burnt againe. And Seffride the ſecond Biſhop of that name re-edified all anew. The Church it ſelfe truly is not great, but very faire and neat, having a ſpire ſteeple of ſtone, riſing up paſſing high, and in the South Croſſe Iſle of the Church, of the one ſide is artificially portraied, and depainted the hiſtorie of the Churches foundation, with the Images of the Kings of England: on the other, the Images of all the Biſhops, as well of Selſey as of Chicheſter, at the charges of Robert Shirburne Biſhop, who greatly adorned and beautified this Church, and every where for his Empreſſe, ſet theſe Mots CREDITE OPERIBVS, that is, TRVST MEN ACCORDING TO THEIR DEEDS; and DILEXI DECOREM DOMVS TVAE DOMINE, that is, I HAVE LOVED (O LORD) THE BEAVTIE OF THY HOVSE. Neither hee onely adorned the Lords houſe, but repaired alſo the Biſhops houſes. But that great high tower which ſtandeth neere unto the weſt dore of the Church, was built by R. Riman, as the report goeth (when he was forbidden to erect a caſtle at Aplederham his habitation hard by) of thoſe ſtones, which for that Caſtle he had provided afore. Neere the haven of Chicheſter is W. Witering, where, as the monuments of the Church teſtifie, Ælla the firſt founder of the Kingdome of Suth-ſex arrived.

Selſey. Scales.

Selſey before ſaid, is ſomewhat lower in the Saxon tongue, Seal-reÿ, that is to ſay, The Iſle of Sea calves, (for theſe in our language wee call Scales, which alwaies ſeeke to Iſlands, and to the ſhore, for to bring forth their young, but now it is moſt famous for good cockles, and full Lobſters. A place (as Beda ſaith) compaſſed round about with the Sea, but onely in the Weſt ſide, where it hath an entrie into it by land, as broad as a ſlings caſt. It was reckoned by Survey taken, to containe fourſcore and ſeven Hides of Land, when Edilwalch King of this Province gave it to Wilfride Biſhop of Yorke, whiles hee was in exile: who firſt preached Chriſt unto this people, and as he writeth, not only by baptiſme ſaved from thraldome under the divell, two hundred and fiftie bond-men, but alſo by giving freedome, delivered them from the yoke of bondage under man. Afterwards K. Cedwalla, who vanquiſhed Edilwalch, founded here a Minſter, and beautified it with an Epiſcopall See, which by Stigand the two and twentieth Biſhop, was tranſlated to Chicheſter, where it now flouriſheth, and doth acknowledge Cedwalla to bee the founder. In this Iſle remaineth onely the dead carkaſſe, as it were, of that ancient little citie, wherein thoſe Biſhops ſat: and the ſame hidden quite with water at everie full ſea, but at a low water, evident, and plaine to be ſeene.

Here be the beſt Cockles.

Then maketh the ſhore way for a river, which out of Saint Leonards Forreſt runneth downe, firſt by Amberley, where William Read Biſhop of Chicheſter, in the raigne of Edward the third, built a caſtle for his ſucceſſours: and ſo from thence, by Arundell, ſeated on the hanging of an hill, a place greater in name than deede, and yet is not that name of great antiquitie: for before Ælfreds dayes, who bequeathed it by teſtament to Anthelme his brothers ſonne, I have not read it, ſo much as once named. Unleſſe perhaps I ſhould thinke, that Portus Adurni, is corruptly ſo called, by tranſpoſition of letters, for Portus Arundi. The reaſon of this name is fetched neither from that fabulous horſe of Sir Beavois of Southampton, nor of Charudum, a promontorie in Denmarke, as Goropius Becanus hath dreamed, but of the valley or dale, which lieth upon the river Arun, in caſe Arun bee the name of the river, as ſome have delivered, who thereupon named it in Latine, Aruntina vallis, that is, Arundale. But all the fame it hath, is of the Caſtle, that flouriſhed under the Saxon Empire, and which (as we read) preſently upon the comming in of the Normans Roger Montgomerie repaired, who thereupon was ſtiled, Earle of Arundell. For, a ſtately place it is, both by naturall ſituation, and alſo by mans hand verie ſtrong. But his ſonne Robert de Beliſmo, who ſucceeded his brother Hugh, being by King Henrie the Firſt proſcribed, loſt that, and all his other dignitie. For, when he had perfidiouſly raiſed warre againſt the King, he choſe this Caſtle for his ſureſt hold, whiles the warre laſted, and fortified the place with many munitions, but ſpedde no better than traitours uſe to doe. For, the Kings forces environing it everie way, at the laſt wonne it. When as Robert now had forfeited his eſtate, and was baniſhed, the King

A King gave this caſtle, and all his Lands beſides unto * Adeliza, daughter to Godfrey Barbatus of Lovaine, Duke of Loraine and Brabant, for her Dowrie; whom he tooke to be his ſecond wife. In whoſe commendation a certaine Engliſh man in that unlearned age, wrote theſe not unlearned verſes.

His ſonne Richard petitioned in Parliament to be reſtored to bloud, lands, and goods, for that his father was put to death not tried by his Peeres according to the law and great Charter of England: nevertheleſſe whereas the attaindor of him was confirmed by Parliament, hee was forced to amend his petition, and upon the amendment thereof, hee was reſtored by the Kings meere grace. his life ſerving King Henrie the Fifth valerouſly in France, and leaving his ſiſters his heires generall; Sir Iohn of Arundell Lord Maltravers his next coſin, and heire male obtained of King Henrie the ſixt the Earldome of Arundell, as we even now declared, and alſo was by the ſaid King for his good ſervice created Duke of Touraine. Of the ſucceeding Earles I find nothing memorable. Henrie Fitz Alan the eleventh and laſt Earle of that ſurname lived in our daies, in great honor as you ſhall ſee. After whom leaving no iſſue male Philip Howard his daughters ſonne ſucceeded, who not able to digeſt wrongs and hard meaſure offered unto him, by the cunning ſleights of ſome envious perſons, fell into the toile and net pitched for him, and being brought into extreame perill of his life, yeelded up his vitall breath in the Tower. But his ſonne Thomas a moſt honorable young man, (in whom a forward ſpirit and fervent love of vertue and glorie, moſt beſeeming his nobility, and the ſame tempered with true courteſie ſhineth very apparently) recovered his fathers dignities being reſtored by King Iames, and Parliament authoritie.

See before the Earles of Surrey.

Beſides the Caſtle and the Earles, Arundell hath nothing memorable: For, the Colledge built by the Earles, which there flouriſhed, becauſe the revenue or living is alienated and gone, now falleth to decay. Howbeit, in the Church are ſome monuments of Earles there enterred, but one above the reſt right beautifull, of Alabaſter, in which lieth in the mids of the Quire Earle Thomas, and Beatrice his wife, the daughter of Iohn King of Portugall. Neither muſt I overpaſſe this Inſcription ſo faire guilt, ſet up heere in the Honor of Henrie Fitz-Alan the laſt, Earle of this line, becauſe ſome there be whom liketh it well.

* As having married his daughter.

As for the river Arun, which ſpringing out of the North part of the Shire runneth heereby, it is encreaſed by many brooks falling into it from all ſides, but the cheefe of them is that which paſſeth beſide Cowdrey, a very goodly houſe of the Vicounts Montacute; which for building oweth much to the late Vicount, & formerly to Sir William Fitz-Williams, Earle of South-hampton. Here by is Midherſt that is Midlewood which braggeth of the Bohunes Lords thereof, who carried for their coate of armes a Croſſe azur in a field Or, and from Ingelricus de Bohun under King Henrie the firſt, flouriſhed unto King Henrie the ſeaventh his daies, who gave in marriage marriage the daughter and heire of Iohn Bohun unto Sir David Owen Knight, the baſe ſonne of Owen Theodor, with a rich inheritance. Theſe Bohuns (to note ſo much by the way for the antiquity of a word now growne out of uſe) were by inheritance for a good while the Kings Spigurnells, that is, The Sealers of his writs, which office together with Serjeancie of the Kings chappell, Iohn de Bohun the ſonne of Franco reſigned unto King Edward the Firſt, as wee reade in an old Charter made, as touching that matter. Then this river leaveth about a mile off Petworth which together with one and twenty Knights fees William de Albeney Earle of Arundell, beſtowed upon Ioſcelin of Lovaine the Brabander, brother to Queene Adeleza, and the younger ſonne of Godfrey Duke of Brabant, deſcended from the ſtocke of Charles the Great, what time as hee tooke to wife Agnes the onely daughter and heire of the Percies. Since which time, the poſterity of that Ioſceline, having aſſumed the name of Percie, (as I will els where ſhew) held it. A Familie, I aſſure you very ancient and right noble, which deriveth their pedigree from Charles the great more directly, and with a race of Anceſtors leſſe interrupted, than either the Dukes of Loraine Or of Guiſe that ſo highly vaunt themſelves thereupon. Ioſceline aforeſaid, as I have ſeene it in his Donations, uſed this title: Ioſcelin of Lovain, brother to Queene Adeliza, and Caſtellan of Arundell. And here about the Familie of Dautry, Or De alta ripa hath beene of right worſhipfull eſteeme, as on the other ſide of the river the name of Goring at Burton, who were acknowledged founders of Hardham Or Heredham a Priory of blacke Canons, a little off. Where this Arun meeteth with an other river of a deeper and bigger ſtreame, which ſpringeth neare Horſeham an indifferent mercat, which ſome ſuppoſe to have taken name from Horſa the brother of Hengiſt, who were the firſt leaders of the Engliſh Saxons into this iſle of Britaine. Thus Arun increaſed, with ſundry creekings, by Arundell before mentioned, holdeth on his courſe to the ſea.

As the ſhoare giveth backe from the mouth of Arun, inwardly is Michel-grove, that is, Great grove, the heire generall whereof ſo ſurnamed, was married to Ihon Shelley, whereby, with the profeſſion of the law, and a marriage with one of the coheires of Beknap the familie of Shelley was greatly enriched: Offington is not farre off well knowne by his ancient poſſeſſours the Weſts Barons de la Ware. This of the Weſts is a noble and ancient Familie, whoſe ſtate beeing bettered by marriage with the heires of * Cantlow of Hemſton and Fitz-Reginald Fitz Herbert, was adorned alſo with the title of Baron, by the heire generall of the Lord de la Ware. Hard by, there is a fort compaſſed about with a banke rudely caſt up, wherewith the Inhabitants are perſwaded that Cæſar entrenched and fortified his camp: But Ciſiburie the name of the place, doth plainely ſhew and teſtifie, that it was the worke of Ciſſa: who beeing of the Saxons line the ſecond King of this pety kingdome, after his father Aella, accompanied with his brother Cimen, and no ſmall power of the Saxons, at this ſhoare arrived and landed at Cimonſhore, a place ſo called of the ſaid Cimen, which now hath loſt the name: but that it was neere unto Wittering, the charter of the donation which King Cedwalla made unto the Church of Selſey, moſt evidently prooveth. Another fort likewiſe two miles from Ciſiburie is to bee ſeene, which they uſe to call Chenkburie.

Cimenſhore.

As you goe forward, ſtandeth neere unto the ſea, Broodwater, the Baronie of the Lords of Camois, who from the time of King Edward the Firſt, flouriſhed unto the daies of King Henrie the Sixt, what time the inheritance came by heires generall unto the Lewknors & Radmilds. Out of this familie (a thing neither in that age, nor in ours ever heard of (or exampled before) Sir Iohn Camois the ſon of the Lord Raulph Camois, of his owne free-will (the verie words theſe bee in effect, exemplified out of the Parliament Records) gave and demiſed his owne wife Margaret, daughter and heire of Iohn de Gaideſden unto Sir William Panell Knight, and unto the ſame William, gave granted, releaſed and quit claimed all the goods and chattels, which ſhe hath, or otherwiſe hereafter might have: and alſo whatſoever was in his hands of the foreſaid Margarets goods, and chattels with their appurtenances: ſo that neither he himſelfe, nor any man elſe in his name, might

A make claime, or challenge any intereſt, nor ought for ever, in the foreſaid Margaret from hence forth, or in the goods and chattels of the ſaid Margaret: Which is as much, as in one word they ſaid in old time, * Vt omnia ſua ſecum haberet, That ſhe ſhould have away with her all that was hers. By which graunt, when ſhee demanded her dowrie in the Manour of Torpull which had been the poſſeſſion of Sir Iohn Camois her firſt husband, there grew a memorable ſuite and controverſie in Law: but wherein ſhee was overthrowne and ſentence pronounced. That ſhe ought to have no dowrie from thence: upon a Statute made againſt women abſenting themſelves from their husbands, &c. The forme of a Bill of a kind of Divorcement, called Repudium.

B Theſe matters, I aſſure you, it goes againſt my ſtomacke to relate, but yet I ſee, it was not for nought that Pope Gregorie long ſince wrote unto Lanfranck Archbiſhop of Canterburie, How hee heard ſay, there were ſome among the Scots that not onely forſooke, but alſo ſold their wives, whereas in England they ſo gave and demiſed them.

Somewhat lower upon the ſhore appeareth Shoreham, in times paſt Scope-ham, which by little and little fell to bee but a village, at this day called Old Shoreham, and gave encreaſe to another towne of the ſame name, whereof the greater part alſo being drowned and made even with the ſea is no more to bee ſeene: and the Shoreham.

C commodiouſneſſe of the haven by reaſon of bankes and bars of ſand caſt up at the rivers mouth quite gone: whereas, in foregoing times it was wont to carrie ſhips with full ſaile as farre as to Brember, which is a good way from the ſea. This Brember was a caſtle ſometime of the Breoſes: For, King William the firſt gave it unto William de Breoſe, from whom thoſe Breoſes are deſcended, who were Lords of Gower and Brechnock: and from them alſo, both in this County and in Leiceſterſhire, are come the Families of the Shirleys, Knights. But now in ſtead of a Caſtle, there is nothing but an heape of rubble and ruines. A little from this Caſtle lieth Stening, a great mercate, and at certaine ſet daies much frequented, which in Aelfrids will, unleſſe I be deceived, is called Steningham, in latter times it had a Cell of Black-

D Monkes wherein was enſhrined S. Cudman an obſcure Saint, and viſited by pilgrimes with oblations.

That ancient place alſo, called Portvs Advrni, as it ſeemeth is ſcarce three miles from this mouth of the river: where, when the Saxons firſt troubled our ſea with their piracies, the Band called Exploratorum under the Roman Emperours kept their Station; but now it ſhould ſeeme to bee choked, and ſtopped up with huge heapes of beach gathered together. For, that this was Ederington a pretie village, which the ſaid Aelfred granted unto his younger ſonne, both the name remaining Edeington.

E in part, and alſo certaine cottages adjoyning now called Portſlade, that is, The way to the Haven, doe after a ſort perſwade: to ſay nothing, how eaſily they might land heere, the ſhore being ſo open and plaine. And for the ſame cauſe, our men in the reigne of King Henrie the Eighth, did heere eſpecially wait for the Frenchmens gallies all the while they hovered on our coaſts and upon the ſudden ſet one or two cottages on fire at Brighthelmſted, which our anceſtours the Saxons termed Bnigh-tealmep-tun, the very next road or harbour thereunto.

Some few miles from hence, there diſchargeth it ſelfe into the ſea a certaine river, that hath no name, ariſing out of S. Leonards forreſt neere unto Slaugham, the Slaugham.

habitation of the Coverts, who in King Henrie the third his daies flouriſhed in this quarter, with the degree of Knight-hood; thence by Cuckfield to Linfeld, where in former ages was a ſmall Nunnery; and ſo by Malling ſome-time a Manour appur-name of paſtures called by the Engliſh Saxons Leppa. This for frequencie of people and greatneſſe is reputed one of the chiefeſt townes of the County: Seated it is upon a riſing almoſt on every ſide: That it hath beene walled there are no apparant tokens. Southward it hath under it, as it were, a great ſuburb called South-over, another Weſtward, and beyond the river a third Eaſtward called Cliffe becauſe it is under a chalkie cliffe. In the time of the Engliſh Saxon government, when King Athelſtan made a Law that money ſhould not be coyned but in good townes, he appointed two minters, or coyners for this place. In the reigne of King Edward the Confeſſor it paid ſixe pounds and foure ſhillings * de Gablo et Theloneo. The King had there one hundred twenty ſeven Burgars. Their cuſtome and manner was this, If the King minded to ſend his ſouldiers to ſea, without them: of all them, whoſe lands ſoever they were, was collected twenty ſhillings, and all thoſe had they that in their ſhips kept armour. Who ſelleth his horſe within the Burgh giveth to the Provoſt one penny, and the buier, another. For an oxe or cow one halfe penny, in what place ſo ever he buieth within the Rape. He that ſhaddeth blood maketh amends for ſeven ſhillings. Hee that committeth adulterie or a rape, for eight ſhillings and foure pence, and the woman as much. The King hath the Adulterer, The Archbiſhop, the woman: when the mint or money is made new: every minter giveth twentie ſhillings. Of all theſe paiments two third parts went to the King, and one third part to the Earle. William de Warren the firſt Earle of Surrie built here a large Caſtle on the higheſt ground for moſt part with flint and chalke. In the bottom of the towne called Southover he founded to the honour and memory of Saint Pancrace a Priorie, and ſtored it with Cluniach Monkes, In regard of the holineſſe, religion, and charitie which he found in the Monaſterie of Clugni in Burgundie (for theſe be the words taken out of the very originall inſtrument of the foundation) Whiles going in pilgrimage together with his wife for religion, he turned in, and lodged there. But this is now turned into a dwelling houſe of the Earle of Dorſet. Howbeit there remaine ſtill in the towne ſixe Churches; amongſt which not farre from the Caſtle there ſtandeth one little one all deſolate, and beſet with briers and brambles: in the walles whereof are ingraven in arched worke certaine rude verſes in an old and over-worne character: which implie thus much, that one Magnus deſcended from the bloud roiall of the Danes, who imbraced a ſolitarie life, was there buried: But behold the verſes themſelves, imperfect though they be, and gaping as I may ſo ſay, with the very yawning joynts of the ſtones.

About 346. yeeres ſince this place became famous for the mortall and bloudie battaile betweene K. Henrie the third, and the Barons: in which, the proſperous beginning of the fight on the kings ſide, was the overthrow of the kings forces. For, whiles prince Edward the kings ſon, breaking by force through certain of the Barons troups, careleſly purſued the enemies over far, as making ſure account of the victory: the Barons having reinforced themſelves, giving a freſh charge, ſo diſcomfited, and put to flight the Kings armie, that they conſtrained the King to accept unequall conditions of peace, and to deliver his ſonne Prince Edward with others into their hands. 1263. The battaile of Lewes.

C From Lewis the river, as it deſcendeth, ſo ſwelleth, that the bottom cannot containe it, and therefore maketh a large mere, and is fed more full with a brooket falling from Laughton, a ſeat of Pelhams, a family of eſpeciall reſpect, by Gline that is in the Britiſh tongue, the vale, the habitation of Morleyes, whoſe antiquitie the name doth teſtifie. And afterward, albeit it gathereth it ſelfe into a channell, yet often times it overfloweth the low lands about it to no ſmall detriment. Not farre from the ſaid mere, Furle ſheweth it ſelfe a principall manſion of the Gages, who advanced their eſtate by the marriage of one of the heires of Saint Clare, Princes favour, and Court Offices. 232.

The ſhore next openeth it ſelfe at Cuckmere, which yet affordeth no commodious
D haven, though it be fed with a freſh, which inſulateth Michelham, where Gilbert de Aquila, founded a Priory for black Chanons. And then at Eaſt-bourn the ſhore ariſeth into ſo high a Promontory, called of the beach Beachy-points, and Beau-cliffe (for the faire ſhew being interchangeably compounded with rowe, of chalke and flint) that it is eſteemed the higheſt cliffe of all the South coaſt of England. As hitherto from Arundell, and beyond, the countrey along the coaſt: for a great breadth, mounteth up into high hilles, called the Downes, which for rich fertilitie giveth place to few valleys, and plaines: ſo now it falleth into ſuch a low levell and marſh, that the people think it hath been over-flowed by the ſea. They call it Pevenſey Marſh, of Pevenſey the next towne adjoyning, which lieth in the plaine ſomewhat within the land upon a
E ſmall river, which often times overlaieth the lands adjacent. In the old Engliſh Saxon Language, it was walled, Peopenrea, in the Norman ſpeech Pevenſell, now commonly, Pemſey: It hath had a meane haven, and a faire large caſtle, in the ruinous walles whereof, remaine great bricks, ſuch as the Britans uſed, which is ſome argument of the antiquitie thereof. It belonged in the Conquerours time to Robert Earle of Moriton, halfe brother by the mothers ſide to the Conquerour, and then had fiftie and ſix Burgeſſes. After the attainder of his Sonne William Earle of Moriton, it came to King Henrie the Firſt, by Eſcheat. In the compoſition betweene Stephen, and King Henrie the ſecond both towne, and caſtle with whatſoever Richard de Aquila, had F of the Honor of Pevenſey, which after his name, was called Honor de Aquila, and Baronia de Aquila, or of the Eagle, was aſſigned to William Sonne to K. Stephen. But he ſurrendred it with Norwich into King Henrie the Seconds hand, in the yeere 1158, when he reſtored to him all ſuch Lands as Stephen was ſeaſed of before hee uſurped the crowne of England. After ſome yeeres King Henrie the third, over-favouring forrainers granted the Honor de Aquila (which had fallen to the crowne by Eſcheat, for for that Gilbert de Aquila had paſſed into Normandie, againſt the Kings good will to Peter Earle of Savoy the Queenes uncle. But he fearing the envie of the Engliſh againſt forrainers relinquiſhed it to the King, and ſo at length it came to the Dutchy of Lancaſter. Inward from Pevenſey is ſeated Herſt in a Parke among the woods, which name alſo it hath of the woody ſituation: For, the ancient Engliſh-men called a wood Hyrſt. This was immediately after the Normans entry into England the ſeat of certaine noble gentlemen, who of that place were a good while named de Herſt, untill William the ſonne of Walleran de Herſt, tooke unto him the name Monceaux, of the place haply where he was borne, an uſuall thing in that age: whereupon that name alſo was adnexed unto this place, which ever ſince was of the Lord, termed Herſt Monceaux. From whoſe Poſteritie by heire generall it deſcended hæreditarily to the Fienes. Theſe Fienes, called likewiſe Fenis, and Fienles, derive their pedigree from Ingelram de Fienes, who had wedded the heire of Pharamuſe of Boloigne, of the houſe of the Earles of Boloigne in France. About the time of King Edward the Second, Sir Iohn Fienes married the heire of Monceaux, his ſonne William married one of the heires of the Lord Say, his ſonne likewiſe the heire of Batiſford, whoſe ſonne Sir Roger Fienes married the daughter of Holland, and in the firſt yeare of King Henrie the Sixt built of bricke the large, faire, uniforme, & convenient houſe heere Caſtle-like within a deepe moate. The ſaid King Henrie the Sixt, Accepted, declared and reputed Sir Richard Fienis ſonne of the ſaid Sir Roger, to be Baron of Dacre, And the ſame tittle, King Edward the fourth choſen Arbitratour and Umpire betweene him & Sir Humfrey Dacre, awarded & confirmed to the ſaid S. Richard Fienis, and to the heires of his bodie lawfully begotten; for that he had married Ioane the couſin and next heire of Thomas Baron Dacre; and to have præcedence before the L. Dacre of Gileſland heire male of the family. Since which time the heires lineally deſcending from him being enriched by one of the heires of the Lord Fitz-Hugh, have enjoyed the honor of Baron Dacre, untill that very lately George Fienis Lord Dacre ſonne to the unfortunate Thomas Lord Dacre died without iſſue, whoſe onely ſiſter and heire Margaret, Sampſon Lennard Eſquire a man both vertuous and courteous tooke to wife, and by her hath faire iſſue. In whoſe behalfe it was publiſhed, declared, and adjudged by the Lords Cõmiſſioners for Marriall cauſes, in the ſecond yeere of the raigne of King Iames, with his privity, and aſſent Royall, That the ſaid Margaret ought to beare, have, and enjoy the name, ſtate, degree, title, ſtile, honor, place, and precedency of the Baronie of Dacre; to have and to hold to her, and the iſſue of her bodie in as full and ample manner, as any of her anceſtors enjoied the ſame. And that her children may, and ſhall have, take, and enjoy the place, and precedence reſpectively, as the children of her anceſtors Barons Dacre have formerly had, and enjoyed.

Now to returne to the Sea-coaſt, about three miles from Pevenſey is Beckes-hil a place much frequented by Saint Richard Biſhop of Chicheſter, and where he died. Vnder this is Bulver-hith in an open ſhore, with a roofleſſe Church, not ſo named of a bulles hide which cut into thongs by William the Conquerour, reached to Battaile (as they fable) for it had that name before his comming. But heere he arrived with his whole fleete, landed his armie, and having caſt a rampier before his campe, ſet fire on all his ſhips, that their onely hope might be in manhood, and their ſafety in victorie. And ſo after two daies marched to Haſtings then to an hill neere Neſfeld now called Standard hill, becauſe (as they ſay) he there pitched his Standard, and from thence two miles farther where in a plaine the Kingdome of England was put upon the hazard and chance of a battaile; and the Engliſh-Saxon Empire came to a full period and finall end. For there, King Harold in the yeere of our Lord 1066. the day before the Ides of October, albeit his forces were much weakened in a former fight with the Danes, and his ſoldiers wearied beſides with a long journey from beyond Yorke, encountred him in a place named Epiton. When the Normans had ſounded the Battaile, firſt the skirmiſh continued for a pretty while with ſhot of arrowes from both ſides; then, ſetting foote to foote, as if they fought man to man, they maintained fight a longer time: But when the Engliſh men had moſt valiantly received

See Normans before.

A received their firſt violent on ſet, the Norman horſmen with full cariere put forward and gave an hot charge. But ſeeing they alſo could not breake the battaile, they retired for the nonce, and yet kept their rankes in good order. The Engliſhmen ſuppoſing them to flie, preſently diſranged themſelves, and in diſray preaſſed hard upon the enemies: but they, all on a ſudden bringing backe their companies charged them a freſh on every ſide with all their joynt forces thicke united together and ſo encloſing them round about, drove them backe with great ſlaughter: who not withſtanding having gotten the higher ground withſtood the Normans a long time, untill Harold himſelfe was ſhot through with an arrow and fell downe dead: for then
B ſtraightwaies they turned their backes and betooke themſelves every man to flight. The Duke lofty, and haughty with this victory, and yet not unmindfull of God the giver thereof, erected in memoriall of this battaile an Abbey to the glory of God, and S. Martin, which he called de Bello, or Battaile Abbey, in that very place where Harold after many a wound and ſtab among the thickeſt of his enemies gave up the ghoſt, that the ſame might bee as it were an everlaſting monument of the Normans victorie: and therein he offered his ſword, and royall robe which he ware, the day of his Coronation. Theſe the Monkes kept untill their ſuppreſſion, as alſo a table of the Normans gentry which entred with the Conquerour; but ſo corruptly in later times, that they inſerted therein the names of ſuch as were their benefactours, and
C whoſoever the favour of fortune or vertue had advanced to any eminencie in the ſubſequent ages. About this Abbey there grew afterwards a towne of the ſame name: or, (that I may uſe the words of the private Hiſtory of this Abbey) As the Abbey encreaſed, there were built about the compaſſe of the ſame one hundred and fifteene houſes of which the towne of Battell was made. Wherein there is a place called by a French word Sangue lac, of the bloud there ſhed: which by nature of the ground ſeemeth after raine to wax red. Whence, William Newborough, wrote although untruely, thus: The place, in which there was a very great ſlaughter of the Engliſh men fighting for their countrey, if peradventure it be wet with any ſmall ſhowre, ſweateth forth very freſh bloud indeed: as if the very evidence thereof did plainely declare that the voyce of D ſo much Chriſtian bloud there ſhed doth ſtill cry from the earth to the Lord. But to the ſaid Abbey King William the Conquerour granted many and great priviledges. And among other, to uſe the very words of the Charter. If any thiefe, murderer, or felon for feare of death fly and come to this Church, let him have no harme but be diſmiſſed and ſent away free from all puniſhment. Be it lawfull alſo for the Abbat of the ſame Church to deliver from the gallowes any thiefe or robber whereſoever, if he chance to come by where ſuch execution is in hand.

Henrie the Firſt likewiſe, (that I may rehearſe the words of his Charter) inſtituted a mercate to be there kept on the Lords day, free from all toll and tallage. But Sir Anthony Browne Lord Vicount Mount-acute, who not long ſince in that place built a goodly
E houſe, obtained of late by authoritie of Parliament, that this mercate ſhould bee held upon another day. And as for the priviledges of Sanctuary, in thoſe more heinous and grievous crimes, they are here and every way els by Parliamentary authoritie quite aboliſhed. For, they perceived well, that the feare of puniſhment being once removed, ſtout boldneſſe, and a will to commit wickedneſſe grew ſtill to greater head: and that hope of impunity was the greateſt motive of ill-doing. Neither heere or in that quarter nere adjoyning, ſaw I any thing worth relation but onely Aſhburnham, that gave the name to a family of as great antiquity as any one in all this tract.

A mercate kept on the Sunday.

Haſtings, which I ſpake of, called in the Engliſh Saxon tongue Haſtinz-ceaſtep. is ſituate ſomewhat higher upon the ſame ſhore. Some there bee that ridiculouſ-
F ly derive this name from out of our tongue, from haſte or quickneſſe, forſooth; becauſe as Matthew Paris, writeth William Conquerour at Haſting did ſet up haſtily a fortreſſe of timber. But it may ſeeme to have taken this new name of Haſtings a Daniſh Pirate, who whereſoever hee landed, with intent to ſpoile and raiſe booties, built oftentimes fortreſſes, as we read in Aſſerius Menevenſis, of Boemſlote caſtle built by him in Eſſex, as alſo of others at Appledor and Middleton in Kent. The tradition is that the old towne of Haſtings is ſwallowed up of the ſea. That which ſtandeth now as I obſer-

The haven ſuch as it is being fedde but with a poore ſmall rill, is at the South end of the Towne, and hath had a great Caſtle upon the hill which over commanded it, now there are onely ruines thereof, and on the ſaid hill Light houſes to direct ſailers in the night time. Here in the reigne of King Athelſtan was a mint-houſe. Afterward it was accounted the firſt of the Cinque Ports, Cinqueports. which with the members belonging to it, namely Seford, Peuenſey, Hodeney, Bulverhith, Winchelſey, Rhy, &c. was bound to finde one and twenty ſhips for warre at ſea. In what manner and forme (if you deſire to know) both this Port and the reſt alſo B

Yet ſo, as that ſummons bee made thereof on the Kings behalfe fortie daies before. And when the foreſaid ſhips and men therein, are come to the place whereunto they were ſummoned, they ſhall abide there in the Kings ſervice for fifteene daies at their owne proper coſts and charges. But after that the peere made of timber was at length violently carried away by extreame rage of the ſea, it hath decaied, and the fiſhing leſſe uſed, by the reaſon of the dangerous landing, for they are enforced to worke their veſſels to land by a Capſtall or Craine. In which reſpect for the bettering of the towne, Queene Elizabeth granted a contribution toward the making of a new harbour, which was begun, but the

The whole Rape of Haſtings and the Honour was holden by the Earles of Ew, (commonly called de Augi) in Normandie, deſcended from the baſe ſonne of Richard

* daies, they were Ad fidem Regis Franciæ, that is, under the king of France his allegiance. When King Henry the third had ſeazed their lands into his hands, hee granted the Rape of Haſtings firſt to Peter Earle of Savoy, then to Prince Edward his ſonne, and E after upon his ſurrender to Iohn ſonne to the Duke of little Britaine upon certaine exchanges of lands pertaining to the Honour of Richmond which Peter Earle of Savoy had made over for the uſe of the Prince. Long time after when the Duke of Britaine had loſt their lands in England for adhering to the French King. King Henrie the Fourth gave the Rape of Haſtings with the Manour of Crowherſt, Burgwaſh, &c. to Sir

For whiles hee ſpake his minde, and reaſoned over franckly at a private conſultation, with the Uſurper King Richard the Third, all of a ſodaine, and unlooked for, had hee was away, and without pleading for himſelfe, preſently made ſhorter by the head upon the next blocke. Neither is this to be paſſed over in ſilence that King Henrie the Sixth adorned Sir Thomas Hoo, a worthy knight, whom

From thence the ſhore paſſing under Farley hill farre ſeene both by ſea, and land whereon ſtandeth a ſolitary Church full bleakly, and a beacon is hollowed with an in-winding Bay, and upon it ſtandeth Winchelſey which was built in the time of Winchelſey.
King Edward the Frſt, when a more ancient towne of the ſame name, in the Saxons tongue called Wincelr-ea, was quite ſwallowed up with the rough and raging Ocean in the yeare of our Lord 1250. (what time the face of the earth both heere

Situate it is upon a high hill, very ſteepe on that ſide, which either looketh toward the ſea, or overlooketh the rode where ſhips lie at anchor. Whence it is that the way leading from that part to the haven goeth not ſtreight forward, leaſt it ſhould by an over ſodaine and downe right deſcent, force thoſe that goe downe to fall headlong, or them that goe up to creepe rather with their hands then to walke: but lying ſide-waies it windeth with curving turnes in and out, to one ſide and the other.* At firſt, it was incloſed with a rampier, after-wards Camber-Caſtle.
with ſtrong wals: and ſcarce beganne it to flouriſh, when it was ſacked by the French men and Spaniards, and by reaſon that the ſea ſhrunke backe from it, began
D ſodainely (as it were) to fade and looſe the beauty: And now only beareth the countenance of a faire towne, and hath under it in the levell which the ſea relinquiſhed a Caſtle fortified by Henrie the Eighth, and large marſhes defended from ſea-rages with workes very chargeably: By the decay hereof and the benefit of the ſea together. Rhie oppoſite unto it and as highly ſeated began to flouriſh, or rather to reflouriſh, Rhie.
For that in old time it flouriſhed: and that William of Ipres Earle of Kent fortified it, Ipres Tower now the priſon, and the immunities or priviledges that it had in common with the Cinque-ports may ſufficiently ſhew. But by occaſion of the Vicinity of Winchelſey or the ſhrinking backe of the ſea, it lay for a good while in former ages unknowne: But when Winchelſey decaied, and King Edward the Third walled it
E where the cliffes defended it not, it beganne to breath againe and revive: and in our fathers daies, the ſea to make amends aboundantly for the harmes it had done raiſed with an unuſuall tempeſt, ſo ruſhed in, and inſinuated it ſelfe in forme of a bay that it made a very commodious haven, which another tempeſt alſo in our daies did not a little helpe. Since which time it greatly reflouriſhed with inhabitants, buildings, fiſhing and navigation: and at this day there is an uſuall paſſage from hence into Normandie, yet now it beginneth to complaine that the ſea abandoneth it (ſuch is the variable, and interchangeable courſe of that element) and in part imputeth it, that the river Rother is not contained in his channell, and ſo looſeth his force to carry away the ſands and beach which the ſea doth inbeate into the haven: Notwithſtanding it hath many fiſhing veſſels and ſerveth London, and the Court with va-
F rietie of ſea-fiſh.

Now whether it have the name of Rine a Norman word which ſignifieth a ſtrond or Banke, I cannot eaſily ſay. But ſeeing that in Records it is very often called in Latine Ripa, and they who bring fiſh from hence be termed Ripiers, I encline rather this way, and would encline more, if the Frenchmen uſed this word for a ſtroud or ſhore, as Plinius doth Ripa. Theſe two townes, (neither may it ſeeme impertinent to note it) belonged to the Abbey of Feſcampe in Normandie. But when King Henry the Third perceived that religious men intermingled ſecretly in matters of State, he gave them in exchange for theſe two, Chiltenham and Sclover two Manours in Gloceſter-ſhire, and other lands; adding for the reaſon, that the Abbat and Monkes might not lawfully fight with temporall armes againſt the enemies of the Crowne.

The River Rother. Barons Burgherſh.

Into this haven the River Rother, or Rither ſheddeth it ſelfe, which iſſuing forth at Ritheram fieldes (for ſo the Engliſhmen in ancient times called that towne, which wee doe Rotherfield) paſſeth by Burgwaſh, in old time Burgherſh, which had Lords ſo ſurnamed thereof: among whom was that Sir Bartholomew Burgwaſh, a mightie man in his time, who being approved in moſt weighty Ambaſſages, and warres in Aquitaine, for his wiſedome, and valour deſerved, to be created a Baron of the Realme, to be admitted into the Order of the Garter, at the very firſt inſtitution even among the Founders thereof, and to bee made Conſtable of Dover Caſtle, and Warden of the Cinque-ports. And his ſonne carrying the ſame fore-name not degenerating from his father, lived in high honour and eſtimation; but hee left behind him one daughter, and no more iſſue, married into the houſe of Le Deſpencer;

Baron Echingham.

of which there remaineth ſtill a goodly of-ſpring of Noble perſonages. Echingham next adjoyning, had alſo a Baron, named William de Echingham, in the time of King Edward the Second, whoſe anceſtours were the hereditarie Seneſchals of this Rape. And their inheritance in the end, by the heires females name to the Barons of Windſor, and to the Tirwhits. Then the Rother dividing his water into three channels, paſſeth

Roberts Bridge, or Rotherbridge Bodiam.

under Roberts bridge, where Alured de S. Martin, in King Henrie the ſeconds daies founded a Monaſterie: and ſo running beſide Bodiam, a Caſtle belonging to the ancient Family of the Lewknors, built by the Dalegrigs, here falleth (as I ſaid) into the Ocean. Now I have paſſed along the Sea coaſt of Suſſex. And as for the mid-land part of the ſhire, I have nothing more to relate thereof, unleſſe I ſhould recount the woods, and forreſts, lying out faire in length and breadth, which are a remnant of the vaſt wood, Anderida. Among which, to begin at the Weſt, thoſe of greateſt note are theſe, The forreſt of Arundill, Saint Leonards forreſt, Word forreſt, and not farre off Eaſt Gren-ſted anciently a parcell of the Barony of Eagle, and made a Mercate by King Henry the ſeventh. Aſhdowne forreſt, under which ſtandeth Buckhurſt the habitation of the ancient houſe of the Sackviles, out of which race Queene Elizabeth in our daies aduanced Thomas Sackvile her allie by the Bollens, a wiſe Gentleman, to be Baron of Buckhurſt, took him into her Privie Councell, admitted him into the moſt honorable Baron Buckhurſt.

Order of the Garter, and made him Lord Treaſurer of England: whom alſo of late, K. Iames created Earle of Dorſet. Waterdown forreſt, where I ſaw Eridge, a lodg of the Lord Abergevenny, and by it craggie rocks riſing up ſo thicke, as though ſporting nature had there purpoſed a ſea. Here-by in the very confines of Kent, is Groomebridge an habitation of the Wallers, whoſe houſe there was built by Charles Duke of Orleance, father to K. Lewis the 12. of France, when he being taken priſoner in the battaile at Agincourt, by Richard Waller of this place, was here a long time detained priſoner.

Earles of Suſſex.

See Earles of Arundell.

As touching the Earles; Suſſex had five by the line of Albiney, who were likewiſe called Earles of Arundell; but had the third pennie of Suſſex, as Earles then had. The firſt of them was William D' Albiney, the ſonne of William, Butler to King Henrie the firſt, and Lord of Buckenham in Norfolk: who gave for his armes Gules, a Lion rampant, Or: and was called one while Earle of Arundell, and another while Earle of Chicheſter, for that in thoſe places he kept his chiefe reſidence. This man, of Adeliz the daughter of Godfrey * Barbatus Duke of Lorraine, and of Brabant, Queen Dowager, or Widdow of K. Henrie the Firſt, begat William the ſecond Earle of Suſſex, and of Arundell, father to William the third Earle: unto whom Mabile the ſiſter, and one of the heires of the laſt Raulph Earle of Cheſter, bare William the fourth Earle, & Hugh the fifth, who both died without iſſue, and alſo foure daughters married nnto Sir Robert Yateſhall, Sir Iohn Fitz-Alan, Sir Roger de Somery, and Sir Robert de

A de Mount-hault. After this, the title of Arundell budded forth againe, as I ſaid before, in the Fitz-Alans: but that of Suſſex lay hidden, and loſt unto this our age: which hath ſeene five Ratcliffes, deſcended of the moſt Noble houſe of the Fitz-walters, (that derived their pedigree from the Clares) bearing that honour, to wit, Robert created Earle of Suſſex by King Henrie the Eight, who wedded Elizabeth daughter of Henry Stafford Earle of Buckingham, of whom he begat Henrie the ſecond Earle: 21. Henry 8. unto whom Elizabeth the daughter of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, brought forth Thomas: who being Lord Chamberlaine to Queene Elizabeth, died without iſſue, a moſt worthy and honourable perſonage, in whoſe mind were ſeated joyntly both po-
B litike wiſedome, and martiall proweſſe, as England and Ireland acknowledged. Him ſucceeded Sir Henrie his brother, and after him Robert his onely ſonne, now in his flower.

D THus farre of Suſſex, which together with Suth-rey, was the habitation of the Regni, in the time of the Britaines, and afterwards the kingdome of the South-Saxons, called in the Saxon tongue, ſuð-ſeaxan-ric, which in the two and thirty yeare after the Saxons comming, was begun by Ella, who, as Beda writeth, Firſt among the Kings of the Engliſh Nation ruled all their Southern Provinces, which are ſevered by the River Humber, and the limits adjoyning thereto. The firſt Chriſtian King was Edilwalch, baptized in the preſence of E Wulpher King of Mercia, his Godfather, and he in ſigne of adoption gave unto him two Provinces, namely, the Iſle of Wight, and the Province of the Meanvari: But in the 306. yeare after the beginning of this Kingdome, when Aldinius the laſt King was ſlaine by Ina King of Weſt-Saxons, it came wholly under the Dominion of the Weſt-Saxons.

CANTIVM.

NOw am I come to Kent, which Countrey although maſter WILLIAM LAMBARD, a man right well endued with excellent learning, and as godly vertues, hath ſo lively depainted out in a full volume, that his painefull felicitie in that kind hath left little, or nothing for others, yet according to the project of this worke which I have taken in hand, I will runne it over alſo: and leaſt any man ſhould thinke, that as the Comicall Poet ſaith, I deale by way of cloſe pilfering I willingly acknowledge him, (and deſerve he doth no leſſe) to have beene my foundation, and fountaine both of all (well-neere) that I ſhall ſay.

Time as yet hath not bereft this Region of the ancient name, but as it was called CANTIVM by Ceſar, Strabo, Diodorus Siculus, Ptolomee, and others, ſo that Saxons named it, as Ninnius witneſſeth, Cant-guap-lant, that is, The countrey of the people inhabiting Cantium, and wee Kent. This name maſter Lambard deriveth from Caine, which among the Britaines, ſoundeth as much as a greene Bough, becauſe in old time it was ſhadowed with woods. But it may be lawfull for mee to put in my conjecture; whereas Britaine heere runneth out with a mightie nooke, or corner into the Eaſt, and I have obſerved, that ſuch a kind of nooke in Scotland, is called, Cantir; Againe, that the Inhabitants of another Angle in that part of the Iſland, are by Ptolomee termed Cantæ, as alſo that the Cangani in Wales, were poſſeſſed of another corner, (to ſay nothing of the Cantabri, who likewiſe dwelt in an angle among the Celtiberians, who as they came from one originall, ſo likewiſe they were of the ſame language with our Britans) I would gueſſe, that the name was given by reaſon of the forme and ſcituation, and ſo much the rather, both for that our Frenchmen have uſed Canton for a Corner, and that (as it is probable) from the old Language of the Gauls: for it comes not from the Germane or Latine tongue, which together with that old tongue, be the mothers of this latter French tongue; and alſo becauſe this Countrey by all the old Geographers is called Angulus. For it looketh full upon France with a huge Angle, compaſſed with the æſtuarie of Tamis, and with the Ocean ſea, ſaving, that Weſtward it hath Surrey, and ſouthward Suſſex to confine upon it.

Carion, corruptly read in Diodorus Siculus.

Hereof commeth Canton in Heraldrie, for a corner; and the Helvetians countreys, were by the French called Cantons.

KENT.

KENT.

THe Region which we call Kent, extendeth it ſelfe in length, from Weſt to Eaſt fifty miles, and from South to North 26. For ſcituation, it is not uniforme as being more plaine toward the Weſt, and full of ſhady woods; but higher Eaſtward, by reaſon of hils, mounting up with eaſie aſcents. The Inhabitants diſtinguiſh it as it lyeth South-eaſt-ward from the Tamis, into three plots or portions, they call them ſteps or degrees; the upper whereof, lying upon Tamis, they ſay is healthfull, but not ſo wealthy: the middle they account both healthfull, and plentifull: the lower they hold to bee wealthy, but not healthy: as which for a great part thereof is very moiſt, yet it bringeth forth ranke graſſe in great plenty. Howbeit every where almoſt it is full of meadowes, paſtures, and cornefields: abounding wonderfully in apple-trees, and cherrie-trees alſo, which being brought out of Pontus into Italie, in the 608. yeare after the foundation of Rome, and in the 120. yeare after tranſlated from thence into Britaine, proſper heere exceeding well, and take up many plots of land: the trees being planted after a direct manner one againſt another by ſquare, moſt pleaſant to behold. It hath villages and townes ſtanding exceeding thicke, and well peopled, ſafe rodes, and ſure harbours for ſhips, with ſome veines of iron and marle: but the aire is ſomewhat thicke, and ſomewhere foggie, by reaſon of vapours riſing out of the waters. At a word, the revenues of the Inhabitants are greater both by the fertilitie of the ſoile, and alſo by the neighbourhood of a great citie, of a great river, and the maine ſea. The ſame commendation of civilitie and courteſie which Ceſar in old time gave the Inhabitants, is yet of right due unto them: that I may not ſpeake of their warlike proweſſe, whereas a certaine Monke hath written, How the Kentiſhmen ſo farre excelled, that when our armies are ready to joyne battaile, they of all Engliſhmen, are worthily placed in the Front, as being reputed the moſt valiant and reſolute ſouldiers. Which, Iohn of Saliſburie, verifieth alſo in his Polycraticon. For good deſert (ſaith he) of that notable valour, which Kent ſhewed ſo puiſſantly, and patiently againſt the Danes, it retaineth ſtill unto theſe daies in all battailes the honour of the firſt and fore-ward, yea, and of the firſt conflict with the enemie. In praiſe of whom William of Malmesbury hath likewiſe written thus, The country people and towne-dwellers of Kent, above all other Engliſhmen retaine ſtill the reſent of their ancient worthineſſe. And as they are more forward, and readier to give honour, and etertainment to others, ſo they be more ſlow to take revenge upon others.

Rumney Marſh.

Pli. 15. ca. 25. Cherries were brought over into Britaine about the yeare of our Lord 48. 236.

Proweſſe of Kentiſhmen.

Iulius Ceſar.

Ceſar (to ſpeake briefly by way of Preface, before I come to deſcribe the particular places) when he firſt attempted the conqueſt of our Iſland; arrived at this countrey; but being by the Kentiſh Britans, kept from landing, obtained the ſhore not without a fierce encounter. When he made afterward his ſecond voyage hither, here likewiſe hee landed his armie: and the Britaines with their horſemen and wagons encountred them couragiouſly, but beeing ſoone by the Romans repulſed, they withdrew themſelves into the woods. After this they skirmiſhed ſharpely with the Roman Cavallery in their march, yet ſo, as the Romans had every way the upper hand. Alſo, within a while after, they charged the Romans againe, and moſt reſolutely brake through the midſt of them, and having ſlaine Laberius Durus, Marſhall of the field retired ſafe: and the morrow after ſet upon the Foragers, and victualers of the campe, &c. which I have briefly related before out of Ceſars owne Commentaries. At which time, Cyngetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus, and Segonax were great Commanders of Kent (whom he, becauſe he would be thought to have vanquiſhed Kings, termeth Kings) whereas indeed they were but Lords of the countrey, or Noble men of the better marke.

See Romans in Britaine. Page 34.

After the Roman Empire was heere eſtabliſhed, it was counted under the juriſdiction of the Preſident of Britannia Prima. But the Sea coaſt which they termed

A Littvs Saxonicvm, that is, The Saxon ſhore, like as the oppoſite ſhore unto it, from the River Rhene to Xantoigne in France, had a Ruler over it from Diocleſians time whom Marcellinus calleth Tractus maritini Comitem, that is, The Count, or Lieutenant of the Maritime tract: the booke of Notices, ſtileth him: The honourable, Earle or Lieutenant of the Saxon ſhore along Britaine, whoſe office was with garriſons ſet upon the ſhore in places convenient, to repreſſe the depredations, and robberies of Barbarians, but of Saxons eſpecially, who grievouſly infected Britaine. And hee was under the diſpoſe of the Right honourable Generall of the Footemen, whom they called Præſentalis, who beſides the Garriſons lying at the Havens, aſſigned unto him for the defence B thereof at all aſſaies, Victores Iuniores Britannicianos Primanos Iuniores, and Secundanos Seniores, (theſe are the names of certaine bands or Companies) this hee had for his under Officers to it, Principem ex officio Magiſtri præſentalium a parte peditum, Numerarios duos, Commentarienſem, Cornicularium, Adjutorem, Subadjuvam, Regerendarium, Exceptores ſingulares, &c. Neither doubt I, but that our Anceſtors imitated this cuſtome of the Romans, when they placed over this coaſt a Governour or Portreve, whom now they uſe to call Warden of the Cinque Ports, becauſe as the Comes or Earle of the Saxon ſhore aforeſaid was Governour of nine Ports, ſo he is of five.

The Count or Comes of the Saxon coaſt.

The L. Warden or Keeper of the Cinque ports.

But when the Romans were departed quite out of Britaine, Vortigern, who bare ſoveraigne rule in the greateſt part of Britaine, placed over Kent a Guorong, that is to C ſay, a Vice Roy, or Freed man under him, and unwitting to him, hee forthwith freely granted this region, as Ninnius and William of Malmesbury write, unto Hengiſt the Saxon, for his daughter Rowens ſake: upon whom hee was exceedingly enamoured. Hence it came, that the firſt Saxon Kingdome erected in Britaine in the yeare of our Lord 456. was called by them Cant-papapie, that is, The Kingdome of the Kentiſhmen, which after three hundred and twenty yeares, when Baldred their laſt King was ſubdued, fell to bee under the Dominion of the Weſt Saxons, to whom it continued ſubject untill the Normans Conqueſt: For then, if we may beleeve Thomas Spot the Monke, (for none of the more ancient Writers have recorded it) the Yeomanrie of Kent at Swanes-comb (a village this is where (they ſay) Suene the Dane ſometime pit- D ched his campe) carrying before them in their hands every one a great greene bough repreſenting a farre of a moving wood, yeilded themſelves unto William the Conquerour upon this condition that they might retaine their ancient cuſtomes unviolated, and eſpecially that which they call Gavelkind, that is, Give all kinne, by which they are not ſo bound by Copyhold, cuſtomarie tenures, or Tenant-right, as in other parts of England, but in manner every man is a free-holder, and hath ſome part of his owne to live upon. For lands of this nature are equally divided among the male children, or if there be no ſonnes, among the daughters. By vertue of this alſo, they are at full age and enter upon their inheritance when they come to be fifteene yeares old: and lawfull it is for them to alienate and make it over to any one, either by gift or by E ſale, without the Lords conſent. By this likewiſe, the ſonne though their parents were condemned for theft, ſucceede them nevertheleſſe in ſuch kind of Lands, &c. which I leave to Lawyers. So that, it is truely though not purely written in Latine in an old book thus: The County of Kent avoucheth, that this County ought by right to be free from ſuch kind of grievance: for it ſaith, that this County was never conquered, as the reſidue of England was, but by concluding of a peace ſubjected themſelves to the dominion of the Conquerour, retaining to themſelves all their liberties, immunities, and cuſtomes, which they had, and uſed before time. After this, William the Conquerour, that hee might more firmely aſſure to himſelfe Kent, which is the very key of England, placed a Conſtable over Dover Caſtle, and according to the ancient order of the Romans made him alſo Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports. And theſe bee they, Haſtings, F Dover, Hith, Rumney and Sandwich, unto which, Winchelſey, and Rie are joyned as principall ports, and other ſmall townes as Members. Which becauſe they are bound to ſerve in the warres by ſea, enjoy many great immunities: as who are free from payment of Subſidies, and from Wardſhip of their children as touching the bodie, neither are they ſued in any court, but within their owne townes; and of the inhabitants therein, therein, ſuch as they call Barons, at the Coronation of Kings and Queenes ſupport the Canopies over them, yea and have a table by themſelves that day ſpred and furniſhed on the Kings right hand, &c. And the Lord Warden himſelfe, who is alwaies one of the Nobilitie of moſt approved truſt, hath within his juriſdiction the authoritie of a Chancellour and Admirall in very many caſes, and enjoyeth other rights beſides. But now returne we to the places.

The Northſide of this Country, Tamis the ſoveraigne of all Rivers in Britaine runneth hard by, as I have ſaid before, which having held on his courſe paſt Surrey, forthwith being with a winding reach almoſt retired into himſelfe, doth there admit into his channell into the firſt limit of this ſhire Ravensburne a ſmall water, and of ſhort courſe, which riſeth in Keſton heath hard under the pitching of an ancient campe, ſtrange for the height of double rampiers, and depth of double ditches of all that I have ſeene: doubtleſſe the worke of many Labouring hands. Of what capacitie it was I could not diſcover for that the greateſt part thereof is now ſeverall, and overgrowne with a thicket, but verily great it was, as may bee gathered by that which is apparent. We may probably conjecture that it was a Roman Campe, but I might ſeeme to rove; if I ſhould thinke it that Campe which Iulius Cæſar pitched, when the Britans gave him the laſt battaile with their whole forces, and then having bad ſucceſſe retired themſelves, and gave him leave to march to the Tamis ſide. And yet certes Keſton the name of the place ſeemeth to retaine a parcell of Ceſars name for ſo the Britaines called him, and not Cæſar, as wee doe. As for the other ſmall intrenchment not farre of by W. Wickham, it was caſt in freſh memory when old Sir Chriſtopher Heydon a man then of great command in theſe parts, trained the country people. This water having paſſed by Bromeley a Manſion houſe of the Biſhops of Rocheſter, when it hath gathered ſtrength, the depth of his ford giveth name to Depe-ford: a moſt famous Ship-docke, where the Kings ſhips are built, and ſuch as be decaied, repaired: there alſo is a goodly Store-houſe and a Colledge (as it were) or incorporation ordained for the uſe of the navie. The place was ſometime called Weſt-Greenwich, and at the conqueſt of England fell to Ciſlebert Mamignot for his ſhare, whoſe Grand-child Walkelin, defended Dover Caſtle againſt King Stephen, and left behind him one onely daughter living, who when her brother was dead, by her marriage brought a rich inheritance called the Honor of Mamignot into the family of the Saies.

From hence the Tamis goeth to Green-wich, that is, the Greene Creeke, for the creek of a river in the old Engliſh tongue was called Wic, a place in times paſt famous for the Daniſh Fleet that lay there often at Rode, and for the Danes crueltie ſhewed unto Ealpheg Archbiſhop of Canterbury, whom in the yeare of our Lord a thouſand and twelve, they cruelly executed with moſt exquiſite torments. Whoſe death together with the cauſe thereof Ditmarus Merſepurgius, who about the ſame time lived, hath thus in the eighth booke of his Chronicles deſcribed. I underſtood (ſaith he) by the relation of Sewald, a pitifull deede, and therefore memorable: namely, That the perfideous crew of Northman ſouldiours under Thurkil as yet their Captaine, tooke that excellent prelate, Archbiſhop of the Citie of Canterburie named Ealpheg with the reſt, and them after their wicked manner empriſoned and bound, yea and put him to endure famine and unſpeakeable paines. This good man moved with humane frailtie promiſeth unto them a ſumme of money, and for the obtaining thereof did ſet downe a time betweene, that if in this ſpace he could not by ſome acceptable ranſome eſcape this momentany death, hee might yet in the meane while purge himſelfe with many a groane, to be offered as a lively ſacrifice unto the Lord. But when all the time & ſpace appointed were come & gone, this greedy gulfe of Pirates called forth the ſervant of the Lord, & in threatning wiſe demands this tribute promiſed unto them to be ſpedily and out of hand paid. Then he, as a meeke Lamb, Here am I, quoth he, ready to undergoe even for the love of Chriſt whatſoever ye preſume now to doe againſt me, that I may deſerve to become an example of his ſervants. And nothing am I troubled at this day. And whereas I ſeeme unto you a lyer, it is not mine owne will but great neede and poverty that hath done it. This body of mine, which in this exile I have loved overmuch, I preſent as*

A as culpable unto you, and I know it is in your power to doe with it, what yee intend: but my ſinfull ſoule that regardeth not you, I humbly commend to the Creator of all things. As hee was thus ſpeaking, the whole rabble of theſe prophane wretches hemmed him round about and getteth together divers and ſundry weapons to kill him. Which when their leader Thurkill ſaw a farre off, he came quickly running and crying, Doe not ſo in any wiſe I beſeech you: and heere, with my whole heart I deliver unto you all my gold and ſilver and whatſoever I have heere, or can by any meanes come by, ſave my ſhip onely, that yee would not ſinne againſt the Lords annointed. But this unbridled anger of his mates, harder than yron and flint was nothing mollified with ſo gentle words and faire language of his, but became pacified by ſhed-
B ding his innocent bloud, which preſently they altogether confounded and bleanded with Ox-heads, ſtones as thicke as haile, and billets hurled at him. And to the memorie of this Saint Ealpheg is the Pariſh Church heere conſecrated. But now is the place of very great name, by reaſon of the Kings houſe, which Humfrey Duke of Gloceſter built and named Placence; which alſo King Henrie the Seventh moſt ſumptuouſly enlarged: who adjoyned thereto a little houſe of obſervant Friers, and finiſhed that towre famous in Spaniſh fables, which the ſaid Duke of Gloceſter begun, on an high hill, from whence there is a moſt faire, and pleaſant proſpect open to the river winding in and out, and almoſt redoubling it ſelfe, the greene meddowes and marſhes underlying, the Citie of London, and the Countrie round about. Which being now enlarged and beau-
C tified by the L. Henrie Howard Earle of Northampton, Lord Privie Seale, &c. cannot but acknowledge him a well deſerving benefactor. But the greateſt ornament by far that graced this Green-wich, was our late Queene Elizabeth, who heere moſt happily borne to ſee the light by the reſplendent brightneſſe of her royall vertue enlightned all England. But as touching Green-wich have heere theſe verſes of Leland the Antiquarian Poet:

Ecce ut jam niteat locus petitus
Tanquam ſydereæ domus cathedræ.
Quæ faſtigia picta? quæ feneſtræ?
D Quæ turres vel ad aſtra ſe efferentes?
Quæ porro viridaria, ac perennes
Fontes? Flora ſinum occupat venuſta
Fundens delicias nitentis horti.
Rerum commodus æſtimator ille,
Ripæ qui variis modis amœnæ,
Nomen contulit eleganter aptum.

How glittereth now this place of great requeſt,
Like to the ſeate of heavenly welkin hie?
With gallant tops, with windowes of the beſt.
E What towres that reach even to the ſtarry skie:
What Orchards greene, what ſprings ay-running by.
Faire Flora heere that in this creeke doth dwell,
Beſtowes on it the flowers of garden gay;
To judge no doubt of things he knew full well,
Who gave this banke thus pleaſant every way,
So fit a name, as did the thing bewray.

Nothing elſe have I here to note (but that, for I would not have the remembrance of well deſerving benefactors to miſcarry) William Lambard a godly good Gentleman built an Almeshouſe here for the ſuſtentation of poore perſons which F hee named The Colledge of Queene Elizabeths poore people, and as the prying adverſaries of our religion then obſerved, was the firſt Proteſtant that built an Hoſpitall. At the backe of this, as ye turne out ſcarce three miles off, ſtandeth Eltham, a re- Eltham.
tyring place likewiſe of the Kings, but unholſomly by reaſon of the moate. Anthony Becke Biſhop of Durham, and Patriarch of Ieruſalem built this in a manner new, and gave unto Queene Eleanor wife to King Edward the Firſt, after hee had craftily ly conveyed unto himſelfe the inheritance of the Veſcyes, unto whom this place before belonged. For that Biſhop, whom the laſt Baron of Veſcy had made his foeffe for truſt, of all his inheritance to the uſe of William Veſcy his little baſe ſonne, dealt not ſo faithfully, as he ſhould with this orphane and ward of his, but diſpoiled him of Alnwick Caſtle, this, and other faire lands.

The Breach. 1527. Leiſnes.

Beneath Greenwich, the Thames having broken downe his bankes, hath by his irruption ſurrounded and overwhelmed many acres of land. For the inning whereof divers have as it were ſtrugled with the waters now many yeares; and yet with great workes, and charges cannot overmaſter the violence of the tides, which the Chanons of Lieſnes adjoyning kept ſound and ſweete land in their times. This Abbey was founded 1179. by Lord Richard Lucie chiefe Iuſtice of England, and by him dedicated to God and the memorie of Thomas of Canterburie, whom hee ſo admired for his piety, while other condemned him for pervicacie againſt his Prince, as hee became here a devoted Chanon to him. Heere in the marſhes groweth plentifully the hearbe Cochlearia, called by our Countrey men Scurvy-graſſe, which ſome Phiſicians would have to be the ſame which Plinie calleth Britannica, by which name I have already made mention thereof: but heare what Plinie ſaith. In Germany, when as Germanicus Cæſar had removed his campe forward beyond Rhene, in the maritime tract there was one fountaine and no more, of freſh water, whereof if a man dranke, within two yeares his teeth would fall out of his head and the joynts in his knees become looſe and feeble. Thoſe diſeaſes the Phiſicians tearmed Stomacace and Sceletyrbe. For remeaie hereof, there was found an hearbe called Brittannica, *holeſome not onely for the ſinewes and maladies of the mouth but alſo againſt the Squincie and ſtinging of ſerpents, &c. They of * Friſia, what way our campe lay, ſhewed it unto our ſouldiours. And I marvaile what ſhould bee the cauſe of that name, unleſſe peradventure they that confine upon the Ocean, dedicated the name thereof to Britaine, as lying ſo nere vnto it.* But that moſt learned Hadrian Iunius in his booke named Nomenclator, bringeth another reaſon of the name whom you may have recourſe unto if you pleaſe: For, this word Britannica hath here diverted me a ſide from my courſe.

* See afterward in the Britiſh Iſles, concerning the Arrenat or Armory of the Britaines.

From thence the Thames being contained within his bankes meeteth with the river Darent, which falling downe out of Suthrey runneth with a ſoft ſtreame not farre from Seven-oke (ſo called as men ſay of ſeven exceeding great Okes now cut downe) which commendeth Sir William Sevenok an Alderman of London, who being a foundling and brought up here; and therefore ſo named, built heere in gratefull remembrance an Hoſpitall and a ſchoole. On the Eaſt ſide of it ſtandeth Knoll ſo called for that it is ſeated upon a hill, which Thomas Bourchier Archbiſhop of Canterbury purchaſing of Sir William Fienes, Lord Say and Seale, adorned with a faire houſe: and now lately Thomas Earle of Dorſet Lord Treaſurer hath fourbiſhed and beautified the old worke with new chargeable additaments. Darent then paſſeth by Otteanforo, now Otford, a place famous in former ages for an overthrow and ſlaughter of the Danes which happened there in the yeare 1016. and lately by reaſon of the Kings houſe, which William Warham Archbiſhop of Canterbury built, for himſelfe and his ſucceſſours ſo ſumptuouſly, that for to avoid envie, Cranmer who next ſucceeded him was conſtreined to exchange it with King Henrie the Eighth. Somewhat lower hard by Darent ſtandeth Lullingſtone, where there was ſometime a Caſtle the ſeat of a family of the ſame name, but now of Sir Percival Hart, deſcended from one of the coheires of the Lord Bray. Then Darent giveth name unto Darentford, commonly Dartford a great mercat towne well frequented, and well watered, where King Edward the Third built a Nunnery, which King Henry the Eighth converted into a houſe for himſelfe and his ſucceſſours: Heere the rivelet Grey, anciently called Crecan intermingleth it ſelfe with Darent, when in his ſhort courſe hee hath imparted his name to five townelets which hee watereth, as Saint Mary Crey, Pauls Crey, Votes-Crey, North Crey, and Crey-ford, in former ages Crecanford, where Hengiſt the Saxon the eighth yeare after his arrivall, joyned battaile with the Britaines, and after he had ſlaine their captaines, brought them under with ſo great a ſlaugh-

A ſlaughter, that afterwards hee never ſtood in feare of them, but eſtabliſhed his kingdome quietly in Kent.

From the river Darent or Dart unto the mouth of Medway, the Thames ſeeth nothing above him but little townes pleaſantly ſeated, which to paſſe over in ſilence were no prejudice either of their fame or any thing els. Yet amongſt them is Swanſ-combe (of which I have heretofore ſpoken) of honorable memorie among the Kentiſh men, for obtaining their the continuance of their ancient franchiſes, afterward it was well knowne by the Montceuſies, men of great Nobility the owners thereof who had there Barony here-about. And by it Graveſ-end ſo called (as Maſter B Lambert is my author) as the Gereveſ-end; that is, the limit of the Gereve or Reve. A towne as well knowne as any other in England, for the uſuall paſſage by water betweene it and London, ſince the Abbat of Grace by the tower of London, to which it appertained, obtained of King Richard the ſecond that the inhabitants of it and Milton onely, ſhould tranſport paſſengers from thence to London. King Henrie the Eighth when he fortified the ſea coaſt, raiſed two Platformes or Block-houſes here, and two other oppoſite on Eſſex ſide. Beyond Graveſ-end is Shorn held anciently by Sir Roger Northwood by ſervice to carry with other the kings tennants a white enſigne fortie daies at his owne charges when the King warred in Scotland. Somewhat more within the land, lieth Cobham, the habitation for a long C time of the Barons of Cobham; of whom Iohn Cobham the laſt of that name, founded a Colledge here and a caſtle at Cowling: who left one onely daughter wife to Sir Iohn de la Pole Knight: Shee likewiſe bare but one daughter, though married in her time to many husbands. But by Sir Reginald Braibrooke onely had ſhee iſſue As for her husband Sir Iohn Old Caſtle, whiles hee endeavoured to bring in innovation in religion, was both hanged, and burnt. Ioane her onely daughter by Sir Reginald Braybrooke, was wedded untō Thomas Broke of Somerſetſhire, from whom ſix Lord Cobhams have lineally deſcended, and flouriſhed in honorable reputation untill our time. From Graveſ-end a little country called Ho, lying as a demy Iſland between rivers Thames and Medway ſtretcheth it ſelfe into the Eaſt, and is for ſituation but D unholſome. At the entry hereof is Cowling Caſtle built by Iohn Lord Cobham in a mooriſh ground, and Cliffe a good bigge towne, ſo called of a cliffe upon which it ſtandeth. But whether it bee that Clives at Ho, ſo famous in the tender age and infancie of our Engliſh Church, by reaſon of a Synode there holden I dare not as others doe, affirme: conſidering, that in regard of the ſite it is a place inconvenient for ſuch an aſſembly; and beſides that Clives at Hoo ſeemeth to have beene within the Kingdome of the Mercians. As for the river Medweg, now called Medway, and in the Britiſh tongue, (unleſſe I miſſe of the truth,) Vaga, whereunto afterward was added Med, hath his ſpring head in the wood Anderida which is termed the Weald, that is a Wood-land country; and taketh up the South-part of this region farre and E wide. At firſt, whiles it carrieth but a ſlender ſtreame it receiveth the Eden by Penſhurſt the ſeat anciently (as it ſeemeth by the name) of Sir Stephen de Penherſt who alſo was called de Penſheſter a famous Warden of the Cinque ports; but now the houſe of the Sidneies who derive their race from William de Sidney Chamberlaine to King Henrie the ſecond: out of which came Sir Henrie Sidney that renowned Lord deputy of Ireland, who of the daughter of Iohn Dudley Duke of Northumberland, and Earle of Warwicke, begat Philip and Robert. This Robert, Iames our ſoveraigne King, made right honorable, firſt by the title of Baron Sidney of Penſhurſt and afterwards, of Vicount Liſle. But Sir Philip, whom I cannot paſſe over in ſilence, beeing the glorious ſtarre of this familie, a lively patterne of vertue, and the lovely joy of all the learned F ſort, fighting valerouſly with the enemy before Zutphen in Gelderland died manfully. This is that Sidney, whom, as Gods will was he ſhould be therefore borne into the world, even to ſhew unto our age a ſample of ancient vertues: ſo his good pleaſure was before any man looked for it to call for him againe, and take him out of the world as beeing more worthy of heaven then earth. Thus wee may ſee, Perfect vertue ſodainely vaniſheth out of ſight, and the beſt men continue not long.

Then the river Medway, branching it ſelfe into five ſtreamlets, is joyned with as many ſtone Bridges, and thereof giveth the name of Tunbridge to the towne there ſituate, as the towne of Bridges. This about King William Rufus his time Richard ſonne of Count Gilbert; Grandchild to Godfrey Earle of Ewe, & Lord of Briony obtained in requitall for Briony in Normandie, when there had bin long debate about Briony. This Richard, (as William Gemeticenſis writeth) in recompence for the ſame caſtle received in England the towne of Tunbridge for it. And the report goeth, that the * Lowy of Briony was meaſured round about with a line, and with the ſame line brought into England, hee received ſo much ground meaſured out at Tunbridge. Shortly after, he built here a faire large caſtle fenced with the river, a deepe ditch, and ſtrong walles; and albeit it is now ruinous and the Keepe attired with Ivie, yet it manifeſtly ſheweth what it was. His poſteritie, who were Earles of Gloceſter, and ſurnamed De Clare, (for that they were Lords of Clare in Suffolke) built here a priorie for Chanons of Saint Auguſtines order, founded the pariſh Church which was impropriated to the Knights of Saint Iohn of Hieruſalem, and compounded about the tenure of the Mannour, for which there had beene long ſuit, to hold it of the Archbiſhop of Canterburie by Knights fee, and to be their high Stewards at their inthronizations. From theſe Clares Earles of Gloceſter, it came by an heire generall to Sir Hugh Audley Earle of Gloceſter, and by his onely daughter to the Earles of Stafford, who were afterward Dukes of Buckingham, & from them by attainder to the Crowne. It hath in latter ages beene beholden to Sir Andrew Iude of London for a faire free-Schoole, and to Iohn Wilford for a cauſey toward London. Three miles directly South from hence in the very limit of Suſſex, and neere Frant, I ſaw in a white-ſandy ground divers vaſtie, craggie ſtones of ſtrange formes, whereof two of the greateſt ſtand ſo cloſe together, and yet ſevered with ſo ſtraight a line, as you would thinke they had beene ſawed aſunder, and Nature when ſhe reared theſe, might ſeeme ſportingly to have thought of a Sea. But to returne to the River.

From Tunbridge, Medway paſſeth by Haudelo, from whence came that Iohn Haudelo, who happily marrying the heire of the Lord Burnell, had iſſue by her a ſonne, who was called Nicholas, ſummoned to Parliament among the Barons by the name of Burnell. Then Medway increaſed with another water, called Twiſt, which twiſteth about and inſulateth a large plot of good ground, runneth on not farre from Mereworth, where ſtands a faire Caſtle like houſe, which from the Earles of Arundell came unto the Nevils Lords of Abergevennie, and Le Deſpencer: whoſe heire in the right line, is Marie, Ladie Fane, unto whom, and her heires King Iames in the firſt Parliament that he held, reſtored, gave and granted, &c. the name, ſtile, title, honour, and dignitie of Baroneſſe le Deſpencer: & that her heires ſucceſſively ſhould be Barons le Deſpencer for ever. Now by this time Medway having received a rivelet, that looſeth it ſelfe under ground, and riſeth againe at Looſe, ſerving thirteene fulling-mills, haſteneth to Maidſtone, which ſeeing the Saxons called it Medwegſtan, & Meopeazertun, I beleeve verily it is the ſame VAGNIACAE, which Antonine the Emperor mentioneth, and Ninnius in his Catalogue of cities, calleth corruply, Caer Megwad, for, Medwag. Neither verily doth the account of diſtance diſagree; From Noviomagus one way, and Durobrovis another, whereof I ſhall treat anone. Under the latter Emperours, as is to be ſeene in Peutegerus his table lately ſet out by M. Velſerus, it is named MADVS. Thus as yeeres by litlte and little turne about, ſo names likewiſe by little and little become changed. A large faire, and ſweet towne this is, and populous: for the faire ſtone bridge, it hath been beholding to the Archbiſhops of Canterbury. Among whom to grace this place at the confluence of the waters, Boniface of Savoy, built a a ſmall Colledge, Iohn Vfford raiſed a palace for himſelfe and ſucceſſors, which Simon Iſlip encreaſed, and betweene them, which it ſtandeth in plight, William Courtney erected a faire Collegiat Church, in which he ſo great a Prelate, and ſo high borne, lieth lowly entombed. One of the two common Gaoles or priſons of the whole County is here appointed. And it hath beene endowed with ſundrie priviledges, by King Edward the ſixt, incorporated by the name of Major and Iurates, all which in ſhort

A short time they lost by favouring rebels. But Queene Elizabeth amply restored them, and their Major, whereas anciently they had a Portgreve for their head Magistrate. This I note, because this [Greve] is an ancient Saxon word, and as yet among the Germans signifieth, a Ruler, as Markegreave, Reingreave, Landgreave, &c.

Here, a little beneath Maidstone Eastward, a prety rivelet joyneth with Medway, springing first at Leneham: which towne by probable conjecture is the very same that Antonine the Emperour calleth DVROLENVM, written amisse in some copies, DVROLEVUM. For Durolenum in the British language, is as much to say as The water Lenum. And besides the remaines of the name, the distance also from DV- Leneham.

B ROVENVM, and DVROBROVIS proveth this to be Durolenum: to say nothing of the scituation therof, neere unto that high rode way of the Romans, which in old time (as Higden of Chester doth write) led from Dover through the midst of Kent.

Hard by, at Bocton Malherb hath dwelt a long time the family of the Wottons, out of which in our remembrance flourished both Nicolas Wotton, Doct. of the lawes, who being of the Privy counsell to K. Henry the Eight, K. Edward the sixth, Q. Mary, and Q. Elizabeth, sent in Embassage nine times to forreine Princes, and thrice chosen a Committè about peace between the English, French, and Scottish; lived a goodly time, and ran a long race in this life with great commendation of piety and wisedome: and also Sir Edward Wotton, whom for his approved wisedome in waightie affaires, Q. Eli- Bocton Malherb. Baron Wotton.

C zabeth made Controller of her house, and K. Iames created Baron Wotton of Merlay. Here under is Vlcomb anciently a manso of the family De sancto Leodegario, corruptly called Sentleger & Sellenger, & Motinden, where Sir R. Rockesly descended from Kriol, and Crevecur built a house, who held lands at Seaton by serjeantie to be Vantrarius Regis, when the K. goeth into Gascoin, donec perusus fuerit pari solutarum pretii. 4. d. which as they that understand Law Latin (for I do not) translate that he should be the Kings fore-foot-man, until he had worn out a paire of shooes, prized 4. d. Neither hath this river any other memorable thing neere to it, but Leeds Castle, built by the noble Crevequers, who in ancient charters are named de Crevequer, & De crepito corde: afterwards it was the unfortunate seat of Bartholomew L. Baldismer, who perfidiously fortified Fin. Mich. xi. E. 2. Leeds castle. The family of Crevequer.

D it against K. EDVVARD the second, who had freely given it him, and after that payed the due price of his disloyaltie upon the gallowes. The whole matter you may reade here if you list out of a briefe historie penned by Thomas de la More, a gentleman that lived at the same time, and which of late I did publish in print. In the yeare 1521. Queene Isabel came to the Castle of Leeds, about the feast of Saint Michael, minding there to lodge all night, but was not permitted to enter in. The King offended hereat, as taking it to be done in contempt of him, called certaine of the neighbour inhabitants out of Essex and London, and commanded them to lay siege unto the Castle. Now, there held the Castle at that time Bartholomew de Baldismer, who having left therein his wife and sonnes, was gone himselfe with the rest of the Barons to overthrow the Hughs de Spencer. Meane-while, when

E they that were inclosed within despaired of their lives, the Barons with their associats came as farre as Kingston, and by the mediation of the Bishops of Canterbury and London, together with the Earle of Pembrech, requested that the King would remove his siege, promising to deliver up the Castle, into the Kings hand after the next Parliament. But the King considering well, that the besieged could not long hold out, nor make resistance, being highly displeased & angred at their cõtumacy, would not give eare to the Barons petitions. And when they had turned their journey another way, hee afterward forced the Castle with no small trouble and labour about it: and when he had hanged all the rest that he found therein, he sent the wife and sonnes of Bartholmew aforesaid to the Tower of London. Thus Medway having * received this rivelet from Leeds, fetching about through good grounds rũneth by Al-

F lington, sometime a castle, now lesse than a castellet, where Sir T. Wyat the elder, a worthy learned knight, reedified a faire house now decaied, whose son S^r. Thomas enriched by an heire of Sir T. Haut, proposing to himself great hopes upõ fair pretẽses pitifully overthrew himself & his state. Hence commeth Medway to Ailsford in the old English Saxon Ealesforo, which H. of Huntingdon, calleth Elstre, Ninnius Episford: who hath written, that it was named in the British tongue Saissenaeg haibail of the Saxons there Ailesford.

vanquiſhed, like as others in the very ſame ſenſe termed it Anglesford. For, Guortemere the Britaine, Guortigerns ſonne, did here ſet upon Hengiſt and the Engliſh Saxons, whom being diſraied, and not able to abide a ſecond charge, he put all to flight: ſo as they had beene utterly defeated for ever, but that Hengiſt skil-full and provident to prevent, and divert danger, withdrew himſelfe into the Iſle of Tenet, untill that invincible vigour and heat of the Britanes were allaied, and freſh ſupplies came to his ſuccour out of Germanie. In this Battaile were ſlaine the Generalls of both ſides, Catigern the Britaine, and Horſa the Saxon: of whom the one, buried at Horſted not farre from hence, gave name to the place: and Catigern honored with a ſtately and ſolemne funerall is thought to have beene enterred neere unto Ailesford where under the ſide of a hill I ſaw foure huge, rude, hard ſtones erected, two for the ſides, one tranſverſall in the middeſt betweene them, and the hugeſt of all piled and laied over them in manner of the Britiſh monument which is called Stone heng but not ſo artificially with mortis and tenents. Verily the unskilfull common people terme it at this day, of the ſame Catigern, Keiths or Kits Coty houſe. In Ailsford it ſelfe, for the religious houſe of the Carmelits founded by Richard Lord Grey of Codnor in the time of King Henrie the Third, is now ſeene a faire habitation of Sir William Siddey a learned Knight, painefully, and expenſfully ſtudious of the common good of his country as both his endowed houſe for the poore, and the bridge heere with the common voice doe plentifully teſtifie. Neither is Boxley neere adjoyning to bee paſſed over in ſilence, where William de Ipres, in Flaunders, Earle of Kent founded an Abbey in the yeare of our Lord 1145. and tranſlated thither the Monkes, from Clarevalle in Burgundie. Medway having wound himſelfe higher, from the Eaſt receiveth a brooke ſpringing neare Wrotham or Wirtham, ſo named for plentie of wortes: where the Archbiſhops had a place untill Simon Iſlep pulled it downe; leaveth Malling which grew to bee a towne after Gundulph Biſhop of Rocheſter had there founded an Abbey of Nunnes, and watereth Leibourn which hath a Caſtle ſometime the ſeate of a family thereof ſurnamed, out of which Sir Roger Leibourn was a great Agent in the Barons warres, and William was a Parliamentary Baron in the time of King Edward the firſt. Neare neighbour to Leibourn is Briling, now the habitation of the Lord Abergeveny, in times paſt parcell of the Baronie of the Maminots, then of the Saies, whoſe Inheritance at length by heires generall came to the families of Clinton, Fienes, and Aulton. Upon the banke of Medway Eaſtward ſomewhat higher, after it hath paſſed by Halling where Hamo Heath Biſhop of Rocheſter built an houſe for his ſucceſſors, there ſtandeth an ancient Citie; which Antonine calleth DVRO BRVS, DVRO-BRIVAE and in another place more truely DVRO PROVÆ and DVROBROVÆ: Bede DVRO-BREVIS: and in the declining ſtate of the Romane Empire, proceſſe of time contracted his name ſo, that it came to be named ROIBIS, and ſo by addition of Ceaſtep, which commeth of the latin word Caſtrum, betokeneth among our anceſtors a city or Caſtle, was called Hpouceaſtep, and now with us more ſhort Rocheſter, and in Latin Roffa, of one Rhufus as Bede gueſſeth: but it ſeemeth unto mee to retaine in it ſomewhat ſtill of that old name Durobrevis. Neither is there cauſe why any man ſhould doubt of the name, ſeeing that by the account of journies, or diſtance betweene places, and Bedes authoritie, it is named expreſſely in the Charter of the foundation of the Cathedrall Church there DVROBROVIS: yet thus much I would advertiſe the Reader, that in the printed bookes of Bede it is read Darueruum, whereas in the manuſcript copies it is termed DVROBREVIS: ſeated it is in a bottome, fortified on the one ſide with a marſh, the river, the weake walles, and as William of Malmesburie ſaith, pent within too ſtreight a roome: whereupon, in time paſt it was counted a Caſtle rather then a Citie. For, Bede calleth it Caſtellum Cantuariorum, that is, the Kentiſhmens Caſtle. But now it ſtretcheth forth with large ſuburbs on the Weſt, Eaſt, and South ſides. It hath paſſed through no few dangers and miſchances. In the yeare of Chriſt 676. it was overthrowne and laid along by King Aetheldred the Mercian: and many a time afterward ſacked by the Danes. Aethelbert King of Kent

A Kent erected there a ſumptuous Church, which alſo he made more famous with the dignitie of Biſhopricke, ordaining Iuſtus to bee the firſt Biſhop of that See. But when it fell to decay for very age, Biſhop Gundulph a Norman about the yeare 1080. reedified it, and thruſting out the Prieſts brought in Monkes in their roomes: and when they were caſt out, a Deane, ſixe Prebendaries and Scholars were ſubſtituted in their places. Neere unto the Church there ſtandeth over the river an old Caſtle fortified both by art, and ſituation: Which, as their port goeth Odo Biſhop of Bayeux and Earle of Kent built: But it was, no doubt, King William the firſt that built it: For in Domeſday booke we read thus, The Biſhop of Roueceſter holdeth in Elesford, B for exchange of the land on which the Caſtle is ſeated. Yet, certaine it is, that Biſhop Odo when his hope depended of a doubtfull change of the State, held this againſt King William Rufus: At which time there paſſed proclamation through England, that whoſoever would not be reputed a Niding, ſhould repaire to recover Rocheſter Caſtle. Whereupon the youth fearing that name, and moſt reproachfull and opprobrious in that age, ſwarmed thither in ſuch numbers, that Odo was enforced to yeeld the place, loſe his dignitie, and abjure the realme. But concerning the reedification of this Caſtle about this time, liſten what the * Text of Roceſter ſaith, when King William the ſecond would not confirme the gift of Lanfranck as touching the Manour of Hedenham in the C County of Buckingham, made unto Rocheſter church, unleſſe Lanfranck and Gundulph Biſhop of Rocheſter would give unto the King an hundred pound of deniers; At laſt by the interceſſion of Sir Robert Fitz Hamon and Henry Earle of Warwick, the King granted it thus farre forth in lieu for the money which hee demanded for grant of the Manour, that Biſhop Gundulph, becauſe he was very skilfull and well experienced in architecture and maſonrie ſhould build for the King at his owne proper charges a Caſtle of ſtone. In the end, when as the Biſhops were hardly brought to give their conſent unto it before the King, Biſhop Gundulph built up the Caſtle full and whole at his owne coſt. And a little after, King Heurie the firſt granted unto the Church of Canterbury and to the Archbiſhops, the keeping thereof, and the Conſtableſhip to hold ever after, (as Florentius of Worceſter ſaith) yea and licence withall, to build in the ſame a towre for themſelves. Since which time it was belaied with D with one or two great ſieges, but then eſpecially, when the Barons with their Al'armes made all England to ſhake, and Simon Montford Earle of Leiceſter aſſaulted it moſt fiercely, though in vaine, and cut downe the wooden bridge, which was after repaired. But in the time of King Richard the Second, Sir Robert Knowles by warlike prowes raiſed from low eſtate to high reputation, and great riches, built a very goodly ſtone bridge of arch-work with money levied out of French ſpoiles. At the end of the ſaid bridge, Sir Iohn Cobham who much furthered the worke, erected a Chapell (for our elders built no notable bridge without a chapell) upon which beſides armes of Saints, are ſeen the armes of the King and his three uncles then living. And long after Archbiſhop Warham coped a great part of the ſaid bridge with iron bars. Vnder E this, Medway ſwelling with a violent and ſwift ſtreame ſtrugleth and breaketh through roaring and loud; but forthwith runnning more ſtill and calme becommeth a road at Gillingham and Chetham for a moſt royall and warlike navy of ſtrong and ſerviceable ſhips, and the ſame moſt ready alwaies at a ſhort warning: which, our late gracious Ladie Queene Elizabeth, with exceeding great coſt built for the ſafegard of her ſubjects and terror of her enemies; and for the defence thereof raiſed a caſtelet at Vpnore upon the river ſide.

Now Medway growne more full and carying a greater breadth, with his curling waves right goodly and pleaſant to behold, runneth a long by the fruitfull fields, untill that being divided by meeting with Iland Shepey, (which wee ſuppoſed to bee F Ptolemeis TOLIATIS) maketh his iſſue into the Æſtuarie or Frith of Thames at two mouthes. Vnder which, a certaine Brabander of late beganne to trie by the furnace out of ſtones found upon the ſhore, both Brimſtone and Coperas. It hath Weſtward in the Front thereof a very fine and ſtrong Caſtle, which King Edward the third built, as himſelfe writeth, Pleaſant for ſite, to the terrour of his enemies, and ſolace of his people: unto which hee adjoyned a Burgh, and in the honour of Philip the Queene his wife called it Queene-borough, as one would ſay, The Queens Burgh. The Conſtable whereof at this day, is Sir Edward Hoby, who hath poliſhed his excellent wit with learned ſtudies. Eaſtward, is Shurland ſeated, which belonged in late times to the Cheineies, and now to Sir Philip Herbert ſecond ſonne to Henry Earle of Pembroch, whom King Iames in one and the ſame day created Baron Herbert of Shurland, and Earle of Mont-Gomerie.

Queene Borough.

This Iſle appertaineth to the Hundred of Middleton, ſo named of Middleton the towne, now Milton. This was ſome time a towne of the Kings aboade, and of greater name by farre than at this day, although, Haſting the Daniſh pirate for to annoy it, fortified a Caſtle hard by in the yeare 893. Neere adjoyning heereto Sittingburn a towne furniſhed with Innes ſheweth it ſelfe with his new Major and corporation: the remaines alſo of Thong Caſtle, which as ſome write, was ſo called for that Hengiſt built it by a meaſure of thongs cut out of a beaſts hide, when Vortigern gave ſo much land to fortifie upon, as hee could encompaſſe with a beaſts hide cut into thongs. Since the conqueſt it was the ſeat of Guncelline of Baldiſmer, of noble parentage, whoſe ſonne Bartholomew begat Guncelline: and hee by the Inheretrie of Raulph Fitz-Barnard Lord of Kings-Downe was father to that ſeditious Sir Bartholomew Lord Baldiſmer of whom I ſpake: he againe of Margaret Clare begat Sir Giles Lord Baldiſmer that died without iſſue; alſo Margerie, wife to William Roos of Hamlake; Maude the wife of Iohn Vere Earle of Oxford; Elizabeth eſpouſed to William Bohun Earle of Northampton, and afterward to Edmund Mortimer; and Margaret whom Sir Iohn Tiptoft wedded: from whom deſcended a goodly of-ſpring and faire race of great nobilitie.

Then ſaw I Tenham not commended for health, but the parent as it were of all the choiſe fruit gardens, and Orchards of Kent, and the moſt large and delightſome of them all, planted in the time of King Henrie the Eighth by Rich. Harris his fruterer, to the publike good. For thirty Pariſhes thereabout, are repleniſhed with Cherie-gardens, and Orchards beautifully diſpoſed in direct lines. Amongſt theſe is Feverſham very commodiouſly ſituate. For, the moſt plentifull part of this countrey lieth round about it, and it hath a creeke fit for bringing in and carrying forth commodities; whereby at this day it flouriſheth amongſt all the neighbour townes. It ſeemeth alſo in former times to have flouriſhed, conſidering that King Aethelſtane aſſembled hither an aſſembly the Sages of his Kingdome, and made lawes heere in the yeare of our redemption 903.

King Stephen alſo he that uſurped the Kingdome of England, founded an Abbey heere, for the Monkes of Clugny; In which, himſelfe, Maude his wife, and Euſtach his ſonne were entombed. Nigh thereto, like as elſe where through this Countie, are found pits of great depth, which being narrow in the mouth and very ſpatious beneath have their certaine diſtinct roomes or chambers (as it were) with their ſeverall ſupporting pillers of chalke. Concerning theſe there are divers opinions. I for my part, cannot tell what to thinke of them unleſſe they were thoſe pits, out of which the Britaines in old time digged forth chalke or white marle to dung their grounds withall, as Plinie writeth. For, they ſound pits, ſaith hee, An hundred foote deepe, ſtreight at the mouth, but of great capacitie within: like unto theſe very ſame of which we now ſpeake.

And verily, no where elſe are they found but in a chalkie and marly ſoile. Vnleſſe a man would thinke, that our Engliſh-Saxons digged ſuch caves and holes to the ſame uſe and purpoſe, as the Germans did, of whom they were deſcended. For, they were

A were wont as Tacitus writeth, to make holes and caves under the ground, and thoſe to charge aloft with great heapes of dung, as harbours of refuge for Winter, and garners of receit for corne; becauſe by ſuch like places they mitigate the rigour of cold wether: and if at any time the enemie commeth, hee waſteth onely the open ground: but as for thoſe things that lie hidden and buried under the earth, they are either unknowne, or in this reſpect doe diſappoint the enemies, for that they are to be ſought for. Pits made in Kent.

From above Feverſham, the ſhoare runneth on, plentifull of ſhel-fiſh, but eſpecially oiſters, (whereof there are many pits, or ſtewes) as far as Reculver, and farther. * Reculver. Regulbium.

B This Reculver, is a place of ancient memorie, named in the old Engliſh-Saxon Reaculf, but in elder time REGVLBIVM. For ſo it is named, in the Roman Office booke Notitia Provinciarum; which reporteth that the captaine of the primer band of the Vetaſians lay heere in garriſon under the Lieutenant of the Saxon-ſhoare: (for ſo was the ſea coaſt a-long this tract called) who had the command then of nine Ports, as the L. Warden now hath of five Ports. And verily the Roman Emperours coines digged up there give teſtimony to this antiquitie of the place: In it Aethelbert King of Kent when he had made a grant of Canterbury to Auguſtine the Monk, built himſelfe a Palace, and Baſſa an Engliſh-Saxon beatified it with a Monaſterie, out of which Brightwald the Eighth Archbiſhop of Canterbury was elected. C ſtery, or Minſter it was named Raculf-Minſter, what time as Edred brother to King Edward the Elder gave it to Chriſt-church in Canterbury. Howbeit, at this day it is nothing elſe but an uplandiſh country towne, and if it bee of any name, it hath it for the ſalt ſavory Oiſters there dredged, and for that Minſter; the ſteeples whereof ſhooting up their loftie ſpires ſtand the Mariners in good ſtead, as markes, whereby they avoide certaine ſands and ſhelves in the mouth of the Thames. Five miles from hence the river Stoure dividing his Channell, runneth ſwiftly by DVROVERNVM the chiefe Cittie of this Countie and giveth it his name. For Durwhern in the * Britiſh tongue ſignifieth a ſwift river: Ptolome calleth it in ſteed of Durovernum DARVERNVM, Bede and others DOROBERNIA, the Engliſh Saxons Cant-þapa-bÿriz, that is, The Kentiſhmens citie: Ninnius and the Britans Caer Kent, that is, the Citie of Cent, wee, Canterbury, and the later writers in Latine Cantuaria. A right antient citie this is, and famous, no doubt in the Romans time: not over great (as William of Malmesbury ſaid 400. yeares ſince) nor verie ſmall: much renowned both for the ſituation, and exceeding fertility of the ſoile adjoining, as alſo for the walles whole and undecaied encloſing it round about, by reaſon likewiſe of the rivers watering it, and commodiouſneſſe of woods there about, beſides the vicinity of the ſea, yeelding ſtore of fiſh to ſerve it. Whiles the Saxons Heptarchie flouriſhed, it was the head citie of the kingdome of Kent and the kings ſeat; untill ſuch time as king Ethelbert paſſed a grant of it together with the royalty thereof unto Auguſtin the Apoſtle as they called him, and conſecrated Archbiſhop of the Engliſh Nation, who eſtabliſhed heere his habitation for himſelfe and his ſucceſſors. And albeit the Metropolitan dignity, together with the honour of the Pall (that is an Epiſcopall veſtiment that was comming over the ſhoulders, made of a ſheepe skin, in memoriall of him that ſought the ſtray ſheepe, and having found the ſame laid it upon his ſhoulders, wrought and embroydered with croſſes, firſt laied upon Saint Peters coffin or ſhrine) was ordained by Saint Gregorie the Great then Pope, to bee at London, yet for the honour of Auguſtine it was tranſlated hither. For, Kenulph King of the Mercians thus writeth unto Pope Leo. Becauſe Auguſtine of bleſſed Memorie, the miniſter of Gods word unto the Engliſh Nation, and who moſt glorioufly governed the Churches of Engliſh Saxonie, departed this life in the Cittie of Canterburie, and his bodie was there buried in the Miniſter of Saint Peter Prince of the Apoſtles, the which Laurence his ſucceſſours conſecrated, it hath pleaſed all the wiſe men of our nation, that the Metropolitane honour ſhould bee conferred upon that Citie where his bodie was entombed, who engraffed in theſe parts the veritie of Chriſtian faith. But whether the Archbiſhops See and Metropolitan dignity were here ordeined by authority of the wiſe men of our nation (that is to ſay) the States of the Parliament, (to ſpeake according to our time) or by Auguſtine him ſelfe whiles hee lived, as others would have it: the Biſhops of Rome, who next followed eſtabliſhed the ſame ſo, as they decreed, That to have it ſevered and taken away from thence Auguſtine the Apoſtle of the Engliſhmen.

Pall what it is.

Anno. 7093.

A was an abominable act punishable with Curse and hell-fire. Since which time, it is incredible, how much it hath flourished, in regard both of the Archiepiscopal dignity, and also of that schoole of the better kind of literature which Theodore the seventh Archbishop erected there. And albeit it was sore shaken with the Danish wars, and consumed for a great part thereof sundrie times by casualtie of fire, yet rose it up alwaies againe more beautifull and glorious then before.

After the Normans entrie into this land when King William Rufus, as it was recorded in the Register of Saint Augustines Abbey, Had given the Citie of Canterburie wholly in fee simple unto the Bishops, which before time they had held at the Kings courtesie*
B onely, it begun not onely to get heart againe, what through the fame of the religious piety of godly men there, and what through the bounty of the Bishops, and especially of Simon Sudbury, who rebuilt up the walls new; but grew also as it were upon a sodaine to such a state, that for beauty of private dwelling houses it equalled all the cities of Britaine, but for the magnificent and sumptuous building of religious places and the number of them, it surpassed even those that were most famous. Among which, two especially surmounted all; Christs-church, and Saint Augustines, both of them repleni shed with Monkes of the Order of Saint Benet. And as for Christ-Church, it raiseth it selfe aloft neare the heart of the Citie, with so great a majestie and statelinesse, that it striketh a sensible impression of religion into their
C minds that behold it a farre off. This Church built in old time, as Beda saith, by the faithfull and believing Romans, the same Augustine of whom I spake, got into his hands, consecrated it to Christ, and assigned it to be the seat for his successors: wherein 73. Archbishops in a continued traine of succession have now set. Of whom Lanfranke, and William Corboyle brought the upper part of the Church, and they that succeeded, the nethermore, (where as that the more ancient worke had beene consumed with fire) to that statelinesse which now wee see not without exceeding great charges, which a devout perswasion in former times willingly disbursed. For, a number of high, of low, and of meane degree flocked hither in pilgrimage with very great and rich oblations to visit the tombe of Thomas Becket the Archbishop:
D who being slaine in this Church by Courtiers, for that in maintaining of the Ecclesiasticall liberties, hee had stubbornly opposed himselfe against the King, was matriculated a holy Martyr by the Bishop of Rome, and worshipped as a Saint, and his shrine so loaden with great offerings, that the meanest part of it, was of pure gold, So bright, so shining and glittering, as Erasmus (who saw it) saith, was every corner with rare and exceeding big precious stones: yea, and the Church all round about did abound with more than princelike riches: and as though Christs name to whom it was dedicated, had beene quite forgotten, it came to be called Saint Thomas Church. Neither was it for any thing else so famous, as for his memoriall and sepulture, although it may justly vaunt of many famous mens tombs and monuments: especially, that of Edward sur-E named The Blacke Prince of Wales, a most worthy and renowned Knight for warlike prowesse, and the very wonder of his age: also of Henry the Fourth, a most puissant King of England. But Henry the Eighth scattered this wealth heaped up together in so many ages, and dispersed those Monkes: in lieu of whom were placed in this Christs-Church, a Deane, an Archdeacon, Prebendaries twelve, and Sixe Preachers, who in places adjoyning round about should teach and preach the word of God. The other Church that alwaies mightily strove with this for superioritie, stood by the Cities side Eastward, knowne by the name of Saint Austines: which Augustine himselfe, and King Ethelbert at his exhortation, founded and dedicated to Saint Peter and Paul: that it might be the Sepulture place, both for the Kings of Kent, and also for F the Archbishops; (For, as yet it was not lawfull to bury within Cities) and endowed it with infinite riches, granting unto the Abbat a Mint-house with priviledge to coine money. And now, at this day, notwithstanding the greatest part thereof is buried under his owne ruines, and the rest were converted to the Kings house, yet it sheweth manifestly to the beholders how great a thing it was. Augustine himselfe was enterred in the porch of the same, with this Epitaph, as witnesseth Thomas Spot.

Inclytus

Inclytus Anglorum præsul pius, & decus alium,
Hic Augustinus requiescit corpore sanctus.

The bodie of Saint Augustine doth here interred lie:
A Prelate great, devout also, and Englands honor hie.

But, as Bede reporteth, who rather is to be credited, this was the more ancient Inscription of his tombe.

HIC REQVIESCIT DOMINVS AVGVSTINVS DOROVERNENSIS ARCHIEPISCOPVS PRIMVS, QVI OLIM HVC A BEATO GREGORIO ROMANAE VRBIS PONTIFICE DIRECTVS, ET A DEO OPERATIONE MIRACVLORVM SVFFVLTVS, ET ETHELBERTHVM REGEM AC GENTEM ILLIVS AB IDOLORVM CVLTV AD FIDEM CHRISTI PERDVXIT, ET COMPLETIS IN PACE DIEBVS OFFICII SVI DEFVNCTVS EST SEPTIMO KALENDAS IVNIAS, EODEM REGE REGNANTE.

HERE RESTETH DAN. AVGVSTINE, THE FIRST ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBVRY: VVHO BEING IN TIMES PAST DIRECTED HITHER FROM BLESSED GREGORIE THE BISHOP OF ROME, AND THROVGH THE VVORKING OF MIRACLES SVPPORTED BY GOD, BOTH BROVGHT KING ETHELBERT AND HIS PEOPLE FROM IDOLATRY TO THE FAITH OF CHRIST, AND ALSO AFTER THE DAIES OF HIS FVNCTION ACCOMPLISHED IN PEACE, DIED THE SEVENTH DAY BEFORE THE KALENDS OF IVNE, IN THE SAME KINGS REIGNE.

Together with him in the same porch were buried sixe Archbishops next succeeding, and in memoriall of these seven namely, Austen, Laurence, Mellitus, Iustus, Honorius, Deus-dedit, and Theodosius, were these verses (such as they are) engraven there in marble:

SEPTEM SVNT ANGLIS PRIMATES ET PROTO PATRES, SEPTEM RECTORES, SEPTEM COELOQVE TRIONES;
SEPTEM CISTERNAE VITAE, SEPTEMQVE LVCERNAE; ET SEPTEM PALMAE REGNI, SEPTEMQVE CORONAE, SEPTEM SVNT STELLAE, QVAS HAEC TENET AREA CELLAE.

Seven Patriarchs of England, Primates seven:
Seven Rectors, and seven Labourers in heaven.
Seven Cesternes pure of life, seven Lamps of light
Seven Palmes, and of this Realme seven Crownes full bright, Seven Starres, are heere bestow'd in vault below.

I may not forget another Church neere unto this, built as Bede saith, by the Romans and consecrated to Saint Martin, wherein, before Austens comming, Bertha wife to King Ethelbert, descended from the bloud Royall of France was wont to frequent divine Christian service. Concerning the Castle on the South side of the Citie, the Bulwarks whereof now are decaied, it maketh no shew of any great antiquity, and there is no memorable thing therof come to my knowledge, but only that it was built by the Normans: as touching the dignitie of the See of Canterburie, which in times past carried a great State, I will say nothing but this, that, as in former ages, during the Roman Hierarchie, the Archbishops of Canterbury were Primates of all Britaine, Legates to the Pope, and as Vrbane the second said, The Patriarches, as it were, of another world: so when the Popes authoritie was abrogated, a decree passed in the Synode, Anno, 1534. that laying aside the said title, they should bee stiled Primates and Metropolitanes of all England. Which dignitie the right reverend Father in Christ D. Iohn Whitgift lately held, who devoutly consecrated both his whole life to God, & all his painefull labours to the Church, and in the yeare 1604. slept in the Lord, a Prelate

A late much miſſed of all good men: After whom ſucceeded Doctor Richard Bancroft, a man of ſingular courage and counſaile, in eſtabliſhing and ſupporting the ſtate Eccleſiaſticall. For the Latitude of Canterbury, the Pole Artick is elevated above the Horizon there fifty one degrees and ſixteene minutes, and the Longitude is reckoned to be foure and twenty degrees, and fiftie one minutes.

Stour by this time having gathered his waters all into one ſtreame runneth Hackington.

Afore which time Baldwin Archbiſhop of Canterbury began a Church there in the honour of Saint Stephen, and Thomas of Canterbury. But being inhabited by the Biſhop of Rome his authoritie, × Inhibited liberalitie the poore inhabitants are much beholding) was of late time a right great * ornament: and even ſo is his ſonne at this day Sir Peter Manwood Knight of the Bath, whom I cannot but mention when as he is a favourer of vertue, and learning. From thence Stour paſſeth by Fordich (called the little Burough of Forewich in King Wil-C liam the Conquerours booke) a place of note for excellent good trouts; and ſo in former time to Stoure-mouth, which it hath now forſaken a mile, and more; yet left and The firſt Engliſh Nunne.

of which I have read nothing, but that the Mannour was the inheritance of Iulian Leibourn a Ladie of great honour in her time, who was mother of Laurence Haſtings Inq. a. E. 3.
firſt Earle of Penbrooke of that ſurname, and after wife to William Clinton Earle of Huntingdon. Then it holdeth his courſe by divers villages, which thereof receive the addition of Bourn, as Biſhops-bourn, Hawles-bourn, Patricks-bourn, and Beakes-bourn. This D bourne is that river Stoure as Cæſar calleth it (as I have obſerved travailing lately in theſe parts) which Cæſar came unto, when he had marched by night almoſt twelve Italian miles from the ſea-coaſt, and where hee had the firſt encounter, in his ſecond expedition into Britaine; with the Britaines, whom he drave into the woods, where they had a place fortified both by nature, and mens labour, with a number of trees hewen downe and plaſhed to fore-cloſe the entries, But yet the Romans forced an entrie, drave them out, and there about encamped. The place of campe as I heare, is Herdes.
neare Hardes, a place of ancient Gentlement of that ſurname, deſcended from Eſten grave, Herengod, and the Fitz-Bernards.

Below Stoure-mouth, Stoure dividing his ſtreame taketh two ſeverall waies, and E leaving that name is called In-lade and Wantſume, making the Iſle of Tenet on the Weſt and South ſide: for on all other ſides it is waſhed with the maine Sea. This Iland Solinus named ATHANATON, and in other copies THANATON: the Britaines Iuis Ruhin, as witneſſeth Aſſerius: happily, for Rhutupin, of Rhutupinæ a Citie adjoining. The Engliſh Saxons called it Tanet, and Tanetland, and we Tenet. All the Iſle ſtandeth upon a whitiſh maile, full of goodly corne fields, and being a right fertile ſoile, carrieth in length eight miles, and foure in breadth: reckoned in old time to containe 600. * Families: in ſtead whereof, it is corruptly read in Bede Milliarium Sexcentarum, for, Familiarum Sexcentarum. But whereas Solinus writeth that there is not a * Hides in Engliſh. An hides as it is thought conſiſteth of an hundred acres, called in latine in old time, Familia, Manſa and Manens. Lapis tituli.
ſnake creeping in this Iſle, and that the mould or earth carried from hence killeth ſnakes, it
F is now proved to bee untrue. That Etymologie therefore derived ἀπὸ τοῦ θανάτου, that is, from the death of ſnakes, falleth quite to the ground. Here the Engliſh Saxons landed firſt: here by the permiſſion of Guortigern they firſt ſeated themſelves: here was their place of refuge; and here Guortimor the Britaine made a great ſlaughter of them; when, at Lapis Tituli, (for ſo is that place named in Ninnius which we now call Stouar almoſt in the ſame ſenſe, and haven certainely it was) hee put them to flight flight and forced them with all the ſpeed they might to take their Pinnaces.

In which place alſo, he gave commandement, ſaith he, that himſelfe ſhould bee buried to repreſſe thereby, as he thought, the furious outrages of the Engliſh Saxons: in like ſort as Scipio Africanus did, who commanded that his tombe ſhould bee ſo ſet, as that it might looke toward Africa: ſuppoſing that his verie tombe would be a terror to the Carthaginians. Here alſo at VVipped fleet, (ſo called of VVipped the Saxon there ſlaine) Hengeſt diſcomfited the Britaines and put them to flight, after hee had fore tired them with ſundry conflicts. S. Auſtine our Apoſtle (as they call him) many yeares after landed in this Iſle, unto whoſe bleſſing the credulous Clergie aſcribed the plentifull fertility of the country: and the Monke Gotceline cried out in this manner: O the land of Tenet, happy by reaſon of her fertilitie, but moſt happy for receiving and entertaining ſo many Divine in-commers bringing God with them, or rather ſo many heavenly citizens. Egbert the third King of the Kentiſhmen to pacifie dame Domneva a devout Lady, whom before time he had exceedingly much wronged, granted here a faire piece of land, wherein ſhe erected a Monaſtery for 70. veiled virgins: the prioreſſe whereof was Mildred, for her holineſſe canonized a Saint, and the Kings of Kent beſtowed many faire poſſeſſions upon it, but Withred eſpecially, who (that I may note the antiquitie and manner of livery of Seiſin in that age out of the very forme of his owne Donation) For the full complement of his confirmation thereof, laied upon the holy altar a turfe of that ground which he gave at Humantun. Heere afterward ſundry times arrived the Danes who piteouſly empoveriſhed this Iſland by robbings and pillages, and alſo polluted this Monaſterie of Domneva with all kind of cruelty, that it flouriſhed not againe before the Normans government. Heere alſo landed Lewis of France, who called in by the tumultuous Barons of England againſt King Iohn, publiſhed by their inſtigation a pretended right to the Crowne of England. For that whereas King Iohn for his notorious treaſon againſt King Richard his brother abſent in the Holy-land, was by his Peeres lawfully condemned, and therefore after the death of King Richard the right of the Crowne was devolved to the Queene of Caſtile ſiſter to the ſaid King Richard; and that ſhee and her heires had conveied over their right to the ſaid Lewis, and his wife her daughter: Alſo that King Iohn had forfeited his Kingdome both by the murther of his Nephew Arthur, whereof he was found guilty by his Peeres in France, and alſo by ſubjecting his Kingdomes which were alwaies, free to the Pope, as much as in him lay, contrary to his oath at his Coronation, and that without the conſent of the Peeres of the Realme, &c. Which I leave to Hiſtorians, with the ſucceſſe of his expedition, leaſt I might ſeeme to digreſſe extraordinarily.

Chronicles of W. Thorn.

Neither muſt I paſſe over heere in ſilence, that which maketh for the ſingular praiſe of the inhabitants of Tenet, thoſe eſpecially which dwell by the roads or harbours of Margate, Ramſgate and Brodſtear. For, they are paſſing induſtrious, and as if they were Amphibii, that is, both land creatures, and ſea creatures, get their living both by ſea and land, as one would ſay with both theſe elements: they be Fiſher-men and Plough-men: as well Husband-men as Mariners: and they that hold the plough-taile in earing the ground, the ſame hold the helme in ſteering the ſhip. According to the ſeaſon of the yeare, they knit nets, they fiſh for Cods, Herrings, Mackarels, &c. they ſaile, and carry forth Merchandiſe. The ſame againe dung and mannure their grounds, Plough, Sow, harrow, reape their Corne and they inne it. Men moſt ready and well appointed both for ſea and land: and thus goe they round and keepe a circle in theſe their labours. Futhermore whereas that otherwhiles there happen ſhipwrackes heere, (for there lie full againſt the ſhore thoſe dangerous flats, ſhallowes, ſhelves, and ſands, ſo much feared of Sailers, which they uſe to call, The Goodwinſands, The Brakes, The four-foots, The whitdick, &c.) theſe men are wont to beſtir themſelves luſtily in recovering both ſhips, men, and Merchandize endangered.

Rhutupia. Portus Trutulenſis.

At the mouth of Wantſum Southward, (which men thinke hath changed his channell) over againſt the Iſle ſtood a City, which Ptolomee calleth RHVTVPIAE; Tacitus, PORTVS TRVTVLENSIS, for Rhutupenſis, if Beatus Renanus conjecture truly:

truely: Antonine, RHITVPIS PORTVS, Ammianus Marcellinus, RHVTVPIAE STATIO, that is, the Road of Rhutupiæ, Oroſius, THE HAVEN and City of Rhutubus: the old Engliſh-Saxons as Beda witneſſeth, Reptaceſter, others Ruptimuth, Alfred of Beverly nameth it Richberge: we at this day, Richborow: Thus hath time ſported in varying of one and the ſame name. Whence this name ſhould ariſe, it is not for certaine knowen. But ſeeing the places neere unto it, as Sandwich and Sandiby have their denomination of Sandi: I conſidering alſo, that Rhyd Tuſith in the Britiſh-tongue betokeneth a ſandy fourd, I would willingly if I durſt, derive it from thence: This City ſeemed to have beene ſeated on the deſcent of an hill, the Caſtle there ſtood overlooking from an higher place the Ocean which is now ſo farre excluded by reaſon of ſandy reſidence inbealched with the tides, that it comes hardly within a mile of it. Right famous and of great name was this City while the Romans ruled here. From hence was the uſual paſſing out of Britan to France and the Neatherlands at it, the Roman fleets arrived here, it was that Lupicinus ſent by * Conſtantius the Emperour into Britaine for to repreſſe the rodes and invaſions of Scots and Picts both, landed the Heruli, and Batavians, and Mæſian regiments. Heere alſo Theodoſius the father of Theodoſius the Emperour, to whom as Symmachus witneſſeth, the Senate decreed for pacifying Britan armed Statues on horſe-backe, arrived with his Herculij, Iovij, Victores & Fidentes, for theſe were names of Roman regiments. Afterwards when the Saxon Pirates impeached entercourſe of merchants and infeſted our coaſts with continuall piracies, the Second Legion Auguſta, which being remooved by the Emperour Claudius out of Germany had remained many yeares in Garriſon at Iſca Silurum* in Wales, was tranſlatd hither, and had a Provoſt of their owne heere under the great Lieutenant and Count of the Saxon ſhore. Which Provoſtſhip happily, that Clemens Maximus bare, who being heere in Britan by the ſoldiers ſaluted Emperour, ſlew Gratian, the lawfull Emperour; and was afterwards himſelfe ſlaine by Theodoſius at Aquileia: For, this Maximus it was whom Auſonius in the verſes of Aquileia, called the Rhutupine robber.

*The younger.

* Caer Leon.

Clemens Maximus.

* Maximus armigeri quondam ſub nomine lixæ.
Felix quæ tanti ſpectatrix læta triumphi,
Fudiſti Auſonio Rhutupinum Marte latronem.

* See how theſe verſes are engliſhed in pag. 83.

The ſame Poet alſo in his Poem Parentalia, preſerved the memory of Flavius Sanctus another Preſident or Governour of Rhutupiæ, concerning whom thus hee wrote.

Militiam nullo qui turbine ſedulus egit,
Præſide lætatus quo Rhutupinus ager.
His martiall ſervice who diſcharg'd with care without all ſtirre,
And Rutupin rejoyce in him, who was their governour.

There bee that under the name of Rhutupine would have all Britans to be underſtood.

Auſonius likewiſe in a lamentable funerall verſe, ſetteth forth the praiſe of Claudius Contentus his Vncle, who being overtaken with death left behind him unto ſtrangers a mighty ſtock of money which hee had put out to uſury among the Britaines and encreaſed by intereſt; and was heere alſo enterred.

Et patruos Elegia meos reminiſcere cantus,
Contentum, tellus quem Rhutupina tegit.
My dolefull Muſe now call to minde the ſongs of Vnkle mine,
Contentus, who enterred lies within mould Rhutupine.

This Rhutupiæ flouriſhed alſo after the comming in of the Engliſh Saxons. For, writers record, that it was the Royall Palace of Ethelbert King of Kent; and Bede gave it the name of a City. But ever ſince, it beganne to decay: neither is the name of it read in any place afterward, as farre as I know, but in Alfred of Beverley, who hath put downe in writing, that Alcher with a power of Kentiſh-men at this towne, then called Richberge, foiled and defeated the Danes encombered with the ſpoiles they had before gotten.

Now hath time razed out all the footings and tractes thereof, and to teach us that Cities as well as men have their fatall periods, it is a verie field at this daie, wherein when the corne is come uppe a man may ſee the draughts of ſtreetes croſſing one another: (For, whereſoever the ſtreetes went, there the corne is thinne) which the common people terme Saint Auguſtins Croſſe. And there remaine onely certaine walles of a Caſtle of rough flinte, and long Britan brickes in forme of a quadrant and the ſame cemented with lime, and a moſt ſtiffe binding ſand, mightily ſtrengthened by tract of time, ſo that the cement is as hard as the ſtone. Over the entrie whereof is fixed a head of a perſonage engraven in ſtone, ſome ſay it was Queene Berthas head, but I take it to bee a Romane worke, a man would deeme this to have beene the Citadell or keepe of the City, it ſtands on ſuch a height over-looking the low grounds in Tenet, which the Ocean by little and little ſhrinking away hath now left. Moreover, the plot whereon the Citie ſtood, being now plowed up, doth oftentimes diſcover peeces of Romane coines as well gold as ſilver, evident tokens of the antiquity thereof: and a little beneath ſhee ſheweth a daughter of hers, which the Engliſh Saxons of ſand called Sonꝺþỳc, and wee, Sandwich. This beeing one of the Cinque-ports, as they terme them, is on the North and Weſt ſide, fortified with walles and on other parts fenced with a rampier, river and ditch. The haven by reaſon of ſand choaking it, and a great ſhippe of burden belonging to Pope Paule the Fourth, which was accidentallie ſunke in the verie channell thereof, is not deepe enough to beare any tall veſſells.

Sandwich.

In ancient times it ſundrie times felt the furious forces of the Danes, afterward King Canutus the Dane when hee had gained the Crowne of England, beſtowed it upon Chriſts-Church in Canterburie with the royaltie of the water on each ſide, ſo farre forth as a ſhippe beeing a floate, a man might caſt a Daniſh hatcher out of the veſſell to the banke. In the Norman raigne it was reckoned one of the Cinque ports, and to finde five ſhippes. In the yeare 1217. Lewis of France of whom wee ſpake lately, burned it, King Edward the firſt for a time placed heere the ſtaple, and King Edward the Third by exchange reunited it to the Crowne. About which time there flouriſhed heere a familie ſurnamed De Sandwico, which had matched with one of the heires of Creve-cur, and Dauranches, Lord of Folkeſto, and deſerved well of this place. In the time of King Henrie the Sixth it was burned by the French. In our daies Sir Roger Manwood chiefe Baron of the Exchequer native of this place, built, and endowed heere a free-ſchoole, and the Netherlanders have bettered the towne by making, and trading of Baies, and other commodities.

Beneath Rhutupiæ, Ptolomee placeth the Promontorie CANTIVM as the utmoſt cape of this Angle, which in ſome copies is corruptly written NVCANTIVM and ACANTIVM: Diodorus as corruptly calleth it CARION, and we at this day the Foreland of Kent. Now all theſe ſhores on every ſide, are of this Rhutupiæ by the Poets termed Rhutupina littora. Hence it is, that Iuvenall ſatyrically inveighing againſt Curtius Montanus a dainty and delicious glutton, ſpeaking of oyſters carried from this ſhore to Rome, hath theſe verſes.

A when it is come as farre as Sandon (that is to ſay the Downe of Sand), and to Deale, and Walmer, three Neighbour Caſtles, which King Henrie the Eighth, within the remembrance of our Fathers built, it ſetleth low, and in a flat and open plaine lieth full againſt the ſea. At this Deale, or Dole: as Ninnius calleth it (and that truely in mine opinion: For, our Britains at this day doe ſo terme a plaine lying low and open upon ſea or river) the conſtant report goes that Iulius Cæſar did arrive: and Ninnius avoucheth as much, who in barbarous Latine wrote thus, Cæſar ad Dole bellum pugnavit, that is, At Dole Cæſar fought a battaile. A Table likewiſe ſet up in Dover Caſtle confirmeth the ſame: yea and Cæſar himſelfe verifieth it: who reporteth that B he landed upon an open and plaine ſhore, and that the Britaines welcommed and received him with a hote and dangerous encounter. Whereupon, our Countrey man Leland in his Swans ſong Sandon. Deale. where Cæſar arrived.

For hee, (give mee leave I pray you to digreſſe awhile out of my courſe) having, (as Pomponius Sabinus reporteth out of Seneca) wonne all that was to bee gotten by ſea and land, caſt his eie to the Ocean, and as if the Romane world C would not ſuffice him, bethought him ſelfe upon another world: and with a fleete of a thouſand ſaile (for ſo writeth Athenæus out of Cotas, either to bee revenged of the Britains who aided the Gaules (as Strabo ſaith; or in hope of Britiſh pearles, as Suetonius reporteth: or inflamed with an ambitious deſire of glory, as others doe record, in the yeare before Chriſts nativitie fiftie foure, and once againe in the yeare enſuing, entred into Britaine: having before hand ſounded the havens by his eſpialls, as Suetonius, and himſelfe doth teſtifie; and not, as Roger Bachon fableth, by ſetting certaine looking glaſſes upon the coaſt of Gaule, and by Art perſpective, which by reflection multiplieth hidden formes. What hee exploited here, himſelfe hath at large delivered in his Commentaries; and I likewiſe before have ſummaD rily abridged out of him, and the writings of Suetonius concerning Scæva, whoſe valourous ſervice during the civill warre was notably ſeen above others at Dyrrachium, and whom our Poet Ioſeph of Exceſter in his Antiocheis, and namely in theſe his verſes touching Britaine, reported (I know not how truely) to have beene a Britaine borne.

Cæſars entry into Britaine.

In his booke de Arte et Natura.

Hinc et Scæva ſatus, pars non obſcura tumultus
Civilis, MAGNVM ſolus qui mole ſolutâ
Obſedit, meliorq; ſtetit pro Cæſare murus.
Here borne alſo was Scæva, he that bare no little ſway
In all theſe civill broiles; the Fort that ſtood full in his way
E Alone he brake, Pompey beſieged, was Cæſars ſtrongeſt ſtay.

But what were the exploits of Cæſar in this our country, learne you may of himſelfe, and out of that which hath before beene written. For, neither as yet, have I met with that old father a Britaine, whom Marcus Aper, as we read in Quintilian, ſaw in this Iſland; who avowed that he was preſent at the battaile, in which they aſſaied to keepe Cæſar from landing, when he came to warre upon them: neither is it any part of my meaning now to write an Hiſtorie, but a Topographie.

See page 34, 35, &c.

Vpon this ſhore, lie out with a long traine certaine heapes in manner of bankes or rampiers, which ſome imagine that the winde ſwept up together. But I ſuppoſe them to have beene a fence and countermure, or rather the Ship-campe, which Cæſar F raiſed with ten daies and as many nights labour, to haile up thereto his ſea-beaten and ſhaken Navie, and to defend it, both againſt tempeſts and alſo the Britaines, who in vaine did aſſaile it.

Caſtra navalia. Cæſars ſhip-campe.

For I underſtand by relation of the dwellers, thereby, that this rampier is called Romes-worke, as if it were A worke of the Romans. And ſo much the rather believe I, that Cæſar arrived heere, becauſe hee writeth, that ſeven miles from hence, (for, ſo wee reade in the ancient bookes, corrected by Flavius Conſtantinus a man of Conſul degree) the ſea is kept in and compaſſed with ſuch ſtreight mountaines that for the higher places a dart may bee flung to the very ſhore: verily as ſoone as we are paſt Deale, a mightie ridge of ſteepe high Cliffs, Cicero termeth them moles magnificas, that is, Stately cliffes bringing forth Samphyre in great plenty, runneth for ſeven miles or there about, as far as to Dover: where it openeth it ſelfe: and of that nature is the place, that, right as Cæſar writeth, betweene two hills it letteth in and encloſeth the ſea. Within this partition and ſeparation of the Cliffes lieth DVBRIS, which Antonine the Emperour mentioneth, the Saxons name it Dorpa, and we Dover. This name was given unto it, as Darell out of Eadmer writeth, becauſe the place was ſhut up and hard to come unto. For, when as, (ſaith he) in ancient times the ſea there barbarous ſpreaded it ſelfe upon urgent neceſſitie to make it a more commodious haven, they kept it in with more ſtreight bounds. Howbeit, William Lambard, with more probabilitie fetched the reaſon of this name from the word Dufyrrha, which in the Britiſh language betokeneth a place ſteepe and upright.

The towne which is ſeated betweene high clyffes (whereas ſome-time the haven was, when the ſea more inſinuated it ſelfe, as wee collect by the anchors and ſhip planks that are digged there up; is more famous for the commodiouſneſſe of the haven, (ſuch as it is) and for readie paſſage into France, than for any elegancie, or great trade. For it is a place of paſſage of all other moſt haunted, and it was provided in old time by a ſpeciall Statute, that no man going forth of the realme in pilgrimage, ſhould elſe where embarque and take ſea: more-over it is reckoned one of the Cinque-ports, and in times paſt it was charged to furniſh and ſet out one and twenty ſhips unto the warres, in the ſame manner and forme as Haſtings did, whereof I have already ſpoken. Toward the ſea (now ſomewhat excluded by Beach) it was fenced with a wall; whereof ſome part as yet ſtandeth. It had a faire church conſecrated unto Saint Martin, founded by Whitred King of Kent, an houſe alſo of the Knights-Templars, which now are quite gone, and nothing to bee ſeene of them: It yeildeth likewiſe a ſeat for the Archbiſhop of Canterburies Suffragans, who when the Archbiſhop is buſied in weightier affaires, mannageth for him matters that pertaine to Orders onely, and not to the Epiſcopall juriſdiction. From the top of a rough and craggie cliffe which mounteth up to a wonderfull height, where it looketh downe to the ſea: a moſt ſtatey Caſtle like unto a prettie Citie fortified right ſtrongly with bul-warkes and many a Tower, overlooketh and threatneth after a ſort the ſeaſunder it: Matthew of Paris calleth it the Key and Locke, The Barre and Sparre of England. The common ſort of people dreameth, that it was built by Iulius Cæſar, and verily I ſuppoſe by the Britiſh Bricks in the Chappell there, that it was built by the Romans, who uſed ſuch in their great buildings. What time as the Roman Empire declined, they placed here a band or companie of the Tungricanes, who were accounted among the Aides-Palatine: out of whoſe armoury and munition happily were thoſe big arrowes, which the Caſtellanes doe now ſhew for wonders, and were wont to bee diſcharged then, and many yeares after, before the invention of great Ordnance, out of engines called Baliſtæ like huge croſſe-bowes bent by force of two or foure men.

In Suſſex.

From the entrance of the Engliſh Saxons into this land, unto the expiation of their Kingdome, no where could I as yet reade ſo much as one bare word of this Caſtle or the Towne; ſave onely in certaine by-notes out of a Table, that was heere hanged upon a wall; which reported that Cæſar, having arrived at Deale, and diſcomfited the Britaines at Baramdowne (which is a plaine adjoyning, fit for horſe fight, and meete to embattaile an armie in) began the Caſtle of Dover; and that Arviragus afterward fortified it againſt the Romans, and ſtopped up the haven. Alſo, that after him King Arthur and his knights vanquiſhed I wot not what rebels heere. Howbeit a little before the Normans comming in, it was reputed the onely defence and ſtrength of England: and for that cauſe William Duke of

A of Normandie, bound Harold by on oath to deliver up into his hands this Caſtle together with the well, what time as he aſpired to the Kingdome: and after hee had ſettled his eſtate and affaires at London, thought it good before all other things to fortifie this peece, and to aſſigne faire lands in Kent unto Gentlemen to bee held in Caſtle-guard, with this condition to be in readineſſe with certaine numbers of men for defence of the ſame: which ſervice notwithſtanding at this day is redeemed with a yearely paiment of money. For, when Sir Hubert de Burgh was Conſtable of this Caſtle, (to uſe the words of an old writer) he weighed with himſelfe that it was not ſafe for the Caſtle to have every moneth new warders for the Caſtle guard, procured by the aſſent B of the King and all that held of that Caſtle, that every one ſhould ſend for the ward of one moneth tenne ſhillings: and that therewith certaine men elected and ſworne, as well horſe as foote, ſhould be waged, for to gard the Caſtle. It is written, that Phillip ſurnamed Auguſtus King of France, when Lewis his ſonne, went about to gaine the Crowne of England, had wonne certaine Cities and Forts, and could not get this, being manfully defended by the ſaid Sir Hubert de Burgh: ſaid thus. Verily my ſonne hath not one foote of land in England, untill he be Maſter of Dover Caſtle: as beeing in very deed the ſtrongeſt hold of all England and moſt commodious for the French. Vpon the other cliffe which ſtandeth over againſt it, and beareth up his head, in manner, even with it, are extant the remaines of a very ancient building. One, I know not upon what rea- C ſon induced, ſaid it was Cæſars Altar. But Iohn Twin of Canterbury a learned old man, who in his youth ſaw a great part thereof ſtanding whole and entire, aſſured me, that it had beene a Watch-towre to give night light and direction to ſhips. Like as there ſtood another oppoſite unto it at Bologne in France, erected there by the Romans, and long after reedified by Charles the Great (as Regino witneſſeth, in whom Phanum, for Pharum, is falſly read, which at this day the French terme Tour de Order, and the Engliſh, The old man of Bullen. Vnder this cliffe, Henry the Eighth, in our fathers daies with exceeding labour, and 63000. pounds charges, by pitching huge poſts faſt within the very ſea, and the ſame bound together with yron worke, and heaping thereupon a deale of timber and ſtones, brought up a mightie Pile which we call, D The Peere, wherein the ſhips might more ſafely ride. But the furious violence of the raging Ocean ſoone overcame the laudable endeavour of that puiſſant Prince, and ſo the frame of this worke beaten continually upon with the waves, became diſ-joyned. For the repaire whereof, Queene Elizabeth laid out a great ſumme of money, and the Authoritie of Parliament impoſed upon every Engliſh ſhip that carry forth or bring in merchandiſe a certaine toll upon Tonneage for certaine yeares.

Caſtleguard changed.

This Sea coaſt of Britaine is ſeperated from the Continent of Europe by a frete or ſtreight, where, as ſome ſuppoſe the Seas brake in and made way betweene the lands. Solinus calleth it Fretum Gallicum, Tacitus, and Ammianus Macellinus, Fretum Oceani, and Oceanum Fretalem, Gratius the Poet:

E Freta Morinum dubio refluentia ponto.

The narrow Seas on Bollen-coaſt that keepe uncertaine tides.

They of the Netherlands call it Dehofden, of the two heads or promontories: we the Narrow-ſea, and The ſtrait of Calais, as the Frenchmen, Pas de Callais. For, this is the place as ſaith a Poet of our time.

The ſtreight of Calais or narrow ſeas.

——gemini quà janua ponti
Faucibus anguſtis, latèque frementibus undis
Gallorum Anglorumque vetat concurrere terras.
Where current of two ſeas
In gullet ſtreight, wherein throughout, their billowes rage and fret
F Keepes France and England ſo a part, as though they never met.

The narrow ſea, as Marcellinus truly writeth, ſwelleth at every tide with terrible high flouds, and againe at the ebbe, becommeth as flat as a plaine field: if it be not raiſed with winds, and counter ſeas betweene two riſings of the moone it floweth twice and ebbeth as oft. For, as the Moone aſcendeth toward the Meridian, and is ſet againe under the Horizon in the juſt oppoſite point, the Ocean heere ſwelleth mightily, and the huge billowes ruſh upon the ſhores with ſo great a noiſe that the Poet might well ſay, Rhutupináq; littora fervent. And Rhutup ſhore doth boile and billow, and D. Paulinus, where he ſpeaketh of the County of Bulloigne, which he termeth the utmoſt skirt of the world, not without cauſe uſed theſe words, Oceanum barbaris fluctibus frementem, that is, The Ocean raging and roaring with barbarous billowes.

Whether Britanie was in time paſt joyned unto France.

Heere might ariſe a queſtion beſeeming a learned man that hath wit and time at will, whether, where this narrow ſea runneth between France and Britaine now, there was a narrow banke or necke of land that in times paſt conjoyned theſe regions, and afterwards being broken either by the generall deluge, or by ruſhing in of the waves, or elſe by occaſion of ſome earth-quake, did let in the waters to make a through paſſage. Verily, as no man makes doubt that the face of the whole earth hath beene altered, partly by the ſaid deluge, and partly by long continuance of time and other cauſes: as alſo that Ilands by earthquakes, or the ſhrinking back of waters were laid and joyned unto firme lands: ſo, moſt certainly it appeareth by authors of beſt credite, that Ilands by reaſon of earthquakes and the breaking in of waters were ſevered, diſjoyned, and rent from the Continent. Whereupon Pythagoras in Ovid ſaith thus:

Vidi ego quod quondam fuerat ſolidiſſima tellus
Eſſe fretum; vidi factas ex æquore terras.

My ſelfe have ſeene maine ground ſometime turned into ſea and ſand,
And ſeene I have againe the Sea, became maine ſetled land.

Strabo gathering of things to come by thoſe that are paſt, concluded that ſuch Iſthmi, neckes, or narrow bankes of land, both have beene, and ſhall bee wrought and pierced through. You ſee, ſaith Seneca, whole regions violently removed from their places, and now to lie beyond the Sea, which lay before bounding upon it and hard by. You ſee, there is ſeparation made both of Countries and nations, when as ſome part of nature is provoked of it ſelfe: or when the mighty wind beateth ſtrongly upon ſome ſea: the force whereof, as in generall, is wonderfull. For, although it rage but in part, yet it is of the univerſall power that ſo it rageth. Thus hath the ſea rent Spaine from the Continent of Africke: Thus by Deucalions floud ſo much ſpoken of by the greateſt Poets, was Sicilie out from Italy. And hereupon Virgil wrote thus,

Hæc loca vi quondam, & vaſta convulſa ruinâ
(Tantum ævi longinqua valet mutare vetuſtas)
Diſſiluiſſe ferunt, cùm protinùs utraque tellus
Vna foret, venit medio vi pontus & undis,
Heſperium Siculo latus abſcidit, arvaq; & urbes
Littore diductas anguſto interluit æſtu.

Theſe lands whilom by violence of breach and ruines great,
(Such change makes time, and what is it that long time doth not eate?)
A ſunder fell (men ſay) where as they both in one did grow,
The Seas brake in by force, and through the mids did overthrow Both townes and grounds. And Italy forthwith from Sicily ſide, Did cut, and them with in-let ſtreight doth ſtill part and divide.

Plinie ſheweth likewiſe of Iſles, that Cyprus was rent from Syria, Eubæa, from Baotia, Besbicus, from Bythinia, being parts before of the maine land: But none of the old writers was ever able to avouch, that Britaine was ſo ſevered from the Maine: onely thoſe verſes of Virgil and Claudian before cited by me in the very firſt entrance into this worke, together with the conjecture of Servius Honoratus doe inſinuate ſo much. And yet, Dominicus Marius Niger, and Maſter Iohn Twin a right learned man, and whoſoever he was that wreſted theſe verſes made of Scicilia, unto Britaine, are of this opinion:

——Britannia quondam
Gallorum pars una fuit, ſed pontus & æſtus
Mutavere ſitum, rupit confinia Nereus
Victor: & abſciſſos interluit æquore montes.

Some

——Some time was Britannie
A part of France. But ſwelling tides on hie
Have changed the ſite; and Nereus he, as Conquerour hath torne
The confines quite, and runnes betweene the cliffs a founder worne.

Conſidering therefore, that in this matter there is no aſſured ground upon certaine authoritie; the learned, by laying and comparing the like examples in ſuch narrow Seas as this, for ſearching out of the truth; propoſe theſe and ſuch like points duly to be weighed and conſidered.

B Firſt, whether the nature of the ſoyle in both ſhores be the ſame; which verily is found here to be even ſo: For the ſhore of either ſide, where the diſtance betweene is narroweſt, riſeth up with loftie cliffes, of the ſame matter, as it were, and colour, ſo as they may ſeeme to have beene riven aſunder.

Secondly, How great the breadth is of the ſea or ſtreight. Certes, the ſtreight heere is not much broader, than either the ſtreight of Gibraltar, or of Scicily: to wit, twenty foure miles over: ſo as at the firſt ſight, one would imagine that theſe lands were ſevered by the billowes of the raging counter-ſeas. For that the land ſunke downeward by earth-quakes, I hardly dare thinke, ſeeing that this our Northen climate of the world is ſeldome ſhaken with earth-quakes, and thoſe when they happen, be never great.

C Thirdly, How deepe the ſtreight is. As the Streight of Sicilie is founded in depth 80. paces, ſo this of ours exceedeth not 25. fathom, whereas the ſea on both ſides of it is much deeper.

Fourthly, Of what nature the ground is in the bothoms, ſtony, ſandy, beachy, or elſe oaſy, and muddy. And whether there be beds or ſhelves of ſand lying ſcattered in the ſaid narrow ſea? I have learned of Sailers that there lieth but * one banke, and the ſame in the very mid-channell, which at a low water is ſcarce 3. fathom deepe, But within halfe a league to the South-ward it is 27. fathom deepe, and to the North-ward 25.

* Frowen ſhoale.

D Laſtly, Whether any place in either of the two ſhores taketh name in the ancient language, of a breach, a plucking away, diviſion, ſeparation or ſuch like? as Rhegium which ſtandeth upon the Sicilian Streight, is named of the Greeke word Ῥηγνυμι that is, to breake, becauſe in that place, by the violent force of waves Sicilie was broken off from Italie. But thinking, as I doe heereof, I can meet with none, unleſſe one would ſuppoſe that Vitſan upon the French ſhore, had the name from Gwith, which in the * Britiſh tongue betokeneth a diviſion or ſeparation.

* Welch.

They that would have Britaine to have been the very continent of Gaule after that univerſall deluge, argue from the wolves, whereof there were many among us in old time, like as at this day in Scotland and Ireland.

E How, ſay they, could there be any of them in Ilands conſidering that all beaſts and living creatures periſhed which were not in the Arke? unleſſe a long time after, the earth had beene paſſable throughout, and no Iſles at all. This queſtion buſied Saint Auguſtine, but unto it he anſwereth thus, Wolves and other beaſts may bee thought to have ſwome over the ſea unto Ilands, yet onely to neere adjoyning Ilands (as ſtags yearely for their reliefe and food ſwim out of Italy into Cicily). But ſome Iſles there be ſo far remote from maine lands, that it is to be thought no beaſt could ſwim over. If it ſhould bee ſaid, men caught them and ſo brought them over with them, it carrieth ſome credit, that this might well have beene for the delight they had in hunting. Although it cannot bee denied but by the commandement or permiſſion of God even by the worke of Angels they F might have beene tranſported. But if ſo be they ſprung out of the earth according to their firſt originall, when as God ſaid, Let the earth bring forth a living ſoule, *then it appeareth much more evidently, that all kind of living creatures were in the Arke, not ſo much for the encreaſe and reparation of them, as to * figure out ſundry Nations for the ſacrament of the church, in caſe the earth, brought forth many creatures in thoſe Ilands, whereto they can not paſſe.* Thus Philoſophizeth he. Neither is any man able upon this argument to pronounce any thing more ſufficiently and exquiſitely. For me, it may ſuffice, that I have propounded

De Civitate Dei lib. 16. c. 7.

* As a type of the Gentiles calling.

propounded thereof, let the Reader throughly waigh and examine it. And hee that is able in this point to ſee deepeſt what is moſt true, verily I will report him a man right skilfull and deepely quick-ſighted. A Morini. On the other ſide in the Firme-land, inhabited the MORINI, ſo called in the ancient Gaules tongue, as it were Maritimi, ſive Maris accolæ, men dwelling upon the Sea-coaſt, or hard by the ſea. Their countrey is now termed Conto de Guines, and Conte de Bolonois, and had in old time two places of very great name, to wit GESSORIACVM, and ITIVM, * whence, as Cæſar hath recorded, there was the beſt and moſt commodious paſſing out of Gaule or France into Britain, and moſt Authors thinke it was that towne which now they call Callais. But that famous and learned man Hoſpitalius, Chancellour of France, a very skilfull Antiquary, avoucheth, that Callais is no ancient towne, but was only a ſmall village, ſuch as the French-men terme Burgados, untill that Philip Earle of Bolen, walled it about, not very many yeares before the Engliſh won it. Neither is it red in any place, that men tooke ſhipping there for Britaine, before thoſe times. I thinke therefore that Itium is to bee ſought ſome where elſe: that is to ſay, below, at Vitſan, neere unto Blackneſſe, which we call Whitſan, the word ſounding not much unlike to Itium. For, that all men croſſed over out of this Iland thither, and embarqued there to ſaile hither, wee obſerved out of our owne hiſtories: in ſo much as certaine lands were held in Coperland neere Dover by ſervice to hold the Kings head betweene Dover and Whit-ſand when ſoever hee croſſed the Sea there. And Lewis the younger French King when he came in devout pilgrimage to viſit Thomas of Canterbury, beſought that ſaint by way of moſt humble interceſſion, that no paſſenger might miſcarry by ſhipwracke betweene Vitſan and Dover; as who would ſay, that at the ſame time, that was the uſual paſſage to and fro: neither in truth, is this narrow ſea elſe where more ſtreightned: although it is to bee ſuppoſed, that they who ſaile betweene, in paſſing over did not reſpect the neerer way and ſhorter cut in ſailing, but the commodiouſneſſe of the havens in the one ſhoare, and the other. For even ſo, albeit the ſea be narroweſt, betweene Blackneſſe in France, and the Neſſe in England, yet now the ordinary paſſing is betweene Dover and Callais: as in former ages, before that Vitſan haven was dammed up, the paſſage was betweene it and Dover: and before that time, betweene Rhutupiæ and Geſſoriacum: From whence Claudius the Emperour and the other captaines, whom I have ſpoken of, ſailed over into Britaine. This GESSORIACVM, Pliny ſeemeth to call, Portum Morinorum Britannicum, peradventure for the paſſage from thence into Britaine Ptolomee, in whom it hath crept into the place of Itium, nameth it Geſſoriacum Navale, in which ſignification alſo our Welſh-Britans commonly terme it Bowling-long, that is, Bolne the ſhip-road.

* That is from Itius Portus.

The ſhorteſt paſſage betweene France and Britaine.

Geſſoriacum.

For that Geſſoriacum was the very ſame Sea-coaſt towne, which Ammianus calleth BONONIA, the Frenchmen Bologne, the Low-country men Beunen, and wee Bolen, I dare bee bold to aver and maintaine againſt Hector Boethius, and Turnebus: grounding my aſſertion both upon the authoritie of Beatus Rhenanus, who ſaw an ancient military Map, wherein was written Geſſoriacum quod nunc Bononia, that is, Geſſoriacum, now called Bolen: and alſo upon Itinerarie computation, or account of the miles, which anſwereth juſt to the diſtance that Antonine the Emperour hath put downe betvveene Ambiani and Geſſoriacum. But, that which may ſerve in ſteed of all prooſes. B C D E

Tabula Pentegeriana, now ſet forth by M. Welſer. Bononia Galliæ.

The rablement of Pyrates ſerving under Carauſius, which the Panegirick Oration, pronounced unto Conſtantius the Emperour, reported to have beene incloſed and ſhut up within the walles of Geſſoriacum and there ſurpriſed: an other Oration unto Conſtantius Maximus his ſonne, relateth to have beene vanquiſhed at Bononia: ſo that Bononia, that is, Bolen, and Geſſoriacum muſt needs be one and the ſelfe ſame place: and it may ſeeme, that the more ancient name was vvorne out much about that time. For it is not to be ſurmiſed, that ſo grave authors unto the great Princes erred in the ſetting downe and naming of this place, the memory thereof being then ſo freſh, and that victory ſo glorious. But, what have I to doe with France?

Pag. 272. in Baſil edition and pag. 251. F

Heereby

A Verily, I have the more willingly ripped up the memorie of theſe matters, for that the proweſſe and valour of our Anceſtours ſhewed it ſelfe often in this coaſt; as who wonne and wreſted both Calais and Bolen from the French. And as for Bolen, they rendred it backe againe at the humble requeſt of the French King aftereight yeares, for a ſumme of money agreed upon. But Callais they held 212. yeare in deſpight and maugre of the French. Now returne wee to Britaine with full ſailes and a favourable tide.

From (Dover, leaving the little Abbey of Bradſole dedicated to S. Radegund, whereof Hugh the firſt Abbat was founder) there runneth for five miles in length a con-
B tinued cheine of chalky cliffes ſtanding on a row, hanging joyntly one to another, as far as to Folkſtone: which was a flouriſhing place in times paſt, as may appeare by the pieces of Roman coine and Britaine brickes daily there found: but under what name, it is uncertaine. Probable it is, that it was one of thoſe towres or holds which in the reigne of Theodoſius the younger, the Romans placed for to keep off the Saxons, as Gildas ſaith, At certaine diſtances along the ſhore, in the South part of Britaine.

Famous it was and much frequented by the Engliſh Saxons, for religions ſake, by reaſon of a Monaſterie that Eanſwide daughter to Eadbald King of Kent conſecrated there unto Nunnes: But now it is a ſmall towne, and the greateſt part thereof the Sea hath, as it were, parted away. Howbeit, it was the Baronie of the Family de Abrincis,
C or Aurenches: From whom it came to Sir Hamon Crevequer, and by his daughter to Sir Iohn of Sandwich, whoſe grand child Iulian by his ſonne Iohn, brought the ſame as her dowry to Iohn Segrave.

From thence, as the ſhore turneth a front South Weſt-ward Sandgate Caſtle, built by King Henry the Eighth defendeth the coaſt, and upon a Caſtle hill thereby are ſeene reliques of an ancient Caſtle. More inward is Saltwood a Caſtle of the Biſhops of Canterbury which William Courtney Archbiſhop of Canterbury enlarged. And neere unto it is Oſten-hanger, where Sir Edward Poinings Baneret a father of many faire baſtards, and amongſt them of Thomas Lord Poining Lieuftenant of Bollen, began L. Poinings by King Henrie the Eighth.
D to build a ſtately houſe but left it unperfect when death had bereft him of his onely lawfull child which he had by his lawfull wife the daughter of Sir I. Scot his neighbour at Scots-Hall: where the family of Scots hath lived in worſhipfull eſtimation a long time, as deſcended from Paſhely, and Serieaux by Pimpe. But to returne to the ſea-coaſt: neere to Sandgate, Hith is ſituated, one of the Cinque ports, whereof it aſſumed Hith.
that name, which in the Engliſh Saxons tongue ſignifieth an haven or harbour: although hardly it maintaineth that name now, by reaſon of ſands, and the Sea withdrawing it ſelfe from it. And yet it is not long ſince it firſt made any ſhew, and that by the decay and fall of Weſthyth, a neighbour-towne Weſtward, and which was ſometime a Port, untill the Sea in our great grandfathers daies retired from it. So are Sea-townes ſubject to the uncertaine viciſſitude of the Sea.

E This Hith, like as Weſt-Hith alſo, had their beginning from the ruine of Lime ſtanding hard by, which in times paſt was a moſt famous Port towne, untill the ſands that the Sea caſteth up, had choked and ſtopped the haven. Both, Antonine and the booke of Norrices called it PORTVS LEMANIS, Ptolomee λίμνη which being in Greeke a ſignificative word, the Copiantes, or Copiers out of old bookes, becauſe they would ſeeme to ſupply the defect, wrot it καινος λιμην and the Latin Interpreters following them tranſlated it Novus portus, that is, New port, or New haven: whereas, the proper name of the place was Limen or Leman, like as at this time Lime. Heere the Captaine over a company or band of Turnacenſes, kept his ſtation under the Count or Lieuftenant of the Saxon ſhore. And a Port way paved with ſtone, called Stonyſtreet, F reacheth from hence toward Canterbury, which one would eaſily judge to have beene a worke of the Romans, like as the Caſtle adjoyning hard unto it, now named Stutfall, which in the ſide and deſcent of a pretty hill, tooke up about tenne acres of ground in compaſſe: and the reliques of the wall remaine ſtill of Britiſh bricke and flint ſo cloſe laid and couched together with a kind of ſtrong mortar made of lime, ſand and pibles, that as yet time hath not given it the check: and now, although it be not an haven towne, yet it retaineth ſtill no ſmall ſhew of the ancient dignitie it had: For heere the Warden of the Cinque Ports at a place called Shipway uſeth to take his ſolemne oath, when hee firſt entreth into his office, and heere, upon certaine ſet daies, the cuſtome was to decide cauſes betweene the inhabitants of the ſaid Ports. A

Some have thought, that in this place a great river diſcharged it ſelfe into the ſea, for that one or two writers have made mention of the river Leman, and the mouth of Leman, at which the Danes Fleet in the yeare of our ſalvation 892. arrived. But I ſuppoſe they are deceived in the deſcription of the place, both becauſe there is no river heere, but a very ſmall one, which ſtreight waies being of no reckoning at all vaniſheth: as alſo, for that the Archdeacon of Huntingdon, a compendious authour, and of good approved credit writeth, that the ſaid fleet arrived at the Haven Leman, and ſaith not a word of the river. Vnleſſe a man would thinke, (with whom I dare not accord) that the river Rother, which intermingleth it ſelfe with the Ocean under Rhieine, ran downe this way, and changed his courſe by little and little, when that champian plaine called Rumney Marſh, grew unto the firme land. B

Rumney Marſh. For, this Marſh-country, (which from Lime containeth 14. miles in length, and 8. in bredth, and reckoneth two townes, nineteene pariſhes, and 44200. acres or there about, by reaſon of ranke greene graſſe moſt convenient for the graſing and feeding of beaſts), hath beene by little and little laied unto the land by the benefit of the ſea. Whereupon I may well and truely terme it the Seas-gift, like as Herodotus called Ægypt, the gift of the river Nilus, and a very * learned man termed the paſtures of Holland, the gifts of the North-wind and the river Rhene. For, the ſea to make amends yeilded that againe in this place (which it ſwallowed up elſe where in this coaſt) either by retyring backe, or by laying oze thereto from time to time: as ſome places which in the remembrance of our grandfathers, lay cloſe unto the ſea ſhore, are now diſ-joyned a mile or two from the ſea. How fruitful the ſoile is, what a number of heards of cattel it feedeth, that are ſent thither from the furtheſt parts of Wale, and England to be fatted; what art and cunning is uſed in making of bankes to fence it, againſt the violent riſings of the ſea, one would hardly believe, that hath not ſeene it. And that it might be the better ordered, certaine lawes of Sewers were made in the time of King Henry the third. And King Edward the fourth ordained, that it ſhould be a Corporation, conſiſting of a Bailive, Iurates, and the Communalty. In the Saxons time the inhabitants thereof were called Mepre-pape, that is, * Marſhmen: and verily the ſignification of that name accordeth paſſing well with the nature of the place. Neither can I underſtand and conceive that ancient writer Aethelward, when he reporteth, That Ciuulph King of the Mercians waſted Kent, and the country which is called Merſc-warum. And in another place, That Herbyth a Captaine was by the Danes beheaded in a place named Merſc-warum, if he meant not this very Marſh-country, Rumney, or Romeney, and in former time Romenal, which ſome conjecture by the name to have beene the Romans worke, is the principall towne of this Marſh, and one of the Cinque-ports, whereof Old Romeney and Lid are accounted members, which joyntly were charged with the ſetting forth of five ſhips of warre, in that manner and forme, as I have before ſaid. It is ſeated upon an hill of gravell and ſand, and had on the Weſt ſide an haven of good receit and commodious withall, for moſt of the winds; before the ſea with-drew it ſelfe from it. The inhabitants, as we read in King William the Conquerours booke, *were in regard of their ſea ſervice, quitte and quiet from all cuſtome, beſide for * robbery, peace-breach and Foriſtell.* And in thoſe daies it flouriſhed with the beſt; For it was divided into twelue wards, it had alſo five Pariſh-churches, it had a Priorie, and an Hoſpitall for ſicke perſons: But in the reigne of Edward the firſt, when the ſea raging with violence of windes overflowed this tract, and made pittifull waſte of people, of cattell and of houſes in every place, as having quite drowned Promhil a prety town well frequented: it made the Rother alſo forſake his old channel, which heere before time emptied himſelfe into the ſea, and ſtopped his mouth, opening a new and neerer way for him to paſſe into the ſea by Rhie: So as by little and little C D E F

A little hee forſoke this towne. Which ever ſince hath decreaſed, and loſt much of the forme, frequency, and ancient dignity.

Beneath this, the land tending more Eaſt-ward maketh a Promontory, (we call it the Neſſe, as it were a noſe) before which lieth a dangerous flat in the ſea, and upon which ſtandeth Lid a towne well inhabited: whereunto the inhabitants of Promhill after that inundation aforeſaid betooke themſelves. And in the very utmoſt point of this Promontory which the people call Denge-neſſe, where there is nothing but beach and pible ſtones, * Holme-trees grow plentifully with their ſharp prickey leaves alwaies greene, in manner of underwood, for a mile and more. Among the ſaid beach neere unto Ston end is to be ſeene an heape of greater ſtones, which the neighbour Inhabitants call Saint Cryſpins, and Criſpinians tombe, whom they report to have beene B caſt upon this ſhore by ſhip-wracke and from hence called into the glorious companie of Saints. From thence the ſhore retyring it ſelfe is directly carried into the Weſt, bringing foorth peaſon among the beach, which grow up naturally like cluſters of grapes a number together, and in taſt little differ from our field peaſon, and ſo runneth on as farre as to the Rother-Mouth, by which for ſome ſpace Kent is divided from Suſſex.

* Hulver or Holy-trees ſlices,

The courſe of this river on Suſſex ſide wee have in part briefely ſpoken of before. On Kent ſide it hath Newenden, which I almoſt perſwade my ſelfe was that haven ſo long ſought for, and which the booke Notitia Provinciarũ called ANDERIDA, the old Britains Caer Andred, and the Saxons Anb pebyrceaſ ten: firſt, becauſe the Inha- C bitants by a continued tradition conſtantly affirme it was a moſt ancient towne and Haven whereof they ſhew the plot; then, for that it is ſituate by the wood Andredſwald, that tooke the name of it; laſtly, becauſe the Engliſh-Saxons ſeeme to have termed it Brittenden, that is, The Britans Vale, (as they called alſo Segontium an ancient towne of the Britans of which we ſpake before): whence the whole Hundred adjoyning is named Selbrittenden. The Romans for to defend this coaſt againſt the Saxon rovers, placed heere the band of the Abulci with their Captaine: Afterward being taken by the Engliſh Saxons it decaied quite. For, Hengiſt being fully determined to rid all the Britans out of Kent, and thinking it would much availe him to encreaſe his troupes and bands with greater forces of his owne nation, called foorth D Aella out of Germany with a ſtrong power of Engliſh Saxons, and while he gave the aſſault unto this Anderida by violence, the Britans out of the wood hard by, where they laie in ambuſhments, chaſed him ſo, that at length after many loſſes on both ſides given and taken, when he had parted his army and both diſcomfited and put to flight the Britans in the wood, and alſo at the ſame time forced the towne, by aſſaults; his barbarous heart was ſo enflamed with deſire of revenge, that he put the Inhabitants to the ſword and razed the towne even to the ground. The place lying thus deſolate, was ſhewed, (as Henry of Huntingdon ſaith,) to thoſe that paſſed by many ages after. Vntill the Friers Carmelites newly come out from Mount Carmell in the Holi- E land, who ſought for ſuch ſolitary places, built them heere a little Priory in the time of King Edward the firſt, at the charges of Sir Thomas Albuger Knight: and ſo ſtreight waies there roſe up a village, which in regard of the old towne overthrowen, began to be called Newenden, that is, The New towne in the vale. I ſaw nothing there now, but a mean village with a poore Church, & a wodden bridge to no great purpoſe for a ferry is in moſt uſe, ſince that the river Rother, not containing himſelfe in his chanell hath overlaied, & is like to endanger & ſurround the levell of rich lands thereby. Whereupon the inhabitants of Rhie complaine, that their haven is not ſcoured by the ſtreame of Rother as heeretofore, and the owners heere ſuffer great loſſe: which F their neighbours in Oxeney doe feare, if it were remedied, would fall upon them. This is a river-iſle ten miles about, encompaſſed with the river Rother dividing his ſtreames, and now brackiſh; having his name either of mire, which our anceſtours called Hox, or of Oxen, which it feedeth plentifully with ranke graſſe. Oppoſite to this is Appledore, where a confuſed rabble of Daniſh and Norman Pirates, which under the conduct of one Haſting had ſore annoied the French coaſts, loden with booties landed,

For his ſonne and heire S. Richard Guildford was by king Henry the ſeventh made knight of the Garter. Of his ſonnes againe Sir Edward Guildford was Marſhall of Callais, Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports, and B Maſter of the Ordnance, father to Iane Dutches of Northumberland, wife to Sir I. Dudley Duke of Northumberland, mother to the late Earles of Warwick, and Leiceſter, and Sir Henrie was choſen Knight of the Garter by King Henrie the Eight, and had his Armes enobled with a Canton of Granado by Ferdinand king of Spaine for his worthy ſervice in that Kingdome when it was recovered from the Moores, and Edward, lived in great eſteeme at home. To be briefe from the ſaid Sir Iohn are iſſued by females immediatly the Darells of Cale hill, Gages, Brownes of Beechworth, Walſinghams, Cromers, Iſaacs, and Iſeleies, families of prime and principall note in theſe parts. In the pariſhes heere-about the commendable trade of cloathing was firſt ſet up C and freſhly practiſed, ever ſince King Edward the Third his daies, who by propoſing rewards, and granting many immunities, trained Flemings into England in the tenth yeere of his reigne to teach our men that skill of Draperie, or weaving and making wollen cloth, which is juſtly counted at this day one of the Staies that ſupport our common Weale. Thus much of Kent, which (to conclude ſummarily) hath this part laſt ſpoken of for Draperie, the Iſle of Tenet and the Eaſt parts for the Granarie, the Weald for the wood, Rumney Marſh for the meddow-plot, the North downs toward the Thames for the Conny-garthe, Tenham and there about for an Orchard, and Head-Corne for the brood and poultrey of fat, big, and commended capons.

Kentiſh capons.

As for the Earles, omitting the Engliſh Saxons Godwin, and Leofwin his brother, D and others, who were Earles not by deſcent and inheritance, but by office. Odo halfe brother by the mothers ſide to King William the Conquerour, and Biſhop of Baieux, was the firſt Earle of Kent, of the Norman bloud: a man, by nature of a bad diſpoſition and buſie head, bent alwaies to ſow ſedition and to trouble the State. Whereupon he was committed to priſon by a ſubtile diſtinction, as Earle of Kent, and not Biſhop of Baieux in regard of his holie orders; and afterward for a moſt dangerous rebellion which he had raiſed, he was by his nephew King William Rufus deprived of his places of dignity, loſt all his goods in England and abjured the Realme. Afterwards, King Stephen who as an Intruder reaped the revenewes and Commodities of the Crowne of England, that hee might bind by benefits martiall men to E him, hee advanced William of Ipres a Fleming to that honor: who being, as Fitz-Stephen calleth him; Violentus Cantij incubator, that is, the violent over-preſſor of Kent, was forced by King Henrie the ſecond to depart, ſheading many teares and ſo became a monke, Henrie likewiſe the ſonne of King Henrie the ſecond, whom his father had crowned King, rebelling againſt his father, gave in like reſpect the title of Kent unto Philip Earle of Flanders. But this Philip was Earle of Kent in title only and by promiſe. For, as Gervaſe of Canterburie writeth, Philip Earle of Flanders undertooke to the uttermoſt of his power for to aide the young King, doing him homage and binding himſelfe with an oath: unto whom the ſaid King promiſed in reward of his ſervice the F revenewes of a thouſand pounds, together with all Kent: alſo the Caſtle of Rocheſter and the Caſtle of Dover. Not many yeeres after, Hubert de Burgh, having done notable good ſervice unto the State, received as it were, by due deſert the ſame honor at the hands of King Henrie the Third: who alſo made him chiefe Iuſtice of England. This Hubert was a man who unfainedly loved his Countrie, & amidſt the ſtormes of frow-

Earles of Kent.

ning

A ning Fortune performed all duties to the utmoſt that his Countrey could require of a right good patriot. Yet at length he fell in diſgrace, and was diſpoyled of his dignities: whereby this title ſlept and lay as dead untill the time of King Edward the Second. Who beſtowed it upon his younger brother Edmund of Woodſtocke, who being Tutor of his nephew Edward the Third, falling into the tempeſt of falſe, injurious, and malignant envie was beheaded, for that he never diſſembled his naturall brotherly affection toward his brother depoſed, and went about when hee was (God wot) murthered before (not knowing ſo much) to enlarge him out of priſon; perſwaded thereunto by ſuch as covertly practiſed his deſtruction. Hee had two ſonnes B Edmund, and Iohn, who were reſtored by Parliament to bloud and land ſhortly after. And with all, it was inacted that no Peere of the land, or other that procured the death of the ſaid Earle ſhould bee empeached therefore, than Mortimer Earle of March, Sir Simon Beresford, Iohn Matravers, Baious, and Iohn Devoroil. So theſe his two ſonnes ſucceeded in order, and when they were both dead without iſſue, their ſiſter Ioane, who ſurvived them, (for her lovely beautie called The Faire maid of Kent) brought this honour unto the houſe of the Hollands. For Sir Thomas Holland her husband was ſtiled Earle of Kent, and ſhee after married by diſpenſation to the Black Prince heire to him King Richard the Second. Her ſonne Sir Thomas Holland ſucceeded in that honourable title, who died in the twentieth yeare of King Richard the Se- C cond. Him againe there ſucceeded his two ſonnes Thomas and Edmund. Thomas who alſo was created Duke of Surry, and forthwith for complotting a conſpiracie againſt King Henry the Fourth loſt his head, leaving no child: Edmunds his brother being Lord High Admirall of England, was wounded at the aſſault of Saint Brieu in little Britan, and died thereof in the yeare of Salvation 1408. leaving likewiſe no iſſue. Now when this dignitie was expired, in this family of the Hollands, their glaſſe being runne out, and the Patrimony parted among Edmund ſiſters; King Edward the Fourth honoured with the title of the Earldome of Kent, Firſt Sir William Nevill Lord Fauconberg: and after his death, Edmund Lord Grey of Ruthin, Haſtings and Weisford, and who had to ſucceed him George his ſonne. Hee of Anne Wideville his D firſt wife begat Richard Earle of Kent, who having waſted his inheritance ended therewith his daies iſſueleſſe, 1523. But the ſaid George by his ſecond wife Katherine, daughter to William Herbert Earle of Pembrooke, was father of Sir Henry Grey of Wreſt knight, whoſe grand-ſonne Reginald, by his ſonne Henrie, Queene Elizabeth in the yeare 1571. advanced to the Earledom of Kent. And after his deceaſe without iſſue, his brother Henrie ſucceeded, a right honourable perſonage and endued with the ornaments of true nobility.

DOBVNI.

HItherto we have walked over all those Countries that lie betweene the Britiſh Ocean of the one ſide, and the Severne ſea and river Thames on the other. Now according to the order which wee have begun, let us ſurvey the reſt throughout: and paſsing over the ſaid river returne to the head of Thames and the ſalt water of Severne; and there view the DOBVNI, who in ancient times inhabited thoſe parts which now are termed Oxford-ſhire and Gloceſter-ſhire. This their name, I verily ſuppoſe came of Duffen a Britiſh word, becauſe the places where they planted themſelves, were for the moſt part low and lying under the hils, whereupon the name became common to them all: and verily from ſuch a kind of ſite, Bathieia in Troas, Catabathmos in Africk, and Deep-Dale in Britan tooke their names. I am the more eaſily induced to believe this becauſe I ſee, that Dio in the very ſame ſignification hath named certaine people, BODVNNI if the letters be not miſplaced. For, Bodo or BODVN, (as Plinie ſaith) in the ancient French tongue, (which I have proved before was the ſame that in the Britiſh language,) betokeneth Deepe. Hence was it, that the City Bodincomagus, as he writeth, became ſo called, for that it ſtood where the river *Po was deepeſt, hence had the people Bodiontij that name, who inhabited a deepe vale by the Lake of Lozanne, and Geneva, now called Val de Fontenay, to ſay nothing of Bodotria the deepeſt Frith in all Britan. Concerning theſe Bodunj, I have found in all my reading no matter of great antiquity, ſave only that A. Plautius ſent as Proprætor by Claudius into Britan, received part of them upon their ſubmiſsion into his protection, to wit, thoſe that were under Cattuellani, (for they held the region bordering upon them) and as Dio hath recorded, about the forty and foure yeare after Chriſt was borne, placed a garriſon over them.

Duffin in the Britiſh tongue ſignifieth low, deepe, or flat.

Bodo what it ſignifieth in Britiſh and French.

* Padus.

But when the Engliſh Saxons reigned in Britan, and the name of Dobuni was worne out, ſome of theſe, as alſo the people dwelling round about them them, were by a new Engliſh Saxons name called Wiccij : but whereupon, I dare ſcarce venture to gueſſe, without craving leave of the Reader. Yet, if Wic in the Saxons tongue ſoundeth as much as the * creeke, or reach of a river, and the Viguones, a nation in Germanie are ſo called, becauſe they dwell neere unto the creekes or baies of the Sea, and of rivers, (for ſo doth Beatus Rhenanus conſtantly affirme) It will bee no abſurditie, if I derive our Wiccii from thence, who inhabited round about the mouth of Severne, which is very full of ſuch Coves and ſmall creekes and reaches.

GLOCESTER-SHIRE.

GLoceſter-ſhire, in the Saxon tongue Gleaucerter-ſcyre, which was the chiefe ſeat of the Dobuni, on the Weſt-ſide butteth upon Monmouth-ſhire and Hereford-ſhire, on the North upon Worceſter-ſhire, on the Eaſt upon Warwick-ſhire, Oxford-ſhire and Barck-ſhire, on the South upon Wilt-ſhire and Somerſet-ſhire both. A pleaſant countrey and a fruitfull, ſtretching out in length, from North-eaſt unto South-weſt. The part that lyeth more Eaſt-ward, riſing up in height with hils and wolds is called Cotteſwold: the middle part ſettleth downe low to a moſt fertile plaine, and is watered with Severne that noble river, which doth infuſe life, as it were, into the ſoile. That part which bendeth more Weſtward on the further ſide of Severne, is all over be ſpread with woods. But what meane I to buſie my ſelfe herein? William of Malmesbury will eaſe mee of this labour, who fully gives high commendations to this countrey. Have therefore what he writeth in his booke of Biſhop; The countrey (ſaith he) is called of the principall Citie: The vale of Gloceſter. the ground throughout yieldeth plentie of corne, and bringeth forth abundance of fruits: the one through the naturall goodneſſe onely of the ground, the other through diligent manuring and tillage; in ſo much, as it would provoke the lazieſt body that is, to take paines, ſeeing that it anſwereth backe againe with the encreaſe of an hundred fold, that which is ſowne. Here may you ſee the high wayes and common lanes clad with apple-trees and peare-trees, not ſet nor graffed by the induſtry of mans hand, but growing naturally of their owne accord. The ground of it ſelfe is enclined to beare fruits, and thoſe both in taſte and beautie farre exceeding others: whereof ſome will laſt a whole yeare and not wither and rivell: ſo that they are ſerviceable untill new come againe for ſupply. There is no countrey in all England ſo thicke ſet as this Province with Vine-yards, ſo plentifull in encreaſe, and ſo pleaſant in taſte. The very wines thereof made, affect not their mouthes that drinke of them with any unpleaſing tartneſſe, as being little inferiour in ſweetneſſe and odour to the French wines. The houſes in it are almoſt innumerable, the Churches paſſing faire, and the townes ſtanding very thicke. But that which addeth unto all theſe good gifts a ſpeciall glory is the river Severne, than which there is not any one in this land, for channell broader, for ſtreame ſwifter, for fiſh better ſtored. There is in it a daily rage and fury of the waters, which I know not whether I may call a gulfe or whirle-poole of waves, and the ſame raiſing up the ſands from the bothome winding and driving the ſame upon heapes, commeth with a forcible violence, and reacheth no further then to the bridge. Sometimes alſo it overfloweth the bankes, and when it hath roved about a great way, it retireth backe as a conquerour of the land. Vnhappy is that veſſell which it taketh full upon the ſide. The Water-men well ware hereof when they ſee that Higra comming, (for ſo they call it in Engliſh), turne the veſſell affront upon it, and ſo cutting through the middeſt of it, checke and avoide the violence thereof.

Vines and wine.

Severn.

Higra.

But that which hee ſaith of the hundred fold increaſe and yeeld of the ground, doth not hold true. Neither for all that, would I thinke with theſe whining and ſloathfull husbandmen, whom Columella taketh up for it, that the ſoile is now wearied and become barren with too much fruitfulneſſe and over-free bearing in former ages. Howbeit hereby, if I ſhould ſay nothing of other things, it is to bee ſeene, that wee have no cauſe to wonder, why many places in this countrey and elſe-where in England are called Vine-yards, ſeeing it hath affoorded wine; and ſurely it may ſeeme to proceed rather of the Inhabitants idleneſſe than any diſtemperature and indiſpoſition of the ayre; that it yeeldeth none at this day. But why in ſome places within this Countrey, as wee reade in our Statutes, by a private cuſtome which now is become of ſtrong validitie as a law, the goods and lands of condemned perſons fall into the Kings hands for a yeare onely and a day, and after that terme expired (contrary to the cuſtome of all England beſide) returne to the next heires, let law-ſtudents and Stateſmen looke to that: for no part it is of my purpoſe to ſearch thereinto. Now I will take a ſuperficiall ſurvey (ſuch as I can) of thoſe three parts whereof I ſpake orderly one after another.

Forreſt of Deane.

The part, that lyeth more Weſt beyond Severne, (which the Silures in old time poſſeſſed) along the river Vaga or Wye, that parteth England and Wales, was wholy beſpred with thicke tall woods: we call it at this day, Deane-forreſt: The Latine writers ſome name it of the Danes Danica Sylva the Danes wood, others with Girald, the Wood of Danubia. But I would thinke, if it had not this name of Dean a little towne adjoyning, that by ſhort cutting the word, it was called Deane, for Arden. Which terme both Gauls and Britans in ancient times may ſeeme to have uſed for a wood, conſidering that two mighty great woods, the one in that part of Gaule called Gallia Belgica, and the other among us in Warwick-ſhire, are by one and the ſelfe ſame name termed Arden. For, this was a wonderfull thicke Forreſt, and in former ages ſo darke and terrible, by reaſon of crooked and winding wayes, as alſo the griſly ſhade therein, that it made the inhabitants more fierce, and bolder to commit robberies. For in the reigne of Henry the ſixt they ſo infeſted all Severne ſide with robbing and ſpoiling, that there were lawes made by authority of the Parliament, for to reſtraine them. But ſince that rich Mines of Iron were heere found out, thoſe thicke woods began to wax thin by little and little. In this Forreſt, upon the foreſaid river ſtood Tudenham and Wollaſton, two townes of good antiquity, which Walter and Roger the brethren of Giſlebert Lord of Clare wreſted out of the Welch-mens hands, about the yeare 1160. As alſo Lidney is adjoyning to them, where Sir William Winter, Viceadmirall of England, a renowned Knight for Sea-ſervices (as his brother Arthur ſlaine in Orkeney-Iſles) built a faire houſe. But the moſt ancient towne of all others is ABONE or AVONE, mentioned by Antonine the Emperour in his Iourney-booke, which having not loſt that name altogether, is at this day called Aventon: a ſmall towne indeed, but ſtanding upon Severne, juſt nine miles, as hee writeth, from VENTASILVRVM, or Caer-went.

Arden. Iron. Lidney. Abone. Aventon.

And ſeeing that Avon in the Brittiſh tongue importeth A River, it ſhall be no ſtrange thing, if we thinke it ſo called of the river: for in the very ſame ſignification, (that I may omit the reſt) we have Waterton, Bourne, and Riverton: as the Latines had Aquinum and Fluentium. And I ſuppoſe the rather, that it tooke name of the river, becauſe people were wont at this place to ferry over the river, whereupon the towne ſtanding over againſt it, is by Antonine called TRAIECTVS, that is, a paſſage or ferry: but without doubt, the number in that place ſet downe, is corrupted. For he maketh it nine miles betweene TRAIECTVS and ABONE, whereas the river is ſcarce three miles broad. It may ſeeme then to have beene utterly decaied, or turned rather into a village, either when as paſſengers began to ferry over below, or when Athelſtane thruſt out the Welſh Britans from hence. For, hee was the firſt that drave them, as William of Malmesbury witneſſeth, beyond the river Wye. And where as before his time, Severne was the bound, betweene the Engliſh and Welſhmen, hee appointed Wye to be the limit confining them both: Whence our Necham writeth thus.

Trajectus.

Inde vagos vaga Cambrenſes, hinc reſpicit Anglos.
To Wales on this ſide, looketh Wie,
On that againe, our England he doth eye.

S. Breulais.

Not farre from Wye amongſt blind by-wayes beſet with thicke plumps of trees, appeareth Breulis Caſtle more than halfe fallen downe, remarkable for the death of Mahel youngeſt ſonne of Miles, Earle of Hereford. For there, his greedy deviſes, bloody crueltie, and covetouſneſſe ready to pray-upon other mens eſtates (for which vices hee

A hee is much blamed in Writers) were overtaken with a juſt revenge from heaven. For, as Girald hath written, being entertained gueſt-wiſe by Sir Walter Clifford in this Caſtle, when the houſe was all on a light fire, hee was killed with a ſtone that from the top of an high Turret fell upon his head and brained him.

Neither have I any thing elſe to be recounted in this wood-countrey beſide Newnham a pretty mercate, and Weſtbury thereby a ſeate of the Bainhams of ancient deſcent: But that Herbert who had wedded the ſiſter of the ſaid Mahel Earle of Hereford, in her right was called Lord of Deane frō whom that Noble houſe of the Herberts fetcheth their pedigree, out of which family came thè Lords of Blanleveney, and of late daies, B the Herberts Earles of Huntingdon and Pembroch, with others. From hence alſo, if wee may believe David Powell in his hiſtorie of Wales, was deſcended Antonie Fitz-Herbert, whoſe great learning and induſtrie in the wiſedome of our law, both the judiciall Court of Plees, wherein he ſate Iuſtice a long time, and alſo thoſe exact bookes of our common law by him exquiſitely penned and publiſhed, doe ſufficiently witneſſe. But other have drawne his deſcent and that more truly, if I have inſight therein, from the race of the Fitz-Herberts Knights in Derby ſhire.

The river Severn, called by the Britains HAFFREN, after it hath run a long courſe with a channell ſomewhat narrow, no ſooner entereth into this ſhire, but entertaineth the river Avon, and another brooke comming from the Eaſt. Betwixt which, is ſeated C Tewkeſbury, in the Saxon tongue Theocrburȳ, by others Theoci Curia, taking the name from one Theocus who there did lead an Eremites life. It is a great and faire towne, having three bridges to paſſe over, ſtanding upon three rivers, famous for making of Wollen cloath, and the beſt muſtard; which for the quicke heate that it hath, biteth moſt and pierceth deepeſt: but moſt famous in times paſt by reaſon of an ancient Monaſtery which Dodo a man of great power in Mercia founded in the yeare 715, where before time he kept his royall court, as is teſtified by this inſcription which there remained long after.

THIS ROIAL PALACE DVKE DODO CAVSED TO BE CONSECRATED FOR A CHVRCH.

And Odo his brother endowed the ſame, which being by continuance of time, and the fury of enemies ruinated, Robert FITZ-HAIMON the Norman, Lord of Corboile and Thorigny in Normandie reedified, tranſlating monks from Cranborn in Dorſetſhire hither upon a devout mind verily and a religious, that he might make ſome amends to the Church, for the loſſe that the Church of Baieux in Normandie had ſuſtained: E which K. Henry the firſt for to free him from his enemies had ſet on fire and burned, and afterwards repenting that which he had done, built againe. It cannot, (writeth William of Malmesbury) be eaſily reported, how highly Robert Fitz-hamon exalted this Monaſtery, wherin the beauty of the buildings raviſhed the eies, and the charity of the Monks allured the hearts of ſuch folke as uſed to come thither, Within this both himſelfe and his ſucceſſours Earles of Gloceſter were buried: who had a Caſtle of their owne called Holmes hard by, which now is almoſt vaniſhed out of ſight. Neither is this towne leſſe memorable for that battell, whereby the houſe of Lancaſter received a mortal wound: as wherein very many of their ſide in the yeere, 1471. were ſlaine, more taken priſoners and divers beheaded, their power ſo weakened and their hopes abated, eſpeci- F ally becauſe young Prince Edward the only ſonne of King Henry the ſixt, a very child, was there put to death, and in moſt ſhamefull and villanous manner his braines daſhed out, as that never after they came unto the field againſt King Edward the Fourth. In which reſpect, Iohn Leland wrote of this towne in this wiſe:

Ampla foro, & partis ſpoliis præclara, Theoci
Curia, ſabrinæ quà ſe committit Avona

Fulget;

Fulget; nobilium ſacríſque recondit in antris
Multorum cineres, quondam inclyta corpora bello.

Where Av'n and Severn meete in one, there ſtands a goodly towne.
For mercat great and pillage rich there wonne, of much renowne, Hight Tewkesburie: where noble men entombed many are,
Now gone to mould, who ſometimes were redoubted Knights in warre.

From thence we come to Deorhirſt, which Bede ſpeaketh of, ſcituate ſomewhat low upon the banke of Severn, wherby it hath great loſſes many times, when he overfloweth his bounds. It had in it ſometimes a little Monaſterie, which being by the Danes overthrowne flouriſhed againe at length under Edward the Confeſſor; who, as we read in his Teſtament, aſſigned The religious place at Deorhirſt and the government thereof to Saint Denis neere unto Paris. Yet, a little while after, as William of Malmeſbury ſaith, It was but a vaine and void repreſentation of antiquitie. Over againſt it lieth a place halfe incompaſſed in with Severne, called in the Saxon tongue Olenaȝ, and Alney, now the Eight, that is, The Iland: Famous, by the reaſon of this occurrence, that when both the Engliſhmen and the Danes were much weakened with continuall encounters, to make a finall diſpatch at once of all quarrels, the Fortune and deſtinie of both nations was committed to Edmund King of the Engliſh, and to Canutus King of the Danes, who in this Iland by a ſingle combate tried it out, unto whether of them the right of this Realme ſhould belong. But after they had fought and given over one-ven hand, a peace was concluded, and the kingdome divided betweene them. But when ſtreight upon it Edmund was diſpatched out of the way not without ſuſpicion of poiſon, Canutus ſeized into his owne hands all England.

Pauncefote, or Pauncevolt. Placita 15. Edw. 1.

From Deorhirſt Severne runneth downe by Haesfield which King Henry the Third gave to Rich. Pauncefote, whoſe ſucceſſours built a faire houſe heere, and whoſe predeceſſours were poſſeſſed of faire lands in this Countrey before, and in the Conquerours time in Wiltſhire making many reaches winding in and out, and forthwith dividing himſelfe to make a river Iland moſt rich and beautifull in greene meddowes, he paſſeth along by the head Citie of this Shire, which Antonine the Emperour called CLEVVM and GLEVVM, the Britans terme Caer Glovie, the Engliſh Saxons Gleaceſtep, we Gloceſter, the Vulgar ſort of Latiniſts Glovernia, others Claudioceſtria, of the Emperour Claudius, as they imagine: who forſooth, ſhould give it this name, when hee had beſtowed heere his daughter Geniſſa in marriage upon Arviragus the Britan. Touching whom, Iuvenall writeth thus,

Regem aliquem capies, vel de temone Britanno Excidet Arviragus.

Some King (ſure) thou ſhalt priſoner take in chaſe or battaile heat,
Or elſe Arviragus ſhall looſe his Britiſh royall ſeate.

As though hee had begat any other daughters of his three wives beſides Claudia, Antonia and Octavia; or as if Arviragus had beene knowne in that age, whoſe name was never heard of before Domitians time and ſcarce then. But, let them goe, that ſeeke to build antiquitie upon a frame grounded on lies: Rather yet would I give my voice and accord with Ninnius, who writeth, That it tooke the name from Glovus, the great grandfathers father of King Vortigern; but that long before it, Antonine had named it Glevum (which, both the Diſtance from Corinium and the name alſo may prove.) But as the Saxon name Gleaveceſter came from Glevum, ſo Glevum proportionably from the Britiſh, Caer Glow which I ſuppoſe ſprong from the word Glow, that in the Britiſh tongue ſignifieth Faire and Goodly: ſo that Caer Glow may bee as much as to ſay, a faire Citie: In which ſignification alſo, the Greekes had their Callipolis: Callidromos, Calliſtratia: the Engliſh men their Brightſtow, and Shirley, and in this very Countie Faireford, Faire-ley, &c.

This Citie was built by the Romans, and ſet, as it were upon the necke of the Silures to yoake them. And there alſo was a Colonie planted to people it, which they called COLONIA GLEVVM. For I have ſeene a fragment of antique ſtone in the walles of Bath neere unto the North-gate, with this Inſcription.

*DEC COLONIÆ GLEV VIXIT ANN. LXXXVI.

* Decurio.

It lieth ſtretched out in length over Severne: on that ſide where it is not watered
B with the river, it hath in ſome places a very ſtrong wall for defence. A proper and fine Citie I aſſure you it is, both for number of Churches and for the buildings. On the South part there was a lofty Caſtle of ſquare Aſhler ſtone which, now for the moſt part, is nothing but a ruine. It was built in King William the firſt his time, and ſixteene houſes there about, as wee read in the booke of Englands Survey, were plucked downe for the rearing of this Caſtle. About which, Roger the ſonne of Miles, Conſtable of Gloceſter went to law with King Henry the ſecond: and his brother Walter loſt all the right and intereſt hee had in this City and Caſtle, as Robert de Mont hath written. Ceaulin King of the Weſt Saxons, was the firſt, that about the yeare of our redemption 570. by force and armes wreſted Gloceſter out of the Britans hands. After
C this, the Mercians won it, under whom it flouriſhed in great honour, and Oſricke King of Northumberland by permiſſion of Etheldred the Mercian, founded there a very great and ſtately Monaſtery for Nunnes, over whom Kineburg, Eadburg and Eve Queenes of the Mercians were Prioreſſes ſucceſſively one after another. Edelfled alſo that moſt noble Ladie of the Mercians, adorned this City with a Church, wherein ſhee her ſelfe was buried, and not long after, when the Danes had ſpoyled and waſted the whole countrey, thoſe ſacred Virgins were throwne out, and The Danes (as Aethelward that ancient authour writeth) with many a ſtroake pitched poore cottages into the citie of Glevv-ceſter. 878.
At which time, when thoſe more ancient Churches were ſubverted, Aldred Archbiſhop of Yorke, and Biſhop of Worceſter erected another for Monkes which is now
D the chiefe Church in the Citie, and hath a Deane and ſixe Prebendaries. But the ſame in theſe late precedent ages was newly beautified. For, Iohn Hanley and Thomas Farley two Abbats added unto it the Chappel of the bleſſed Virgin Mary: N. Morwent raiſed from the very foundation the forefront, which is an excellent piece of worke: G. Horton an Abbat, adjoyned to it the croſſe North-part; Abbat Trowceſter a moſt daintie and fine Cloiſter, and Abbat Sebrok an exceeding high faire ſteeple. As for the South ſide, it was alſo repaired with the peoples offerings at the Sepulcher of the unhappy King Edward the ſecond, who lieth heere enterred under a monument of Alabaſter: and not farre from him another Prince as unfortunate as hee, Robert Curt-hoſe, the eldeſt ſonne of King William the Conquerour Duke of Normandy within a woodden
E painted tombe in the mideſt of the quire, who was bereft of the Kingdome of England for that he was borne before his father was King, deprived of his two ſonnes the one by ſtrange death in the New-forreſt, the other diſpoiled of the Earledome of Flanders his inheritance, and ſlaine; he himſelfe diſpoſſeſſed of the Dukedome of Normandie by his brother King Henry the firſt, his eies plucked out, and kept cloſe priſoner 26. yeares with all contumelious indignities untill through extreame anguiſh hee ended his life. Above the quire, in an arch of this church, there is a wall built in forme of a ſemicircle full of corners, with ſuch an artificiall device, that if a man ſpeake with never ſo low a voice at the one part thereof, and another lay his eare to the other being a good way diſtant, he may moſt eaſily heare every ſillable. In the reigne of William F the Conquerour and before, it may ſeeme that the chiefeſt trade of the Citizens was to make Iron. For as we find in the * Survey booke of England, the King demanded in manner no other tribute than certaine Icres of Iron, and Iron barres, for the uſe of the Kings Navy, and ſome few * quarts of hony. After the comming in of the Normans, it ſuffered divers calamities: by the hands of Edward, King Henry the third his ſonne; whiles England was all on a ſmoake and cumbuſtion by the Barons warre, it was ſpoiled; led; and afterward by caſualty of fire almoſt wholy conſumed to aſhes; but now cheriſhed with continuance of long peace it flouriſheth againe as freſh as ever it was, and by laying unto it two Hundreds, it is made a County, and called the County of the Citie of Gloceſter. Alſo within the memory of our fathers, King Henry the Eighth augmented the ſtate thereof with an Epiſcopall See, with which dignitie in old time it had beene highly endowed, as Geffery of Monmouth avoucheth, and I will not derogate ought from the credit of his aſſertion, conſidering that among the Prelates of Britaine the Biſhop Cluvienſis is reckoned, which name derived from Clevum or Glow, doth after a ſort confirme and ſtrengthen my coniecture, that this is that Glevum, whereof Antonine maketh mention.

* Elmore.

Severne, having now left Gloceſter behind it, and gathered his waters unto one ſtreame againe, windeth it ſelfe by Elmore a Manſion houſe of the Giſes, ancient by their owne lineall deſcent, being in elder times owners of Apſely-Giſe neere Brickhill: and from the Beauchamps of Holt, who acknowledge Huber de Burgo Earle of Kent (whom I lately mentioned) beneficious to them, and teſtifie the ſame by their Armories. Lower upon the ſame ſide Stroud a pretty river ſlideth into Severne out of Coteſwold by Stroud a Mercat towne ſometimes better peopled with Clothiers, and not farre from Minching-Hampton which anciently had a Nunnery, or belonged to Nunnes whom our anceſtors named Minchings.

Minching.

Now Severn waxing broader and deeper by reaſon of the alternative flowing and ebbing of the ſea, riſeth and ſwelleth in manner of a rough and troublous ſea indeed, and ſo with many windings and turnings in, and out, ſpeedeth him unto the Ocean. But nothing offereth it ſelfe unto his ſight, (to count of) as hee paſſeth along, but Cam-bridge a little country towne: where it receiveth Cam a ſmall rivelet: Over the bridge whereof, when the Danes with rich ſpoiles paſſed (as Aethelward writeth) * in battail-ray, the Weſt-Saxons and the Mercians received them with an hote battaile in Woodnesfield, where three of their Pettie Kings were ſlaine, namely, Heatfden, Cinvil and Inguar.

Cam-bridge.

* Barkley. See Briſtow in Somerſetſhire.

On the ſame ſhore not much beneath, ſtandeth Barkley, in the Saxon-tongue Beopkenlau, of great name for a moſt ſtrong Caſtle, a Major, who is the Head Magiſtrate, and eſpecially for the Lords thereof deſcended from Robert-Fitz-Harding to whom King Henry the ſecond gave this place, and Barkely Hearnes. Out of this houſe are branched many Knights and Gentlemen of ſignall note, and in the reigne of King Henry the ſeventh flouriſhed William Lord Barkely, who was honoured by King Edward the fourth with the ſtile of Viſcount Barkely, by King Richard the third with the honour of Earle of Nottingham (in regard of his mother daughter of Thomas Moubray Duke of Norfolke, and Earle of Nottingham) and by King Henry the Seventh with the office of Marſhall of England, and dignity of Marquis Barkely. But for that he died iſſueleſſe, theſe his titles died together with him. If you be willing to know by what a crafty fetch Goodwin Earle of Kent, a man moſt deeply pregnant in deviſing how to do injury, got the poſſeſſion of this place, you may read theſe few lines out of Wal. Mapes, who flouriſhed 400. yeares ago: and worth the reading, (believe me) they are. Barkley neere unto Severn is a towne of 500. pounds revenew. In it there was a Nunnery, and the Abbeſſe over theſe Nunnes was a Noble woman and a beautifull. Earle Goodwin by a cunning and ſubtill wile, deſiring not her ſelfe, but hers, as he paſſed that way, left with her a Nephew of his, a very proper and beautifull young Gentleman (pretending that hee was ſickly) untill he returned backe. Him he had given this leſſon, that hee ſhould keepe his bed and in no wiſe ſeeme to be recovered untill he had got both her and as many of the Nunnes as hee could with child as they came to viſite him. * And to the end that the young man might obtaine their favour and his owne full purpoſe, when they viſited him: the Earle gave unto him pretty rings and fine girdles to beſtow for favours upon them, and thereby to deceive them. Hee therefore being willing entred into this courſe of libidinous pleaſure (for that the way downe to hell is eaſie) was ſoone taught his leſſons, and wiſely playeth the foole in that, which ſeemed wiſe in his own conceit. With him they were reſtant all thoſe things that the fooliſh virgins could wiſh for, beauty, daintie delicates, riches, faire ſpeech; and carefull he Goodwins fraudulent fetch.

* De honeſtâ, exuſtas.

A he was now to ſingle them alone. The Devill therefore thruſt out Pallas, brought in Venus, and made the Church of our Saviour and his Saints, an accurſed Temple of all Idols; and the Shrine, a very ſtewes, and ſo of pure Lambes, hee made them foule ſhee-wolves, and of pure virgins, filthy harlots. Now when many of their bellies bare out big and round, this youth being by this time over wearied with conqueſt of pleaſure, getteth him gone, and forthwith bringeth home againe unto his Lord and Maſter, a victorious Enſigne, worthy to have the reward of iniquitie: and to ſpeake plaine, relateth what was done. No ſooner heard he this, but he hieth him to the King: enformeth him how the Lady Abbeſſe of Barkely and her Nuns were great with child, and commonly proſtitute to every one that would: ſendeth ſpeciall meſ-

B ſengers of purpoſe for enquirie heereof, proveth all that he had ſaid. Hee beggeth Berkley of the King his Lord after the Nuns were thruſt out, and obtained it at his hands: and he left it to his wife Gueda: but becauſe ſhe her ſelfe (ſo ſaith Doomeſ-day booke,) would eat nothing that came out of this Manour, for that the Nunnery was deſtroied, he purchaſed for her Vdeceſter, that thereof ſhe might live, ſo long as ſhe made her abode at Barkley.

Thus wee ſee, a good and honeſt mind abhorreth whatſoever is evill gotten. How King Edward the ſecond being depoſed from his Kingdome through the crafty complotting and practiſe of his wife, was made away in the Caſtle heere, by the wicked ſubtiltie of Adam Biſhop of Hereford, who wrote unto his keepers theſe few words without points betweene them: Edwardum occidere nolite timere bonum eſt: K. Edward the ſecond murdred.

C that by reaſon of their diverſe ſenſe and conſtruction, both they might commit the murther, and he alſo cleanly excuſe himſelfe, I had rather you ſhould ſeeke in Hiſtorians, than looke for at my hands.

Beneath this Barkley, the little river Avon cloſely entereth into the Sea, at the head whereof ſcarſe eight miles from the waterſide, upon the hils neere Alderley a ſmall towne, there are found certaine ſtones reſembling Coccles or Periwinckles and Oyſters: which, whether they have beene ſometimes living creatures, or the gameſom ſports of Nature, I leave it to Philoſophers (that hunt after natures works.) But Fracaſtorius the principall Philoſopher in this our age; maketh no doubt, but that they were living creatures engendred in the Sea, and by waters brought to the

D mountaines. For, he affirmeth, that mountaines were caſt up by the Sea, with the driving at firſt of ſand into heapes and hillocks: alſo that the ſea flowed there where now hilles doe riſe aloft: and that as the ſaid Sea retired the hilles alſo were diſcovered. But this is out of my race.

There remaine yet in that place huge rampiers and trenches as fortifications of their campes, and other moſt apparent monuments here and there of ſo great a war. This was the chiefe ſeat of the Barony of * Iames de novo Mercatu, who begat three daughters, wedded to Nicholas de Moelis, Iohn de Boteraux, and Ralph Ruſſell: one of whoſe poſterity, enriched by matching with the heire of the ancient family of Gorges, aſſumed unto them the name of Gorges. But from Ralph Ruſſell the heire this Deorham deſcended to the family of Venis. Above theſe is Sodbury knowne by the familie of Walſh, and neighbours thereunto are Wike-ware the ancient ſeat of the familie De-la-ware, Wotton under Edge, which yet remembreth the ſlaughter of Sir. Thomas Talbot Vicount Liſle heere ſlaine in the time of King Edward the Fourth in an encounter with the Lord Barkley, about poſſeſſions, ſince which time have continued ſuites betweene their poſterity untill now, lately they were finally compounded. More Northward I had ſight of Duriſley reputed the ancienteſt habitation of the Barkleys, hereupon ſtiled Barkleis of Dureſley, who built here a Caſtle now more than ruinous, and were accounted founders of the Abbey of Kingſ-wood thereby for Ciſtertian Monkes, derived from Tintern whom Maud the Empreſſe greatly enriched. The males of this houſe failed in the time of King Richard the Second, and the heire generall was married to Cantelow. Hitherto have we curſorily paſſed over the principall places in this Shire ſituate beyond and upon Severn, and not far from his banke: Now proceede we forward to the Eaſt part, which I ſaid riſeth up with hilles, to wit, Cotteſwold, which of woulds, and Cotes, that is, hils and Sheepfolds tooke that name. For, mountaines and hils without woods, the Engliſhmen in old time termed Woulds: whence it is that an Old Gloſſary interpreteth Alpes Italie, The Woulds of Italie. In theſe Woulds there feed in great numbers, flockes of ſheepe, long necked and ſquare of bulke and bone, by reaſon (as it is commonly thought) of the weally and hilly ſituation of their paſturage: whoſe wool being moſt fine and ſoft is had in paſſing great account among all nations. B Sudley, in times paſt Sudlengh, a very faire Caſtle, the ſeat not long ſince of Sir Thomas Seimor Baron Seimor of Sudley, and Admirall of England, attainted in the time of king Edward the Sixth, and afterward of Sir John Bruges whom Queene Mary created Baron Chandos of Sudley, becauſe he derived his pedegree from the ancient family of Chandos, out of which there flouriſhed in the raigne of Edward the third Sir John Chandos a famous Baneret Vicount of Saint Saviours, L. of Caumont, and Kerkiton in France, a martiall man, and for military Proweſſe every way moſt renowned. But in old time certaine Noblemen here dwelt, and of it had their addition de Sudley, deſcended of a right ancient Engliſh Race, to wit from Gorda K. Æthelbreds daughter, whoſe ſon Ralph Medantinus Earle of Hereford begat Harold L. of Sudley, whoſe progeny flouriſhed here a long time, untill for default of iſſue male, the daughter and heire matched C in marriage with Sir William Butler of the family of Wem, and brought him a ſonne named Thomas: and he begat Ralph, Lord Treaſurer of England, created by king Henry the Sixth Baron of Sudley, with a fee of 200. markes yearely, who repaired this caſtle and enlarged it with new buildings. His ſiſters and coheires were married unto the houſes of Northbury and Belknape: and by their poſterity the poſſeſſions in ſhort time were divided into ſundry Families. Toddington alſo is next adjoyning hereunto, where the Tracies Gentlemen of a righte worſhipfull and ancient houſe flouriſhed a long time, who long ſince found the Barons of Sudley very bounteous unto them. But how in the firſt variance about Religion, William Tracy Lord of this place was proceeded againſt and puniſhed after his death by digging up his corps and burning it openD ly, for ſome few words put downe in his laſt Will and Teſtament, which ſavoured (as thoſe times judged) of hereſie: as alſo how another William de Tracy long before, embrued his hands in the bloudy murder of Thomas Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Eccleſiaſticall Hiſtoriographers have written at large, and it is no part of my purpoſe to relate ſuch like matters. There is heere likewiſe Winchelcombe a great Towne and well inhabited, wherein Kenulph the Mercian King erected an Abbay, and on the ſame day that hee hallowed and dedicated it, hee freed and ſent home Edbricht a King of Kent, whom he had kept before his Priſoner. A man would hardly beleeve how much haunted and frequented this Abbay was long ſince, for the Reliques of King Kenelme a childe ſeven yeares old, whom his owne ſiſter to get the Inheritance E unto her ſelfe, ſecretly made away, and our forefathers regiſtred in the ranke of holy Martyrs. The Territory adjoyning hereto in times paſt was reckoned a County by it ſelfe or a Sherif-dome: For, we read in an old manuſcript, ſometime belonging to the Church of Worceſter, in this wiſe, Edric ſirnamed Streona, that is, The getter, or gainer, who firſt under King Æthelbred, and afterwards for a good while under Cnut or Canut governed the whole Kingdome of England, and ruled as Vice Roy, adjoyned the Sherifdome of Winchelcombe which was then an entire thing by it ſelfe, unto the ſhire of Glocester. Thence I found nothing memorable, but neere the fountaine of Churn River, Coberley, a ſeat of a ſtem of Barkeleies ſo often named even from the Conqueſt, which matched with an heire of Chandos, and ſo came hereditarily to the Bruges progeniF tors to the Lords Chandos. Then by Bird-lip-hill, whereby we aſcended unto this high Coteſwold out of the vale, lyeth Brimsfield, which had for the L. thereof the Giffords in times paſt, unto whom in right of marriage there came a goodly inheritance from the Cliffords, and ſtreight waies by the female heires, the ſame fell to the Lords le Strange of Blackmer, to Audleies and divers others. Thus much of the places among the Woulds.

Fosse way. But under the ſaid Woulds I have ſeene that notable Roman high-way by a well knowne name called the Foſſe, which out of Warwicke-ſhire commeth downe firſt by Lemington, (where it may ſeeme there was a Station of the Romanes by the peeces of Romane Coine ploughed there often times out of the ground: ſome of which Edward Palmer a curious and diligent Antiquary, whoſe Anceſtors flouriſhed heere a long time, hath of his courteſie imparted unto mee) then, by Stow on the Would, where by reaſon of that high ſite, the Windes blow cold: and North-Leach bearing the name of a Riveret running hard by it: and then to Circenceſter, which the River Corinus, now Churn riſing among the Woulds neere Corberley, very commodious for Milles, paſſeth by into the South, and ſo giveth it his name. This was a City of as great antiquity as any other, called by Ptolomee CORINIUM, by Antonine the Emperour, DUROCORNOVIUM, that is, The water Cornovium, juſt fifteene miles from Glevum or Gloceſter, as hee noteth. The Britans named it Caer Cori, and Caer Ceri; the Engliſh Saxon Cyren-ceaſtep, wee in theſe dayes Circeſter, and Circiter. The ruinate wals doe plainely ſhew that it was very large: for, by report they tooke up two miles in compaſſe: That it was a famous place, the Romane Coines, the cherkerworke pavements, and the engraven marble ſtones that now and then are there digged up, (which, have beene broken and to no ſmall prejudice of Antiquity) doe evidently teſtifie: As alſo the Port Conſular wayes of the Romanes, that heere did croſſe one another, whereof that which led to GLEVUM or Gloceſter, is yet extant with his high rigde evident to bee ſeene as farre as to Bird-lip-hill, and if a man looke well upon it, ſeemes to have beene paved with ſtone. The Britiſh Chronicles record, that this City was burnt being ſet on fire by Sparrowes, through a ſtratageme deviſed by one Gurmund, I wot not what Tyrant of Africke, whereupon Giraldus calleth it Paſſerum urbem, that is, the Sparrowes City: and out of thoſe Chronicles Necham writeth thus,

Who this Gurmund was I know not. The Inhabitants ſhew a Mount beneath the City which they report Gurmund did caſt up, and yet they call it Griſmunds Tower. Marianus an Hiſtorian of good antiquity and credit, reporteth, that Ceaulin King of the Weſt Saxons diſpoſſeſſed the Britans of it, what time hee had diſcomfited and put to flight their forces at Deorham, and brought Gloceſter to his ſubjection. Many yeares after this, it was ſubject to the Weſt Saxons: for, wee reade, that Penda the Mercian was defeited by Cinegliſe King of the Weſt Saxons, when hee beſieged it with a mighty Army. Howbeit, at length both it, and the whole Territory and country came under ſubjection of the Mercians, and ſo continued untill the Engliſh Monarchie. Under which it ſuſtained much ſorrow and grievous calamity by the Danes: and peradventure at the hand of Gurmon that Dane, whom the Hiſtoriographers call both Guthrus and Gurmundus. So that it may ſeeme he was that Gurmund which they ſo much ſpeake of. For certes when he raged, about the yeare 879. a rablement of Danes rouſted heere one whole yeare. Now ſcarce the fourth part within the wals is inhabited: the remaines beſide are paſture grounds and the ruines of an Abbay, built (as the report goeth) at firſt by the Saxons, and newly repaired afterwards by King Henry the Firſt for Blacke Chanons, wherein, I heard ſay, that many of the family of the Barons de * Sancto Amando were buried. But the Caſtle that it had, was by a Warrant from the King, overthrowne in the firſt yeare of Henry the Third his Raigne. The Townesmen raiſe the chiefe gaine by the Trade of Clothing, and they make great reports of the ſingular bounty of King Richard the Firſt towards them, who endowed the Abbay with lands: and (as they ſay themſelves) made them Rulers of the ſeven Hundreds adjoyning, to hold the ſame juriſdiction in fee farme: by vertue whereof, they ſhould have the hearing and determining of cauſes, and take unto themſelves the fines, perquiſites, amercements, and other profites growing growing out of the trials of ſuch cauſes. Moreover King Henry the Fourth granted unto them certaine priviledges in conſideration of their good and valiant ſervice performed againſt Thomas Holland Earle of Kent, late Duke of Surrey, Iohn Holland Earle of Huntingdon, late Duke of Exceſter, Iohn Montacute Earle of Salisbury, Thomas de Spenſer Earle of Glocester, and others, who being by him diſpoiled of their honors, and maligning his uſurpation, conſpired to take away his life, and here, by the townesmen intercepted, were ſome of them ſlaine outright, and others beheaded. Baker's Chronicle f. 159

The river Churne when it hath left Circeſter behinde him, ſix miles * neere to Dounamveny an ancient ſeate of the Hungerfords, joyneth with Iſis. For, ISIS, commonly called Ouſe, that it might bee by originall of Glocester-ſhire, hath his head there, and with lively ſprings floweth out of the South border of this ſhire nere unto Torleton an upland Village, not farre from that famous Port-way, called the Foſſe. This is that Iſis which afterwards entertaineth Tame, and by a compound word is called Tamiſis, Soveraigne as it were of all the Britain Rivers in Britaine: of which a man may well and truely ſay as ancient Writers did of Euphrates in the Eaſt part of the World: that it doth both Sow and Water the beſt part of Britaine. The poeticall deſcription of whoſe Source or firſt head, I have heere put downe out of a Poem entituled The Marriage of Tame and Iſis, which whether you admit or omit, it skilleth but little.

Earles of Gloceſter.

As touching the Earles of Gloceſter; ſome there be, who have thruſt upon us one William Fitz-Euſtace, for the firſt Earle: who this was, I have not yet found, and I verily beleeve hee is yet unborne. But that which I have found, I will not conceale from the Reader. About the comming in of the Normans, wee reade that one Bithricke an Engliſh Saxon was Lord of Gloceſter, whom Maud wife to William Conquerour, upon a ſecret rankor and hatred conceived againſt him for his contempt of her beauty (for, Bithrick had before time refuſed to marry her) troubled and moleſted moſt maliciouſly. And when ſhee had at length caſt him in Priſon, Robert Fitz-Haimon Lord of Corboile in Normandy, was by the King endowed with his poſſeſſions, who in a battaile having received a wound with the puſh of a pike upon the temples of his head, had his wits crackt therewith, and ſurvived a good while after, as a man beſtraught and madde. His daughter Mabil, whom others name Sibill, Robert the baſe ſonne of King Henry the Firſt by the interceſſion of his father, obtained for his wife, but not before he had made him Earle of Gloceſter. This is hee who is called commonly by Writers The Conſull of Gloceſter. A man of an haughty valorous minde and undaunted heart, as any one in that age; and who being never dejected with any adverſity, wanne great praiſe for his fidelity and worthy exploits in the behalfe of his ſiſter Maude the Empreſſe againſt Stephen then uſurping the Crowne of England. This honourable Title left he unto his ſon William, who dejected with comfortleſſe griefe when death had deprived him of his onely ſon and heire, aſſured his eſtate with his eldeſt daughter to Iohn ſon to King Henry the Second, with certaine proviſoes for his other daughters. Yet his three daughters brought this Earldome into as many families. For Iohn when he had obtained the Kingdome repudiated her upon pretenſes, as well that ſhe was barren, as that they were within prohibited degrees of conſanguinity: and reſerving the Caſtle of Briſtow to himſelfe, after ſome time, paſſed over his repudiated wife with the Honor of Gloceſter, to Geffrey Mandevil ſon of Geffrey Fitz Peter, Earle of Eſſex for 20000. markes, who thus over-marrying himſelfe was greatly impoveriſhed, and wounded in Tournament died ſoone after iſſueleſſe: and ſhe being remarried to Hubert of Burgh died immediately. Then K. Iohn upon an exchange granted the Earldome of Gloceſter to Almary Earle of Eureux, ſon to the eldeſt daughter of the foreſaid E. William, who enjoyed it a ſhort time dying alſo without iſſue. So by Amice the

Pat. 15. Joan. R. 4.

A the ſecond daughter of the forenamed Earle William married to Richard de Clare Earle of Hertford, this Earledome deſcended to Gilbert her ſonne, who was ſtiled Earle of Glocester and Hertford, and mightily enriched his houſe by marrying one of the heires of William Marſhall Earle of Pembroch. Earles of Glocester and Hertford.

His ſonne and ſucceſſour Richard in the beginning of the Barons warres againſt king Henry the Third ended his life, leaving Gilbert his ſonne to ſucceed him, who powerfully and prudently ſwaied much in the ſaid wars, as he inclined to them or the king. He obnoxious to King Edward the Firſt, ſurrendred his lands unto him, and received them againe by marrying Joane the Kings Daughter (ſirnamed of Acres in the Holy-land becauſe ſhee was there borne) to his ſecond Wife, who bare unto him Gilbert
B Clare laſt Earle of Glocester of this ſirname, ſlaine in the flower of his youth in Scotland at the battaile of Sterling in the 6. yeare of K. Edward the ſecond. Howbeit while this Gilbert the third was in minority, Sir Ralph de Mont-hermer who by a ſecret contract had eſpouſed his mother the Kings daughter (for which he incurred the kings high diſpleaſure, and a ſhort impriſonment) but after reconciled was ſummoned to Parliaments by the name of Earle of Glocester and Hertford. But when Gilbert was out of his minority, he was ſummoned amongſt the Barons by the name of Sir Ralph de Mont-hermer, as long as he lived, which I note more willingly for the rareneſſe of the example. After the death of Gilbert the third without children Sir Hugh Le De-Spenſer (commonly named Spenſer) the younger, was by writers called Earle of Glo-
C ceſter, becauſe he had married the eldeſt ſiſter of the ſaid Gilbert the third. But after that he was by the Queene and Nobles of the Realme hanged, for hatred they bare to K. Edward the 2. whoſe minion he was; Sir Hugh Audley, who had matched in marriage with the ſecond ſiſter, through the favour of King Edward the Third, received this honour. After his death King Richard the Second erected this Earledome into a Dukedome, and ſo it had three Dukes and one Earle betweene: and unto them all it prooved Equus Sejanus, that is, Fatall to give them their fall. Thomas of Woodſtocke youngeſt ſonne to King Edward the Third, was the firſt Duke of Glocester advanced to that high honour by the ſaid King Richard the Second, and ſhortly after by him ſubverted. For when he buſily plotted great matters, the King tooke order that he D ſhould be conveyed ſecretly in all haſte to Calis, where with a featherbed caſt upon him he was ſmouthered: having before under his owne hand confeſſed (as it ſtands upon Record in the Parliament Rols) that he by vertue of a Patent which hee had wreſted from the King, tooke upon him the Kings regall authority, that he came armed into the Kings preſence, reviled him, conſulted with learned about renouncing his allegiance, and deviſed to depoſe the King: for which being now dead he was by authority of Parliament attainted and condemned of high Treaſon. When hee was thus diſpatched, the ſame King conferred the Title of Earle of Glocester upon Thomas Le De-Spenſer in the right of his Great Grand-mother; who within a while after ſped no better than his great Grand-father Sir Hugh. For by King Henry the E fourth he was violently diſplaced, ſhamefully degraded, and at Briſtow by the peoples fury beheaded. After ſome yeares King Henry the Fifth created his brother Humfrey, the ſecond Duke of Glocester, who ſtiled himſelfe the firſt yeare of King Henry the Sixth, as I have ſeene in an Inſtrument of his, Humfrey by the Grace of God, ſonne, brother, and Uncle to Kings, Duke of Glocester, Earle of Henault, Holland, Zeland, and Penbroch; Lord of Frieſland, Great Chamberlaine of the Kingdome of England, Protector and Defender of the ſame Kingdome, and Church of England. A man that had right well deſerved of the common wealth and of learning, but through the fraudulent practiſe and malignant envie of the Queene brought to his end at Saint Edmunds Bury. The third and laſt Duke was Richard brother to King Edward the Fourth who afterwards ha-
F ving moſt wickedly murdred his Nephewes, uſurped the Kingdome, by the name of King Richard the third: and after two yeates loſt both it and his life in a pitched field, finding by experience that power gotten by wicked meanes is never long laſting.

Thomas De La Mare in the life of Edward 2.

Concerning this laſt Duke of Glocester, and his firſt entry to the Crowne, give me leave for a while to play the part of an Hiſtoriographer, which I will ſpeedily Richard the third King of England.

give over againe as not well able to act it. When this Richard Duke of Glocester being now proclaimed Protector of the Kingdome had under his command his tender two Nephewes, Edward the Fifth King of England, and Richard Duke of Yorke, he retriving after the Kingdome for himselfe, by profuse liberality and bounty to very many, by passing great gravitie tempered with singular affabilitie, by deepe wisdome, by ministring justice indifferently, and by close devises, wonne wholly to him all mens hearts, but the Lawyers especially to serve his turne. So shortly he effected that in the name of all the States of the Realme, there should be exhibited unto him a supplication, wherein they most earnestly besought him for the publike Weale of the Kingdome, to take upon him the Crowne, to uphold his Countrey, and the common-weale now shrinking and downe falling, not to suffer it to runne headlong into utter desolation; by reason that both lawes of nature, and the authority of positive lawes, and the laudable customes and liberties of England, wherein every Englishman is an inheritor, were subverted and trampled under foote through civill wars, rapines, murthers, extortions, oppressions, and all sorts of misery. But especially ever since that King Edward the fourth, his brother bewitched by sorcerie and amorous potions fell in fancie with Dame Elizabeth Greie widdow, whom he married without the assent of his Nobles, without solemne publication of Banes, secretly in a profane place, and not in the face of the Church, contrary to the law of Gods Church and commendable custome of the Church of England: and which was worse, having before time by a precontract espoused Dame Æleanor Butler, daughter to the old Earle of Shrewsburie: whereby most sure and certaine it was, that the foresaid matrimony was unlawfull and therewith the children of them begotten illegitimate, and so unable to inherite or claime the Crowne. Moreover considering that George Duke of Clarence the second brother of King Edward the Fourth, was by authority of Parliament convicted and attainted of high treason, thereupon his children disabled and debarred from all right succession; evident it was to every man, that Richard himselfe remained the sole and undoubted heire to the Crowne. Of whom they assured themselves, that being borne in England he would seriously provide for the good of England, neither could they make any doubt of his birth, parentage, and Filiation; whose wisdome also, whose justice, princely courage, warlike exploits most valiantly atchieved in the defence of the State, and whose roiall birth and bloud, (as who was descended from the bloud roiall of the three most renowned Kingdomes of England, France, and Spaine) they knew assuredly. Wherefore having throughly weighed these and such like motives, they willingly and withall hearty affection tendring the welfare of the land, by that their petition and one generall accord of them all elected him for their King, and with prayers and teares lying prostrate before him, humbly craved and besought his gracious favour to accept and take upon him the Kingdomes of England, France, and Ireland, appertaining to him by right of inheritance, and now presented to him by their free and lawfull election; and so for very pitty and naturall zeale to reach forth unto his Countrey now forlorne his helping hand, that after so great and grievous stormes the sonne of grace might shine upon them to the comfort of all true hearted English men: This supplication being tendred privately to himselfe, before that he entred upon the Kingdome, was presented also afterwards unto him in the publike assembly of all the States of the Realme, and there allowed, and so by their authoritie enacted and published, with a number of words (as the maner is) heaped up together, that according to the law of God, the law of Nature, the lawes of England and most laudable custome, Richard was and is by lawfull election, Inauguration, and Coronation the undoubted King of England, &c. and that the Kingdomes of England, France, and Ireland appertained rightfully to him and the heires of his body lawfully begotten. And to use the very words as they stand penned in the originall Record. By the authority of the Parliament it was pronounced, decreed and declared, that all, and singular the contents in the foresaid Bill were true and undoubted; and the Lord the King with the assent of the three States of the Kingdome, by the foresaid authoritie pronounceth, decreeth, and declareth the same, for true and undoubted.

She was married first to R. Butler, L. of Sudley.

A undoubted. Theſe things have I laid forth more at large out of the Parliament Rowle, that yee may underſtand, both what and how great matters, the power of a Prince, the outward ſhew of vertue, the wily fetches of Lawyers, fawning hope, penſive feare, deſire of change, and goodly pretenſes, are able to effect in that moſt wiſe aſſembly of all the States of a Kingdome, even againſt all Law and right. But this Richard is not to be accounted worthy to have bin a Soveraigne had he not bin a Soveraigne as Galba was reputed; who when he was a Soveraigne, deceived all mens expectation: but moſt worthy indeed of Soveraigntie, had he not being tranſported with ambition (which blaſteth all good parts) by lewd practiſes, and miſchievous meanes made foule way thereunto. For that by the common conſent of all that
B are wiſe, he was reckoned in the ranke of bad men, but of good Princes.

Now remembring my ſelfe to be a Chorographer I will returne to my owne part, and leave theſe matters unto our Hiſtoriographers, when God ſhall ſend them.

In this Countie there are Pariſhes. 280.

OXFORD-SHIRE.

OXFORD-SHIRE, in the Saxon Tongue Oxenpopopchyne, which, as we ſaid, belonged alſo to the Dobuni, on the Weſt ſide joyneth upon Glocester-ſhire, on the South, which way it runneth out farthest in breadth, is diſſevered from Berk-ſhire, by the River Iſis or Tamis: Eastward, it bordereth upon Buckingham-ſhire: and Northward where it endeth pointed, in manner of a Cone, or Pine-apple, hath North-hampton-ſhire of one ſide, and Warwick-ſhire on the other ſide, confining with it. It is a fertile Country and plentifull: wherein the Plaines are garniſhed with Corne-fields and meddowes, the Hilles beſet with Woods, ſtored in every place not onely with Corne and fruites, but alſo with all kinde of game for Hound, or Hawke; and well watered with fiſhfull Rivers. For ISIS, or OUSE which afterwards comes to bee named Tamis, maketh a long courſe and runneth under the South ſide; Cherwell alſo a prety River well ſtored with fiſh, after it hath for a time parted North-hampton-ſhire and Oxford-ſhire paſſeth gently with a ſtill ſtreame through the middeſt of the Country, and divideth it, as it were, into two parts. And Tamis with his waters conforteth and giveth heart to the Eaſt part, untill both of them together with many other Riverets and Brookes running into them bee lodged in Iſis.

This Iſis when it hath paſſed a ſmall part of Wil-ſhire, no ſooner is entred into Oxford-ſhire but preſently being kept in and reſtrained with Rodcot bridge, paſſeth by Bablac, where Sir R. Vere that moſt puiſſant Earle of Oxford, Marqueſſe of Dublin, and Duke of Ireland, who as he ſtood in moſt high favour and authority with King Richard the Second, ſo he was as much envied of the Nobles, taught us (as one ſaid) that no power is alwaies powerfull. Who being there diſcomfited in a skirmiſh by the Nobles and conſtrained to take the River and ſwimme over, found the Cataſtrophe of his fortune and ſubverſion of his ſtate: For, immediately he fled his country and died diſtreſſed in exile. Of whom the Poet in his Marriage of Tame and Iſis, made theſe verſes.

Rodcot Bridge.
Bablac.

——Hic Verus notiſſimus apro,
Dum dare terga negat virtus, & tendere contrà
Non ſinit invicta rectrix prudentia mentis;
Undique dum reſonat repetitis ictibus umbo,
Tinnitúque ſtrepit circum ſua tempora caſsis,
Se dedit in fluvium, fluvius lætatus & illo
Hoſpite, ſuſcepit ſalvum, ſalvúmque remiſit.

1387.

Heere VERE, well knowne by badge of ſavage Bore,
While man-hood ſhames to yeeld, yet ſtrive againe
Stout heart may not, reſtrain'd by wiſdomes lore;
Whiles ſhield reſounds by doubled blowes amaine,
And helmet rings about his eares; is faine
The ſtreame to take: The River glad therefore,
His Gueſt tooke ſafe, and ſet him ſafe on ſhore.

Wilde Bore the badge of the Veres.

Iſis from thence overflowing many times the flat and low grounds, is firſt encreaſed with the Brooke Windruſh, which ſpringing out of Cotteſwold, hath ſtanding upon the banke ſide Burford, in the Saxon Tongue Beopppo, where Cuthred King of Weſt-Saxons at that time by curteſie of the Mercians, when hee could endure no longer the moſt grievous exactions of Æthelbald the Mercian, who began to oppreſſe his people and ſucke their bloud, came into the field againſt him, and put him to flight: having won his Banner, wherein, by report of Authours, there was a golden Dragon depainted. Then paſſeth it by Minſter Lovell, the habitation in times paſt of the Burford.

Barons Lovell.

*Lovell. the great Barons Lovels of Tichmerch, who being deſcended from * Lupellus a Noble man of Normandy flouriſhed for many ages, and augmented their eſtate by rich marriages with the daughters and heires of Tichmerch, with the heires of the Lords Holland D'eyncourt, and the Vicounts Beaumont. But their line expired in Francis Vicount Lovell, Lord Chamberlaine to King Richard the Third, (attainted by King Henry the Seventh, and ſlaine in the battaile at Stoke in the quarrell of Lambert that Counterfeit Prince) whoſe ſiſter Fridiſwid was Grandmother to Henry the firſt Lord Norrey.

Whitney. Hence Windruſh hodling on his courſe watereth Whitney an ancient Towne, and before the Normans daies belonging to the Biſhops of Wincheſter: to which adjoyneth

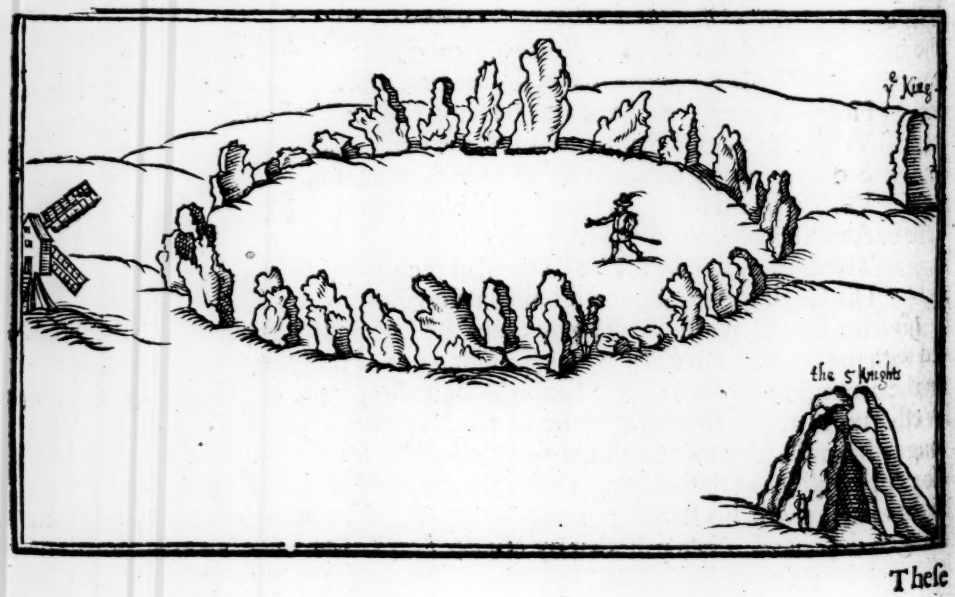
Arſic. Coges, the chiefe place of the Barony of Arſic, the Lords whereof branched out of the family of the Earles of Oxford are utterly extinguiſhed many yeeres agoe. Neere unto this, the Foreſt of Witchwood beareth a great breadth and in time paſt ſpread farre wider. For King Richard the Third diſforeſted the great Territory of Witchwood betweene Woodſtocke and Brightſtow: which Edward the Fourth made to be a Foreſt, as John Roſſe of Warwicke witneſſeth. Iſis having received Windruſh paſſeth downe to Einſham. Einſham in the Saxon tongue Eigneſham, a Manour in times paſt of the Kings, ſeated among moſt pleaſant medowes, which Cuthwulfe the Saxon was the firſt that tooke from the Britans whom he had hereabout vanquiſhed, and long after Æthelmar a Nobleman beautified it with an Abbay: the which, Æthelred King of England in the yeere of Salvation 1005. confirmed to the Benedictine Monkes, and in his confirmation ſigned the priviledge of the liberty thereof, (I ſpeake out of the very originall grant as it was written) with the ſigne of the ſacred Croſſe: but now is turned into a private dwelling houſe and acknowledgeth the Earle of Derby Lord thereof. Beneath this, Evenlode a little river ariſing likewiſe out of Cotteſwald ſpeedeth him into Iſis; which riveret in the very border of the Shire paſſeth by an ancient Monument ſtanding not farre from his banke, to wit, certaine huge ſtones placed in a round circle (the common Rolle rich-ſtones. people uſually call them Rolle-rich ſtones, and dreameth that they were ſometimes men, by a wonderfull Metamorphoſis turned into hard ſtones. The draught of them, ſuch as it is, portrayed long ſince, heere I repreſent unto your view. For, without all forme and ſhape they bee, unequall, and by long continuance of time much impaired. The higheſt of them all, which without the circle looketh into the earth, they uſe to call The King, becauſe hee ſhould have beene King of England (forſooth) if hee had once ſeene Long Compton, a little Towne ſo called lying beneath, and which a man, if he goe ſome few paces forward, may ſee: other five ſtanding at the other ſide, touching as it were, one another, they imagine to have been knights mounted on horſe backe; and the reſt the Army. But loe the foreſaid Portraiture.



These

A These would I verily thinke to have beene the Monument of ſome Victory and haply, erected by Rollo the Dane, who afterwards conquered Normandie. For, what time as he with his Danes and Normans troubled England with depredations, we read that the Danes joined battaile with the Engliſh thereby, at Hoche Norton, and afterwards fought a ſecond time at Scier ſtane in Huiccia, which alſo I would deeme to be that Mere-ſtone ſtanding hard by for a land Marke, and parting foure ſhires: For, ſo much doth that Saxon word Scier-ſtane moſt plainly import. Certainly in an Exchequer booke the Towne adjacent is called Rollen-drich, where as it is there ſpecified, Turſtan le Diſpenſer held land by Serjeanty of the Kings Diſpenſary, that is, to be the Kings Steward. As for that Hoch-Norton, which I ſpake of before, for the ruſticall behaviour of the Inhabitants in the age afore going it grew to be a proverbe,
B when folke would ſay of one rudely demeaning himſelfe and unmanerly after an Hoggiſh kinde, that hee was borne at Hocknorton. This place, for no one thing was more famous in old time, than for the woefull ſlaughter of the Engliſhmen in a foughten field againſt the Danes, under the Raigne of King Edward the Elder. Afterwards, it became the ſeat of the Barony of the D' Oilies an honourable and ancient Family of the Norman race; of whom the firſt that came into England was Robert de Oily, who for his good and valiant ſervice, received of William Conquerour this Towne and many faire poſſeſſions, whereof hee gave certaine to his ſworne brother Roger Ivery, which were called the Barony of Saint Valeric. But when the ſaid Robert departed
C this life without iſſue male, his brother Niele ſucceeded him therein: whoſe ſonne Robert the ſecond was founder of Oſney Abbay. But at length the daughter and heire generall of this houſe D' Oily, was married to Henry Earle of Warwicke: and ſhe bare unto him Thomas Earle of Warwicke, who dyed without iſſue in the Raigne of Henry the Third: and Margaret, who deceaſed likewiſe without children, abeit ſhee had two husbands, John Mareſcall, and John de Pleſſetis, both of them Earles of Warwicke. But then, (that I may ſpeake in the very words of the Charter of the Grant) King Henry the Third granted Hoch-norton and Cudlington unto John de Pleſſetis, which were in times paſt the poſſeſſions of Henry D' Oily, and which after the deceaſe of Margaret, wife ſometime to the foreſaid John Earle of Warwicke, fell into the kings hand as an Eſcheat of Normans lands: To have and to hold, untill the lands of England and Normandy were common.
D Howbeit out of this ancient and famous ſtocke there remaineth at this day a family of D' Oilies in this ſhire. Evenlode paſſeth by no memorable thing elſe, but La Bruer, now Bruern ſometime an Abbay of white Monks, and after he hath runne a good long courſe taketh to him a Brooke, neere unto which ſtandeth Woodſtocke, in the Engliſh Saxon language ꝑuðeꝛtoc, that is, A woody place, where King Etheldred in times paſt held an aſſembly of the States of the Kingdome and enacted Lawes. Heere is one of the Kings houſes full of State and magnificence, built by King Henry the Firſt, who adjoyned alſo thereunto a very large Parke compaſſed round about with a ſtone wall, which, John Roſſe writeth to have beene the firſt Parke in England, although we read
E once or twiſe even in Doomeſday Booke, theſe words, Parcus ſilveſtris beſtiarum in other places. In which ſenſe old Varro uſeth the word Parcus, which ſome thinke to be but a new word. But ſince that, Parkes are growne to ſuch a number that there bee more of them in England, than are to be found in all Chriſtendome beſide; ſo much were our Anceſtours raviſhed with an extraordinary delight of hunting. Our Hiſtorians report, that King Henry the Second being enamoured upon Roſamund Clifford, a Damoſell ſo faire, ſo comely, and well favoured without compariſon, that her beauty did put all other women out of the Princes minde, in ſo much as now ſhee was termed Roſa mundi, that is, The Roſe of the World; and for to hide her out of the F ſight of his jealous Juno the Queene, he built a Labyrinth in this houſe, with many inexplicable windings, backward and forward: Which notwithſtanding is no where to be ſeene at this day. The Towne it ſelfe, having nothing in it at all to ſhew, glorieth yet in this, that Geffrey Chaucer our Engliſh Homer was there bred and brought up. Of whom and of our Engliſh Poets I may duely avouch that, which that learned Italian ſaid of Homer and the Greeke Poets;

Woodſtocke

Geffrey Chaucer.

His

——Hic ille eſt cujus de gurgite ſacro
Combibit arcanos vatum omnis turba furores.

This is the man whoſe ſacred ſtreame hath ſerved all the crew
Of Poets, thence they dranke their fill, thence they their furies drew.

For, he ſurpaſſing all others without queſtion in wit, and leaving our ſmattering Poet-aſters by many degrees behinde him:

——jam monte potitus,
Ridet anhelantem dura ad faſtigia turbam.

When once himſelfe the ſteepe top hill had wonne,
At all the ſort of them he laught anone,
To ſee how they the pitch thereof to gaine
Puffing and blowing doe clamber up in vaine.

Iſis having now entertained Evenlode, divideth his Chanell and ſevering it ſelfe maketh many and thoſe moſt delectable Iſlands, neere which ſtood Godſtow a little Nunnery, which Dame Ida a rich widow built; and King John both repaired and alſo endowed with yearely Revenewes, that theſe holy Virgins might releeve with their prayer (for by this time had that perſuaſion poſſeſſed all mens mindes) the ſoules of King Henry the Second his father, and of Roſamund: For, there was ſhe buryed with this Epitaph in Rhyme:

Hac jacet in tumbâ Roſa mundi, non Roſamunda,
Non redolet, ſed olet, quæ redolere ſolet.

Roſe of the World, not Roſe the freſh pure floure
Within this Tombe hath taken up her boure:
She ſenteth now and nothing ſweet doth ſmell,
Which earſt was wont to favour paſſing well.

* We read that Hugh the Biſhop of Lincolne Dioceſan of this place comming hither cauſed her bones to bee removed out of the Church as unworthy of Chriſtian buriall for her unchaſte life. Nevertheleſſe the holy ſiſters there tranſlated them againe into the Church, and layed them up in a perfumed leather bagge; encloſed in lead as was found in her Tombe at the diſſolution of the houſe; and they erected a Croſſe there whereby the Paſſengers were put in minde with two rhyming Verſes to ſerve God, and pray for her. But I remember them not.

* Neither doth the Ouſe or Iſis as yet gather himſelfe into one ſtreame, when hee meeteth with Cherwell, which out of Northampton-ſhire, runneth almoſt through the mids of this Country. This River firſt watereth Banbury ſometime Banesbyrig, a faire large Towne, at which Kinric the Weſt Saxon King in old time put to flight the Britans in a memorable battaile fighting manfully for their lives, ſtate, and all they had: and in this later foregoing age, not farre off Richard Nevill Earle of Warwicke ſiding with the houſe of Lancaſter gave ſuch an overthrow to thoſe of York, that forthwith alſo he tooke King Edward the Fourth now forlorne and hopeleſſe. Now the fame of this Towne is for zeale, cheeſe, and cakes, and hath a Caſtle for ſhew, which Alexander Biſhop of Lincolne, (for to the See of Lincolne it belongeth) firſt built, who having a minde to dwell ſtately rather than quietly, brought upon himſelfe many adverſities by his huge buildings. About this Towne, (that I may obſerve ſo much by the way) peeces of the Romane Emperours Coine found, (as alſo elſewhere in the field neere adjoyning) make ſomewhat to prove the antiquity of the place.

Neere to Banbury is Hanwell, where the Family of Cope hath flouriſhed many yeares in great and good eſteeme. And neere it againe is Broughton the habitation of Sir Richard Fienes, or Fenis: unto whom and to the heires of his body, the moſt mighty Prince King James, in the firſt yeare of his Raigne, Recognized and confirmed the name, ſtile, title, degree, dignity and honour of the Baron Say and Sele: as who lineally deſcended from Sir James Fienes Baron Say and Sele, and Lord high Treaſurer of England, who was cruelly beheaded by a rable of Rebells in the time of King Henry the Sixth.

Cherwell

A Cherwell carrying his Streame along from Banbury ſeeth nothing but pleaſant fields paſſing well husbanded, and as plentifull medowes. Amongſt which ſtand Heiford Warin, ſo denominated Warin Fitz-Gerold Lord thereof, Heyford Purcell likewiſe, ſo named of the Purcels, or de Porcellis ancient Gentlemen the old owners, Blechinden an * an ancient Poſſeſſion of the ancient Family Le Pever, and Iſlip in elder time Ghiſtlipe Iſlip. the natall place of that King Edward (whom for his religious Piety and continency our Anceſtours, and the Popes vouchſafed the name of Saint Edward the Confeſſor) as hee himſelfe witneſſeth in the originall Charter, whereby he granted this place to the Church of Weſtminſter.

Here there runneth a riveret from the Eaſt in to Cherwell, which paſſeth by Bur- Burceſter.
B ceſter, in the Engliſh Saxons tongue Bupenceaſtep, and Bennacaſtep, a little towne carrying an ancient name, but wherein I have obſerved no matter of antiquity, ſave that Gilbert Baſſet and Egelina Courtenay his Wife, built heere a Religious Houſe in honour of Saint Eadburga, in the time of King Henry the Second, and that not long ſince the Barons Le Strange of Knocking were Lords of the place. But Weſtward, there lie ſome few remaines of a decayed and forlorne ancient ſtation Alcheſter, they call it happily, as one would ſay, Aldcheſter, that is, an old Towne, by Aldcheſter. which a Port way from Wallengford, as the neighbour Inhabitants thinke, led to Banbury, and the ſame they called Akemanſtreet way: the Tract whereof for cer- Bath ſometime called Akemanceſter.
C taine miles together is yet moſt plainly to bee ſeene in the plaine of Otmore, which oftentimes is ſtrangely overſpread with winter waters. Cherwell thus increaſed paſſeth Southward nere to Hedindon, which King Iohn gave to Sir Thomas Baſſet for Hedindon. his Barony. *

But where Cherwell is confluent with Iſis, and pleaſant Eights or Iſlets lye diſperſed by the ſundry diſſeverings of Waters; there the moſt Famous Univerſity of Oxford, called in the Engliſh Saxon tongue Oxenford, ſheweth it ſelfe aloft Oxford.
in a Champion plaine. Oxford, I ſay, our moſt noble Athens, The Muſes-Seate, and one of Englands ſtayes; nay The Sunne, the Eye, and the Soule thereof, the very Source and moſt cleare Spring of good Literature and Wiſedome: From whence, Religion, Civility and Learning are ſpred moſt plenteouſly into all parts of the Realme.
D A faire and goodly Citty, whether a man reſpect the ſeemely beauty of private houſes or the ſtately magnificence of publike buildings, together with the wholſome ſight or pleaſant proſpect thereof. For, the hils beſet with woods doe ſo environ the plaine, that as on the one ſide they exclude the peſtilent Southwinde, and the tempeſtuous Weſt winde on the other, ſo they let in the cleering Eaſtern-winde onely, and the North-eaſt winde with all, which free from all corruption: Whence it came to paſſe that of this Situation it was, (as writers recorde in ancient times) called Belloſitum. Some are of opinion, that it hath beene named Caer Vortigern and Caer Vember in the Britiſh language, and that I wote not, what Vortigerns and Memprices built it. But what ever it was in the Britans time, the Engliſh Saxons called it
E Oxenpopo, and altogether in the ſame ſignification that the Grecians terme their Boſphori, and the Germans their Ochen-furt upon Odera, to wit, of the fourd of Oxen: in which ſenſe it is named of our Britans in Wales at this day Rhyd-ychen: And yet Leland grounding upon a probable conjecture, deriveth the name from the River Ouſe called in Latine Iſis, and ſuppoſeth that it hath beene named Ouſford conſidering that the River Eights or Iſlands which Iſis ſcattereth hereabout, bee called Ouſney.

Sage antiquity, as wee read in our Chronicles, conſecrated this Citty even in the Britiſh age unto the Muſes: whom from Greeke-lad (which is a ſmall Towne at this day in Wilt-ſhire) they tranſlated hither as unto a more fruitefull Plant-plot.
F For thus writeth Alexander Necham, The skill of Civill Law Italy challengeth to it ſelfe: but for Heavenly Writ or Holy Scripture, the liberall Sciences alſo do prove, that the Citty of Paris is to bee preferred before all others. Moreover according to the Propheſie of Merline, Wiſedome and Learning flouriſhed at Oxford, which in due time was to paſſe over into the parts of Ireland. But when during the Engliſh Saxons age next enſuing, there was Lib. 2. de Naturis rerum.

nothing but continuall wasting and rasing of Townes and Citties, according to the sway and current of those dayes it sustained in part the common calamity of that Frideswide. time, and for a great while was frequented onely for the reliques of Frideswide, who for the chastity and integrity of her life was canonized a Saint, upon this occasion especially, for that by a solemne vow shee had wholly devoted her selfe unto the Service of GOD; and Prince Algar whiles he came a wooing unto her, was miraculously, as writers say, stricken blinde. This Frideswide, (as wee reade in William of Malmesbury) triumphing for her virginity, erected here a Monastery, into which when certaine Danes adjudged to die in King Etheldreds time fled for refuge as to a Sanctuary, they were all burned with the buildings, (such was the unsatiable anger of the Englishmen against them.) But soone after, when the King repented this Act, the Sanctuary was cleansed, the Monastery reedified, the old Lands restored, new Possessions added, and at length the place was given by Roger Bishop of Salisbury unto a Chanon excellently well learned who there presented unto GOD many such Chanons who should live regularly in their Order. But leaving these matters, let us returne unto the Universitty. When the tempestuous Danish stormes were meerely well blowne ouer, Aelfred that most devout and Godly King recalled the long banished Muses unto their owne Sacred Chancells and built three Colledges: one for Grammarians, a second for Philosophers, and a third for Diuines. But this you may more plainely understand out of these words in old Annales of the new Abbey of Winchester. In the yeare of Christs Incarnation * 806. and in the second yeare of Saint Grimbald his comming into England, was the Vniversity of OXFORD begunne. The first Regents in the same and Readers in the Divinity Schoole were Saint Neoth an Abbat, and besides a worthy Teacher in Divinity; and holy Grimbald a right excellent Professour of the most sweete written Word of Holy Scripture. But in Grammar and Rhetoricke, the Regent was Asserius a Monke, in the skill of Literature passing well learned. In Logicke, Musicke and Arithmeticke, the Reader was John a Monke of the Church of * Saint Davids: In Geometry and Astronomy reade John a Monke also and Companion of Saint Grimbald, a Man of a passing quicke witte, and right learned every way: At which Lectures was present that most glorious and invincible King Aelfred, whose memoriall in every Mans mouth shall bee as sweete as honie.

* Menevensis.

But presently after, as wee reade in a very good manuscript coppy of the sayd Asserius, who at the same time professed learning here; There arose a most dangerous and pernicious dissention at Oxford, betweene Grimbald and these great Clerkes whom he brought thither with him on the one side, and those old Schoole-men whom hee there found, on the other side: who upon his comming refused altogether to embrace the Rules, Orders and Formes of reading prescribed and begunne by him. For three yeares space the variance and discord betweene them was not great, howbeit there lurked a secret hatred fostered and festered among them, which brake out afterwards in most grievous and bitter manner, and was most evident. For the appeasing whereof, that most Invincible King Ælfred being by a message and complaint from Grimbald certified of that discord, went to OXFORD to determine and end this controversie: Where also himselfe in Person tooke exceeding great paines in giving Audience to the quarrels and complaints of both sides. Now the maine substance of all the contention stood upon this point. Those old Schoole-men hotly avouched, that before Grimbalds comming to OXFORD Learning generally flourished there, although the Schollers and Students were fewer then in number than in former times, by reason that the most of them through the cruelty and tyranny of Painims were expelled. Moreover they proved and declared, and that by the undoubted testimony of old Chronicles, that the Orders and Ordinances of that place were made and established by certaine Godly and learned men, as namely Gildas of holy memory, Melkin, Ninnius, Kentigern and others, who all of them studied and followed their books there untill they were aged persons, managing and governing all things there in happy peace and concord: also that S. German came to Oxford and abode there halfe a yeare, what time as he travelled through Britan, with a purpose to preach against the Pelagian heresies, who wonderous well allowed of their former Orders and Ordinances. This Noble King with incredible and unexampled humility heard both parts most diligently, exhorting

A exhorting them in earneſt wiſe, (enterlacing godly and wholſome admonitions) to keepe mutuall ſociety and concord one with another. And ſo the King departed with this minde, hoping they would all of both ſides obey his counſell and embrace his orders. But Grymbald taking this unkindely and to the heart, forthwith went his wayes to Wincheſter Abbay newly founded by Aelfred: Shortly after hee cauſed his owne Tombe to be tranſlated to Wincheſter, wherein he purpoſed after hee had runne his race in this life, that his bones ſhould bee beſtowed, in an arched Vault made under the Chancell of Saint Peters Church in Oxford: Which Church verily the ſame Grymbald had built from the very foundation out of the ground, with ſtone moſt curiouſly wrought and poliſhed.

Within ſome years after this new revived felicity, there enſued divers diſturban-
B ces from the Danes, and afterward followed one or two calamities. For the Danes in the reigne of Ethelbred by way of robbery and foule worke and havocke there: and ſtreight after, Herald ſurnamed Light foote raged againſt it with ſuch barbarous cruelty, for that ſome of his followers were ſlaine there in a fray, that there followed thereupon a moſt heavy baniſhment of the Students, and the Univerſity, (a ſorrowfull ſpectacle) lay as it were, halfe dead and paſt all recovery, untill the dayes of king William the Conquerour. Whom ſome write falſly to have wonne it by aſſault: but Oxonia written amiſſe in the Copies, for Exonia, that is, Exceſter deceived them. And that it was at that time a place of Studies and Students, may bee underſtood out of theſe words of Ingulph, who in that age flouriſhed. I, Ingulph (ſaith hee) being firſt
C *placed in Weſtminſter, and afterwards ſent to the * Study of Oxford, when as in learning of Ariſtotle, I had profited above my fellowes of the ſame time, &c.* For thoſe Schooles of Learning which wee call Academies or Vniverſities, that Age termed Studia, that is, Studies, as I will ſhew anone. But at this very time, it was ſo empoveriſhed, that whereas within the wall and without, (I ſpeake out of William the Conquerour his Domeſday booke) there were about ſeaven hundred and fifty houſes, beſides foure and twenty Manſions upon the Walls, five hundred of them were not able to pay their Subſidy or Impoſition. And to uſe the very words of that booke, *This City paid pro Theloneo et Gablo, and for other Cuſtomes by the yeare to the King twenty pounds and ſixe quarts of Hony: and unto Earle Algar tenne pounds. About this time,
D Robert D'oily a noble man of Normandy (of whom I have before ſpoken) when hee had received at the hands of William the Conquerour in reward of his Service in the Warres, large Poſſeſſions in this Shire, built a ſpacious Caſtle in the Weſt ſide of the Citty with deepe Ditches, Rampiers, an high raiſed Mount, and therein a Pariſh Church to Saint George, unto which when as the Pariſhioners could not have acceſſe, by reaſon that King Stephen moſt ſtreightly beſieged Maude the Empreſſe within this Caſtle; Saint Thomas Chappell in the ſtreete hard by was built. 1074.
He alſo, as it is thought, fortified the whole Citty with new walls, which by little and little time doth force, and as it were embreach with his aſſault. Robert likewiſe Nephew unto him by his brother Neale, and Chamberlaine to King Henry the Firſt,
E founded Ouſney or Oſney, a moſt ſtately Abbay, as the ruines doe yet ſhew, amidſt the divided waters, not farre from the Caſtle: perſwaded thereto by Edith his wife, 1129.
(the daughter of Forne) who before time had beene one of King Henry the Firſt his ſweet hearts and lig-bies.

About thoſe times as we read in the Chronicle of the ſaid Oſney Abbay, Robert Pulein beganne to reade in Oxford the Holy Scriptures, in England now growne out of requeſt: Who afterwards, when as by his Doctrine the Engliſh and Frenchmen both had much profited; was called by Pope Lucius the ſecond, and promoted to be Chancellour of the Church of Rome. To the ſame effect alſo writeth Iohn Roſſe of Warwicke. By the procurement of King Henry the Firſt, the Divinity Lecture which had diſcontinued a long time in Oxford,
F began againe to flouriſh, and there he built a Palace, which King Edward the Second at length converted into a Covent of Carmelits. But long before this time, in this Palace was borne into the World that Lion-hearted Knight, Richard the Firſt King of England; commonly called Ceeur de Lion, a Prince of a moſt hauty minde and full of reſolution, borne for the weale of Chriſtendome, the honour of England, and the terrour of Oſney.

Richard Cuer de Lion.

Infidels. Upon whoſe death a Poet in that age of no meane conceite verſified thus, for that his remaines were interred in diverſe places;

Viſcera Carcelorum, Corpus Fons ſervat Ebrardi,
Et cor Rhothomagum, Magne Richarde, tuum:
In tria dividitur unus, qui, plus fuit uno,
Nec ſupereſt uno gloria tanta viro.

Hîc Richarde jaces, ſed mors ſi cederet armis,
Victa timore tui, cederet ipſa tuis.

Thy Bowels keep's Carceolum, thy corps Font Everard:
And Roan thy valiant Lions heart, O noble great Richard.
Thus one three fold divided is, for more he was then one,
And for that one, ſo great he was, ſuch glory is in none.

Here li'ſt thou Richard, but if death to force of armes could yeeld,
For feare of thee he would to thee have given as loſt the field.

Thus after the Citty was refreſhed againe with theſe buildings, many beganne to flocke hither as it were to a Mart of learning and vertue: and by the induſtrious meanes eſpecially of that Robert Pulein, a man borne to promote the Common-wealth of learning, who refuſed no paines, but laboured all that he could to ſet open againe thoſe Well ſprings of good Literature which had beene ſtopped up, through the favour eſpecially of King Henry the Firſt, King Henry the Second, and King Richard his ſonne, of whom I ſpake ere while. And theſe endeavours of Pulein ſped ſo well and tooke ſo good effect, that in the reigne of King Iohn, there were here three thouſand Students; who all at once every one changed their Habitation to Reding and partly to Cambridge, becauſe the Citizens ſeemed to wrong and abuſe overmuch theſe Students and Profeſſours of Learning: but after this tumult was appeaſed, they returned within a ſhort time. Then and in the age preſently enſuing, as God provided this City for good learning, ſo he raiſed up a number of very good Princes and Prelats to the good thereof, who for the adorning and maintenance of learning extended their liberality in the higheſt degree. For, when King Henry the Third had by way of Pilgrimage viſited Saint Frideſwide, (a thing before-time thought to bee an hainous Offence in a Prince for the diſhonour offered to her by Algar a Prince) and ſo removed that ſuperſtitious feare, wherewith ſome ſuperſtitious Prieſtes had for a time frighted Princes from once comming to Oxford: and had aſſembled here a very great Parliament for the compoſing of certaine controverſies betweene him and the Barons, hee confirmed the priviledges granted by the former Kings, and conferred alſo ſome other himſelfe. So that by this time there was ſo great ſtore of learned men, that divers moſt skilfull in Divinity as well as in Humanitie, were in great numbers ſpread from thence both into the Church and Common-wealth: and Mathew Paris, in plaine termes called The Vniverſity of Oxford, The Second Schoole of the Church, nay, rather a ground-worke of the Church, next after Paris. For with the name of Vniverſity the Biſhops of Rome had before time honoured Oxford, which Title at that time by their Decrees they vouchſafed to none but unto that of Paris, this of Oxford, unto Bononia in Italy and Salamanca in Spaine. And in the Councell of Vienna, it was ordained that there ſhould bee erected Schooles for the Hebrew, Greeke, Arabicke and Chaldæan tongues, in the Studies of Paris, Oxford, Bononie and * Salamanca, as the moſt famous of all others, to the end that the knowledge of thoſe tongues might by effectuall inſtruction be throughly learned. And, that Catholicke men having ſufficient knowledge in thoſe tongues ſhould bee choſen, twaine skilfull in every of thoſe tongues. For thoſe who were to bee Profeſſours in Oxford, The ſame Councell ordained, That the Prelats of England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales, the Monaſteries alſo, the Clementinarum, Quinto.

A the Chapters, the Covents, the Colledges exempt, and not exempt, and Persons of Churches should provide competent stipends.

Out of these words may bee observed, both that Oxford was the chiefe place of Studies in England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales, and also that those Schooles which we now adayes doe call Academies and Universities, were aptly in old time named Studies: as S. Hierom tearmed the Schooles of Gaul, Studia Florentissima, that is, most flourishing Studies. And as for the name of Vniversity, it was taken up about the time of King Henry the Third, for a Publike Schoole, and if I bee not deceived in mine owne observations, it was then in use not for the place but for the very body and society of Students, as we reade in bookes of that age, Vniversitas Magistrorum B Oxoniæ, Vniversitas Magistrorum Cantabrigiæ, that is, The Vniversity of Masters of Oxford, &c. But happily this may seeme beside my Text.

Studia. Ad Rusticum Monachum.

Vniversitas.

Now by this time, good and bountifull Patrons began to furnish the Citty within, and the Suburbs without with most stately Colledges, Halls and Schools, and to endow them also with large Revenewes: For the greatest part of the Vniversity was beforetime in the Suburbs without the North-gate. In the reigne of King Henry the third, Iohn Balliol of Barnards Castle in the Bishopricke of Durham who died in the yeere 1269. the father of Balliol King of Scots, founded Balliol Colledge and so named it: and streight after Walter Merton Bishop of Rochester, translated the Colledge which hee had built in Surrey to Oxford, in the yeere 1274. enriched it with C Lands and Possessions, naming it The house of Schollers of Merton, but now it is called Merton Colledge. And these two were the first endowed Colledges for Students in Christendome. William Archdeacon of Durham repaired and enlarged with new building that worke of King Aelfred, which now they call, Vniversity Colledge. At which time, the Students, for that they entertained somewhat courtely Otto the Popes Legate, or Horse-leach rather, sent out to sucke the English Clergies blood, were excommunicate and with all indignities shamefully handled. And in those dayes, as Armachanus writeth, there were counted here thirty thousand Students. Under King Edward the Second, Walter Stapledon Bishop of Exceter founded Exceter Colledge and Hart Hall, and the King himselfe in imitation of him built the Colledge D commonly called Oriall, and S. Mary Hall. At which time a convert Jew read an Hebrew Lecture here, unto whom for a Stipend every one of the Clergy of Oxford for every Marke of his Ecclesiasticall living, contributed a penny. Afterward Queene Philip wife to King Edward the Third, built Queenes Colledge, and Simon Islip, Archbishop of Canterbury, Canterbury Colledge.

The Students then, having the world at will and all things falling out to their hearts desire, became insolent, and being divided into factions, under the names of Northren and Southren men, strucke up the Alarum to intestine and unreasonable tumults among themselves. Whereupon the Northren faction went their wayes to Stanford and beganne there to set up Schooles. But some few yeeres after, when E Gods favour shining more lightsomely had scattered away the clouds of contention, they returned from Stanford recalled by Proclamation directed to the High-sheriffe of Lincolneshire upon penalty to forfeit their bookes and the Kings displeasure. And then it was ordained that no Oxford man should professe at Stanford, to any prejudice or hinderance of Oxford. Shortly after William Wickham Bishop of Winchester founded a magnificent Colledge, which they call New-Colledge: into which out of another Colledge of his at Winchester the best wits are yeerely transplanted. And hee about the same by the tract of the Citty wall built a faire high wall embatled and turrited. Also Richard Angervill Bishop of Durham, surnamed Philobiblos, that is Love booke, furnished a Library for the publike use of Students. His Successour Thomas F Hatfield, laied the foundation of Durham Colledge, for Durham Monkes, and Richard Fleming Bishop of Lincolne founded likewise Lincolne Colledge. Also at the same time the Monkes of the order of Saint Bennet, by a Chapter held among them, laid their monies together and encreased Glocester Hall: built before by I. Lord Gifford of Brimsfield for Monkes of Glocester, wherein one or two Monkes out of every Covent of Benedictine Monkes were maintained at ſtudy, who afterwards ſhould profeſſe good letters in their Abbaies, unto which Glocester Hall, Nicholas Wadham of Merifeld in the County of Somerſet, hath aſſigned a faire portion of lands and mony for the propagation of Religion and Learning, which I note incidently by way of congratulation to our Age, that there are yet ſome who graciouſly reſpect the advancement of good Learning. About that time, not to ſpeake of the Chanons of Saint Frideſwide, and Oſney, or the Ciſtertian Monkes of Reilew, there were erected fower faire Frieries and other religious houſes, where flouriſhed alſo many profound Learned men. In the age enſuing, when Henry the Fifth reigned, Henry Chicheley Archbiſhop of Canterbury built two and thoſe very faire Colledges, the one dedicated to the memory of All Soules, and the other to Saint Bernard. And there paſſed not many yeeres betweene, when William Wainflet Biſhop of Wincheſter founded Mary Magdalen Colledge: for building rare and excellent, for ſight commodious, and for walkes paſſing pleaſant. And at the very ſame time was built the Diviniy Schoole, ſo fine a peece of elegant worke that this of Xeuxis may juſtly bee ingraven upon it: Inviſurum facilius aliquem quàm imitaturum: that is, Sooner will one envy me, then set ſuch another by me. And Humfrey that good Duke of Glocester, a ſingular Patron, and a reſpective lover of learning, encreaſed the Library over it with an hundred twenty nine moſt ſelect Manuſcript bookes, which at his great charges he procured out of Italy. But ſuch was the private avarice of ſome in the giddy time of K. Edward the Sixt, that they for ſmall gaine envied the uſe thereof to Poſterity. Yet now againe (God bleſſe and proſper it) Sir Thomas Bodley a right worſhipfull knight and a moſt worthy Nource-ſon of this Vniverſity furniſhed richly in the ſame place a new Library with the beſt books of exquiſite choice from all parts, with great charges and ſtudious care, never ſufficiently commended. Whereby the Vniverſity may once againe have a publike Store-houſe of knowledge and learning, and himſelfe deſerveth the Glory that may flouriſh freſhly in the memory of all Eternity. And whereas by an ancient cuſtome of the wiſeſt men, thoſe were wont to be dedicated within ſuch Libraries in gold, ſilver or braſſe, by whoſe care they were erected, and whoſe immortall ſoules in them doe ſpeake to the end that Time might not have power and prevaile againſt men of worth, and the deſires of mortall men might be ſatisfied who do all long to know what their perſons and preſence were. The Earle of Dorſet late Chancellor of this Vniverſity (that he might alſo leave ſome memoriall of himſelfe) hath in the very place dedicated unto Sir Thomas Bodley ſo paſſing well deſerving of the Learned Common-wealth, his repreſentation with this inſcription:

Hide Abbay. Locus Regalis.

That is,

UNTO SIR THOMAS BODLEY KNIGHT, WHO INSTITUTED THIS LIBRARY OF A PIOUS MIND ERECTED THIS MONUMENT TO DO HIM HONOUR.

In

A In the Raigne of Henry the Seventh, for the better advancement of learning, William Smith Bishop of Lincolne built new out of the ground Brasen Nose College, (which that good and godly old man Master Alexander Nowell Deane of Saint Paules in London lately augmented with Revenewes) and Richard Fox Bishop of Winchester erected likewise that which is named Corpus Christi College: and Thomas Wolsey Cardinall of Yorke following their example, beganne another (where the Monastery of Frideswide stood) the most stately and faireſt of them all, for Professors and 200. Students, which Henry the Eighth, joyning unto it Canterbury College assigned to a Deane Prebends and Students, endowed it with livings, and named it Christs Church. And the same most puissant Prince, with money disbursed out of his owne Treasury,
B ordained, both for the Dignity of the City a Bishop, and for the ornament and advancement of the Universitie, publique Professours. Likewise within our remembrance, for the furtherance of learning with new and fresh benefits, Sir Thomas Pope Knight reared a new Durrham College: and Sir Thomas White Knight Citizen and Alderman of London raised Bernard College, both which lay buryed in the rubbish. They reedified them, repaired them with new buildings, enriched them with faire lands and gave them new names: For the one of them they dedicated to Saint Iohn Baptist, and that other to the holy and sacred Trinity. Queene Mary also built the common Schooles. And now of late Hugh Price Doctor of the Lawes, hath beC gunne a new College (with good speede and happy successe as I wish) to the honor of Iesus. With these Colleges which are in number 16. (and eight Haulls beside) all faire, and decently built, richly endowed, and furnished with good Libraries, Oxford at this day so flourisheth, that it farre surmounteth all other Universities of Christendome. And for Living Libraries, (for so may I well and truely with Eunapius terme great Scholers and learned men) for the discipline and teaching of the best Arts, and for the politique government of this their republicke of Literature, it may give place to none. But to what end is all this? Oxford needeth no mans commendation: the excellency thereof doth so much exceede, and (if I may use Plinies word) superfluit, that is, Surmounteth. Let this suffice to say of Oxford as Pomponius Mela did of Athens, Clarior est quàm ut indicari egeat, that is, More glorious it is of it selfe, than D that it needeth to bee out shewed. But have heere for an upshot and farewell, the beginning of Oxford story out of the Proctors booke. By the joint testimony of most Chronicles, many places in divers Coasts and Climats of the world we read to have flourished at sundry times in the studies of divers sciences; But the Vniversity of Oxford is found to be for foundation more ancient; for plurality of sciences more generall, in profession of the Catholike truth more constant, and in multiplicity of Privileges more excellent, than all other Schooles that are knowne among the Latines. The Mathematicians of this Universitie have observed, that this their City is from the Fortunate Islands 22. Degrees, and the Arcticke or North Pole elevated 51. Degrees, and 50. Scruples high. And thus much briefly of my deare Nurse-mother Oxford.

E But when a little beneath Oxford Isis and Cherwell have consociated their waters together within one Chanell, Isis then entire of himselfe and with a swifter current runneth Southward, to finde Tame whom so long he had sought for. And gone he is not forward many miles, but behold Tame streaming out of Buckinghamshire, meeteth with him: who is no sooner entred into this Shire, but he giveth name to Tame a Mercate Towne situate very pleasantly among Rivers. For, Tame passeth hard by the Northside, and two Riverets shedding themselves into it compasse the same, the one on the East, and the other on the West. Alexander that liberall Bishop of Lincolne, Lord of the place, when his prodigall humor in sumptuous building of Castles was of every body privily misliked, to wash out that staine (as Newbrigensis saith)
F built a little Abbay neere unto the Towne: and many yeares after the Quatremans, who in the age foregoing were men of great reputation in these parts, founded an Hospitall for the sustentation of poore people. But both of these are now decayed and quite gone: and in stead thereof Sir Iohn Williams Knight, whom Queene Mary advanced to the Dignity of a Baron, by the Title of Lord William of Tame erected a very Baron Williams of Tame.

Baron William of Tame.

a very faire Schoole, and a ſmall Hoſpitall. But this Title ſoone determined when he left but daughters marryed into the Families of Norris and Wenman.

From hence Tame runneth downe neere unto Ricot, a goodly houſe, which in times paſt belonged to thoſe Quatremans: whoſe ſtocke failing to bring forth Males, it was devolved at length after many ſailes and alienations paſſed by the Foulers and Herons, unto the ſaid Lord Williams; and ſo by his daughter fell to Sir Henry, Lord Norris, whom Queene Elizabeth made Baron Norris of Ricot, a man of good marke in regard of his noble birth and parentage: for he deſcended from the Lovells, who were neere allied by kinred unto the greateſt houſes in England: but moſt renowned for that right valiant and warlike Progeny of his, as the Netherlands, Portugall, little Bretagne, and Ireland can witneſſe. At the length, Tame by Haſeley, where ſometimes the names of Barentines flouriſhed as at Cholgrave commeth to Dorcheſter by Bede termed Civitas Dorcinia: by Leland Hydropolis, a name deviſed by his owne conceit, yet fit enough, conſidering that Dour in the Britiſh tongue ſignifieth water. That this Towne was in old time inhabited by Romanes, their coined peeces of money oftentimes turned up doe imply: and our Chronicles record, that it was for a long time much frequented by reaſon of a Biſhops See, which Birinus the Apoſtle of the Weſt-Saxons appointed to be there. For when hee had baptiſed Cinigiſe a pety King of the Weſt-Saxons, unto whom Oſwald King of Northumberland was Godfather, both theſe Kings, as ſaith Bede, gave this City unto the ſame Biſhop to make therein his Epiſcopall reſidency. This Birinus, as wee may read alſo in Bede, was wonderfully in thoſe daies admired, for a deepe conceived opinion of his holineſſe: whereupon an ancient Poet who penned his life in Verſe, wrote thus of him, Dorcheſter.

Dignior attolli quàm ſit Tyrinthius heros,
Quàm ſit Alexander Macedo; Tyrinthius hoſtes
Vicit, Alexander mundum, Birinus utrunque.
Nec tantùm vicit mundum, Birinus, & hoſtem,
Sed ſeſe bello vincens, & victus eodem.

More worthy for to be extold than Hercules for might,
Or that great king of Macedon, who Alexander hight:
For Hercules ſubdu'd his foes; and Alexander he Wonne all the World by force of Armes: But our Birinus, ſee,
Did vanquiſh both: nor conquer'd he onely the World and Foe,
But in one fight ſubdu'd himſelfe, and was ſubdu'd alſo.

After 460. yeares, Remigus Biſhop of this place leaſt the name of Biſhop ſhould looſe credit in ſo ſmall a City (a thing forbidden in the Canons) in the Raigne of William the firſt tranſlated his ſeat to Lincolne. At which time this City of Dorcheſter (as Malmesbury ſaith who then flouriſhed) was but ſlender and of ſmall reſort, yet the majeſty of the Churches was great, whether you reſpected either the old building, or the new diligence and care emploied thereupon. Ever ſince it beganne by little and little to decay: and of late by turning London high way from thence, it hath decreaſed ſo, as that of a City it is ſcarce able now to maintaine the name of a Towne, and all that it is able to doe, is to ſhew in the fields adjoyning ruines onely and rubbiſh, as expreſſe tokens of what bigneſſe it hath beene. A little beneath this Towne Tame and Iſis meeting in one ſtreame become hand-faſt (as it were) and joyned in Wedlocke: and as in waters, ſo in name, they are coupled, as Ior and Dan in the holy Land, Dor and Dan in France, whence come Iordan and Dordan. For ever after this, the River by a compound word is called, Tamiſis, that is, Tamis. He ſeemeth firſt to have obſerved this, who wrote the booke entituled Eulogium Hiſtoriarum. Now as touching this marriage of Iſis with Tame have heere certaine Verſes taken out of a Poem bearing that Title, which you may read or leave unread at your pleaſure:

Occiduos adiit tractus, ut Cæsar anhelus

Territa

Territa quæſitis oſtendit terga Britannis, &c.

And after a few other verſes:

Dixerat, unito conſurgit & unus amore
Lætior exultans nunc nomine TAMISIS uno,
Oceanúmque patrem quærens jactantior undas Promovet.

Heere Zephyrus with freſh greene graſſe
The Bankes above doth ſpread,
Faire Flora with ay-living herbs Flora.
Adourneth ISIS head,
Moſt lovely GRACE ſelecteth forth
Sweet floures that never dy
And gladſome CONCORD plats thereof
Two guirlands skilfully.
With all God HYMENÆUS lifts
His torches up on hie.
A Bride-chamber the NAIADES
Beneath of rare device
And Bed do rear, ywov'n with warp
Beſet with ſtones of price.
All ſhining eke with pillars tall,
And wrought full curiouſly
The like did neither Lydie for King Pelops edify,
Nor thou, Queene Cleopatra, for Thine husband Antony.
There lay they foorth and make no ſpare,
Thoſe ſpoiles that whilom Brut
From Achives tooke; what riches great
From Grecians Brennus ſtout,
And from fierce Iriſh, Gurmund wonn,
What either Bundwic Queen,
From Romans gat, or Arthur from
Our Engliſh there are ſeene.
What ever from the Scots by force
Of fight our Edward King,
Or valiant Engliſh from the French
By armes away did bring.
Meane while, down Catechlanian hils TAME gliding, kindled had
The fire of love in hope of ISE
Her husband wondrous glad.
Impatient now of all delay
She haſtneth him to wed,
And thinks the daies be long untill
They meet in marriage bed.
Untill I ſay, ambitious ſhe,
May now before her love
Her own name ſet: ſee whereunto
Ambition minds doth move!
And now by this ſhee leav's the * town *Tame.
That knowen is by her name,
All haile, fare well redoubling to
The Norriſ's by the fame.
Old Dorcheſter at length ſhee ſees

Which

Which was to give preſage,
And lucky Augury of this Long wiſhed marriage.
Up riſeth Tame then, who know's
Her locks with eares of corn
Full well to knit, with kirtle green
Her waſt eke to adorn:
The lightſome raies of morning bright
She now doth far excell;
Dione faire in countenance
Lookes not by halfe ſo well.
Her lips the Peſtane Roſe ſurpaſſe,
Her eyes, gemmes of great coſt,
Her haire the Lilies freſh and white,
Her necke the hoary froſt.
And as ſhe runnes, her haire all wet
She doth behind her caſt,
Which waving thus ſhe kembeth flick,
And layeth even at laſt.
Lo, Iſis ſudainly out of
The Waves ſo mild doth ſhew,
His lovely face, his eies withall
Glitter with golden hew,
As they from dropping viſage ſend
Their beames the fields throughout,
Whiles one anothers neck with armes
Diſplayd they clip about,
Full ſweetly he doth Tame kiſſe
Whom he hath wiſh'd ſo long,
A thouſand kiſſes twixt them twain
Doe now reſound among.
With claſping cloſe their armes wax pale,
Their lips their hearts linke faſt,
To nuptiall chamber thus they both
Jointly deſcend at laſt:
Where CONCORD with religious FAITH
Together both ymet,
Knit up the knot of wedlock ſure
With words in forme yſet.
And now the pipes of thyrled box
On every ſide reſound;
The water Nymphes, the Dryades
The wanton Satyrs round
About the place diſport and dance
The meaſures cunningly,
Whiles on the graſſe they foote it fine,
In rounds as merily.
The Birds heerewith in every wood
Melodiouſly doe ſing,
And ECHO her redoubled notes
In mirth ſtrives forth to ring.
All things now laugh, the fields rejoice
The CVPIDS as they fly,
Amid the aire on bridled birds
Clap hands right pleaſantly

BRITONA, hand-faſt-maker ſhee,
All clad in Laurell green,
Play's on the Harp what ever acts
Our aunceſtours have ſeene.
Shee ſings how BRITANNY from all
The world divided was;
When Nereus with victorious Sea
Through cloven rocks did paſſe:
And why it was that Hercules
When he arrived heere,
Upon our coaſt, and taſted once
The mudleſſe TAMIS cleere,
Did Neptun's ſonne high Albion
Vanquiſh in bloudy fight
And with an haile-like ſtorme of ſtones
Kild him in field out-right.
And when Vlyſſes hither came,
What Altars ſacred were
By him? How Brute with Corinæ
His truſty friend and fere,
Went foorth into the Weſtern parts
And how that Cæſar, he
When he had fought and found, turn'd back
With feare, from Britannie.

And after ſome few verſes interpoſed.

This ſaid, then Tame and Iſis both
In love and name both one,
Hight Tamiſis, more joy's therein,
And haſtning to be gone
Ariſeth up and leaping out,
With haſtfull hot deſire,
Advanceth forth his ſtreame, and ſeekes
The Ocean main his ſire.

Benſon. From Dorcheſter, Tamis goeth to Benſon, in old time Benſingſton, which Marius calleth Villam Regiam, that is, The Kings towne, and reporteth, That Ceaulin tooke it from the Britans in the yeere of our Lord, 572. and that the Weſt-Saxons kept the poſſeſſion of it 200. yeeres after. For, then Offa the King of Mercians, thinking it would be for his commoditie and honor both, that they ſhould have nothing on this ſide the river, wonne it, and ſubjected it to him. But at this day it goeth for a village onely, and hath a houſe of the Kings hard by, ſometime a faire place, but now running exceedingly to ruine, as being not very wholſome by reaſon of the foggy aire and miſts ariſing from a ſtanding water adjoyning. This houſe of certaine Ewelme. Elmes called Ewelme, but commonly New-Elme, was built by William de la pole Duke of Suffolke, who having taken to Wife Alice the onely daughter of Thomas Chaucer, had by her faire lands heereabout as elſewhere: and beſide this houſe, he erected alſo a faire Church, wherein the ſaid Alice lieth buried, and a proper Hoſpitall: But Iohn Earle of Lincolne his Grand child, who by King Richard the Third had beene declared heire apparent to the Crowne, overthrew in ſome ſort the happie eſtate of this Family. For whiles he plotted and projected ſeditiouſly to rebell againſt King Henry the ſeventh, he was attainted and ſlaine in the battell at Stoke, and Edmund his brother being for like cauſe attainted, the poſſeſſions became Crowne-land. Then King Henrie the Eighth made this houſe an Honour, by laying unto it certaine Manours, and Wallingford among others, which before had a long time belonged unto the Dukes of Cornewall.

The

A The Tamis from hence having fetched a great compaſſe about windeth in manner backe againe into himſelfe, encloſing within it the Hundred of Henley, mounting high with Hills, and beſet with thicke Woods, which ſome doe thinke the ANCALITES that yeelded themſelves unto Cæſars protection, did inhabite. Here is Bix-brond and Stonor ancient Poſſeſſions of the Families of Stonores who ſince the time of King Edward the Third when Sir Iohn Stonore was chiefe Juſtice in the Common-pleas, flouriſhed with great alliance, and faire revenues untill they were transferred by an Heire generall to Sir Adrian Forteſcue unhappily attainted, whoſe daughter, Heire to her mother was married to the firſt Baron Wentworth. Next neighbour hereunto is Puſ-hull which the Family of D'oily held by yeelding yeerely to the King a Table-cloth of three ſhillings price, or three ſhillings for all ſervice. B Under this Southward ſtandeth Greies Rotherfield, a houſe which in times paſt Walter Grey the Archbiſhop of Yorke gave freely unto William Grey his Nephew, the Inheritance whereof by the Baron of D'Eincourt was devolved upon the Lovels. Now it is the dwelling houſe of Sir William Knolles, Treaſurer of the Kings Houſe, whom Iames our King for his faithfull ſervice performed unto Queene Elizabeth, and to be performed unto himſelfe, advanced to the honourable title of Baron Knolles of Rotherfield. Nere unto it, Henley upon Tamis, in old time called Hanleganz ſheweth it ſelfe in the very confines of the ſhires. The Inhabitants whereof be for the moſt part Watermen, who make their chiefeſt gaine by carrying downe in their Barges wood C and Corne to London: neither can it make report of any greater antiquity than that in times paſt the Molinies were Lords thereof, from whom by the Hungerfords who procured unto the towne, of King Henry the Sixth the liberty of holding two faires, it came by right of Inheritance unto the honourable houſe of the Haſtings. And where now the Tamis hath a wooden Bridge over it, they ſay in times paſt there ſtood one of ſtone arched. But whether this Bridge were here, that Dio writeth the Romans paſſed over when they purſued the Britans along this tract, who below had ſwom over the river, hard it is for a man to ſay. From Henley, the Chiltern-hils hold on with a continued ridge running Northward, and divide this Country from Buckinghamſhire: at the foote whereof ſtand many ſmall townes: among which theſe D two are of greateſt note, Watlington a little mercate towne belonging ſometime to Robert D'Oily: and Shirburne a prety Caſtle of the Quatremans in times paſt, but now the habitation of the Chamberlans deſcended out of the houſe of the Earles of Tankervill, who having beene long agoe Chamberlains of Normandy, their Poſterity relinquiſhing that old name of Tankervills, became ſurnamed Chamberlans, of the Office which their anceſtours bare.

To omit Edgar, Algar, and other Engliſh Saxons, officiall Earles of Oxford; Since after the Conqueſt, the title of the Earledome of Oxford hath flouriſhed a long time in the Family of Vere, which derive their deſcent from the Earles of Guines, and that ſurname from Vere a towne in Zeland. They received the beginning of their E greatneſſe and honour here in England from King Henry the Firſt, who advanced Aubrey de Vere for his ſingular wiſedome with ſundry favours and benefits, as namely with the Chamberlainſhip of England, and Portgreveſhip of the City of London. To his ſon Aubrey, Henry the Second (before hee was eſtabliſhed King, and when hee uſed onely this ſtile, Henry Sonne to King Henries daughter, right heire of England and Normandie) reſtored firſt the Chamberlan-ſhippe, which hee had loſt in the civill broiles, and then offered unto him which of the Titles he himſelfe would chooſe, of theſe foure Earledomes: Dorſet, Wilſhire, Barkſhire, and Oxfordſhire; that he might divert him from Stephen then uſurping the Kingdome, and aſſure him to himſelfe. And in the end both Maude the Empreſſe, and Henry alſo her ſon being now come to the F Crowne by their ſeverall Charters created him Earle of Oxford. Among thoſe that deſcended from him, (not to recount every one in their courſe and order) theſe were they that purchaſed greateſt fame and honour: Robert de Vere, who being in very high favour with King Richard the ſecond was honoured with theſe new and ſtrange dignities not heard of before, namely, Marqueſſe of Dublin, and Duke of Ireland: of which, as one ſaid, he left nothing at all to himſelfe, but to his Tombe titles, and to the world matter of talke. For, ſhortly after through the ſpitefull envy of the Nobles as much againſt the King as againſt him, he was diſpoiled of his eſtate, and ended his dayes miſerably in exile. Iohn the Firſt of that name ſo truſty and true to the Houſe of Lancaſter, that both Hee and his Sonne and Heire Aubrey loſt their heads therefore together in the Firſt yeere of King Edward the Fourth. Iohn his ſecond Sonne a right skilfull, and expert Martiall man, nevertheleſſe was moſt firme and faithfull to the ſaid Houſe of Lancaſter, fought in ſundry battells againſt King Edward the Fourth, defended and made good for a while Saint Michaels Mount, and was an eſpeciall aſſiſtant unto Henry the Seaventh in attaining to the Kingdome. Another Iohn likewiſe in the reigne of Henry the Eighth, a Man in all parts of his life ſo ſincere, ſo religious, and ſo full of goodneſſe, that hee gained the ſurname of the Good Earle. Hee was great Grandfather of Henry that is now Earle, and the Eighteenth of this race in Lineall diſcent, and alſo Grandfather of Sir Francis and Sir Horatio Vere, brethren, who by their ſingular knowledge in Military affaires, and exploits moſt valiantly, and fortunately atchieved in the Low-Countries, have added exceeding much honour and glory to themſelves, and to the ancient Nobility of their Family.

This Countie containeth Pariſh Churches. 280.

CATTI-

CATTIEUCHLANI.

VPon the DOBUNI Eastward there confined the people, which Ptolomee calleth according to the diuersity of copies, CATTIEUCHLANI, CATTIDUDANI, CATHICLUDANI, and Dio CATTUELLANI. Which of these might bee the truest name, I can not easily say. Yet giue me leaue I pray you in this place to cast forth my conjecture (although it is an abortive) concerning this point. I haue beene of opinion that these were in old time called CASSII, that of this Cassii their Prince was named Cassivellaunus or Cassibelinus: (for so wee finde it diuersely written. Also that, of Cassivellaunus name, this very people were by the Grecians termed Cattuellani, Cathuellani and Cattieuchlani. For, among the Nations of Britaine, Cæsar reckoneth the CASSII; who that they were seated in these parts it is most certaine: and of whose name a prety portion of this Tract is at this day called Caishow. And seeing that Cassivellaunus ruled this Country as it appeareth by Cæsar, and in the said name of his this denomination of CASSII doth most plainly bewray it selfe; it may seeme probable enough that Cassivellaunus, was so named, as one would say, The Prince of the Cassii. And unlesse it were so, why should Dio name this Cassivellaunus, Suellan, for Vellan, and Ninnius the Britan, call him, not Cassibellinus, but Bellinus; as though that Bellinus were the proper name either of the Man, or of his Dignity? Neither let it seeme strange, that Princes in old time tooke names of their owne Nations. The Catti in Germanie had their Cattimarus, the Teutons their Teutomarus and Teutobochus, the Daci their Decebalus, and the Goths their Gottiso. And what should let, but that our Cassii might haue their Cassibelinus? Considering that Belinus hath beene an usuall name in this Island: and some haue thought; that Cunobelinus who reigned amongst the Iceni, was so called, as one would say, the Belinus of the Iceni. From this Cassivellaunus therefore, if the Greeke writers haue not wrested these names Cattuellani and Cattieuchlani, &c. I confesse, that in this matter mine eye-sight fayleth mee altogether, and I see plainely nothing.

Cassii.

Belin.

But whence this people should come to bee named CASSII, I know not, unlesse happily it were of their Martiall prowesse. For, Servius Honoratus writeth, that the ancient Gaules who spake the same language that Britans did, called hardy and valiant men, Gessos: Whence Ninnius interpreteth Cethilon (a Brittish word,) The seede of Warriours. Now that these excelled in Warlike prowesse it is manifest: for, before Cæsars comming, they had warred continually with their Neighbours, they had reduced part of the DOBUNI under their subjection; the Britans had chosen their Prince, General over all their forces in the Warre against Cæsar, and they had enlarged their Empire and name farre abroad every way; For, all those generally were knowne by the name of CASSII, or CATTIEUCHLANI who now take up three Shires or Counties, to wit, Buckingham-shire, Bedford-shire and Hertford-shire. Of whom I am now to speake in order, and that briefely, because I have not much to say of any of them.

BVCKINGHAM-SHIRE.

WHereas Buckingham-ſhire is given to bring forth Beech trees plentifully, which the Engliſh-Saxons in elder times called Bucken, it may ſeeme conjecturally that Buckingham the chiefe Towne, and ſo the whole ſhire tooke the name from Beech trees. For there is a Country in Germany bearing Beech trees, named Buchonia: and with us, a towne in Norfolke called Buckenham, fruitfull of Beech, as I have beene enformed. This ſhire carrying but a ſmall bredth, runneth forth in length from the Tamis North-ward. On the South-ſide it looketh into Barke-ſhire, ſevered from it by the river Tamis: on the Weſt, Oxford-ſhire; from the North it hath Northhampton-ſhire, and from the Eaſt firſt Bedford-ſhire, then Hertford-ſhire, and afterward Middle-ſex. The Country generally is of a rich plentifull ſoile, and paſſing full of Inhabitants, who chiefly employ themſelves in graizing of cattell. It is divided into two parts, whereof the one bending into the South and Eaſt, and riſing into hills, they call Chilterne, in the Engliſh-Saxon tongue Cylteꝛn: the other lying under it North-ward is named the Vale.

Chiltern got that name according to the very nature of the ſoile of Chalky marle, which the ancient Engliſh men termed Cylt or Chilt. For, all of it mounteth aloft with whitiſh hills, ſtanding upon a mixt earth of Clay and Chalke clad with groves and woods, wherein is much Beech, and it was altogether unpaſſable in times paſt by reaſon of trees, untill that Leofſtane Abbot of Saint Albans did cut them downe, becauſe they yeelded a place of refuge for theeves. In it, where the Tamis glideth at the foote of thoſe hills with a winding courſe, ſtandeth Marlow, a prety towne of no meane credite taking name of the ſaid Chalke commonly tearmed Marle: which being ſpred upon Corne ground eaten out of heart with long tillage, doth quicken the ſame againe, ſo as that after one yeeres reſt it never lieth fallow, but yeeldeth againe unto the Husband-man his ſeed in plentifull meaſure. Chiltern. Marlow.

Nere unto this, a rill ſheaddeth it ſelfe in the Tamis, making way through low places, and where it turneth hath a towne upon it called High Wickham or Wicombe rather, which happily thereof tooke the name, conſidering that the German Saxons terme any winding reach of river and ſea, a Wicke, and Combe a low Valle. And very many places wee meet withall in England named in that reſpect. This towne for largeneſſe and faire building is equall to the greateſt townes in this ſhire, and in that it hath a Major for the Head-Magiſtrate worthily to bee preferred before the reſt. About the time of the Normans comming in, Wigod of Wallengford was Lord both of the Burgh of Wicomb, and alſo of the Villa forinſeca (I ſpeake according to the Record of the ancient Inquiſition) that is, The out Hamlet or Bery. After whoſe death King Henry the firſt laid it unto the Crowne. But King John at the length, divided the ſaid Out Berry betweene Robert de Vi-pount and Alane Baſſet. North off Wicomb mounteth up aloft the higheſt place of this Region, and thereof it retaineth ſtill the Britiſh name Pen. For the head or eminent top of a thing is with them called Pen: and hence it is that the Pennine Alpes, the Apennine and many Mountaines among us tooke their names. Nere unto this Wickham or Wicomb is Bradenham ſeated in a very commodious and wholſome place, which now is become the principall habitation of the Barons of Windeſor: (concerning whom I have already ſpoken in Barke-ſhire) ever ſince that in the memory of our fathers William Lord Windeſor ſeated himſelfe here, whoſe father S. Andrew deſcended from the old ſtemme of ancient Barons, King Henry the Eighth dignified with the honour of Baron Windeſor. Wickham.

Tamis having entertained the ſaid Rill commeth downe with a rolling ſtreame by Acton, famous for a Colledge, the nource garden (as it were) or plant plot of good letters, which that moſt vertuous and godly Prince K. Henry the Sixt, as I have already See in Barkſhire.

said, first founded. And some few miles forward the river Cole entreth into Tamis, which running here betweene Buckinghamshire and Middlesexe giveth name unto the towne Colbroke: which was that PONTES, whereof Antonine the Emperour maketh mention, as the distance on both sides from Wallingford and London doth witnesse: Neither is there any other place else in the way that leadeth from Wallingford to London to which the name of Pontes, that is, Bridges, might be more fitly applied. For this Cole is here parted into foure channels, over which stand as many bridges for the commodity of passengers; whereof that it tooke this name, the very signification of the word doth plainly shew. Like as Gephyræ a towne in Boætia, and another Pontes in France, where the County of Ponthieu, our Tunbridge, and others are so called, of Bridges. This County of Ponthieu (to note so much by the way) descended to the Kings of England in the right of Aeleanor the wife of King Edward the First, who by her mothers right was sole and entire Heire of the same. Cole by these severall partitions of his streames compasseth in certaine pleasant Ilands, into which the Danes fled in the yeere of our Lord 894. when Aelfred preassed hard upon them, and there by the benefit of the place defended themselves, untill the English for want of provisions were forced to breake up Siege and leave them. At this divorce and division of the waters Eure or Ever a little Towne sheweth it selfe, which when K. Richard the First had given unto Sir Robert Fitz-Roger, Lord of Clavering, his younger sonnes of this place assumed their surname, to wit, Hugh, from whom the Barons of Eure; and Robert from whom the Family of Eure in Axolme is sprung and spred. Farther within Land, are these places, which I may not passe over, Burnham better knowne by the Hodengs, Lord Huntercombs, and Scudamores, who were Lords thereof and of Beacons-field successively by inheritance, than by it selfe. Stoke Pogeis, so called of the Lords thereof in old time named de Pogeis, and from them hereditarily devolved upon the Hastings: of whose race Edward Baron Hastings of Loughborrow founded here an Hospitall for poore people, making himselfe one of their society, and his nephew by the brother Henry Earle of Huntingdon built a very faire house: and Fernham, the very same, if I bee not deceived, which was called Fernham Roiall: and which in times past, the Barons Furnivall held by service of finding their Soveraigne Lord the King upon the day of his Coronation a glove for his right hand, and to support the Kings right arme the same day all the while hee holdeth the regall Verge or Scepter in his hand. From the Furnivalls it came by the daughter of Thomas Nevill, unto the Talbots Earles of Shrewsbury, who although by exchange they surrendred up this Manour unto King Henry the Eight, yet they reserved this honourable Office still to them and their Heires for ever.

Colbroke. Pontes. Burnham. Stoke Pogeis. Fernham. Roiall. The booke of Fines.

This Cole carrieth downe with him another riveret also, which somewhat above from the West sheddeth it selfe into it: upon it we saw first Missenden, where stood a religious House that acknowledged the D' Oilies their founders and certaine Gentlemen surnamed De Missenden their especiall benefactours upon a vow for escaping a ship-wracke. And then in the Vale Amersham, in the Saxon tongue Agmundesham which vaunted it selfe not for faire buildings, nor multitude of inhabitants, but for their late Lord Francis Russell Earle of Bedford, who being the expresse paterne of true Piety and nobleness lived most dearely beloved of all good men. But the principall seate of the Earles of Bedford is called Cheineis, standing more East-ward, where both Iohn the first Earle out of this Family, and that noble Francis his sonne lye entombed together. Unto which adjoyneth on the one side Latimers, (so named of the Lords thereof, I meane those more ancient Barons Latimer) before time called Islehamsted, where Sir Edwin Sands Knight, who tooke to wife the onely daughter of the Baron Sands, dwelt, while he lived in a very faire house, and on the other Chesham Bois, where, and at Drayton Beauchamp the Family of Cheneis hath anciently flourished.

I. Rosse. Amersham. Cheneys. Latimers.

From hence I passed scarse three miles North-ward, but I came to the ridge of Chilturne-hils, which divideth the whole region a crosse from the South-west to the North-east, passing by many villages and small townes, among which that of greatest note

A note is Hamden, which gave name to an ancient and well ſpred Family in theſe parts. In the very Eaſt corner of theſe hils Aſbridge a retiring houſe ſometime of the kings ſtandeth upon an aſcent; where Edmund Earle of Cornewall ſonne to Richard king of the Romans founded a religious houſe for a new Order of religious men in thoſe daies, called * Bon: Hommes by him firſt brought into England: Who profeſſed the rule of S. Auguſtine, and were according to the manner of the Order of the Eremitans clad in skie coloured garments. From this ridge or edge of the Hils, there is a large proſpect every way downe into the Vale beneath, which I ſaid was the other part of the Shire. This almoſt throughout is a plaine Champion, ſtanding likewiſe upon a clay-ſoile, ſtiffe, tough, and fruitfull; with paſture medowes moſt plentifull of graſſe B and fodder; feeding innumerable flockes of ſheepe, whoſe ſoft and paſſing fine fleeces are in requeſt even as farre as to the Turkiſh Nations in Aſia. But it is all naked and bare of woods, unleſſe it bee on the Weſt ſide, where among others is Bernewood whoſe Forreſters ſurnamed de Borſtall were famous in former times. About this Forreſt the yeare after Chriſts Nativity 914. the Danes furiouſly raged: and then happily it was, that the ancient Burgh was deſtroied, whoſe antiquity Romane coined peeces of money there found doe teſtifie, which afterwards became the royall houſe of King Edward the Confeſſour: But now it is a Country Village, and in ſtead of Buri-Hill, they call it ſhort, Brill. In this Vale although it be exceeding full of Townes and Villages, yet very few of them are memorable, and thoſe either upon the River Tame or Viſa, C that is, Ouſe. Not far from Tame, which watereth the South part of the Vale, upon the riſing of a prety hill ſtandeth a faire Mercat Towne well occupied, and compaſſed about with many moſt pleaſant greene medowes and paſtures, commonly called Ailesbury, of which, the whole Vale is termed the Vale of Ailesbury. The Engiſh-Saxons called it Aeglesburge, when Cutwulf the Saxon won it in the yeare of our Lord 572. For the Brittiſh name, whereby it was knowne before, in continuance of time is utterly loſt. Famous it hath beene in times paſt eſpecially for Edithe ſake there foſtered, who having obtained of her Father Frewald this Towne for her Dowry, forthwith by perſuaſion of the religious people bad the world and her husband farewell, and taking her ſelfe to the Vale for opinion of holineſſe and devotion in that moſt D pregnant and fruitfull age of Saints, became wonderfully renowned, even as farre as to working of miracles, together with her ſiſter Eadburg: of whoſe name there is a little Towne among the Hils as yet called Eadburton. In the time of King William the Conquerour it was a Manour of the Kings: and certaine yard-lands were here given by the King, with this condition, that the Poſſeſſour or Holder thereof (marke ye nice and dainty ones) ſhould finde litter for the Kings bed when the King came thither. In the Raigne of Edward the Firſt, certaine Gentlemen named de Ailesbury, who bare for their Armes Azure, a Croſſe Argent, were by report (but I know not how truely) the Lords thereof; certaine it is, they were in thoſe daies men of the better ſort and of great good note, and ſuch as by marriage with the daughter and E heire of the Caihaignes (who were in times paſt Lords of Meddleton Caihaignes) came to a faire and goodly inheritance, which at laſt by heires generall came to the * Chaworths, the Staffords of Graſton, &c. But now, the greateſt name and reputation that it hath is by grazing and feeding of Cattaile. Very much beholden alſo it is unto Juſtice Baldwin, who not onely adorned it with publique ædifices, but alſo made a paſſing faire cauſey to it (where the way was very deepe and cumberſome) for three miles or thereabout in length.

Cerdic the Saxon, who fought a very ſharpe and bloudy battaile there with the Britans. Neere unto it ſtandeth Credendon, now Crendon, which was the Capitall houſe belonging to the Honour of Giffard, for ſo were thoſe lands termed which fell unto Walter Giffard at the Conqueſt of England, whoſe ſonne the ſecond Earle of Buckingham and Ermingard his wife, built the Abbay of Noteley thereby in the yeare 1118. But his cozen Hugh de Bolebec, from whom by the females the Earles of Oxford are deſcended, held of him no ſmall poſſeſſions in theſe parts. But he reſtored it unto him againe with a cozin of his in marriage: yet loſt he the ſame in the hot broile of the civill war under King Stephen; and Ernald Bois by way of a benefit and courteſie received it at the hands of Robert Earle of Leiceſter: And hee in the yeare of Chriſt 1127. founded there a little Monaſtery for the Ciſtertien Monks. Then Ouſe ſaluteth Buckingham the Shire Towne, which, as Marian ſaith, King Edward the * elder in the yeare of our Lord 915. fortified with a Rampire and Sconces on both bankes, againſt the Invaſions and aſſaults of the Danes. Yet was it of no great name, as it may ſeeme, in the firſt age of the Normans, ſeeing that in the Raigne of King Edward the Confeſſour, (as we read in William Conquerours Domeſday booke) it diſcharged it ſelfe for one Hide and no more, and had but ſix and twenty Burgeſſes. As for the Towne it is ſeated upon a low ground, but the River Ouſe, very commodious for Mils encircleth it about ſave onely on the North ſide. The Caſtle ſtanding in the middeſt raiſed upon an hill caſt up, whereof no Reliques in manner are now to bee ſeene, divideth the Towne as it were in twaine. The greater part of the Towne beareth North, wherein ſtandeth the Towne-houſe, the other toward the South is the leſſe, wherein is the Church, and that of no great antiquity: but in it was the Shrine of S. Rumald a child, who being borne in Kings-Sutton a Village thereby was canonized by our forefathers for a childe-Saint, and much famed with many miracles.

* Before the Conqueſt.

From hence Ouſe haſteneth faire and ſoftly into the North, and more Eaſtward from the River, neere unto the woods, ye have a ſight of Whaddon, the habitation in times paſt of the Giffords, who were by Inheritance keepers of Whaddon Chaſe under the Earle of Vlſter: and from whom it came to the Pigots, who paſſed it away by ſaile and alienation. There ſtandeth now a houſe of the warlike Family of the Greys, Barons of Wilton, who held the Manour neere adjoyning named Acton, by Serjeanty of keeping one Gerfalcon of their Soveraigne Lord the King. Whereupon that Family of the Greys hath for their Badge or Cogniſance a Falcon Sejant upon a Glove.

Barons Grey of Wilton.

Not farre from hence is Thornton an habitation of the Tirelles, and Saulden, where is a faire and lovely houſe built by Sir Iohn Forteſcue a right honourable knight and deeply learned withall, who for his wiſdome was Chauncellor of the Exchequer and Dutchy of Lancaſter, and of the Privie Counſell to Queene Elizabeth, and king Iames. On the other ſide of the River and not farre from the banke ſtand neighbourlike, Stow a houſe of the Family of Temple, Leckhamſted an habitation of the Greenwaies, Lillinſtone likewiſe the ſeat of the ancient Family De-Hairell, commonly called Dairell; and Luffeld, where in times paſt was founded a Monaſtery by Robert Earle of Leiceſter: but by reaſon that the Monkes were all conſumed with the plague, the houſe was utterly left deſolate. Somewhat higher on the South ſide of the River upon the very banke, ſtandeth Stony-Stratford, a Towne of all the reſt moſt frequented, named ſo of Stones, The Street way, and a Fourd: For, the houſes are built of a certaine rough ſtone which is digged forth in great abundance at Caverſham hard by, and

A and it ſtandeth upon the publike Street commonly called Watling ſtreet, which was a Militarie high way made by the Romanes, and is evidently to be ſeene yet beyond the Towne with the banke or cauſey thereof, and hath a fourd but now nothing ſhallow, and hardly paſſable. The Towne is of good bigneſſe, and meweth two Churches, and in the mids a Croſſe, though it be none of the faireſt, erected in memoriall of Queene Aeleonor of Spaine, wife to Edward the Firſt with the Armes of England, Caſtile and Leon, &c. alſo of the Earldome of Ponthieu, whereof ſhe was heire: And where ſometimes there had been a Fourd, the River Ouſe hath a ſtone bridge over it, which keepeth in the River that was wont, when it ſwelled with winter flouds, to breake out and overflow the fields with great violence. But upon the banke of the B other ſide which riſeth ſomewhat higher the Towne ſometime ſtood, as the inhabitants themſelves report. And there hard by, is Paſham, a place ſo called of paſſing over the River, ſo that it may ſeeme in times paſt to have been that paſſage, which King Edward the Elder kept againſt the Danes, whiles he fortified Torceſter: But this paſſage or Ferry became quite forlet after that the Bridge was built at Stony-Stratford. Now if I ſhould gueſſe that LACTORODVM, which Antonine the Emperour mentioneth ſtood heere; beſide the ſituation upon the Militarie High way of the Romanes, and the diſtance from other places, the ſignification alſo of the olde name LACTORODVM fetched out of the Britiſh language, maketh for me and favoureth my conjecture. Which name accordeth paſſing well with this new Engliſh name. For, both names in both languages were impoſed of Stone, and Fourd.
C From hence Ouſe runneth hard by Wolverton anciently Weluetrington the ſeat of an ancient familie ſo ſurnamed: whoſe lands are named in Records, The Baronie of Wulverington, from whom it came to the houſe of the Longvilles of ancient deſcent in theſe parts: and by Newport Painell which tooke that name of Sir Fulcod Painell the Lord thereof, and was from him devolved to the Barons Someries of Dudley, who heere had their Caſtle. Then, by Terringham, (which gave both name and habitation to a worſhipfull houſe and of great antiquity) it goeth to Oulney a meetly good mercate towne. This farre and a little further reacheth the County of Buckingham by Vſe the limit and bound thereof.

Lactorodum.

Leach in the Britiſh tongue ſignifieth ſtones, Rid and Ryd a Fourd. Wolverton. Newport Paynell.

D The firſt Earle of Buckingham, ſo farre as hitherto I could obſerve, was Walter ſurnamed Giffard, ſonne to Osbern de Bolebec, a man of great name and reputation among the Normans: Who in a Charter of King Henrie the Firſt is cited among the witneſſes thereto by the name of Earle of Buckingham. After him followed his ſonne bearing the ſame name, who in the booke of Abbingdon Abbay is called Earle Walter the younger, and died iſſueleſſe in the yeere 1164. Afterward in the reigne of Henry the Second, that famous Richard Strangbow Earle of Pembroch called Conquerour of Ireland, who derived his deſcent from the ſiſter and heir of Walter Giffard the ſecond, in certaine publique inſtruments bare this title. Then for a long time after lay this title as it were out of uſe and quite loſt, untill that in the yeere 1377.
E King Richard the Second conferred this honor upon his Unkle Thomas of Woodſtock, of whom I have already ſpoken among the Dukes of Gloceſter. Of this Thomas his daughter married unto Edmund Earle of Stafford was borne Humfrey Earle of Stafford, created Duke of Buckingham, with an invidious precedence before all Dukes of England by King Henry the Sixt, in whoſe quarrell he ſpent his life, fighting moſt valiantly in the battaile at Northampton. After him ſucceeded his Graundchild Henry, by his Sonne Humfrey, who made way for King Richard the Third the uſurper unto the Kingdome, and ſtreightwaies practiſed to depoſe him: for that he would not reſtore unto him the inheritance of the Bohuns by hereditarie right belonging unto him: but hee being intercepted loſt his head for it: and found (but F all too late) that Tyrants very often hew downe the ſtaires and ſteps whereby they aſcended: His ſonne Edward being reſtored againe through ſpeciall favour of King Henry the Seventh, by the wicked ſlights and practiſes of Cardinall Wolſey fell into diſgrace with King Henry the Eighth, and being condemned of high treaſon, for that among

among other matters hee had conſulted with a Wizard about ſucceſſion of the Crowne, was beheaded, a noble man exceeding much miſſed and lamented of good men. Which when the Emperour Charles the fifth heard, he ſaid, as (it is written in his life) That a Butchers dogge had devoured the faireſt Bucke in all England: alluding to the name Buckingham, and the ſaid Cardinall who was a Butchers ſonne. Ever ſince which time the ſplendour of this moſt noble family hath ſo decaied and faded, that there remaineth to their poſterity the bare title onely of Barons of Stafford, whereas they were ſtiled before, Dukes of Buckingham, Earles of Staffford, Hereford, Northampton, and Perch; Lords of Brecknock, Kimbalton, and Tunbridge.

There are reckoned in this ſmall Shire Pariſhes 185.

BEDFORD-SHIRE.

BEDFORD-SHIRE is one of the three Counties, which we ſaid the Cattieuchlani inhabited: On the Eaſt-ſide and the South it joyneth to Cambridge-ſhire and Hertford-ſhire, on the Weſt to Buckingham-ſhire, and on the North to Northamton-ſhire and Huntingdon-ſhire, and by the river OVSE croſſing over it is divided into two parts. The North-ſide thereof is the more fruitfull of the twaine and more woody: the other toward the South, which is the greater, ſtandeth upon a leaner ſoile, but not altogether unfertile. For it yeeldeth foorth aboundantly, full, white and bigge Barley. In the mids it is ſomewhat thicke of woods, but Eaſtward more drie ground and bare of wood.

Ouſe, where it entereth into this ſhire, firſt viſiteth Turvy the Lord Mordants houſe, who are beholden to King Henry the Eighth for their Barony: For he created Iohn Mordant a wiſe and prudent man, who had wedded the daughter and one of the coheires of H. Vere of Addington, Baron Mordant; then runneth it by Harwood a Village, in old time called Hareleſwood, where Sampſon, ſurnamed Fortis founded a Nunnery, and where in the yeere of our redemption 1399. a little before thoſe troubles and civill broiles wherewith England a long time was rent in peeces, this river ſtood ſtill, and by reaſon that the waters gave backe on both ſides, men might paſſe on foote within the very chanell for three miles together, not without wondering of all that ſaw it, who tooke it as a plaine preſage of the diviſion enſuing. Afterward it paſſeth by Odill or Woodhill, ſometimes Wahull, which had his Lords ſurnamed alſo De Wahul, men of ancient Nobility (whoſe Barony conſiſted of thirty knights fees in divers countries) and had here their Caſtle, which is now hereditarily deſcended to Sir R. Chetwood knight; as the inheritance of the Chetwoods came formerly to the Wahuls. From hence Ouſe no leſſe full of crooked crankes and windings, than Maander it ſelfe, goeth by Bletneſho, commonly called Bletſo, the reſidence in times paſt of the Pateſhuls, after of the Beauchamps, and now of the Honourable family of S. Iohn, which long ſince by their valour attained unto very large and goodly poſſeſſions in Glamorgan-ſhire, and in our daies through the favor of Q. Elizabeth of happy memory, unto the dignity of Barons, when ſhe created Sir Oliver the ſecond Baron of her creation, Lord S. Iohn of Bletneſho unto whom it came by Margaret Beauchamp an inheritrice wedded firſt to Sir Oliver S. Iohn, from whoſe theſe Barons derive their pedigree, and ſecondly to Iohn Duke of Somerſet, unto whom ſhe bare the Lady Margaret Counteſſe of Richmond, a Lady moſt vertuous and alwaies to be remembred with praiſes; from whoſe loines the late Kings and Queenes of England are deſcended.

From hence Ouſe haſteneth by Brumham a ſeat of the Dives of very ancient parentage in theſe parts to Bedford, in the Saxon-tongue Beanſopo, the principall towne, and whereof the Shire alſo taketh name: and cutteth it ſo through the middeſt, that it might ſeeme to be two ſeverall townes, but that a ſtone bridge joyneth them together. A towne to be commended more for the pleaſant ſituation and ancientry thereof, then for beauty or largeneſſe, although a man may tell five Churches in it. That it was Antonines LACTODORVM, I dare not as others doe, affirme: conſidering that it ſtandeth not upon the Romans Military road way, which is the moſt certaine marke to finde out the ſtation and Manſions mentioned by Antonine; neither are there heere any peeces of Romane money ever digged up, as far as I can learne. I have read that in the Britiſh tongue it was named Liſwidur or Lettidur: but it may ſeeme to have been tranſlated ſo out of the Engliſh name. For Letty in the Britiſh language ſignifieth Common Innes, and ſo Lettidur, Innes upon a river: like Bedford in Engliſh, Beds or Innes at a fourd. Cuthwulf the Saxon, about the yeere of our ſalvation,

* Places to give entertainment by the way unto Travellers, Bayting and lodging places.

vation, 572. beneath this towne ſo vanquiſhed the Britans in an open pitch field, A that then preſently upon it, finding themſelves over-matched, yeelded up many townes into his hands. Neither ſhould it ſeeme that the Saxons neglected it: For Offa the moſt puiſſant King of the Mercians chooſe heere (as we read in Florilegus) for himſelfe a place of ſepulture; whoſe tombe the river Ouſe ſwelling upon a time and carrying a more violent and ſwifter ſtreame than ordinary in a floud ſwouped cleane away. Afterwards alſo when it was raſed downe and lay along by occaſion of the Daniſh depredations,* K. Edward the Elder repaired it, and laid unto it upon the South-ſide of the river a prety townlet, which in that age, as we finde in the beſt copy of Hoveden, was called Mikeſgat. In the time of King Edward the Confeſſor, as we read in that booke which King William the Conqueror cauſed to be written B when he tooke the ſurvey of England, It defended it ſelfe for halfe an Hundred in warr, expeditions, and ſhipping. The land belonging to this towne was never hided. After this it ſuffered far more grievous calamities under the Normans: For when * Pain de Beauchamp the third Baron of Bedford had built heere a Caſtle, there aroſe not any ſtorme of civill war but it thundred upon it ſo long as it ſtood. Stephen, when with breach of his oath he intercepted to himſelfe the Kingdome of England, firſt forced this Caſtle, and with very great ſlaughter of men won it: afterwards when the Barons had taken armes againſt King Iohn, William de Beauchamp Lord thereof, and one of the Captaines of their ſide, ſurrendred it unto their hands: But a yeere or two after, Fulco de C Breaut laid ſiege thereto, and forthwith the Barons yeelded, and the King in free gift beſtowed it upon him. Yet the unthankefull man raiſed up a world of warre againe upon King Henry the third: He pulled downe Churches to ſtrengthen this Caſtle, and exceedingly damnified the territory adjoyning, untill the King beſieged it; and when after threeſcore daies he had quelled the ſtubborne ſtomackes of theſe rebels, brought this neſt and nourſe of ſedition into his owne hands.

* Before the Conqueſt.

* Paganus.

It will not be, I hope, diſtaſtfull to the reader, if I ſet downe heere the manner of aſſaulting this Caſtle out of a writer who then lived, and ſaw it: to the end wee may underſtand with what deviſes and engines that age (as wittie well neere as ours to worke men miſchiefe) uſed in their ſieges of Townes. On the Eaſt-ſide (ſaith hee) there was planted one Petrarie and two Mangonells which daily played upon D the Towre, and on the Weſt-ſide two Mangonells which battered the old Towne: alſo one Mangonell on the South part, and another on the North, which made two breaches and entries in the next walles. Beſides theſe there were two frames or engines of Timber made by Carpenters, erected higher above the toppe of the Tower and Caſtle for Shootters in brakes, and for diſcoverers. There were moreover there many frames wherein ſhooters out of Brakes and ſlingers were ſet in await: furthermore there was a frame or engine there, called the Cat, under which the Pioners and underminers had their ingreſſe and egreſſe, while they digged under the Walles of Towre and Caſtle. Now, was this Caſtle taken by foure aſſaults. In the firſt was the Barbican wonne: in the ſecond, the out Ballie. At the third, fell the Wall downe neere the olde Towre by the meanes of the Miners, where, by the helpe of a E chinke or breach with great daunger they became poſſeſſed of the inner Ballie: At the fourth, the Miners put fire under the Towre, ſo that the ſmoke brake forth, and the Towre ran rent aſunder, in ſo much as the clifts and breaches appeared wide, and then the enemies yeelded themſelves. Of theſe Mangonells, Patraries, Trabucks, Bricols, Eſpringolds, and of that which our anceſtors termed the Warwolfe, by which before that Gunnes were deviſed, they diſcharged volies of mighty huge ſtones, with great violence, and ſo brake through ſtrong walles, much might heere be ſaid, were they not beſide my purpoſe. But my author proceedeth thus: Falco remained Excommunicate E untill he reſtored unto the King the Caſtle of Plumpton and Stoke-curey, with his plate of gold and ſilver both, and ſuch money as that he had: and from thence was led to London. Meane while the Sheriffe had commandement to demoliſh and raſe the Towre and out Ballie, as for the inward Ballie, when the Bulwarks were caſt downe, and both Trench and Rampier laid levell with the ground, it remained unto William Beauchamp for to dwell in: The houſes were graunted unto the Chanons of Newenham and Chaldwell, and of Saint Pauls Church in F Bedford.

Cattus.

A Bedford. Neither yet for all this is there any thing here more worth the ſeeing, than the remaines of this Caſtle on the Eaſt ſide of the towne, hanging over the river.

On both ſides of Bedford ſtood two prety and very faire religious houſes, Helenſtow now Euſtow on the South part, conſecrated by Judith wife to Waltheof Earle of Huntingdon unto Helena Great Conſtantines Mother, and to ſacred Virgins: on the Eaſt, Newenham, which Roiſe the wife of * Paine de Beauchamp tranſlated thither from Saint Paules within Bedford. * Pagani.

Ouſe is not gone farre from hence, but he ſeeth the tokens of a decayed Caſtle at Eaton, which was another ſeate of the family de Beauchamp, and bids Bedford-ſhire farewell hard by Biſſemed, where Hugh de Beauchamp, and Roger his brother founded Æton.

B a little Monaſtery for the Chanons of Saint Auſtins order, as appeareth by the Popes Bull. Theſe ſtand on the farther ſide of Ouſe which yet before from the South is augmented with a nameleſſe * brooke, at whoſe confluents is to be ſeene Temſford, well knowne by reaſon of the Danes ſtanding Campe, and the Caſtle there, which they then built, when they wintering in Campe, lay ſore upon this Country, and threw downe the Britans Fort (as it is thought) The place whereof, now called Cheſterfield and Sandie, ſheweth oftentimes peeces of Romane coyne, as expreſſe tokens of the antiquity thereof: Neither doe ſome doubt by the very ſituation, but that this was that SALENÆ, which Ptolomee aſcribeth to the Catieuchlani, if Salnay be the name, as divers have avouched unto me. Heere I overpaſſe Potton a little mercat towne, becauſe I finde nothing of it, but that Iohn Kinaſton gave it and the Lands adjoyning freely unto Thomas Earle of Lancaſter. Neither have I reaſon to make many words of ſuch places as be ſituate upon this Brooke, to wit, Chickſand, where Paine de Beauchamp built a little Monaſtery. Shelford a mercat, Wardon more inward where was a houſe of Ciſtertian monkes, and was mother to the Abbaies of Saulterey, Sibton and Tilthey, Bigleſward much ſpoken of and frequented for the horſe Fayre there, and the ſtone bridge. From whence Stratton is not farre, the manſion place in times paſt of the Barons Latimer, afterward of the Enderbeies, and from them hereditarily untill our time of the Pigotts. * Some call it, Ivell. Salenæ ſeemeth to be that which Antoninus called Sulloniaca. Potton. Chickſand. Stratton.

Five miles from the head of this brooke in the very heart and middeſt well neere

D of the ſhire, ſtandeth Ampthill upon an hill, a parcell of the Barony of Kainho heeretofore and lately a ſtately houſe, reſembling a caſtle, and environed with Parks, built by Sir Iohn Cornwale Baron Fanhop, in the reigne of Henry the Sixth with the ſpoyles wonne from the French; whoſe goods, as I have read, when Edward the Fourth had confiſcated for taking part with the Familie of Lancaſter, and indited him, or this houſe rather, as Fanhop himſelfe ſaith, of high treaſon; forthwith it was granted unto Edmund Grey Lord of Ruthin, and afterwards Earle of Kent: whoſe grandchild Richard paſſed both it and Ruthin over to King Henry the Seventh, and he annexed the ſame unto the Kings Sacred Patrimony, as the Civilians terme it, or as our Lawyers uſe to ſay, unto the Crowne, and ſhortly after with the Lands appertaining it was made the Honour of Ampthil. From hence more Northward lieth Ampthill or Amethull.

E Haughton Conqueſt, ſo called of a worſhipfull and ancient family, which a long time dwelt therein: Weſtward is Woburn: where now is a free ſchoole founded by Francis Earle of Bedford: and where ſometime flouriſhed a notable monaſtery built by Henry de Bolebic for Ciſtercians, who himſelfe entred into this order: Under which, at Aſpley Gowiz, there is a kinde of earth, men ſay, that turneth wood into ſtones: and for proofe and teſtimony thereof, I have heard ſay, there was a wooden ladder to be ſeene in that monaſtery, that having lien a good while covered all over in that earth, was digged forth againe all ſtone. More into the Eaſt, Tuddington ſheweth a faire houſe, goodly to be ſeene, which Sir Henry Cheiney made by Queene Elizabeth

F Baron Cheyney of Tuddington built, and ſhortly after died Sanſ-iſſue, where alſo in old time Paulin Pever a Courtier, and Sewer to King Henry the Third (as Matthew Paris witneſſeth) built a ſtrong houſe with the hall, chappell, chambers, and other houſes of ſtone, and the ſame covered with lead, with Orchards alſo and Parkes to it, in ſuch ſort, as it cauſed the beholders to wonder thereat. Haughton Conqueſt. Woburn. Earth turning wood into ſtone.

We were not gone forward farre from hence but we came to Hockley in the Hole, so named of the miry way in Winter time, very troublesome to Travellers: For the old Englishmen our Progenitors called deepe myre hock, and hocks. So passing along fields smelling sweet in Sommer of the best Beanes, which with their redolent savour doe dull the quicke sent of Hounds and Spaniels not without fuming and chafing of Hunters; we mounted up by a whitish chalkey hill into the Chiltern, and streightwaies were at Dunstable.

Dunstable.

This Towne seated in a chalkey ground, well inhabited, and full of Innes, hath foure Streetes answering to the foure quarters of the world: in every one of which (notwithstanding the Soile bee most dry by nature) there is a large Pond of standing water, for the publique use of the Inhabitants. And albeit they bee fed onely by raine water, yet they never faile nor become dry. As for spring-veines there are none to bee found, unlesse they sinke Wells or pits foure and twenty Cubits deepe. In the middest of the Towne is a Crosse or Columne rather to be seene with the Armes of England, Castle and Ponthieu engraven thereon, adorned also with Statues and Images, which King Edward the First erected as he did some others in memoriall of Æleoner his Wife all the way as hee conveyed her Corps out of Lincoln-shire with funerall pompe to Westminster. That this Dunstable was the very same Station which the Emperour Antonine in his Itinerary calleth MAGIONINIUM, MAGIOVINIUM and MAGINTUM no man needs to make doubt, or to seeke it elsewhere. For, besides that it is situate upon the Romanes high way, there are peeces of the Roman Emperours moneies found otherwhiles in the fields adjoyning round about by the Swine-heards, which as yet they terme, Madning mony: and within a little of the very descent of the Chiltern hils there is a military modell raised up round with a Rampire and Ditch, such as Strabo writeth the Britans Townes were, containing nine Acres of ground, which the people use to call Madning-boure and Madin-boure: in which very name with a little change MAGINTUM most plainly sheweth it selfe. But when the said MAGINTUM, by the injury of warre or time was decayed, king Henry the First heere reedified a Towne, built a royall house at Kings-bury, and planted a Colony to represse the boldnesse of Theeves that heere beset the wayes and lay in wait, as the private History of the Priory, that himselfe founded for the ornament of this his Colony, doth evidently beare witnesse. But heare the very words out of that private History, although they savour of the Barbarisme of that age. Note that the plot of ground where the two high waies Watling and Ikening meet, was first by Henry the elder King of England cleered, to keepe under and bridle the wickednesse of a certaine most notorious Theefe named* Dun, and his Companions, and of that Dun the said place was named Dunstable. The King our Lord built there the Burgh of Dunstable, and made for himselfe a royall Manour, or house neere under that place. The King had in the same Towne both Faire and Mercat. Afterwards, hee founded a Church, and by authority of Pope Eugenius the Third, placed therein Regular Chanons: and feoffed the said Religious Chanons in the whole Burgh by his Charter, and bestowed upon them very many liberties.

Magiovinium.

* Sartabatur. Or clensed by stocking up.

As for Leighton Buzard on the one side of Dunstable, and Luton on the other, neither have I reade, nor seene any thing memorable in them, unlesse I should say that at Luton I saw a faire Church, but the Quier then Roofelesse, and overgrowne with Weedes; and adjoyning to it an elegant Chappell founded by 1. Lord Wenlocke, and well maintained by the Family of Rotheram planted heere by Thomas Rotheram Archbishop of Yorke, and Chancellour of England in the time of King Edward the Fourth.

As touching the Lords, Dukes, and Earles of Bedford. First, there were Barons of Bedford out of the Family of Beauchamp: who by right of inheritance were Almners to the Kings of England upon their Coronation day. Whose inheritance being by females parted among the Mowbraies, Wakes, Fitz-Ottes, &c. King Edward the Third created Engelrame de Coucy Earle of Suesons in France, sonne to Engelrame Lord of Coucy, and his Wife daughter to the Duke of Austria, the first Earle of Bedford, Dukes, Earles and Barons of Bedford. Franciscus Alovertus.

A Bedford, giving unto him his daughter in marriage. Afterwards King Henrie the Fifth advaunced Bedford to the title of a Dukedome: and it had three Dukes: the first was John, the third ſonne of King Henrie the Fourth, who moſt valiantly vanquiſhed the French men in a Sea-fight at the mouth of * Seyne, and afterwards (being Regent of France) ſlaine in a battaile on land, before Verneil, who was buried in Roan, and together with him all the Engliſhmens good fortune in France. At which time he was Regent of France, Duke of Bedford, Alaunſon and Anjou, Earle of Maine, Richmond and Kendall, and Conſtable of England. For ſo was his ſtile. Whoſe Monument when Charles the Eighth King of France came to ſee, and a Noble man ſtanding by adviſed him to raſe it, Nay anſwered he, let him reſt in peace now being dead, of whom in war
B while he lived all France had dread. The ſecond Duke of Bedford was George Nevill a very child, ſonne to John Marqueſſe Mont-acute, both whom King Edward the Fourth ſo ſoone as hee had raiſed them to that type of Honours, threw downe againe, and that by authoritie of the Parliament; the Father, for his perfidious diſloyaltie in revolting from him; the Sonne, in diſlike of his Father: Howbeit there was a colourable pretenſe made, that his eſtate was too weake for to maintaine the port and dignity of a Duke: and becauſe great men of high place if they be not wealthy withall, are alwaies grievous and injurious. The third was Iaſper of Hatfield, Earle of Pembroch, Honoured with that title by his Nephew King Henrie the Seventh, for that hee was both his Unckle, and had delivered him out of extreame
C dangers: who being aged and a Bachelar, departed this life, ſome ten yeeres after his Creation.

But within the remembrance of our Fathers it fell backe againe to the title of an Earledome: what time as King Edward the Sixth created Iohn Lord Ruſſell Earle of Bedford: after whom ſucceeded his Sonne Francis, a man ſo religious and of ſuch a noble courteous nature, that I can never ſpeake ought ſo highly in his commendation, but his vertue will far ſurpaſſe the ſame. He left to ſucceed him Edward his Nephew by his Sonne Sir Francis Ruſſell, who was ſlaine a day or two before his Father departed this life by Scotiſhmen in a tumult upon a True-day in the midle marches. 1585.

HERTFORD-SHIRE.

HERTFORD-SHIRE, which I ſaid was the third of thoſe that belonged to the Cattieuchlani, lieth on the Eaſt and partly on the South ſide of Bedford-ſhire: The Weſt ſide is encloſed with Bedford-ſhire and Buckingham-ſhire: The South with Middleſex, the Eaſt with Eſſex, and the North with Cambridge-ſhire. A rich country in corne fields, paſtures, medows, woods, groves, and cleere riverets. And for ancient townes it may contend with the neighbours even for the beſt: For, there is ſcarſely another ſhire in all England that can ſhew more places of Antiquities in ſo ſmall a compaſſe.

In the very limit thereof Northward, where it boundeth upon Cambridge-ſhire, ſtandeth Roiſton, a towne well knowne, but of no antiquity: as being riſen ſince the Normans daies. For one Dame Roiſe, a woman in that age of right great name, * whom ſome thinke to have been Counteſſe of Norfolke, erected there about a Croſſe in the high way, (which was thought in that age a pious worke to put paſſengers in minde of Chriſts paſſion) whereupon this place was for many yeeres called Roiſes-Croſſe, untill that Euſtach de Marc adjoined thereto a little Monaſtery in the honour of Thomas of Canterbury: for then, were Innes built, and by little and little it grew to be a towne, which in ſtead of Roiſes Croſſe was called Roiſton, that is, Roiſes towne: unto which King Richard the Firſt granted a Faire at certaine ſet times and a mercat; Now, it is very famous and paſſing much frequented for Malt: For, it is almoſt incredible, how many buyers and ſellers of corne, how many Badgers, yea and Corne-mongers or Regraters flocke hither weekely every mercat day, and what a number of horſes loden doe then fill the high waies on every ſide.

Roiſton. Chronicles of Dunſtable.

*Others ſay ſhe was the wife of Richard de Clare.

Over Roiſton Southward is mounted Tharfield among the high hils, an ancient habitation of the familie of Berners, deſcended from Hugh de Berners, unto whom in recompence of his valiant ſervice in the Normans Conqueſt, King William the Conquerour granted faire lands in Everſdon within the county of Cambridge. And in ſo great worſhip and reputation flouriſhed his poſterity, that Sir John Bourchier, who married the right heire at common law of that familie, being promoted by King Edward the Fourth to the honour of Baron, tooke his addition thereof, and was ſtiled Baron Bourchier of Berners, and uſually Lord Berners.

Tharfield. Berners.

Upon this confineth Nucelles, belonging in times paſt to the houſe of the Rochefters or Roffes: but all the repute and glory that it hath aroſe from the inhabitants thereof afterwards, namely the Barons of Scales deſcended out of Norfolke, but yet the heires of Roffe. For King Edward the Firſt gave unto Sir Robert de Scales in regard of his valourous ſervice in the Scotiſh warres, certaine lands to the value in thoſe daies of three hundred markes by the yeare, and called him among the Barons to the Parliament. Their Eſchocheon Gules with ſixe eſcallops argent is ſeene in many places. They flouriſhed unto King Edward the Fourth his daies, at what time the only daughter and heire of this family was wedded vnto Sir Anthonie Wideville Earle Rivers; whom being advanced by his owne glorious proweſſe and the kings marriage with his ſiſter, the malicious hatred and envie of his enemies moſt vilanouſlie overwrought, and brought to utter deſtruction. For, King Richard the Third beheaded him, innocent man as he was. And, when as ſhe died without iſſue, the inheritance was parted in King Henry the Sevenths time betweene Iohn Earle of Oxford, who by the Howards, and Sir William Tindale knight, who by the Bigods of Felbridge, were found next couſens and coheires. The Manour of Barkway hereby appertained alſo to thoſe Lords Scales, a well knowne throughfare. Beyond which is Barley that imparted ſurname to the ancient, and well allied family of the Barleies; and on this ſide Aneſtie, which was not long ſince the inheritance of the houſe of Nucelles. The familie of Roffes.

Barons de Scales.

* Aneſtie.

Yorke, and in elder times the Caſtle there was a neſt of rebels, wherefore Nicholas of Aneſty Lord thereof, was expreſly commanded by King Henry the Third to demoliſh ſo much of it as was raiſed ſince the Barons warres againſt his Father King John. But now time hath wholy raſed itall. Cl.2.H.3.m.11.

Aſhwell. To returne, though diſorderly, Eaſt-ward is Aſhwell, as one would ſay, The well or fountaine among the Aſhes: a Country towne of good bigneſſe and full of houſes, ſituate on a low ground in the very North edge of the ſhire; where there is a ſource of ſprings bubling out of a ſtony banke overſhadowed on every ſide with tall aſhes, from whence there floweth at certaine veines continually running ſuch ſtore of water, that forthwith being gathered within banks it carrieth a ſtreame able to drive a Mill and all of a ſudden, as it were, groweth to a good big river. Of theſe wels and aſhes together, as moſt certaine it is that the Engliſh-Saxons impoſed this new name Aſhwell: ſo I have been ſometime of this opinion, that the ancient Britans, who, as Gildas witneſſeth, heaped divine honours upon hils, rivers, fountaines, and groves, from the very ſame thing and in the ſame ſenſe called it Magiovinium, and that it was the ſame which Antonine named MAGIONINIVM. But time hath now diſcovered a more certaine truth, neither am I aſhamed to change mine opinion in this point, ſeeing I take no pleaſure at all in mine owne error. And yet to prove the ancientneſſe of this towne, the large quadrant adjoyning, encloſed with a trench and rampire maketh much, which by the Romane peeces of coyne digged up there oftentimes, ſheweth whoſe worke it was, and in that * booke, wherein above 500. yeeres ſince King William the Conquerour tooke the review and account of all the townes in England, it is in plaine words tearmed a Burgh.

* Domeſday.

Southward we ſaw Merkat-Baldock, ſituate upon a whitiſh ſoile, wherein as alſo in Hitching hard by, we read of no antiquity. Then is there ſeated in a well-husbanded and good ground Wimondley an ancient and famous Lordſhip, held by the moſt honourable tenure with us, which our Lawyers terme Grand-Sergeanty: namely, that the Lord thereof ſhould ſerve unto the Kings of England upon their Coronation day the firſt cup, and be as it were the Kings Cup-bearer. Which honorable office in regard of this Lordſhip, certaine Noble Gentlemen called Fitz-Tek* held in the beginning of the Normans reigne; from whom by a daughter it came unto the Argentons. Theſe fetched their name and pedegree from David de Argenton a Norman and a martiall knight, who under King William the Conquerour ſerved in the wars, and they in remembrance heereof gave for their armes Three Cups Argent in a ſhield Gueules. But at laſt, for want of iſſue male in King Henry the Sixth his daies, Elizabeth Argenton the ſole and entier inheritrice, brought it unto her husband Sir William Allington knight, with faire lands thereby and this dignity, from whom Sir Gilles Allington now the heire of this family is the ſeventh, a young Gentleman right courteous and of a generous nature, who I hope will give ſome new luſtre by his vertues unto the ancient worſhip of his houſe.

Grand-Sergeantie.

Fitz-Ter.

Argentons.

Hard by and neere unto the roade high-way, betweene Stevenhaugh and Knebworth the ſeat of the worſhipfull houſe of the Littons deſcended from Litton in Darbyſhire, I ſaw certaine round hils caſt up and raiſed by mans hands, ſuch as the old Romanes were wont to reare for Souldiers ſlaine in the wars, of which the Captaine himſelfe laied the firſt turfe. Unleſſe ſome man would rather ſay they had a reference to the bounds: For ſuch like little hils in old time were reared to ſignifie the bounds of lands, under which they uſed to lay aſhes, coales, lime, bricke, and tile beaten to powder, &c. as I will ſhew elſe-where more at large.

In the County of Northampton.

Beneath this, more Southward, the river Lea, by our forefathers named Ligean, hath his head: who with a milde courſe paſſeth down, firſt, by Whethamſted a towne plentifull in wheate, whereof it tooke name; which place, John of Whethamſted there borne and thereof named, a man in King Henry the Sixth his daies much renowned by his due deſert of learning, made of more eſtimation. From thence running by Brocket Hall, the reſidence in late time of the Brockets Knights, approcheth neere unto Biſhops Hatfield ſituate upon the fall and hanging of a little hill: in the upper part whereof

A whereof ſtood a houſe of the Kings, now the Earle of Salisburies, in times paſt belonging to the Biſhops of Ely, whereupon it was named Biſhops Hatfield, which John Morton Biſhop of Ely reedified. For in this place King Eadgar gave unto the Church of Ely forty hides of land. Afterwards it paſſeth under Herisford, which in ſome Copies of Bede is named Herudford, where he treateth of the Synode there holden in the yeare of our Salvation 670. which name ſome interprete: The red Ford, others, The Ford of Harts. This Towne in William the Conquerours time, diſcharged it ſelfe for ten hides and in it were 26. Burgeſſes, and at that time Ralph Limſey a Noble man built heere a Cell for Saint Albans Monkes. But now it is neither greatly inhabited nor much frequented: and in this reſpect moſt of all commended, becauſe it is ancient. For why? it hath given name to the whole County, and is reputed the Shire-towne. A Caſtle it hath upon the River Lea, built, as men thinke, by King Edward the elder, and enlarged firſt by the houſe of Clare, whereunto it belonged. For Giſlebert of Clare about King Henry the Second his dayes, was accounted Earle of this Hertford, and Robert Fitz-walter, of the ſame houſe of Clare, what time as Stephen ſeized into his hands all the Caſtles of England whereſoever, avouched franckly even to Stephen his face, as we read in Mathew of Paris, that the keeping of this Caſtle by ancient right appertained to himſelfe. Afterwards it was laid unto the Crowne: and King Edward the Third granted unto Iohn of Gaunt his ſonne, then Earle of Richmond, who afterward was Duke of Lancaſter, this Caſtle with the Towne and honour of Hertford: where (as the very words runne in the Graunt) hee might according to his eſtate keepe houſe and decently make his aboade.

Biſhops Hatfield.

From hence Lea falleth downe forthwith to Ware, ſo named of a barre or dam made to ſtay water ſtreames, which our Anceſtours called a Weare or Ware. This Towne, even at the very firſt did much harme unto Hertford, and afterwards by reaſon it became ſo greatly hanted, darkened, as it were, the light thereof.

For, when the Barons warre againſt King John was waxed hote, this Ware preſuming much upon their Lord the Baron Wake, turned London high way to it, whereas before it was but a little Village, and knowne by a Friery which hee founded: neither was it lawfull to paſſe that way with any Carts, conſidering that the Bridge was chained up, the Keyes whereof were in the cuſtody of the Bailiffe of Hertford. Neere about which time Gilbert Mareſcall Earle of Pembroch a principall and moſt potent Peere of the Realme, proclaimed heere a diſport of running on horſebacke with launces, which they call Tourneaments, under the name of Fortunie, making a ſcorne of the Kings Authority, whereby ſuch Toureneaments were inhibited. To which place when a great number of the Nobility and Gentry were aſſembled, it fortuned that himſelfe as hee ranne at tilt, by occaſion that his flinging horſe brake bridle and caſt him, was trampled under foote and ſo pittifully dyed. Theſe Juſts or Tourneaments were certaine publique exerciſes of Armes and more than flouriſhes, practiſed among noble Gentlemen, and inſtituted (if wee beleeve Munſter) in the yeare of our Lord 934. having alſo ſpeciall lawes thereto belonging, which you may finde in the ſaid Munſter: and the ſame exerciſes were uſed a long time in ſuch an outragious manner, and with ſuch ſlaughter of Gentlemen in all places, but in England moſt of all, ſince that King Stephen brought them in, that by divers Decrees of the Church they were forbidden, upon paine that whoſoever therein were ſlaine ſhould want Chriſtian Buriall in Church or Churchyard; and heere with us King Henry the Third by adviſe of his Sages made an Act of Parliament, that their heires who tranſgreſſed in this kinde, ſhould be diſinherited. Howbeit, contrary to the ſaid law ſo good and wholeſome, this naughty and wicked cuſtome was practiſed a great while, and grew not quite out of uſe before the happy dayes of King Edward the Third.

Tourneaments.

Matth. Paris Anno 1248.

Betwixt theſe two Townes, Hertford and Ware, diſtant ſcarce two miles a ſunder, Lea is encreaſed by two rilles from the North: Aſſerius termeth them Mimeram and Benefician. I would gueſſe that to bee Benefician upon which ſtandeth Benington, where the notable family of Benſted had in old time a little Caſtle: and alſo Wood-hall

Wood-hall.

* hall an habitation of the Butlers, who being branched from Sir Ralph Butler Baron Butler. of Wem in Shropshire, and his wife heire to William Pantulfe Lord of Wem, were Lords A of Pulre-bach, and enriched much by an heire of Sir Richard Gobion, and another of Peletot Lord of this place, in the time of King Edward the Third. I take Mimeram to bee the other brooke whereupon Pukerich is seated, which by the grant of King Edward the First, at the mediation of William le Bland had a Mercate and Faire gran-Standon. ted to it. Whereupon also neighboureth Standon with a seemely house built by Sir
Ralph Sadleir Chauncellour of the Dutchy of Lancaster, Privie Counsellour to three Princes, and the last Knight Baneret of England: a man so advanced for his great services, and staied wisedome.

At the backe of Pukerich, Munden Furnivall sheweth it selfe, a place to bee re- B membred if it were but for this, that Geffrey Earle of Britaine gave it to Gerard de Furnivall (of whom also it bare the name) a younger sonne of Furnivall of Shef- feld. But now let us returne to the River Lea and the Towne of Ware, unto which the Danes being come with their light Pinnaces, and Shallops raised a Fort, as the said Asserius reporteth, which when King Ælfred could not winne by force, hee by digging three severall Chanels, turned aside the water of Lea, that they might not returne with their Vessels; So as ever since it stood the neighbour Inhabitants in small or no stead; untill being brought of late unto his ancient Chanell, it is become more commodious for the carriages of all commodities, &c. Lea is not gone forward farre from Ware, when he entertaineth a Riveret named Stort from the East, C Bishops Stortford, which first runneth downe out of Essex by Bishops Stortford, a small Towne fenced Castle of Way-more. sometime with a little Castle set upon a mount cast up of purpose, within a prety Iland: which Castle King William the Conquerour gave unto the Bishops of London: and of those Bishops it came to be so called; but King John for hatred to Bishop William overthrew it. From thence it maketh his way by Sabrideworth a parcell of the Honor of Earle William Mandevile, and sometime the possession of Geffrey Say, neere Shingle-hall honested by the Owners, the Leventhorpes of ancient Gentry. So on, not farre from Honsdon forfeited by Sir William Oldhall to the Crowne in the time of King Henry the Sixth, which gave a Title of Baron Hunsdon to Sir Henry Cary, through the favour of Queene Elizabeth, unto whom he was Lord Chamberlaine, as D who verily, besides his descent from the royall Family of the Dukes of Somerset was by his mother Mary Bolen cozen german to the said Queene. Lea having thus admitted into him this Riveret, hasteneth now with a merry glee to the Tamis, under Hodesdon. Hodesdon a faire through Faire, to which H. Bourchier Earle of Essex having a faire house at Base thereby (while it stood) procured a Mercat: and then as it were in gra-Theobalds. tulatory wise saluteth Theobalds, commonly called Tibaulds, which our Nestor of Bri-taine, the right honourable Baron Burghley, late Lord high Treasurer of England built: an house if we respect the workmanship none more faire and elegant; if the gardens, Orchards, and walkes bedight with Groves, none more pleasant: unto whom especially this River willingly acknowledgeth it selfe beholden for the recovery a- E gaine of his ancient Chanell.

But returne we now to places more within the Country, and of greater antiquity.
From Hertford twelve miles Westward, stood VEROLAMIUM, a City in times past very much renowned, and as greatly frequented: Tacitus calleth it VERULA-Verolamium. MIUM, Ptolomee, VROLANIUM and VEROLAMIUM, well knowne this is in Saint Albans. these dayes, neere unto Saint Albans in Caisho Hundred, which the CASSII of whom Cæsar maketh mention, in all probability, held and inhabited.

The Saxons named it Watlinga-ceaſtep, of the famous High-way Watlingstreet, and also Weplam-ceaſtep. Neither hath it as yet lost that ancient name, for commonly they call it Verulam, although there remaineth nothing of it to bee seene, F beside the few remaines of ruined walles, the checkered pavements, and peeces of Roman Coine other whiles digged up there. It was situate upon the gentle descent or side of an hill Eastward, fenced about with passing strong wals, a double Rampire and deepe Trenches toward the South: and Eastward watered with a Brooke, which in old

A old time made a great Meere, or ſtanding Poole. Whereby it was gueſſed that this was the very ſame towne of Caſſibelaunus fortified with woods and mariſhes, which Cæſar wan: For there was not to be ſeene any other Poole or Meere in this Tract, to my knowledge. In Nero his time it was counted a MUNICIPIUM: whence it is that in Ninius his Catalogue of Cities, it is named Caer-Municip. So that probable it is, that this was the very ſame CAER MUNICIPIUM, which Hubert Goltzius found in an old Inſcription. Theſe Municipia were Townes endowed with the right of Romane Citizens, and this name came A Muneribus capiendis, that is, of publique Offices and charges in the Common-wealth: and they had for their States and Degrees, * Decurions, that is, Gentlemen, and Commons: for their publique Councell, a B Senate and People: For their Magiſtrates and Prieſts, Duum-virj, Trium-virj to ſit in judgement and miniſter juſtice, CENSORS: AEDILES, Quæſtors and Flamins. But whether this Municipium or towne enfranchiſed were with ſuffrages or without, a man cannot eaſily affirme. A Municip with ſuffrages they tearmed that which was capable of honourable Offices: like as that other they called without ſuffrage, which was not capable. In the Raigne of the ſame Nero, when Bunduica or Boadicia Queene of the Icenes in her deepe love of her Country, and conceived bitter hatred againſt the Romanes, raiſed bloudy and mortall Warre upon them, it was raſed and deſtroied by the Britans, as Tacitus recordeth. Hence it is that Suetonius wrote thus: To theſe miſchiefes ſo great proceeding from the Prince, there happened (to mend the matter) C a grievous loſſe in Britaine, wherein two principall Towres of great importance, with much ſlaughter of Romane Citizens and Allies, were put to the ſacke and ſpoiled. Nevertheleſſe it flouriſhed againe and became exceeding famous and paſſing well frequented: yea and I have ſeene old Antiquities of money ſtamped, as it ſeemeth heere, with this inſcription, TASCIA, and on the reverſe VER. Which that learned ſearcher of venerable antiquity David Powell, Doctour in Divinity, interpreteth to be The Tribute of Verulamium. For Taſc, as he teacheth me in the Britiſh or Welſh tongue ſoundeth as much as Tribute, Taſcia, A Tribute Penny, and Taſcyd the chiefe Collector of Tribute. But loe heere is the very peece of money portraied for you to ſee, which heeretofore alſo I have exhibited. D

Municipia.

Verulam and Maldon.

E Some would have this money to bee coined before the comming in of the Romans: but I beleeve them not. For I have alwaies thought them to bee Tribute money, which being impoſed upon the poll and the lands were yeerely exacted and gathered by the Romans, as I have ſaid before. For before that the Romans came, I can ſcarce beleeve the Britans coined or ſtamped any money. Yet I remember what Cæſar writeth of them: And they uſe, ſaith he, braſſe money or rings of iron weighed to a certaine poiſe. Where the ancient bookes have Lanceis Ferreis, for which the Criticks put in Laminis Ferreis, that is, plates of iron. But let my pen returne againe to the matter propoſed, for my meaning is not heere to weave the ſame web ſtill. As for Verulam, it was famous for nothing ſo much as for bringing foorth Alban a Ci- F tizen of ſingular holineſſe and faith in Chriſt, who when Diocleſian went about by exquiſite torments to wipe Chriſtian Religion quite out of the memory of men, was the firſt in Britaine that with invincible conſtancy and reſolution ſuffred death for Chriſt his ſake. Whereupon hee is called our Stephen, and the * Protomartyr of Britaine, yea and Fortunatus Presbyter the Poet wrote thus of him,

* Alban Martyr.

Albanum

Albanum egregium fœcunda Britannia profert.

Fruitfull Britaine bringeth foorth
Alban a Martyr of mickle worth.

And Hiericus a Frenchman, who flouriſhed 700. yeeres agoe, of the ſame Alban and his executioner miraculouſly ſtricken blinde, made theſe verſes,

In the life of Saint German.

Millia pœnarum Chriſti pro nomine paſſus,
Quem tandem rapuit capitis ſententia caſi,
Sed non lictori ceſſit res tuta ſuperbo,
Utque caput Sancto, ceciderunt lumina ſævo.

Thouſands of torments when he had endur'd for Chriſt his ſake
At length he dyed by dome thus given. [his head away to take]
The Tortor proudly did the feat, but cleere he went not quite,
That holy Martyr loſt his head, this cruell wretch his ſight.

In reproch of this Martyr and for the terrour of Chriſtians as wee finde in an old * Agon of his, the Citizens of Verulam engraved his Martyrdome in a Marble ſtone, and inſerted the ſame in their walles. But afterwards when the bloud of Martyrs had conquered Tyrants cruelty, the Chriſtians built a Church, as Bede ſaith, of wondrous workmanſhip, in memoriall of him: and Verulam carried with it ſo great an opinion of Religion, that therein was holden a Synode or Councell in the yeere of the worlds Redemption 429. when as the Pelagian Hereſie, by meanes of Agricola ſonne to the Biſhop Severianus had budded forth a freſh into this Iſland, and polluted the Britiſh Churches ſo, as that to averre and maintaine the truth they ſent for German Biſhop of Auxerre, and Lupus Biſhop of Troies out of France: who by refuting this hereſie gained unto themſelves a reverend account among the Britans: but chiefly German, who hath thorowout this Iſland many Churches dedicated to his memory. And nere unto the ruined wals of this raſed city, there remaineth yet a Chappell bearing S. Germans name ſtill, although it be put to a prophane uſe: in which place he openly out of the Pulpit preached Gods word, as the ancient records of S. Albans church do teſtifie.

* A Legend of his paſſion and Martyrdome.

Saint Germans Chappell.

Which German (as Conſtantius flouriſhing in that time writeth in his life) commanded the Sepulchre of Saint Albane to bee opened: and therein beſtowed, certaine Reliques of Saints, that whom one heaven had received, ſhould alſo in one Sepulchre bee together lodged. Thus much I note by the way, that yee may obſerve and conſider the faſhions of that age. Not long after, the Engliſh Saxons wonne it: but Uther the Britan, firnamed for his ſerpentine wiſedome, Pendragon, by a ſore ſiege and a long recovered it. After whoſe death, it fell againe into their hands. For, we may eaſily gather out of Gildas words, that the Saxons in his daies were poſſeſſed of this City. God, ſaith hee, hath lighted unto us the moſt cleere Lamps of holy Saints, the Sepulchres of whoſe bodies, and places of their Martyrdome, at this day (were they not taken away by the woefull diſſeverance which the barbarous enemy hath wrought amongſt us, for our many grievous ſinnes) might kinale no ſmall heat of divine charity in the mindes of the beholders: Saint Albane of Verulam, I meane, &c. When Verulam by theſe warres was utterly decaied, Offa the moſt mighty King of the Mercians built juſt over againſt it about the yeere of our Lord 795. in a place which they called Holmeburſt, a very goodly and large Monaſtery in memory of Saint Alban, or as wee reade in the very Charter thereof, Unto our Lord Ieſus Chriſt, and S. Alban Martyr, whoſe Reliques Gods grace hath revealed in hope of preſent proſperity, and future happineſſe: and forthwith with the Monaſtery there roſe a Towne, which of him they call Saint Albans. This King Offa and the ſucceeding Kings of England, aſſigned unto it very faire and large poſſeſſions, and obtained for it at the hands of the Biſhops of Rome as ample priviledges, which I will relate out of our Florilegus, that yee may ſee the profuſe liberality of Princes toward the Church. Thus therefore writeth he. Offa the moſt puiſſant King gave unto Saint Alban the Protomartyr, that Towne of his ancient Demeſne which ſtandeth almoſt twenty miles from Verulam and is named * Uneſlaw, with as much round about, as the Kings written Deedes at this day doe witneſſe, that are to bee ſeene in the foreſaid Monaſtery: which Monaſtery is priviledged with ſo great liberty, that it alone is quite from

* Peradventure Wineſlow.

A *from paying that Apoſtolicall cuſtome and rent, which is called Rom ſcot: whereas neither King nor Archbiſhop, Biſhop, Abbat, Prior, nor any one in the Kingdome is freed from the payment thereof. The Abbat alſo, or monke appointed Archdeacon under him, hath pontificall Juriſdiction over the Prieſts and Lay-men of all the poſſeſſions belonging to this Church, ſo as he yeeldeth ſubjection, to no Archbiſhop, Biſhop, or Legate, ſave only to the Pope of Rome. This likewiſe is to be knowne, that Offa the Magnificent King granted out of his Kingdome a ſet rent or impoſition called * Rom-ſcot to Saint Peters Vicar, the Biſhop of Rome, and himſelfe obtained of the ſaid Biſhop of Rome that the Church of Saint Alban the Protomartyr of the Engliſh nation, might faithfully collect, and being ſo collected reſerve to their proper uſe, the ſame Rom. ſcot throughout all the Province of Hertford, in which the ſaid Church ſtandeth. Whence it is, that* B as the Church it ſelfe hath from the King all royall priviledges, ſo the Abbot of that place for the time being hath all Pontificall ornaments. Pope Hadrian alſo the fourth who was borne hard by Verulam granted this indulgence unto the Abbats of this Monaſterie (I ſpeake the very words out of the Priviledge) that as Saint Alban is diſtinctly knowne to be the Protomartyr of the Engliſh nation: ſo the Abbat of this Monaſtery ſhould at all times among other Abbats of England in degree of dignitie be reputed firſt and principall. Neither left the Abbats ought undone that might ſerve either for uſe or ornament: who filled up with earth a mighty large poole under Verulam, which I ſpake of. The name whereof yet remaineth ſtill heere in a certaine ſtreet of the towne named Fiſh-poole-ſtreete. Neere unto which ſtreete, becauſe certaine ankers were in our remembrance C digged up, divers have verily thought (induced thereunto by a corrupt place in Gildas) that the river Tamis ſometimes had his courſe and chanell this way. But of this Meere or Fiſh-poole, have heere what an old Hiſtorian hath written. Abbot Alfrike for a great peece of money purchaſed a large and deepe pond, (an evill neighbour and hurtfull to Saint Albans Church) which was called Fiſh-poole, appertaining to the Kings: And the Kings officers and fiſhers moleſted the Abbay, and burdened the Monkes thereby. Out of which poole he the ſaid Abbot in the end drained and derived the water, and made it dry ground.

If I were diſpoſed upon the report of the common people to reckon up what great ſtore of Romane peeces of coine, how many caſt images of gold and ſilver, how many veſſels, what a ſort of modules or Chapiters of pillars, and how many wonderfull D things of antique worke, have been digged up, my words would not carry credit: The thing is ſo incredible. Yet take with you ſome few particulars thereof, upon the credite of an ancient Hiſtoriographer. Ealred the Abbot in the reigne of King Eadgar, having ſearched for the ancient vaults under ground at Verulam, overthrew all. About the yeere of Chriſt 960. and ſtopped up all the waies with paſſages under ground, which were ſtrongly and artificially arched over head: For, they were the lurking holes of whores and theeves. He levelled with the ground the ditches of the Citie and certaine dens, into which malefactours fled as unto places of refuge. But the whole tiles, and ſtones which he found fit for building, he layed aſide. Neere unto the banke they did light upon plankes of oke with nailes driven into them, cemented with ſtone-pitch: alſo the tackling and furniture of Ships as anchors halfe eaten with E ruſt, and ores of firre. A little after he writeth. Eadmer his ſucceſſor went forward with the worke that Ealfred began, and his pioners overthrew the foundations of a Pallace in the mids of the old Citie, and in the hollow place of a wall as it were, in a little cloſet, they happed upon bookes covered with oken boords and ſilken ſtrings at them: whereof one contained the life of Saint Albane written in the Britiſh tongue; the reſt the ceremonies of the Heathen. When they opened the ground deeper, they met with old tables of ſtone, with tiles alſo and pillars, likewiſe with pitchers and pots of earth made by Potters and Turners worke: veſſels moreover of glaſſe containing the aſhes of the dead, &c. To conclude, out of theſe remaines of Verulam, Eadmer built a new Monaſterie to Saint Albane. Thus much for the antiquity and dignity of Verulam; now haue alſo with you for an over-deale in the commendation of Verulam F an * Hexaſtich of Alexander Necham, who 400. yeeres ſince was there borne. * Six verſes.

Saint Albans.

Verolamium at this day being turned into fields: The towne of Saint Albans raiſed out of the ruins thereof flouriſheth; a faire towne and a large, and the Church of that Monaſtery remaineth yet for bigneſſe, beauty and antiquity, to be had in admiration: which when the Monkes were thruſt out of it, was by the Townes-men redeemed with the ſum of 400. pounds of our money, that it might not be laid even with the ground, and ſo it became converted into a pariſh Church: and hath in it a very goodly Font of ſolid braſſe, wherein the Kings children of Scotland were wont to be Baptized, which Font, Sir Richard Lea Knight, Maſter of the Pioners, brought as a ſpoile out of the Scottiſh warres, and gave vnto the ſaid Church, with this lofty and arrogant inſcription.

CUM LÆTHIA OPPIDUM APUD SCOTOS NON INCELEBRE, ET EDINBURGUS PRIMARIA APUD EOS CIVITAS INCENDIO CONFLAGRARENT, RICHARDUS LEUS EQUES AURATUS ME FLAMMIS EREPTUM AD ANGLOS PERDUXIT. ET ANNO REGNI HENRICI OCTAVI XXXVI.

When

When Leeth a Towne of good account among the Scots, and Edinbrough their chiefe Cittie were on fire: Sir Richard Lea Knight ſaved me from burning, and brought me into England. And I being mindefull of this ſo great a benefit, whereas before I was wont to ſerve for Baptiſing of none, but Kings Children, have now willingly offered my ſervice even to the meaneſt of the Engliſh Nation. Lea the victor would have it ſo. Farewell. In the yeere of our Lord, M. D. XLIII. and of the Reigne of King Henrie the Eighth, XXXVI.

But to the matter. As antiquitie conſecrated this place to be an Altar of Religion: ſo Mars alſo may ſeeme to have deſtined it for the very plot of bloudie battaile; For, to let other particulars goe by, when England under the two houſes of Lancaſter and Yorke bereft, as it were, of vitall breath was ready through Ciuill Warre to ſinke downe and fall in a ſound, the chiefe Captaines of both ſides joyned battaile twiſe with reciprocall variety of fortune in the very Towne. Firſt, Richard Duke of Yorke gave the Lancaſtrians heere a ſore overthrow, tooke King Henry the Sixth captive, and ſlew many Honourable perſonages. Foure yeeres after the Lancaſtrians under the conduct of Queene Margaret wonne heere the field, put the houſe of Yorke to flight, and reſtored the King to his former liberty. 1455.

About this towne (that I may let paſſe the mount or fortification which the common ſort uſeth to call Oſſter-hils and I take to have been the Campe of Oſſorius the famous Lieutenant of Britaine) the Abbats in a pious and devout intent erected a little Nunnery at Sopwell, and Saint Julians Spittle for Lepres, and another named Saint Mary de pree for diſeaſed women: neere unto which they had a great Mannour named Gorumbery: where Sir Nicholas Bacon Lord Keeper of the Great Seale of England built an houſe beſeeming his place and calling. To this adjoyneth Redborn, which is by interpretation Red-water, and yet the water running thereby (from Mergrate ſometime a religious houſe, now a ſeat of the Ferrers out of the houſe of Groby) is no more red than is the Red ſea. This Redborne in times paſt was a place renowned and reſorted unto in regard of Amphibalus the Martyrs reliques heere found, who inſtructed Saint Alban in the Chriſtian faith, and for Chriſts ſake ſuffered death under Diocleſian. At this day well knowne, for that it is ſeated upon that common and Military high-way which we call Watling-ſtreet, and hath hard by Wenmer called alſo Womer, a brooke that never breaketh out and riſeth, but it foretelleth dearth and ſcarcity of corne, or elſe ſome extremity of dangerous times, as the vulgar people doe verily beleeve. Nere unto this Redborn I have ſome reaſon to thinke that the Station Duro-Co-Brive ſtood, whereof Antonine the Emperor maketh mention, although the diſtance of places gaine-ſaith it. For, as Redborn in our language, ſo Dur-coch in the Britiſh is all one in ſignification, with Redwater. And verily the trueſt conjectures that we can make of ancient places, are from antique inſcriptions from the lying of Journeies every way, from the analogie and ſimilitude of their names, and from rivers and lakes adjoyning: although they anſwere not juſt to the exact account of miles betweene place and place, conſidering that the numbers may very ſoone be corruptly put downe, and the waies for ſhorter paſſage are as eaſily altered.

* De prato of the Medow.

Redborn.

Duro-Co-Briue.

Certes it cannot otherwiſe be, but that Duro-Co-Brive, ſtood where that Romane

Rode-way passeth over this water, to wit under Flamsted: for even there, by the high-way side, there is a good big spring breaking out of the ground about seuen Italian miles from Verlam: (for which seuen, through the careleſſe negligence of the tranſcribers, twelve hath crept in.) Which brooke preſently, whiles it is yet but ſmall cutteth the high way croſſe; and although it carry here no name at all, yet beneath S. Albans town it is called Cot, which is neere to the name Co. As for that BRIVA, which is an adjection to many names of places, it ſignified, as I ſuppoſe, among the old Britans and Gaules, a bridge, or a paſſage, ſeeing it is found onely where there are rivers. In this Iland there was one or two Durobrivæ, that is to ſay, if I be not deceived Water paſſages; in Gaules, Briva Iſaræ now Pontoiſe, where in times paſt they paſſed over the river * Iſara, Briva Oderæ, where they paſſed over Oderam, and Samarobriva (for this is the true name) where there was paſſage over the river Some.

Briva, what it is.

* Yſere.

Flamſted.

Somewhat above, Flamſted ſheweth it ſelfe upon the hill, which in the time of King Edward the Confeſſor, Leoſtane the Abbat of Saint Albans gave unto three knights, Turnot, Waldeſe and Turman, for to defend and ſecure the countrey thereby againſt theeves. But William the Conqueror tooke it from them, and gave it to Roger of Todeney or Tony, a noble Norman, whoſe poſſeſſion it was, but by a daughter it was transferred at length to the Beauchamps Earles of Warwick.

Hemſted.

From hence I went downe Southward to Hempſted a little mercate towne called Hehan-Hamſted (when King Offa gave it unto the monaſtery of Saint Albans) ſituate among the hills by a riveret ſide, which floweth anon into another, that runneth downe by Berkhamſted. Where the Nobles of England, who deviſed how they might ſhake off the new yoake of the Normans, aſſembled themſelves together by the perſwaſion of Fretherike Abbat of Saint Albans: and unto whom William the Conqueror repaired (as we reade in the life of the ſame Fretherike) fearing leaſt he ſhould looſe the Kingdome with ſhame, which he had gotten with the effuſion of ſo much bloud. And after much debating of matters in the preſence of the Archbiſhop Lanfrank, the King for the preſervation of his peace ſwore upon all the reliques of Saint Albans Church, and by laying hand upon the Holy Goſpells unto Abbat Frederick, who miniſtred the oath, to obſerve and keepe inviolably the good and approoved ancient lawes of the kingdome, which the holy and devout Kings of England his predeceſſors, and King Edward eſpecially ordained. But moſt of thoſe Peeres and Nobles he forthwith evill entreated, turned out of all their poſſeſſions, and beſtowed this Towne upon Robert Earle of Moriton, and Cornwall his halfe brother: Who fortified the caſtle heere with a duple trench and rampier: In which Richard King of the Romanes, and Earle of Cornwall full of honors and yeeres changed this life for a better. For default of whoſe iſſue and offſpring King Edward the Third in the end made over this Caſtle with the Towne unto Edward his eldeſt ſonne, that moſt warlike Prince, whom he created Earle of Cornwall. Now that Caſtle is nothing elſe but broken walls and a rude heape of ſtones: above which Sir Edward Cary Knight, and Maſter of the Kings Jewell-houſe deſcended from the family of the Caryes in Devonſhire, and the Beauforts Dukes of Somerſet built of late a very goodly and moſt pleaſant houſe. In the very Towne it ſelfe nothing is worth ſight ſave only the ſchoole, which Iohn Incent Deane of Paules in London, a native of this place founded.

Berkhamſted.

Kings Langley.

More into the South, ſtandeth Kings Langley, ſometime the Kings houſe, in which was borne, and thereof tooke name Edmund of Langley King Edward the Third his Sonne, and Duke of Yorke: where there was a ſmall cell of Friers preachers, in which that ſilly and miſerable Prince King Richard the Second, after he had been wickedly deprived both of Kingdome and life, was firſt buried, and ſoone after tranſlated to Weſtminſter; requited there by way of amends with a braſen tombe for the loſſe of a Kingdome. Juſt in a maner over againſt this, there is another Langley alſo, which becauſe it belonged to the Abbats of Saint Albanes is called Abbats Langley: wherein was borne Nicholas ſurnamed Break-ſpeare, afterwards Biſhop of Rome, Abbats Langley.

A Rome, knowne by the name of Pope Hadrian the Fourth: who was the first that taught the Norwegians to the Christian Faith, and repressed the Citizens of Rome aspiring to their ancient freedome; whose stirrop also as hee alighted from his horse, Frederik the First Emperor of the Romanes held, and whose breath was stopped in the end with a flie that flew into his mouth. Somewhat lower I saw Watford and Rickemansworth, two mercate townes: concerning which I have read nothing of greater antiquity than this, that King Offa liberally gave them unto Saint Albans, as also Caishobery next unto Watford. In which place Sir Richard Morisin Knight, a great learned man, and who had been used in Embassages to the mightiest Princes, under King Henry the Eighth and King Edward the Sixth began to build an house, which Sir Charles his Sonne finally finished.

Caishobery.

B More into the East, the Romanes Military high way went directly from London to Verolam by Hamsted-heath, Edgeworth and Ellestre: neere unto which at the very same distance where Antonine the Emperour in his Itinerarie placeth SVLLONIACÆ, to wit, twelve miles from London and nine from Verolam, there remaine yet the markes of an ancient Station, and much rubish or rammell is digged up at an hill which in these dayes they call Brockley-hill. But when the Romanes Empire ceassed in this Island, as Barbarisme by little and little crept in, whiles all partes smoked with the Saxons warre, this, as every thing else, lay a great while relinquished, untill that a little before the Normans comming in, Leofstane C Abbat of Saint Albans restored it. For hee, as wee finde written in his life, *Caused the thicke and shady Woods, which lie from the edge of * Chiltern unto London, especially where the Kings high way called Watlingstreete lay to be cut up, the rugged places to be levelled, Bridges to be built, and the uneven waies to be made plaine and safer for passage.* But about three hundred yeeres since, this way was after a sort againe forsaken, by reason that another way through licence of the Bishops of London was laied open through High-gate and Bernet. This Bernet, for the beast mercat there kept, beginneth now to be famous, but it was more renowned for a field there fought, when in the warre betweene the two Families of Lancaster and Yorke, England dared to doe against her owne bowells, whatsoever ambitious treachery and dis- D loyaltie would command. For, upon Gledesmore hard by, even on Easter day in the morning there was a bloudy battaile most fiercely fought, and that with variable fortune for a great while, by reason that a most thicke mist covered the face of the ground. But in the end the victorie fell happily unto King Edward the Fourth, by occasion that Richard Nevil Earle of Warwicke was there slaine, whom as the favourable indulgence of Fortune made over-stout and bold, yea and dangerous unto Kings: so his death freed England from all feare of ciuill Warres. Bernet hath for his neighbours Mimmes a seat of a Worshipfull Family of the Coningesbies descended to them by Frowick from the Knolles, ancient possessours thereof; and North-hall, where Ambrose Dudley last Earle of Warwicke raised a stately house E from the foundations.

This County of Hertford had Earles out of the Familie de Clare, who notwithstanding were oftener called Earles of Clare, from Clare in Suffolke their principall seate. The first to my knowledge was Gilbert, who under the title of Earle of Hertford is put downe as a witnesse in a Charter of King Stephens. Likewise Roger de Clare in the time of King Henry the Second is in the Red-booke of the Exchequer named Earle of Hertford.

Earles of Hertford.

Likewise his successors, whom you may see in their places. But seeing both by right of inheritance, and also through the Princes favour they attained to the Earledome of Gloceſter, they bare both titles joyntly, and were called unto Parlia- F ments by the name of Earles of Gloceſter and Hertford. And Richard de Clare who died in the yeere of our Lord 1262. is in plaine termes by Florilegus of Westminster called Earle of Gloceſter and of Hertford, where he reporteth this Epitaph composed for him in that age, to his great commendation.

But not long since King Henry the Eighth honoured Sir Edward de Saint Maur or Seymor with the title of Earle of Hertford, who also was created Duke of Somerset by King Edward the Sixth. After whom succeeded in this Earledome his Sonne bearing the same name, a right Honourable personage, and a singular lover of Learning.

TRINOBANTES.

THey, whom Cæsar calleth TRINOBANTES, Ptolomee and Tacitus, TRINOANTES, were next neighbours to the Cattieuchlani, inhabiting in those countries, which now having changed their names are commonly termed Middlesex and Essex. Whence that ancient name sprung, I dare not verily so much as guesse, unlesse it come of the British word Tre-Nant, which is as much as Townes in a vale. For this whole region in a maner lieth low in a valley upon the Tamis. But I doe not greatly please my selfe in this my conjecture. And yet they that inhabited Galloway in Scotland, lying altogether lowe in vallies were of old time in the British tongue called Noantes and Novantes, and in the Vaile of Rhine, in French named Le Vaule, the people in old time called Nantuates, had both their abode and their name thence: so that this conjecture of mine may seeme as probable as that of others, who over curiously have derived Trinobantes, of Troy, as a man would say Troia Nova, that is, New Troy. But I wish them well, and that heerein they may please themselves. These were in Cæsars time of all these countries well neere the strongest City or State (for, evermore he termeth by the name of Civitas, a whole people living under the same lawe) and their King in those daies, was Immanuentius, who being slaine by Cassibelinus, his sonne Mandubratius saving his life by flight, went into Gaule to Cæsar, and putting himselfe under his protection returned with him into Britaine. At which time these Arinobantes petitioned Cæsar by their Ambassadors, that he would defend Mandubratius from the injuries of Cassibelinus, and resend him to the State, that he might be Governour and beare rule over them: which being done, they gave forty Hostages, and were the first of all the Britanes that yeelded themselves under his allegeance. This Mandubratius, that I may note so much by the way, is evermore called by Eutropius, Bede, and the later writers, Androgeus. But whence this diversitie of the name should arise, I am altogether ignorant: unlesse that be true, which I have learned from a very skilfull man in the British history and language both, that this name Androgeus was given unto him for his lewdnesse and perfidious treason. For, the signification of wickednesse doth most plainely shewit selfe in it: And in the Booke of Triades, among the three Traitors of Britaine, he is counted the most villanous; in that he was the first that made way to bring the forraine Romanes into Britaine, and betraied his Country. After Mandubratius, Civitas, that is, Citie, what it signifieth in Cæsar.

Androgeus.

tius, when as now by reaſon of hote ciuill warres, Britaine was neglected of the Romanes and left unto his owne Princes and lawes, certaine it is that Cunobeline ruled as King in theſe parts, of whoſe coine I exhibit heere unto you one or two peeces, although I have already ſhewed the very ſame and others heeretofore.

Suetonius. Admimus this mans Sonne baniſhed by his Father fled with a ſmall retinue about him to the Romane Emperour Cajus Caligula, and yeelded himſelfe. Which ſo puffed up the young Emperours minde, that as if all the Iſland had abſolutely and wholly yeelded into his hands, he ſent glorious letters to Rome, admoniſhing oftentimes the bearers thereof not to deliuer them unto the Conſuls, but in the Temple of Mars, and in a frequent aſſembly of the Senate. When Cunobelinus was dead, Aulius Plautius by commiſſion from Claudius the Emperour ſet upon Faſti Capitolini. this Country. One of Cunobilinus his Sonnes named Togodumnus he ſlew, and another called Catacratus he overthrew in the field, over whom alſo, as we finde in the Capitollin Record of the Romane Triumphes, he rode Ouant in triumph: and that, with ſo great honour as Suetonius writeth, that Claudius the Emperour went ſide by ſide with him both in his going to the Capitoll and alſo in his returne from thence. And he himſelfe ſhortly after tranſporting his forces hither, brought theſe parts within few Moneths into the forme of a Prouince. Thence-forth the Trinobantes reſted a while in peace, but that under the Empire of Nero they privily entered into a conſpiracy with the Iceni to ſhake off the Romanes yoke. But Suetonius Paulinus, as Tacitus recordeth, quickly quenched this flame of ſedition with a great effuſion of Britanes bloud. When the Romane Empire was at length come to an end in Britane, Vortigern the Britane, gave to the Saxons (who kept him priſoner) for his ranſome this Country with others, as Ninnius writeth: and it had his peculiar Kings for a long time together, but ſuch as held by homage ſometimes of the Kentiſh Kings, ſometimes of the Mercians. Among whom Sebert in the yeere 603. was the firſt that became a Chriſtian: and Suthred the laſt King, who being vanquiſhed by Egbert in the yeere 804. left the Kingdome unto the Weſt-Saxons: But heereof elſewhere more largely: Now let us ſurvey the very Country.

MIDLE-SEX.

MIDLE-SEX taketh name of the Middle-Saxons, becauſe the Inhabitants thereof were in the middeſt betweene Eaſt-Saxons, Weſt-Saxons, South-Saxons, and thoſe whom that age called Mercians. It is ſevered from Buckingham-ſhire by the River Cole which the Britans called Co, on the Weſt-ſide, from Hertford-ſhire on the North-ſide by a knowne crooked limite, from Eſſex on the Eaſt with the River Lea, from Surrey and Kent on the South by the Tamis. It being compriſed within ſhort Bounds lyeth out in length, where it is longeſt twenty miles, and in the narroweſt place it is ſcant twelve miles over. For aire paſſing temperate, and for Soile fertile, with ſumptuous houſes and prety Townes on all ſides pleaſantly beautified: and every where offereth to the view many things memorable. By the River Cole, where it entreth firſt into this Shire, wee ſaw Breakeſpeare an ancient houſe belonging to a Family ſo ſirnamed, out of which came Pope Hadrian the Fourth, of whom erewhile I ſpake: then, Haresfeld, in old time Herefelle, the poſſeſſion in King William the Conquerours daies of Richard the * ſonne of Counte Giſlebert. More Southward, Uxbridge anciently Woxbridge a Towne of later time built, and full of Innes, ſtretcheth out in length. Beneath which is Draiton, reedified by the Barons Paget; Colham, which from the Barons Le Strange came to the Earles of Darby: and Stanwell ever ſince the Normans comming in, unto our fathers dayes the habitation of the Family of Windeſore. And not farre from hence, Cole after it hath made certaine ſcattering medow Iſlands, at two ſmall mouthes falleth into Tamis. Along the ſide whereof, as a Germane Poet in this our age pretily verſified, Breakeſpeare.

Pope Hadrian the fourth.
Haresfield.
* Fitz-Giſlebert.
Uxbridge.

Tot campos, Sylvas, tot regia tecta, tot hortos
Artifici dextrâ excultos, tot vidimus arces,
Ut nunc Auſonio Tamiſis cum Tybride certet.

So many fields and pleaſant woods, ſo many princely Bowres,
And Palaces we ſaw beſides, ſo many ſtately Towres,
So many gardens trimly dreſs'd by curious hand which are,
That now with Romane Tyberis the Tamis may well compare.

At the very firſt entrance, Stanes in the Saxon tongue Stana offereth it ſelfe to our ſight, where Tamis hath a woodden Bridge over it. This name it tooke of a meere-ſtone heere in times paſt ſet up to marke out the juriſdiction that the City of London hath in the River. Neere unto this ſtone is that moſt famous Medow Runingmead commonly called Renimed: in which the Baronage of England aſſembled in great number in the yeere 1215. to exact their Liberties of King John. Whereof in the marriage of Tame and Iſis the Poet wrote thus, ſpeaking of the Tamis that runneth hard by.

Stanes.
Runingmead.

Subluit hic pratum, quod dixit Renimed Anglus,
Quo ſedere duces armis annisque verendi,
Regis Joannis cuperent qui vertere ſceptrum,
Edwardi Sancti dum leges juráque vellent
Principe contempto tenebroſo è carcere duci:
Hinc ſonuere tubæ pluſquam civilia bella,
Venit & hinc refugus noſtras Lodovicus in oras.

Hence runnes it hard by Medow greene, in Engliſh RENIMED,
Where cloſe in counſell ſat the Lords, as well for armour dred
As ancient yeeres right reverend: who ſought their ſoveraigne King
John to depoſe from regall Throne: Whiles that they ment to bring (Contemning Prince) S. Edwards lawes and liberties againe, Inure,

Inure, which had long time forlet a quite forgotten laine.
Hence more than civill Warres, aloud the trumpets ganne to ſound,
Hence Lewis of France, who ſoone retir'd, ſet foot on Engliſh ground.

From thence it paſſeth by Coway-ſtakes at Lalam, where we ſaid that Cæſar croſſed over the Tamis, and the Britans fenſed the banke and Fourd againſt him with ſtakes, whereof it had the name. Tamis paſſing downe from thence ſeeth above it Harrow, the higheſt hill of all this Country, under which Southward there lie for a long way together exceeding rich and fruitfull fields, eſpecially about Heſton a ſmall Village that yeeldeth ſo fine floure for manchet that a long time it hath ſerved for the Kings mouth. Within a little of it is Hanworth, where ſtands a prety houſe of the Kings which King Henry the Eighth tooke exceeding delight in, as being a retiring place for his ſolace and voluptuous pleaſure. Afterwards it runneth hard by Hampton Court a royall Palace of the Kings, a worke in truth of admirable magnificence built out of the ground by Thomas Wolſey Cardinall, in oſtentation of his riches, when for very pride, being otherwiſe a moſt prudent man, hee was not able to mannage his minde. But it was made an Honour, enlarged and finiſhed by King Henry the Eighth ſo amply, as it containeth within it five ſeverall inner Courts paſſing large, environed with very faire buildings wrought right curiouſly, and goodly to behold. Of which Leland writeth thus:

Harrow hill.
Hanworth.
Hampton Court.

Eſt locus inſolito rerum ſplendore ſuperbus,
Alluitúrque vaga Tamiſini fluminis unda,
Nomine ab antiquo jam tempore dictus Avona.
Hîc Rex Henricus talcis Octavius ædes
Erexit, qualeis toto Sol aureus orbe
Non vidit.

A ſtately place for rare and glorious ſhew
There is, which Tamis with wandring ſtreame doth dowſſe;
Times paſt, by name of Avon men it knew;
Heere Henry the Eigth of that name, built an houſe
So ſumptuous, as that on ſuch an one (Seeke through the World,) the bright Sunne never ſhone.

And another in the Nuptiall Poeme of Tame and Iſis.

Alluit Hamptonam celebrem quæ laxior urbis
Mentitur formam ſpaciis; hanc condidit aulam
Purpureus pater ille gravis, gravis ille ſacerdos
Wolſæus, fortuna favos cui ſelle repletos
Obtulit, heu tandem fortunæ dona dolores.

He runnes by HAMPTON, which for ſpacious ſeat

Firſt founder was a Prieſt and Prelate great Wolſey, that grave and glorious Cardinall:
Fortune on him had pour'd her gifts full faſt,
But Fortunes Bliſſe, Alas, prov'd Bale at laſt.

And now with a winding reach the River bendeth his courſe Northward by Giſtleworth, for ſo was that called in old time, which now is Thiſtleworth. Where ſometime ſtood the Palace of Richard King of Romans and Earle of Cornwall, which the Londoners in a tumultuous broile burnt to the ground.

Thiſtleworth.

From hence Sion ſheweth it ſelfe, a little Monaſtery ſo named of the moſt holy Mount Sion: Which King Henry the Fifth, when he had expelled thence the Monkes aliens, built for religious Virgins to the honor of our Saviour, the Virgine Mary, and Saint Briget of Sion: like as he founded another on the Rivers ſide over againſt it for the Carthuſian Monkes, named Jeſu of Bethelem. In this Sion, hee appointed to the Glory of God ſo many Nunnes, Prieſts, and lay brethren divided a part within their ſeverall wals, as were in number equall to Chriſt his Apoſtles and Diſciples: upon whom when he had beſtowed ſufficient living he provided by a law, that contenting themſelves

A themſelves therewith, they ſhould take no more of any man: but what overplus ſoever remained of their yearely revenew, they ſhould beſtow it upon the poore. But after that in our forefathers time thoſe religious Votaries were caſt out, and it became a retiring houſe of the Duke of Somerſet, who plucked downe the Church, and there began a new houſe. Under this the ſmall water Brent iſſueth into the Tamis, which ſpringing out of a Pond vulgarly called Brounſ-well, for Brentwell, that is, in old Engliſh Frog-well, paſſeth downe betweene Hendon, which Archbiſhop Dunſtan borne for the advancement of Monkes, purchaſed for ſome few golde Bizantines, which were Imperiall peeces of Gold coined at Bizantium or Conſtantinople, and gave to the Monks of Saint Peter of Weſtminſter: and Hamſted-hils (from whence Bezantes Bizantines of ſilver valued at two ſhillings anciently.

B you have a moſt pleaſant proſpect to the moſt beautifull City of London, and the lovely Country about it.) Over which the ancient Roman military way led to Verulam or Saint Albans by Edge-worth, and not by High-gate as now, which new way was opened by the Biſhops of London about ſome 300. yeares ſince. But to returne, Brent into whom all the ſmall Rillets of theſe parts reſort, runneth on by Brentſtreat, an Hamlet to whom it imparted his name, watereth Hanger-wood, Hanwell, Oiſterly Parke, where Sir Thomas Greſham built a faire large houſe: and ſo neere his fall into the Tamis giveth name to Brentford a faire throughfaire, and frequent Mercat.

Neere which in the yeare 1116. King Edmond ſirnamed Ironſide, ſo fiercely charged upon the Danes whom hee compelled by force to retire from the Siege of

C London, that as faſt as their horſes could make way, they fled, not without their great loſſe. From Stanes hitherto, all that lyeth betweene London highway (which goeth through Hounſlow) and the Tamis was called the Forreſt or Warren of Stanes, untill that King Henry the Third, as in his Charter we reade; Diſforreſted and diſwarened it. Then by the Tamis ſide is Fulham, in the Engliſh Saxon tongue Fullonham, that is, The place of Fowles: the greateſt credit and honour whereof is the Biſhop of Londons houſe ſtanding there conveniently, not farre from the City, albeit not ſo healthfully. Alſo Chelſey, ſo named of a ſhelfe of Sand in the River Tamis as ſome ſuppoſe, but in Records it is named Chelcbe-hith: a place garniſhed with faire and ſtately houſes, by King Henry the Eighth, by William Powlet the firſt Marqueſſe of Fulham. Chelſey, as one would ſay, Shelfsey.

D Wincheſter, and by others.

But LONDON, the Epitome or Breviary of all Britaine, the ſeat of the Britiſh Empire, and the Kings of Englands Chamber, ſo much overtoppeth all theſe, as according to the Poet, Inter viburna Cupreſſus, that is, the Cypreſſe-tree amongſt the Viornes. Tacitus, Ptolomee, and Antonine call it LONDINIUM, and LONGIDINIUM: Ammianus LUNDINUM and AUGUSTA; Stephen in his Cities AINAONION, our Britans Lundayn; the old Saxons Lonben ceaſtep, Lonben-bypig, Lonben-þýc: Strangers Londra and Londres: the inhabitants London: Fabulous writers Troja nova, that is, New Troy, Dinas Belin, that is, Belins City, and Caer Lud of King Lud, whom they write to have reedified it and given it the name. But theſe few names and originall

London.

E derivations together with Eraſmus his conjecture, who deriveth it from Lindum a City in the Iſle Rhodes I willingly leave to ſuch as well like it. For mine owne part; ſeeing that Caſar and Strabo doe write that the ancient Britains called thoſe Woods and groves by the names of Cities and Townes, which they had fenced with trees caſt downe and plaſhed to ſtoppe up all paſſage: ſeeing alſo I have underſtood that ſuch woods or groves are in the Britiſh tongue named Llhwn, I encline a little to the opinion that London thence tooke name, as one would ſay, by way of excellency The City, or A City thicke of trees. But if heerein I faile of the truth, let me with good leave give my conjecture (and heere would I have no man to charge me with inconſtancy while I diſport in conjecture) that whence it had the fame, thence alſo it tooke Britans townes.

F the name, even from ſhips, which the Britains in their language call Lhong: ſo that Londinum may ſeeme to ſound as much as a ſhip-Rode, or City of ſhips. For, the Britains tearme a City Dinas, whence the Latines have fetched their Dinum. And hence it is, that elſewhere it is called LONGIDINIUM, and in the funerall ſong or Dump of a moſt ancient Britiſh * Bard, Lhong-porth, that is, an harbour or haven of ſhips; and by Dinum.

* Poet.

this very terme Bononia, or Bolen in France, which Ptolomee calleth Geſſoriacum Navale, in the Britiſh Gloſſarie is named Bolung-long. For, many Cities have drawne their names from Ships, as Nanpactus, Nauſtathmos, Nauplia, Navalia Auguſti, &c. But of theſe none hath better right to aſſume unto it the name of a Ship-Rode, or Haven, than our London. For, in regard of both Elements moſt bleſſed and happy it is, as being ſituate in a rich and fertile Soile, abounding with plentifull ſtore of all things, and on the gentle aſcent and riſing of an hill, hard by the Tamis ſide, the moſt mylde Merchant, as one would ſay, of all things that the World doth yeelde: which ſwelling at certaine ſet houres with the Ocean-tides, by his ſafe and deepe chanell able to entertaine the greateſt Ships that bee, daily bringeth in ſo great riches from all parts, that it ſtriveth at this day with the Mart-townes of Chriſtendome for the ſecond prize, and affoordeth a moſt ſure and beautifull Roade for ſhipping. A man would ſay that ſeeth the ſhipping there, that it is, as it were, a very Wood of trees disbranched to make glades and let in light: So ſhaded it is with maſts and ſailes.

Who was the firſt founder, is by long time growne out of knowledge, and in truth very few Cities there are that know their own firſt founders, conſidering they grew up to their greatneſſe by little and little. But as other Cities ſo this of ours fathereth her originall upon the Trojanes, as verily beleeving that Brutus the Nephew in the third deſcent of Great Æneas was the builder thereof. But whoſoever founded it, the happy and fortunate eſtate thereof hath given good proofe, that built it was in a good houre and marked for life, and long continuance. And that it is for antiquity honourable, Ammianus Marcellinus giveth us to underſtand, who called it in his time, and that was 1200. yeares agoe, an old towne: and Cornelius Tacitus in like manner, who in Nero his daies 1540. yeares ſince, reported it to have been a place very famous for freſh Trade, concourſe of Merchants, and great ſtore of victuals and all things neceſſary. This onely at that time was wanting to the glory thereof, that it had the name neither of Free City nor of Colony. Neither verily could it have ſtood with the Romans profit, if a City flouriſhing with merchandize ſhould have enjoyed the right of a Colony or Free City. And therefore it was, as I ſuppoſe, that they ordained it to bee a Præfecture: for ſo they termed townes where Marts were kept and Juſtice miniſtred: yet ſo as that they had no Magiſtrates of their owne, but rulers were ſent every yeare to governe in them, and for to miniſter Law, which in publique matters, namely of tax, tributes, tolles, cuſtomes, warfare, &c. they ſhould have from the Senate of Rome. Hence it commeth that Tacitus the Panegyriſt, and Marcellinus call it onely a towne. And although it was not in name loftier, yet in welth, riches and proſperity it flouriſhed as much as any other, yea and continued in manner alwaies the ſame under the dominion of Romans, Engliſh-Saxons, and Normans, ſeldome or never afflicted with any great calamities. In the Raigne of Nero, when the Britans had conſpired to recover and reſume their liberty under the leading of Boadicia, the Londoners could not with all their weeping and teares hold Suetonius Paulinus, but that after hee had levied a power of the Citizens to aide him, hee would needs diſlodge and remove from thence, leaving the City naked to the enemy: who foorthwith ſurpriſed and ſlew ſome few, whom either weakneſſe of ſex, feebleneſſe of age, or ſweetneſſe of the place had deteined there. Neither had it ſuſteined leſſe loſſe and miſery at the hands of the French, if it had not ſoddenly and beyond all expectation by Gods providence beene releeved. For when C. Alectus had by a deceitfull wile made away C. Carauſius a Clive-lander, who taking vantage of our rough ſeas, of Dioclesians dangerous warres in the Eaſt, and withall preſuming of the French, and moſt venterous Mariners and ſervitors at ſea, had withheld to himſelfe the revenewes of Britain and Holland, and borne for the ſpace of ſix yeares the title of Emperour Auguſtus, as his coines very often found heere doe ſhew: when M. Aurelius Aſclepiodotus likewiſe had in a battaile ſlain Alectus in the third year now of his uſurpation of the imperiall purple and ſtate; thoſe French, who remained alive after the fight, haſting to London forthwith would have ſacked the City, had not the Tamis, which never failed to helpe the Londoners, very fitly brought in the Roman ſouldiers, who by reaſon of a

fogge

A fogge at Sea were ſevered from the Navie. For, they put the Barbarians to the ſword all the City over, and thereby gave the Citizens not onely ſafety by the ſlaughter of their enemies, but alſo pleaſure in the beholding of ſuch a ſight. And then it was, as our Chronicles record, that Lucius Gallus was ſlaine by a little Brookes ſide, which ran through the middle almoſt of the City, and of him was in Britiſh called Nant-Gall, in Engliſh Walbrooke: which name remaineth ſtill in a Street, under which there is a ſewer within the ground to ridde away filth; not farre from London-ſtone, which I take to have beene a Milliary, or Milemarke, ſuch as was in the Mercate place of Rome: From which was taken the dimenſion of all journies every way, conſidering it is in the very mids of the City, as it lyeth in length. Neither am I perſwaded that London B was as yet walled. Howbeit within a little while after, our Hiſtories report, that Conſtantine the Great at the requeſt of his mother Helena, did firſt fenſe it about with a Wall made of rough ſtone and Britiſh brickes, which tooke up in compaſſe three miles or thereabout: ſo as it encloſed the modell of the City, almoſt foure ſquare but not equall on every ſide, conſidering that from Weſt to Eaſt it is farre longer, than from South to North. That part of this Wall which ſtood along the Tamis ſide is by the continuall flowing and waſhing of the River fallen downe and gone. Yet there appeared certaine remaines thereof in King Henry the Seconds time, as Fitz-Stephen, who then lived, hath written. The reſt now ſtanding is ſtronger toward the North, as which not many yeares ſince was reedified by the meanes of Jotceline Lord C Major of London, became of a ſodaine new, as it were, and freſh againe. But toward Eaſt and Weſt, although the Barons in old time during their warres repaired and renewed it with the Jewes houſes then demoliſhed, yet is it all throughout in decay. For Londoners, like to thoſe old Lacedemonians laugh at ſtrong walled Cities, as cotte houſes for Women, thinking their owne City ſufficiently fenſed when it is fortified with men and not with ſtones. This Wall giveth entrance at ſeven principall Gates, (for wittingly I omit the ſmaller) which as they have beene newly repaired, ſo they have had alſo new names given unto them.

On the Weſt ſide there be two: to wit Lud-gate of king Lud, or Flud-gate, as Leland is of opinion, of a little floud running beneath it (like as the Gate Fluentana in D Rome) built againe of late from the very foundation: and Newgate the faireſt of them all, ſo called of the newneſſe thereof, where as before it was termed Chamberlangate, which alſo is the publique Goall or Priſon. On the North ſide are foure; Alderſgate of the antiquity, or as others would have it, of * Aldrich a Saxon: Creple-gate, of a Spitle of lame Creples ſometime adjoyning thereunto: More-gate of a moory ground hard by, now turned into a field and pleaſant Walkes: which Gate was firſt built by Falconer Lord Major in the yeare of our Lord 1414. and Biſhopſgate of a Biſhop, which Gate the Dutch Merchants of the Stilyard were bound by Covenant, both to repaire and alſo to defend at all times of danger and extremity. On the Eaſt ſide there is Aldgate alone, ſo named of the oldneſſe, or Elbegate, as others terme it, E which at this preſent is by the Cities charge reedified. It is thought alſo that there ſtood by the Tamis beſide that on the Bridge two Gates more, namely, Belings-gate, a Wharfe now, or a key for the receit of Ships, and Douregate, that is, The Water-gate, commonly called Dowgate.

Where the Wall endeth alſo toward the River there were two very ſtrong Forts or Baſtilions: of which the one Eaſtward remaineth yet, uſually called, The Towre of London: in the Britiſh tongue, Bringwin, or Tourgwin of the whiteneſſe. A moſt famous and goodly Citadell, encompaſſed round with thicke and ſtrong Walles, full of lofty, and ſtately Turrets, fenced with a broad and deepe ditch, furniſhed alſo with an Armory or Magazine of warlike Munition, and other buildings beſides: ſo as it F reſembleth a big towne: and a man may truly ſuppoſe, that thoſe two Caſtles which Fitz-Stephen recorded to have beene at the Eaſt ſide of this City went both to the making of this one. The other Fort was on the Weſt ſide of the City, where Fleete, a little Riveret (whence Fleete-ſtreete tooke name) now of no account, but in times paſt able to beare Veſſels, as I have read in the Parliament Rolls, ſheddeth it ſelfe into to the Tamis. Fitz-Stephen called this the Palatine Towre or Castle: and they write, that in the Raigne of William the Conquerour it was consumed by fire. Out of the ruines whereof, both a great part of Pauls Church was newly built: and also in the very plot of ground where it stood, Robert Kilwarby Archbishop of Canterbury founded a religious house for Dominican Friers (whereupon we call the place Blacke Friers.) Whereby, a man may easily guesse of what bignesse it was. Howbeit there stood in that place in the dayes of king Henry the second (Gervase of Tilbury in his booke entituled Otia Imperialia is mine Authour) two Forts or Castles built with Wals and Rampiers: The one whereof belonged to Bainard, the other to the Barons of Montfichet by right of succession. But nothing remaineth of them at this day. Yet some thinke, that Pembroch house was a peece of them, which we terme Bainards Castle, of William Bainard a Noble man Lord of Dunmow, whose possession sometime it was, whose successours the Fitz-walters were in right of inheritance the Ensigne Bearers of the City of London, and amongst them Robert Fitz-walter had licence of king Edward the First to sell the site of Bainard Castle to the said Archbishop Robert.

Pat.6.1.m.11.

Neither was this City at that time walled onely, but also when the Flamin or Pagan Priest was taken away, and Christian Religion established under that good Emperour, a Bishop was enstalled in his roome. For, it appeareth, that at the Councell of Arles which in the yeare of grace 314. was held under Constantine the Great, the Bishop of London was present. For, he subscribed, as is to be seene in the first Tome of the Councels in this manner: RESTITUTUS Bishop in the City of London, out of the Province of Britaine: which Restitutus and his successors had their seat and residance, as some affirme, at Saint Peters in Cornhill. Heereafter, London flourished in such honour, that it beganne to bee called AUGUSTA, and by that name was famous under the Emperour Valentinian. For, Amianus Marcellinus in his 27. booke writeth thus: And going forward to London an ancient Towne, which the posterity called Augusta: and in the 28. booke. He went from Augusta, which men of old time called Lundi, whence it came, that when after Constantines time there was a Mint appointed therein. (For we reade in his peeces of money, which he stamped in honour of his father Constantius, and in others, this inscription P.LON.S. that is, Pecunia Londini signata, that is, Money stamped at London) he that had the charge and overseeing thereof under the Comes sacrarum largitionum*, is in the booke of Notice termed Præpositus Thesaurorum Augustensium in Britannia, that is, Provost of the Treasury of Augusta, or London in Britaine. For this name AUGUSTA was a name full of much dignity, full of majesty. And both founders and repairers of Cities when they either hoped or wished that such Cities would become flourishing and powerfull, gave them significative names of good fortune. But among the most auspicious names that be, none is more magnificent, none more auspicate than AUGUSTA. For, this of AUGUSTUS, that most gracious and mighty Emperour Octavianus tooke unto himselfe not without the judgement of the best learned. Sirnamed he was, saith Dio, Augustus, as one of great Majesty above the nature of man. For, what things be most honourable and sacred, are called AUGUSTA; Neither had London this name for so high an honour without the Licence of the Romane Emperours. For that names could not bee imposed to Cities without licence, Virgil noteth in that Verse of his:

London called Augusta.

A Mint.

Lord high Treasurer.

Urbem appellabant, permisso nomine, Acestam.

The City, by permission, ACESTA they did name.

But as continuance of time hath out-worne this so honorable a name of Augusta: so it hath confirmed that other more ancient name, Londinum. Whiles it enjoyed the foresaid name Augusta, it scaped faire from destruction by a rebellious rout of Ransackers: but Theodosius the father of Theodosius the Emperour did cut them in peeces whiles they were encombred with their spoiles, and entred, as Marcianus saith, with exceeding great joy in triumphant manner into the City distressed before and overwhelmed with grievous calamities. And marching with his Army from thence, he by his valiant prowesse so freed Britain from those intolerable miseries and dangers wherewith it was beset, that the Romans, as witnesseth Symmachus, honored him among other ancient worthies worthies and men of honourable Renowne, with the Statue of a man of Armes. Not long after, when the Romans Empire in Britaine was come to an end, in that publique deſtiny and fatall fall of the whole State, it fell into the Engliſh-Saxons hands: but in what ſort, it is not agreed upon among Writers. For mine owne part, I am of opinion, that Vortigern, to redeeme himſelfe being taken Priſoner, delivered it for his ranſome unto Hengeſt the Saxon: conſidering that it belonged to the Eaſt-Saxons, whoſe Country, as Writers doe record, Vortigerne upon that condition made over unto Hengeſt.

At which time the State of the Church went to wracke and endured ſore afflictions, the Paſtours were either ſlaine or forced to flye, their flockes driven away, and after havocke made of all, as well Church goods as others, Theon the laſt Biſhop of London of Britiſh bloud, was faine to hide the holy Reliques of Saints, for a memoriall (as mine Authour ſaith) and not for any Superſtition. But although thoſe dayes of the Engliſh-Saxons were ſuch as that a man might truely ſay: Mars then brandiſhed and ſhooke his weapons, yet was London never the leſſe, as Bede teſtifieth, a Towne of Trade and Traffique, Frequented with many Nations reſorting thither by ſea and land. But afterwards, when a more gracious gale of peace breathed favourably upon this wearied Iſland, and the Engliſh-Saxons beganne to profeſſe Chriſtianity, it alſo beganne a freſh to flouriſh againe. For, Æthelbert King of Kent, under whom Sebert reigned in this Tract, as it were, his Vaſſall and by courteſie, founded heere a Church and conſecrated it to Saint Paul, which being eftſoones reedified and repaired became at length moſt ſtately and magnificent, endowed alſo with faire Livings and Revenewes, wherewith are maintained, a Biſhop, a Deane, and Chaunter, a Chancellour, and a Treaſurer, five Archdeacons, thirty Prebendaries and divers others.

Reliques hidden for a remembrance.

610. Saint Pauls Church.

The Eaſt part of this Church, which ſeemeth to bee the newer and curiouſly wrought, having under it a very faire Arched Vault, which alſo is Saint Faithes Church, was begunne of the ruines of that Palatine Caſtle (which I ſpeake of) by Maurice the Biſhop; about the yeare of our Lord 1086. when as before time it had beene conſumed by a woefull accidentall fire: whereof, William of Malmesbury writeth thus: The beauty thereof is ſo magnificent, that it deſerveth to bee numbered in the ranke of moſt excellent Edifices: ſo large is that Arched Vault underneath, and the Church above it of ſuch capacity, that it may ſeeme ſufficient to receive any multitude of people whatſoever. Becauſe therefore Maurice carried a minde beyond all meaſure in this project, he betooke the charge and coſt of ſo laborious a peece of worke unto thoſe that came after. In the end when B. Richard his Succeſſour had made over all the Revenewes belonging unto the Biſhoprieke to the building of this Cathedrall Church, ſuſtaining himſelfe and his Family otherwiſe in the meane while, hee ſeemed in a manner to have done juſt nothing: ſo that hee ſpent his whole ſubſtance profuſely heereabout, and yet ſmall effect came thereof.

Biſhop.

The Weſt Part, as alſo the Croſſe-yle are ſpacious, high built, and goodly to bee ſeene by reaſon of the huge Pillars and a right beautifull arched Rouſe of ſtone. Where theſe foure Parts croſſe one another and meete in one, there riſeth uppe a mighty bigge and lofty Towre, upon which ſtood a Spire Steeple covered with Leade, mounting uppe to a wonderfull height: for it was no leſſe than five hundered and foure and thirty foote high from the Ground; which in the yeare of our Lord 1087. was ſet on fire with Lightning, and burnt, with a great part of the City: but beeing rebuilt, was of late in mine owne remembrance, when I was but a Childe, fired againe with Lightning, and is not as yet reedified. The meaſure alſo and proportion of this ſo ſtately building, I will heere put downe out of an old Writer, which you may, if it pleaſe you, reade: Saint Pauls Church containeth in length ſixe hundered ninety foote: the breadth thereof is one hundered and thirty foote: the height of the Weſt Arched Rouſe from the Ground carrieth an hundered and two foote: and the new Fabrique from the Ground is foure ſcore and eight foote high. The ſtoneworke of the Steeple from the plaine ground riſeth in height two hundredand threeſcore foote: and the timber frame upon the ſame is two hundred ſeaventy foure foote high, &c.

The Temple of Diana.

That there ſtood of old time a Temple of Diana in this place ſome have conjectured, and arguments there are to make this their conjecture good. Certaine old houſes adjoyning are in the ancient records of the Church called Dianaes Chamber: and in the Church-yard, while Edward the Firſt reigned, an incredible number of Oxheads were digged up, as wee finde in our Annals, which the common ſort at that time made a wondering at, as the Sacrifices of Gentiles: and the learned know, that Taurapolia were celebrated in the honour of Diana. I my ſelfe alſo when I was a boy, have ſeene a ſtagges head ſticking upon a ſpeare-top, (a ceremony ſuting well with the ſacrifices of Diana) carried round about within the very Church in ſolemne pompe and proceſſion, and with a great noiſe of Horne-blowers. And that Stagge or Hart which they of the houſe de Bawde in Eſſex did preſent for certaine lands that there held, as I have heard ſay, the Prieſts of this Church arrayed in their ſacred veſtiments, and wearing Garlands of flowers upon their heads, were wont to receive at the ſteps of the quire.

Sacrifice of Buls.

Now whether this were in uſe before thoſe Bawds were bound to exhibite ſuch a Stagge, I wote not: but ſurely this rite and ceremony may ſeeme to ſmell of Diana's worſhip and the Gentiles errours, more than of Chriſtian Religion. And verily no man neede to doubt, that from them certaine ſtrange, and foraine and heatheniſh rites crept into Chriſtian religion. Which Ceremonies the firſt Chriſtians, (as mankinde is naturally a pliant Sectary to ſuperſtition) either admitted, or elſe at the firſt tolerated, thereby to traine and allure the Heathen, from Paganiſme by little and little to the true Service and Worſhip of God.

But ever ſince this Church was built, it hath beene the See of the Biſhops of London: and the firſt Biſhop that it had under the Engliſh (about fifty yeares after that Theon of the Britiſh Nation was thruſt out) was Melitus a Roman conſecrated by Auſtin Archbiſhop of Canturbury. In honour of which Auſtin, flat againſt the Decree of Pope Gregorie the Great, the Enſignes of the Archbiſhopricke, and the Metropolitane See, were tranſlated from London to Canturbury.

Who were buried in Pauls Church. About the yeare 680.

Within this Cathedrall Church, (to ſay nothing of Saint Erkenwald, and the Biſhops) there lye buryed Sebba King of the Eaſt Saxons, who gave over his kingdome for to ſerve Chriſt; Etheldred or Egeldred, who was an Oppreſſour rather than a Ruler of this Kingdome, cruell in the beginning, wretched in the middle, and ſhamefull in the end: ſo outragious hee was in his connivency to a Parricidie committed, ſo infamous in his flight and effeminacy, and ſo miſerable in his death.

1016. William Malmesbury.

Henry Lacy Earle of Lincolne; Iohn of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, Sir Simon de Burlie a right noble Knight of the Garter executed by encroched Authority without the kings aſſent, Sir Iohn de Beauchamp, Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports; Iohn Lord Latimer, Sir Iohn Maſon knight; William Herbert Earle of Pembroch, Sir Nicholas Bacon Lord Keeper of the Great Seale of England, a man of a deepe reach and exquiſite judgement; Sir Philip Sidney, and Sir Francis Walſingham, two famous knights, &c. and Sir Chriſtopher Hatton Lord Chancellour of England, for whoſe perpetuall memory Sir William Hatton his Nephew by ſiſter, deſcended from the ancient Family of the Newports, whom hee adopted into the name of Hatton, dutifully erected a ſumptuous monument, well beſeeming the greatneſſe of his adoptive father.

Beſide this Church, there is not to my knowledge any other worke of the Engliſh Saxons extant in London to bee ſeene: for why? they continued not long in perfect peace; conſidering that in ſhort ſpace the Weſt-Saxons ſubdued the Eaſt-Saxons; and London became ſubject to the Mercians. Scarcely were theſe civill Warres huſht, when a new Tempeſt brake out of the North: I meane the Danes, who piteouſly tore in peeces all this Country, and ſhooke this City ſore. For the Danes brought it under their Subjection: but Ælfred recovered it out of their hands, and after he had repaired it, gave it unto Aetheldred Earle of the Mercians, who

A who had married his daughter. Yet those wastefull depopulators, did what they could afterwards many a time to winne it by Siege; but * Canut especially, who by digging a new Chanell attempted to turne away the Tamis from it. Howbeit evermore they lost their labour; the Citizens did so manfully repulse the force of the enemy. Yet were they not a little terrified still by them, untill they lovingly received and saluted as their King, William Duke of Normandy; whom God destined to bee borne for the good of England against those Spoilers. Presently then, the windes were laid, the clouds dispersed, and golden dayes in deed shone upon it: Since when it never sustained any great calamity to speake of: but through the speciall favour and indulgence of Princes obtained very large and great Immunities,

B beganne to bee called The Kings Chamber, and so flourished a new with fresh trade and traffique of Merchants, that William of Malmesbury who lived neere about that time, termed it, a noble and wealthy City, replenished with rich Citizens, and frequented with the commerce of Occupiers and Factours comming out of all lands. And Fitz-Stephen living also in those dayes, hath left in writing, that London at that time counted an hundred and twenty two Parish Churches, and thirteene Covents of religious Orders: also that when a Muster and shew was made of able men to beare Armes, they brought into the Field under their Colloirs forty thousand footemen, and twenty thousand horsemen.

Then was it enlarged with new buildings, and the spacious Suburbs stretched

C forth from the gates a great length on every side: but Westward especially which are the greatest, and best peopled: In which are twelve Innes, ordained for Students of our Common law: whereof foure being very faire and large belong to the judiciall Courts, the rest to the Chauncery: besides two Innes moreover for the Serjeants at Law. Herein such a number of young Gentlemen doe so painefully ply their bookes, and study the Law, that for frequency of Students, it is not inferiour either to Angiers, Cane, or Orleance it selfe, as Sir Iohn Fortescue in his small Treatise of the Lawes of England doth witnesse. The said foure principall houses, are The Inner Temple, the Middle Temple, Graies Inne, and Lincolns Inne. Those two former named, stand in the very place where in times past, during the

D Raigne of King Henry the Second, Heraclius Patriarch of Jerusalem consecrated a Church for Knights Templars, which they had newly built according to the forme of the Temple, neere unto the Sepulchre of our Lord at Hierusalem. For, at their first institution about the yeare of our Lord 1113. they dwelt in part of the Temple hard by the Sepulchre, whereof they were so named, and vowed to defend Christian Religion, the Holy Land, and Pilgrimes going to visite the Lords Sepulchre, against all Mahometans, and Infidels; professing to live in chastity and obedience; whereupon all men most willingly and with right loving hearts embraced them: so that, through the bounteous liberality of Princes and devout people, having gotten in all places very faire Possessions, and exceeding great wealth,

E they flourished in high reputation for Piety and Devotion: yea and in the opinion, both of the holinesse of the men, and of the place King Henry the Third, and many Noble men desired much to bee buryed in their Church among them. Some of whose Images are there to bee seene, with their legges acrosse. For, so they were buryed in that Age that had Taken upon them the Crosse (as they then termed it) to serve in the Holy Land, or had vowed the same. Among whom was William Marshall the elder a most powerfull man in his time, William and Gilbert his sonnes Marshalles of England and Earles of Penbroch. Upon William the elder his Tombe I some yeares since read in the upper part Comes Penbrochiæ, and upon side this Verse:

But in proceſſe of time, when with inſatiable greedineſſe they had hoorded great wealth by withdrawing tith's from churches, appropriating ſpiritual livings to themſelves, and other hard meanes; their riches turned to their ruine. For thereby their former piety was after a manner ſtifled, they fell at jarre with other religious orders, their profeſſed obedience to the Patriarch of Ieruſalem was rejected, envy among the common ſort was procured, which hope of gain among the better ſort ſo enkindled, that in the yeere of our ſalvation 1312. this order was condemned of impiety, and by the Popes authority utterly aboliſhed. Howbeit their poſſeſſions were by authority of the Parliament aſſigned to the Hoſpitalier Knights of S. Iohn of Ieruſalem, leaſt that ſuch Lands given to pious and good uſes, againſt the Donours will ſhould be alienated to other uſes. And yet it is apparent out of ancient writings, that this place, after the expulſion of the Templers, was the ſeat and habitation of Thomas Earle of Lancaſter, and of Sir Hugh Spenſer King Edward the Second his minion: afterwards of Sir Aimer de Valence Earle of Pembroch, and in the end turned into two Colledges or Innes of Lawyers. Of the reſt of theſe Innes, I have found nothing at all by reading: But the generall voyce goeth, that the one was the dwelling houſe of the Lord Greies of Wilton, and the other of the Earles of Lincolne.

Theſe Suburbs with houſes ſtanding cloſe together, and ſtately habitations of the Nobles and great Men of the Land along the Tamis ſide, reach out as farre as to Weſtminſter. Among which theſe are the moſt memorable here: Bride-well, where King Henry the Eighth built a royall houſe for the entertainment of Charles the Fifth Emperour: but now it is an Houſe of Correction: Buckhurſt houſe, or Salisbury Court, belonging ſometimes to the Biſhops of Salisbury: the White Freers, or Carmelite Freers: The Temples whereof I ſpeake: Then without the Bars Eſſex houſe, built by the Lord Paget: Arundel houſe before called Hampton place, and Somerſet houſe built by Edward Seimer Duke of Somerſet: The Savoy, ſo named of Peter Earle of Savoy, who there dwelt, which Queene Æleonor wife to King Henry the Third purchaſed of the fraternity of Mont joy, and gave it to her Sonne Edmund Earle of Lancaſter. Whoſe Poſterity dwelt in it a long time untill that King Henry the Seaventh dedicated it as an Hoſpitall for the Poore: Worceſter-houſe, late Bedford-houſe, Saliſbury-houſe, Durham-houſe, built by Antony Becke Biſhop of Durham, and Patriarch of Jeruſalem, and thereby the onely ornament of this part the Britain-Burſe, built by the Earle of Salisbury, and ſo named by King Iames: Yorke-houſe in times paſt, Bath-houſe, and Northampton-houſe now begunne by Henry Earle of Northampton. Weſtminſter.

By this Suburbs Weſtminſter, which ſometime was more than a mile diſtant, is conjoyned ſo cloſe unto the Citty of London, that it ſeemeth a member thereof: whereas it is a Citty of it ſelfe, having their peculiar Magiſtrates and Priviledges. It was called in times paſt Thorney, of Thornes: but now Weſtminſter, of the Weſt ſituation, and the Monaſtery. Moſt renowned it is for that Church, the Hall of Iuſtice, and the Kings Palace.

This Church is famous eſpecially by reaſon of the Inauguration and Sepulture of the Kings of England. Sulcard writeth, that there ſtood ſometimes a Temple of Apollo in that place, and that in the dayes of Antoninus Pius Emperor of Rome it fell downe with an Earth-quake. Out of the remaines whereof, Sebert King of the Eaſt-Saxons erected another to Saint Peter, which beeing by the Danes overthrowne, Biſhoppe Dunſtane reedified, and granted it to ſome few Monkes. But afterwards,

King

A King Edward ſurnamed the Confeſſour with the tenth penny of all his revenewes built it new for to be his owne ſepulture, and a Monaſtery for Benedictine Monkes, endowing it with Livings and Lands lying diſperſed in diverſe parts of England. But liſten what an Hiſtorian ſaith who then lived: The devout King deſtined unto God that place, both for that it was nere unto the famous and wealthy Citty of London, and alſo had a pleaſant ſituation amongſt fruitfull fields, and greene grounds lying round about it: and withall the principall River running hard by, bringing in from all parts of the world great variety of Wares and Merchandize of all ſorts to the Citty adjoyning. But chiefly for the love of the chiefe Apoſtle, whom he reverenced with a ſpeciall and ſingular affection: He made choiſe to have a place there for his owne Sepulchre: and thereupon commanded, that of the tenths of
B all his Rents, the worke of a noble edifice ſhould bee gone in hand with, ſuch as might beſeeme the Prince of the Apoſtles: To the end, that he might procure the propitious favour of the Lord after he ſhould finiſh the courſe of this tranſitory Life, both in regard of his devout Piety, and alſo of his free oblation of Lands and Ornaments, wherewith hee purpoſed to endow and enrich the ſame. According therefore to the Kings commandement, the worke nobly beganne and happily proceeded forward: neither the charges already diſburſed or to bee diſburſed are weighed and regarded, ſo that it may bee preſented in the end unto God and Saint Peter worth their acceptation. The forme of that ancient building read if you pleaſe out of an old Manuſcript booke: The principall plot or ground-worke of the building ſupported with moſt lofty Arches is caſt round with a foure ſquare worke and ſemblable joynts. But
C the compaſſe of the whole, with a double Arch of ſtone on both ſides is encloſed with joynd-worke firmely knit and united together every way. Moreover the Croſſe of the Church which was to compaſſe the midde Quire of thoſe that chaunted unto the Lord, and with a two-fold ſupportance that it had on either ſide to uphold and beare the lofty toppe of the Tower in the midſt, ſimply riſeth at firſt with a low and ſtrong Arch: then mounteth it higher with many winding Staires artificially aſcending with a number of ſteps: But afterward with a ſingle wall it reacheth up to the roofe of Timber well and ſurely covered with Lead. But after an hundred and threeſcore yeeres King Henry the Third ſubverted this fabricke of King Edwards, and built from the very foundation a new Church of very faire workemanſhip, ſupported with ſundry rowes of Marble pillars, and the Rowfe covered
D over with ſheets of Lead: a peece of worke that coſt fifty yeeres labour in building, which Church the Abbots enlarged very much toward the Weſt end: and King Henry the Seventh for the buriall of himſelfe, and his children adjoyned thereto in the Eaſt end a Chappell of admirable artificiall elegancy (The wonder of the World) Leland calleth it: for a man would ſay that all the curious and exquiſite worke that can bee deviſed, is there compacted: wherein is to bee ſeene his owne moſt ſtately magnificall Monument all of ſolide and maſſie Copper. This Church when the Monkes were driven thence from time to time was altered to and fro with ſundry changes. Firſt of all it had a Deane and Prebendaries ſoone after one Biſhop and no more, namely T. Thurlebey, who having waſted the Church Patrimony ſurrendred it
E to the ſpoile of Courtiers, and ſhortly after were the Monks with their Abbot ſet in poſſeſſion againe by Queene Mary: and when they alſo within a while after were by authority of Parliament caſt out, the moſt gracious Prince Queene Elizabeth converted it into a Collegiat Church, or rather into a Seminary and nurſe-garden of the Church, appointed twelve Prebendaries there, and as many old Soldiers paſt ſervice for Almeſ-men, fourty Scholers, who in their due time are preferred to the Univerſities, and from thence ſent foorth into the Church, and Common-weale, &c. Over theſe ſhe placed D. Bill Deane, whoſe ſucceſſour was D. Gabriel Goodman, a right good man indeede and of ſingular integrity, an eſpeciall Patron of my ſtudies.

F Within this Church are entombed (that I may note them alſo according to their dignity and time wherein they died) Sebert the firſt of that name, and firſt Chriſtian King of the Eaſt-Saxons: Harold the baſtard ſon of Canutus the Dane, King of England, S. Edward King and Confeſſour, with his wife Edith: Maud, wife to King Henry the Firſt, the daughter of Malcolme King of Scots: King Henry the Third, and his ſon, King Edward the Firſt with Aeleonor his wife, daughter to Ferdinando the firſt King

A France in England, beſtowed within a ſmall guilt Urne over a Pyramid. Sir Charles Blunt Earle of Devonſhire, Lord Lieutenant Generall of Ireland. And (whom in no wiſe wee muſt forget) the Prince of Engliſh Poets Geoffry Chaucer: as alſo he that for pregnant wit and an excellent gift in Poetry of all Engliſh Poets came neereſt unto him, Edmund Spencer. Beſide many others of the Clergy, and Gentlemen of quality.

There was alſo another College or Free-chapell hard by conſiſting of a Deane, and twelve Chanons, dedicated to Saint Stephen: which King Edward the Third in his princely Magnificence repaired with curious workmanſhip and endowed with faire poſſeſſions, ſo as he may ſeeme to have built it new what time as he had with his victories overrun and ſubdued al France, recalling to minde (as we read the Charter of B the foundation) and pondering in a due weight of devout conſideration the exceeding benefits of Chriſt, whereby of his owne ſweet mercy and pity he preventeth us in all occaſions, delivering us, although without all deſert, from ſundry perils, and defending us glorioully with his powerfull right hand againſt the violent aſſaults of our adverſaries with victorious ſucceſſes: and in other tribulations and perplexities wherein wee have exceeding much beene encombred, by comforting us and by applying, and in-powering remedies upon us beyond all hope and expectation. There was adjoyning hereto a Palace, the ancient habitation of the Kings of England from the time of King Edward the Confeſſor: which in the Raigne of king Henry the Eighth, was burnt by caſuall fire to the ground. A very large, ſtately, and ſumptuous Palace this was, and in that age for building incomparable, with a vawmure,
C and bulwarks for defence: The remaines whereof, are the Chamber, wherein the King, the Nobles, with the Counſellers and Officers of State, doe aſſemble at the high Court of Parliament, and the next unto it, wherein anciently they were wont to beginne the Parliaments, knowne by the name of Saint Edwards painted chamber, becauſe the tradition holdeth that the ſaid king Edward therein dyed. Fitz Stephens. The higher houſe.

But how ſinfull an Act, how bloudy, how foule, how hainous, horrible, hideous, and odious both to God and man, certaine brute and ſavage beaſts in mens ſhape enterpriſed of late, by the device of that Arch Traitour Robert Catesby, with undermining, and placing a mighty deale of gunpowder under theſe Edifices againſt their Prince, their Country and all the States of the Kingdome, and that under an a-
D bominable pretence of Religion, my very heart quaketh to remember and mention: nay, amazed it is and aſtonied but to thinke onely into what inevitable darkneſſe, confuſion and wofull miſeries, they had ſuddenly in the twinckling of an eye plunged this moſt flouriſhing Realme and Common wealth: But that which an ancient Poet in a ſmaller matter wrote, we may in this with griefe of minde utter: The Treaſon of Robert Catesby.

Excidat illa dies ævo, nè poſtera credant
Secula, nos certè taceamus, & obruta multa
Nocte tegi propriæ patiamur crimina gentis.

That curſed day forgotten be: no future age beleeve
E That this was true: let us alſo at leaſt wiſe now that live
Conceale the ſame, and ſuffer ſuch Deſignes of our owne Nation
Hidden to be and buried quite in darkneſſe of oblivion.

Adjoyning unto this is the Whitehall, wherein at this day the Court of Requeſts is kept. Beneath this is that Hall, which of all other is the greateſt, and the very Prætorium or Hall of Juſtice for all England. In this are the Judiciall Courts, namely: The Kings Bench, the Common Pleas, and The Chancery: And in places neere thereabout, The Star-Chamber, the Exchequer, Court of Ward, and Court of the Dutchy of Lancaſter, &c. In which at certaine ſet times (wee call them Tearmes) yearely cauſes are heard
F and tryed: whereas before king Henry the Third his dayes, the Court of common Law and principall Juſtice was unſetled and alwaies followed the kings Court. But he in the Magna Charta made a law in theſe words: Let not the Common Pleas follow our Court, but bee holden in ſome certaine place. Which notwithſtanding ſome expound thus: That the Common Pleas from thenceforth bee handled in a Court of the owne by it ſelfe Weſtminſter hall. William Lambert.

ſelfe a part, and not in the Kings Bench, as before. This Judgement Hall which we now have, king Richard the Second built out of the ground, as appeareth by his Armes engraven in the ſtone-worke, and many arched beames (when he had plucked downe the former old Hall that king William Rufus in the ſame place had built before) and made it his owne habitation. For kings in thoſe daies ſat in Judgement place in their owne perſons: And they are indeed the ΑΙΚΑΣΠΟΛΟΙ, that is, Judges, Whoſe mouth (as that Royall Writer ſaith) ſhall not erre in Judgement. But the foreſaid Palace, after it was burnt downe in the yeare of our Lord 1512. lay deſolate, and king Henry the Eighth tranſlated ſhortly after the kings Seat from thence to an houſe not farre off, which belonged but a while before to Cardinall Wolſey, and is called White Hall. This houſe is a Princely thing: encloſed of the one ſide with a Parke that reacheth alſo to another houſe of the kings named S. James (where anciently was a Spittle for Maiden Lepres) built by king Henry the Eighth, on the other ſide with the Tamis. A certaine Poet termed the foreſaid Houſe according to the Engliſh name thereof Leucæum in Latine, as appeareth in theſe Verſes:

Prov. c. 16.

——Regale ſubintrant
Leucæum Reges (dederant memorabile quondam Atria, quæ niveo candebant marmore, nomen)
Quod Tamiſis prima eſt cui gloria paſcere cygnos
Ledæos, rauco pronus ſubterluit æſtu.

To Royall Palace Kings enter in, ſometime LEUCEUM hight:
(This famous name thoſe Courts it gave that ſhone with marble white.)
Hard under it with low-ſound ſtreame Tamis downe apace doth glide,
A River feeding Swannes, wherein he takes eſpeciall pride.

The Mues.

Hard by, neere unto the Mues ſo called, for that it ſerved to keepe Hawkes, and now is become a moſt faire Stable for the kings horſes, there remaineth a monument in memoriall of that moſt pious and kinde Queene Aeleonor, erected by the king Edward the Firſt her moſt dearely beloved husband: and certes the memory of her loving kindneſſe ſhall remaine worthy to be conſecrated to æternity. For ſhee, the daughter of Ferdinand the Third, king of Caſtile, being given in marriage to Edward the firſt king of England, accompanied him into the Holy Land: where, when as he was ſecretly foreſaid, and by a certaine Moore wounded with an envenomed ſword, and by all the remedies that Phyſitians could deviſe was not ſo much eaſed as afflicted: ſhee tooke her to a cure ſtrange I muſt needs ſay and never heard of before, howbeit full of love and kinde affection. For, her Husbands wounds infected with the poiſon, and which by reaſon of the malignity thereof could not bee cloſed and healed, ſhee day by day licked with her tongue, and ſucked out the venemous humour which to her was a moſt ſweet liquour. By the vigour and ſtrength whereof, or to ſay more truely, by vertue of a wives lovely fidelity ſhe ſo drew unto her all the ſubſtance of the poiſon, that the wounds being cloſed, and cicatrized, hee became perfectly healed, and ſhee caught no harme at all. What then can bee heard more rare, what more admirable than this womans faithfull love? That a wives tongue thus annointed, as I may ſo ſay, with faith and love to her Husband, ſhould from her well beloved draw thoſe poiſons, which by an approved Phyſitian could not bee drawne: and that which many and thoſe right exquiſite medicines effected not, the love onely and piety of a Wife performed. Thus much of Weſtminſter joyntly with London (although as I have ſaid, it is a City by it ſelfe, and hath a ſeverall juriſdiction from it) becauſe with continued buildings it ſo joyneth thereto, that it may ſeeme to be one and the ſame City.

The love of a wife.

Rodericus Toletanus lib. 1.

Holborne.

Moreover, at the Weſt end of the City, other Suburbs runne a great way in length, with goodly rowes of houſes orderly ranged, as namely Holborne or rather more truely Oldborne: wherein ſtood anciently the firſt houſe of the Templers onely in the place now called Southampton houſe. But now there ſtand certaine Innes, or Colleges of Students in the Common Law: and a City-habitation of the Biſhops of Ely, well beſeeming Biſhops to dwell in: for which they are beholden to John de Hotham Biſhop of Ely under king Edward the Third.

At the North ſide likewiſe there be Suburbs annexed to the City, wherein Iordan Briſet

A Briſet a man very wealthy and devout built an houſe for the Knights Hoſpitalers of Saint Iohn of Ieruſalem, which grew in time ſo great, that it reſembled a Palace: and had in it a very faire Church and a Towre-ſteeple raiſed to a great height with ſo fine workemanſhip, that while it ſtood, it was a ſingular beauty and ornament to the City. Theſe Knights Hoſpitalers at their firſt inſtitution, about the yeare 1124. and long after, were ſo lowly all the while they continued poore, that their Governour was ſtiled Servant to the poore Servitours of the hoſpitall of Ieruſalem, like as the Maſter of the Templari, who ſhortly after aroſe, was termed The humble Miniſter of the poore Knights of the Temple. This religious Order was inſtituted ſhortly after Geffery of Bollen had recovered Hieruſalem. The Brethren whereof ware a white Croſſe upon their upper blacke Garment, and by ſolemne Profeſſion were bound to ſerve Pilgrimes, and poore people in the Hoſpitall of Saint Iohn at Hieruſalem, and to ſecure the paſſages thither, they charitably buried the dead, they were continuall in prayer, mortified themſelves with watchings and faſtings, they were courteous and kinde to the poore whom they called their Maſters, and fed with white bread, while themſelves lived with browne; and carried themſelves with great auſterity. Whereby they purchaſed to themſelves the love and liking of all ſorts, and through the bounty of good Princes and private perſons admiring their piety, and proweſſe, they roſe from this low degree to ſo high an eſtate, and great riches, that after a ſort they wallowed in wealth. For they had about the yeare of our Lord 1240. within Chriſtendome nineteene thouſand Lordſhips or Manours: like as the Templars nine thouſand (the Revenewes and rents whereof in England fell afterwards alſo to theſe Hoſpitalers.) And this Eſtate of theirs growne to ſo great an height made way for them to as great honours, ſo as their Prior in England was reputed the * Prime Baron of the Land and able with fulneſſe and aboundance of all things to maintaine an honourable Port, untill that King Henry the Eighth adviſed by them, which reſpected their private profit, gat their lands and livings into his owne hands, like as hee did of the Monaſteries alſo. Albeit it was then declared that ſuch religious places being of moſt pious intent conſecrated to the Glory of God, might have beene according to the Canons of the Church, beſtowed in exhibition and Almes for Gods Miniſters, releefe of the poore, redemption of Captives, and repairing of Churches. Neere unto it, where now is to be ſeene a ſightly circuit of faire houſes, was the Charter-houſe, founded by Sir Walter Many of Henault, who with ſingular commendation ſerved under King Edward the Third in the French warres: and in that place heretofore was a moſt famous Cemitery, or buriall place in which in a plague time at London, were buried in the yeare 1349. more than 50000. perſons: a thing recorded to poſterity by an inſcription which continued there a long time engraven in Braſſe.

Saint Johns Hoſpitalers after called Knights of the Rhodes and now of Malt.

Templars.

* Lords of S. Johns.

Charter-houſe.

On this North-Weſt ſide likewiſe London hath other great Suburbs, and there ſtood in old time a * Watchtowre or military Forefenſe, whence the place was of an Arabicke word called Barbacan, and by the gift of King Edward the Third became the dwelling houſe of the Vffords; from whom by the Willoughbies it came to Sir Pengrine Bertey, Lord Willoughbey of Eresby, a man noble and generous, and one of Mars his broode.

Barbacan, Galeottus Martius.

Neither leſſe Suburbs runne out on the North-Eaſt and Eaſt. In the fields of which Suburbs, whiles I was firſt writing theſe matters, there were gotten out of the ground many urnes, funerall veſſels, little Images, and earthen pots, wherein were ſmall peeces of money coined by Claudius, Nero, Veſpaſian, &c. Glaſſe vials alſo and ſundry ſmall earthen veſſels, wherein ſome liquid ſubſtance remained which I would thinke to bee either of that ſacred oblation of Wine and Milke, which the ancient Romanes uſed when they burnt the dead, or elſe thoſe odoriferous liquours that Statius mentioneth.

——Phariique liquores
Arſuram lavere comam.

And liquid baulmes from Ægypt-land that came,
Did waſh his haire that ready was for flame.

This

This place the Romanes appointed to burne and bury dead bodies, who according to the law of the xij. Tables carried Coarſes out of their Cities, and enterred them by the high waies ſides, to put Paſſengers in minde that they are, as thoſe were, ſubject to mortality: Thus much of that part of the City which lieth to the Land.

London Bridge.

Now for that ſide where the River runneth, toward the South banke thereof, the Citizens made a Bridge alſo over the Water reaching to that large Burrough of Southwarke, whereof I have already ſpoken; Firſt, of wood in that place where before time they uſed for paſſage a ferry boat in ſtead of a Bridge. Afterwards, under the Raigne of King John they built a new Bridge with admirable workmanſhip of ſtone hewen out of the Quarry, upon 19. Arches, beſide the draw-bridge, and ſo furniſhed it on both ſides with paſſing faire houſes joyning one to another in manner of a Street, that for bigneſſe and beauty, it may worthily carry away the priſe from all the Bridges in Europe.

See of Southwarke, in Suthrey.

Saint Saviour.

In this Burgh of Southwarke, to ſpeake onely of things memorable, there ſtood ſometime a famous Abbay of Monkes, of Saint Benets Order, called Bermondſey, conſecrated in times paſt unto our Saviour, by Aldwin Childe Citizen of London: alſo a ſtately houſe built by Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolke, which having ſerved his turne but a ſmall time, was ſhortly after pulled downe.

Suffolkehouſe.

S. Thomas Hoſpitall.

Theſe are extant, Saint Thomas Hoſpitall, reedified or founded rather by the City of London, for the ſuſtenance of feeble and impotent perſons: The Priory of the bleſſed Virgin Mary, called Saint Mary Over Rhe becauſe it ſtandeth beyond the River of Tamis in regard of London, erected by William Pont del Arche a Norman for blacke Chanons. The Biſhops houſe of Wincheſter built by William Giffard Biſhop, for his Succeſſours, about the yeare of our Lord 1107. From which along the Tamis banke there runneth Weſtward a continued raunge of dwelling houſes: where within our fathers remembrance was the Bordello or Lupanarie, for ſo the Latines terme thoſe little roomes or ſecret chambers of harlots wherein they filthily proſtituted their bodies to ſale, becauſe they after the manner of ravening ſhe-wolves catch hold of ſilly wretched men and plucke them into their holes. But theſe were prohibited by King Henry the Eighth, at which time England was growne to exceſſive laſciviouſneſſe and riot; which in other Nations are continued for gaine, under a ſpecious ſhew of helping mans infirmity: Neither, of theſe Strumpets and brothel-houſes, doe I thinke that this place in our tongue tooke the name Stewes, but of thoſe Ponds or Stewes, which are heere to feed Pikes and Tenches fat, and to ſcowre them from the ſtrong and muddy fenniſh taſte. Heere have I ſeene Pikes panches opened with a knife to ſhew their fatneſſe: and preſently the wide gaſhes and wounds come together againe by the touch of Tenches, and with their glutinous ſlime perfectly healed up. Among theſe buildings there is a place in manner of a Theater for baiting of Beares and Buls with Dogges: and certaine kenels appointed ſeverally for Band-Dogges or Maſtives, which are of that ſtrength, and ſo ſure of bit, that three of them are able to take and hold downe a Beare, and foure a Lion: ſo that the Poet in old time reported truely of our Dogges, in theſe words:

Stewes.

Band-dogges or Maſtives.

Taurorum fracturi colla Britanni.

The Britiſh Dogges are able well,
To breake the neckes of Buls ſo fell.

Like as he that ſaid, they were more fierce than the Dogges of Arcadian kinde, which are thought to be engendred of Lions.

What time as the Bridge was thus made betweene London and this Burrough, the City was not onely enlarged; but alſo an excellent forme of Common wealth was therein ordained, and the Citizens reduced into certaine diſtinct Corporations and Companies. The whole City divided into ſix and twenty Wards: and the Counſell of the City conſiſted of as many ancient men, named of their age in our tongue Aldermen, as one would ſay, Senatours, who each one have the overſeeing and rule of his ſeverall Ward: and whereas in ancient time they had for their Head-Magiſtrate, a * Portreve, that is, a Governour of the City, King Richard the Firſt ordained two Bal- lives:

A lives: in ſtead of whom ſoone after King John granted them liberty, to chuſe by their voices yearely out of the twelve principall Companies a Major for their chiefe Magiſtrate: alſo two Sheriffes, whereof the one is called the Kings, the other the Cities Sheriffe. This forme of Common wealth being thus eſtabliſhed it is incredible to tell how much London grew, and groweth ſtill in publike and alſo private buildings, whiles all the Cities of England beſides decreaſe. For, to ſay nothing of that beautifull peece of worke, the Senate houſe named Guild Hall, built by Sir Thomas Knowles Major: Leaden Hall, a large and goodly building, erected by Simon Eire, to bee a common Garner in time of dearth to pull downe the price of Corne; the Merchants meeting place ſtanding upon Pillars, which the common people call the Burſe, and
B Queene Elizabeth with a ſolemne ceremony named The Royall Exchange, for the uſe of Merchants, and an ornament to the City, ſet up by Sir Thomas Greſham Citizen and knight; a magnificent worke verily, whether you reſpect the modull of the building, the reſort of Merchants from all Nations thither, or the ſtore of wares there. Which Sir Thomas Greſham, being withall an exceeding great lover of learning, conſecrated a moſt ſpacious houſe his owne habitation to the furtherance of learning, and inſtituted there Profeſſours of Divinity, Law, Phyſicke, Aſtronomy, Geometry, and Muſicke, with liberall ſalaries and ſtipends; to the end that London might be a place not onely furniſhed with all ſorts of Traffique, but alſo with the liberall Arts and Sciences. To paſſe over the Houſe of the Society of the Hanſe, com-
C monly called the Stilyard, as the Eaſterlings yard, and the waters conveighed by pipes underthe ground, into all parts of the City, and very goodly conducts or ciſternes caſtellated to receive the ſame: alſo the new conveyance of water deviſed by the skilfull travell of Peer Maurice a German; who by meanes of a forcer or wheele, with pipes placed at a certaine levell, brought water of late out of the Tamis into a great part of the City; To omit all theſe, I ſay, it is ſo adorned every where with Churches, that RELIGION and GODLINESSE ſeem to have made choiſe of their reſidence herein. For the Churches therein amount to the number of one hundred twenty and one, more verily than Rome it ſelfe (as great and holy as it is) can ſhew. Beſides Hoſpitals for diſeaſed perſons, it maintaineth alſo ſixe hundred Orphane children or D thereabout, in Chriſts Church Hoſpitall, and poore people upon contribution of Almes about 1240. &c. A long time it would aske to diſcourſe particularly of the good lawes and orders, of the laudable government, of the port and dignity of the Major and Aldermen, of their forward ſervice and loyalty to their Prince, of the Citizens courteſie, the faire building and coſtly furniture, the breed of excellent and choiſe wits, their gardens in the Suburbs full of dainty arbours, and banqueting roomes, ſtored alſo with ſtrange herbes from forraigne countries, of the multitude, ſtrength and furniture of their ſhips, the incredible ſtore of all ſorts of Merchandiſe (two hundred thouſand broad-clothes, beſide other Antwerp alone hath received from hence every yeare) and of the ſuperabundance of all things which belong to the furniture or neceſ-
E ſity of mans life. For, right truly wrote that Hadrianus Iunius in his Philippeis:

Thicke built with houſes London is, with riches ſtuffed full;
Proud, (if we may ſo ſay) of men that therein live and dwell,
Wherein moſt plenteous wiſe abound all things that tongue can tell.

F And Iul. Scaliger in his Poem of Cities.

Vrbs animis, numeróque potens, & robore gentis.

For peoples, courage, numbers, power, it is a City ſtrong.

And another Poet hath powred out theſe Verſes alſo, concerning London, if you deigne to reade them,

LONDINUM

LONDINUM gemino procurrit littore longè
Æmula maternæ tollens sua lumina Troiæ
Clementer surgente jugo dum tendit in ortum:
Urbs peramæna situ, cœlóque solóque beata.
Urbs pietate potens, numeroso cive superba,
Urbsque Britannorum quæ digna BRITANNIA dici.
Hæc nova doctrinis Lutetia, mercibus Ormus,
Altera Roma viris, Chrysæa secunda metallis.

Along both bankes out ſtretched farre the Citie LONDON lies Reſembling much her mother Troie, aloft ſhe lifts her eies, Whiles on a gentle riſing hill ſhe beareth toward Eaſt:
A City pleaſant for her ſite, in aire, and ſoile much bleſt.
Religious, and populous: and hence ſhe lookes on hie,
And well deſerves for to be cal'd the Britans Britanie.
For learning new Lutetia, Ormus for Traffique mich,
A ſecond Rome for valiant men, Chryſe for metals rich.

In this manner likewiſe verſified Henry of Huntingdon in praiſe of London, while King Stephen raigned, about foure hundered yeares ſince:

Ibis & in noſtros dives Londonia verſus,
Quæ nos immemores non ſinis eſſe tui.
Quando tuas arces, tua mœnia mente retracto,
Quæ vidi, videor cuncta videre mihi.
Fama loquax & nata loqui, moritura ſilendo,
Laudibus erubuit fingere falſa tuis.

Thou alſo ſhalt of Verſes ours Rich London have thy part,
For why? we cannot thee forget, ſo great is thy deſart.
When I thinke of thy ſtately Towres, thy faire and ſpacious Wall
Which I have ſeene, me thinkes therewith I ſee no * leſſe then all.
This pratling fame, that's borne to prate, and talk'd ſhe not would dye,
In all the praiſe that goes of thee hath baſh'd to tell one lye.

Another Poet in like manner pleaſantly played upon London in this ſort:

Hæc Urbs illa potens, cui tres tria dona miniſtrant
Bacchus, Apollo, Ceres, pocula, carmen, ador.
Hæc Urbs illa potens, quam Iuno, Minerva, Diana Mercibus, arce, feris, ditat, adornat, alit.

This is that City ſtrong to which three gifts are given by three,
By Bacchus, Ceres, and Phœbus, Wine, Wheat, and Poetree.
This place ſterne Pallas, Iuno Queene, Diana Hunters-feer
Adorn's, enricheth, and doth feed, with towres, with wares, with deer.

But in a more grave note and ſerious ſtile, a friend of mine and a praiſe worthy perſon, Maſter Iohn Ionſton, Profeſſor of Divinity in the Kings Univerſity of S. Andrews.

URBS AUGUSTA, cui cœlúmque, ſolúmque, ſalúmque
Cuique favent cunctis cuncta elementa bonis.
Mitius haud uſquàm cœlum eſt, uberrima Tellus

This City well AUGUSTA call'd, to which (a truth to ſay)
Aire, Land, Sea, and all Elements, ſhew favour every way.
The weather no where milder is, the ground moſt rich to ſee,
B Doth yeeld all fruits of fertile ſoile, that never ſpent will bee.
And Ocean, that with Tams ſtreame his flowing tyde doth blend Conveis to it commodities, all that the world can ſend.
The noble ſeat of Kings it is for port and roialty,
Of all the Realme the fence, the heart, the life, and lightſome ey.
The people ancient, valorous, expert in chivalry,
Enriched with all ſorts and meanes of Art and myſterie.
Take heedfull view of every thing, and then ſay thus in briefe,
This either is a world it ſelfe, or of the world the chiefe.

C But of theſe and ſuch like particulars Iohn Stowe Citizen of London, and a famous Chronicler hath diſcourſed more at large, and more exactly in that his Survey of London, which he lately publiſhed.

Now will I take my leave of my deere native Country, and bid London a diew, after I have given this onely note, that the Pole is here elevated fiftie one degrees, and foure and thirty ſcruples, and the Meridian diſtant from the fartheſt Weſt-poynt three and twenty degrees and five and twenty ſcruples. That the Fidicula* ſymbolizing in nature with Venus and Mercurie, is the Tropick ſtarre which glanceth upon the Horizon, but never ſetteth; and the Dragons head is reputed by Aſtronomers to be the Verticall ſtarre over head. * Orpheus harpe a ſtar.

D * From London, the Tamis watering Redcliff, ſo called of the Red-cliffe, a prety fine Towne and dwelling place of Sailers, as he fetcheth almoſt a round compaſſe with a great winding reach, taketh into him the River Lea at the eaſt bound of this Countie, when it hath collected his divided ſtreame and cheriſhed fruitfull Mariſh-medowes. Upon which there ſtandeth nothing in this ſide worth the ſpeaking of. For, neither Ædelmton hath ought to ſhew, but the name derived of Nobility; nor Waltham, unleſſe it be the Croſſe erected there for the funerall pompe of Queene Æleonor Wife to King Edward the Firſt, whereof alſo it tooke name. Onely Enfeld a houſe of the Kings is here to be ſeene, built by Sir Thomas Lovel knight (of the order of the Garter and one of King Henry the Seventh his Privy Counſell) and Du- E rance neighbour thereunto a houſe of the Wrothes of ancient name in this Countie. To Enfeld-houſe, Enfeld-chace is hard adjoyning, a place much renowned for hunting: the poſſeſſion in times paſt of the Magnavils Earles of Eſſex, afterwards of the Bohuns who ſucceeded them: and now it belongeth to the Duchie of Lancaſter, ſince the time that Henry the Fourth King of England eſpouſed one of the daughters and coheires of Humfrey Bohun Earle of Hereford and Eſſex of that ſurname. And there are yet to be ſeene, in the middeſt well nere of this Chaſe, the rubbiſh and ruines of an old houſe, which the vulgar ſort ſaith was the dwelling place of the Magnavils Earles of Eſſex. As for the title of Midleſex, the Kings of England have vouchſafed it to none, neither Duke, Marquis, Earle, or Baron. * Or beyond Radcliffe. Iſle of Dogs. Edmonton. Waltham Croſſe. Enfield Chaſe.

ESSEX.

THE other part of the Trinobantes, toward the East called in the English Saxon tongue Eaſt-ſeaxa, and Eaſt-ſex-rcipe, in the Norman language Exſſeſa, of the ſituation toward the Eaſt, and the Saxons which inhabited it, and commonly Eſſex, is a Country large in compaſſe, fruitfull, full of Woods, plentifull of Saffron, and very wealthy: encircled, as it were, on the one ſide with the maine Sea, on the other with fiſhfull Rivers, which alſo doe affoord their peculiar commodities in great abundance. On the North ſide, the River Stour divideth it from Suffolke, on the Eaſt the Ocean windeth it ſelfe into it: On the South part, the Tamis being now growne great ſecludeth it from Kent like as in the Weſt part the little River Ley from Middleſex, and Stort or Stour the leſſe which runneth into it, from Hertfordſhire. In deſcribing of this Country, according to my methode begunne, firſt I will ſpeake of the memorable places by Ley and the Tamis, afterwards of thoſe that bee further within, and upon the Sea-coaſt.

By Ley, in the Engliſh Saxon Tongue Lyzean, there ſtretcheth out a great way in length and breadth a Foreſt ſerving for game, ſtored very full with Deere, that for their bigneſſe, and fatneſſe withall, have the name above all other. In times paſt called it was by way of excellency Foreſta de Eſſex, now Waltham Foreſt, of the towne Waltham, in the Saxons ſpeech Wealo-ham, that is, A wilde or wooddy habitation. This ſtandeth upon Ley, where, by dividing his Chanell hee maketh divers Eights or Iſlands, and is not of any great Antiquity to make boaſt of. For, when the Kingdome of the Saxons beganne to decay, one Tovie, a man of great wealth and authority, as wee reade in the private Hiſtory of the place, The Kings Staller, that is, Standerd bearer, for the abundance of wilde beaſts there, firſt founded it, and planted threeſcore and ſixe indwellers therein. After his death Athelſtane his ſonne quickly made a hand of all his goods and great eſtate: and King Edward the Confeſſour gave this Towne to Harold Earle Goodwins ſonne: and ſtreightwayes an Abbay was erected there, the worke and Tombe both of the ſaid Harold. For, he being crept up by the errour of men and his owne ambition to regall Dignity built this Abbay in honour of an Holy Croſſe found farre Weſtward, and brought hither, as they write, by miracle. Heerein made he his prayers and vowes for victory when hee marched againſt Normans, and being ſoone after ſlaine by them, was by his mother, who had with moſt ſuppliant ſuite craved and obtained at the Conquerours hands his Corps, here entombed. But now it hath a Baron, namely Sir Edward Deny, called lately unto that honour by King Iames his Writ. Over this Towne upon the riſing of an Hill ſtandeth Copthall, and yeeldeth a great way off, a faire ſight to feed mens eyes. This was the habitation in times paſt of Fitz-Aucher, and lately of Sir Thomas Heneage Knight, who made it a very goodly and beautifull houſe. Neere unto this River alſo was ſeated, no doubt, DUROLITUM, a Towne of antique memory, which the Emperour Antonine maketh mention of, but in what place preciſely, I am not able to ſhew. For, the ancient places of this County, (I tell you once for all before hand) lye hidden ſo enwrapped in obſcurity, that I, who elſewhere could ſee ſomewhat, heerein, am heere more than dim-ſighted. But if I may give my gueſſe, I would thinke that to have beene DUROLITUM, which retaining ſtill ſome marke of the old name, is called at this day Leyton: that is, The Towne upon Ley, like as Durolitum in the Britiſh Tongue ſignifieth, The water Ley. A ſmall Village it is in theſe daies, inhabited in ſcattering wiſe, five miles from London, for which five, through the careleſſe negligence of tranſcribers is crept into Antonine XV.

That there was a common paſſage heere in times paſt over the River, a place nigh unto it called Ouldfourd ſeemeth to proove, in which when Queene Mawd wife to King Henry the Firſt hardly eſcaped danger of drowning, ſhee gave order that a little beneath, at Stretford, there ſhould bee a Bridge made over the water. There, the River brancheth into three ſeverall ſtreames, and moſt pleaſantly watereth on every ſide the greene medowes: wherein I ſaw the remaines of a little Monaſterie which William Montfichet, a Lord of great name of the Normans race built, in the yeere of our Lord 1140. and forthwith Ley gathering it ſelfe againe into one chanell mildely diſchargeth it ſelfe in the Tamis, whereupon the place is called Leymouth.

The Tamis which is mightily by this time encreaſed, doth violently carry away with him the ſtreames of many waters, hath a ſight (to ſpeake onely of what is worth remembrance) of Berking, which Bede nameth Berecing, a Nunnery founded by Erkenwald Biſhop of London, where Roding a little River entreth into the Tamis. This running hard by many Villages imparteth his name unto them, as Heigh Roding, Eithorp Roding, Leaden Roding, &c. of the which, Leofwin a Nobleman gave one or two in times paſt, to the Church of Ely, for to expiate and make ſatisfaction for the wicked act hee had committed in murdering his owne mother: then, by Angre, where upon a very high Hill are the tokens of a Caſtle built by Richard Lucy Lord Chiefe Juſtice of England in the Raigne of Henry the Second: of which Family, a daughter and one of the heires, King Iohn gave in marriage to Richard Rivers, who dwelt hard by at Stranford Rivers.

* So it paſſeth by Lambourn Manour, which is held by ſervice of the Wardſtaffe, viz. to carry a load of ſtrawe in a Carte with ſixe horſes, two ropes, two men in harneſſe to watch the ſaid Wardſtaffe when it is brought to the Towne of Aibridge, &c. and then by Wanſted Parke, where the late Earle of Leiceſter built much for his pleaſure. From the mouth of this Roding, this Tamis haſteneth through a ground lying very flat and low, and in moſt places otherwhiles overflowne, (whereby are occaſioned ſtrong and unwholſome vapours exceeding hurtfull to the health of the neighbour Inhabitants) to Tilbury: neere unto which there bee certaine holes in the riſing of a chalky Hill, ſunke into the ground tenne fathome deepe, the mouth whereof is but narrow, made of ſtone cunningly wrought, but within they are large and ſpacious, in this forme, which hee that went downe into them deſcribed unto mee after this manner.

Of

A Of which I have nothing elſe to ſay, but what I have delivered already. As for Tilbury, (Bede nameth it Tilaburgh) it conſiſteth of ſome few cottages by the Tamis ſide, yet was it in ancient time the ſeate of Biſhop Chad, when about the yeare of our Salvation 630. hee ingrafted the Eaſt-Saxons by Baptiſme into the Church of Chriſt. Afterwards, this River paſſing by places lying flat and unwholeſome, with a winding returne of his Water, ſevereth the Iſland CONVENNON, which alſo is called COÛNOS, (whereof Ptolomee maketh mention) from the firme land. This hath not yet wholly foregone the old name, but is called Canvey. It lyeth againſt the Coaſt of Eſſex, from Leegh to Hole Haven, five miles in length: ſome part whereof appertaineth to the Collegiat Church of Weſtminſter. But ſo B low, that oftentimes it is quite overflowne, all ſave hillocks caſt up, upon which the Sheepe have a place of ſafe refuge. For, it keepeth about foure hundred Sheepe, whoſe fleſh is of a moſt ſweet and delicate taſte, which I have ſeene young lads taking womens function, with ſtooles faſtened to their buttockes to milke, yea and to make Cheeſes of Ewes milke in thoſe dairy ſheddes of theirs, that they call there, Wiches.

There adjoyne to this Iſland along in order, firſt Beamfleot, fortified with deepe and wide Trenches (as ſaith Florilegus) and with a Caſtle, by Haſting the Dane, which King Ælfred wonne from them: Then Hadleigh, ſometime the Caſtle of Hubert de Burgo, afterwards of Thomas of Woodſtocke Duke of Gloceſter, now defaced with ru- C ines: and in the laſt place Leegh, a proper fine little Towne and very full of ſtout and adventerous Sailers: with Pritlewel faſt by where Sweno de Eſſex built long ſince a Cell for Monkes. And here the land ſhooteth forward to make a Promontory, which they call Black-taile Point, and Shobery Neſſe of Shobery a Village ſituate upon it; which ſometime, was a City an Havenet named Sceobirig, For, in old Annales of the Engliſh-Saxons wee reade thus, The Danes being driven from Beamfleot, goe to a City ſeated in Eaſt-ſex, called in the Engliſh Tongue Sceobirig, and there built themſelves a ſure and ſtrong Fort. Heere by reaſon that the bankes on both ſides ſhrinke backe, the Tamis at a huge and wide mouth rowleth into the ſea. This doth Ptolomee terme Æſtuarium TAMESÆ, and corruptly in ſome other Copies TEMESÆ, and D we commonly, the Tamis Mouth.

More inward is Rochford placed, that hath given name to this Hundered: Now, it belongeth to the Barons Rich, but in old time it had Lords of ancient Nobility ſirnamed thereof: whoſe inheritance came at length to Butler Earle of Ormond and Wiltſhire, and from them to Sir Thomas Bullen, whom King Henry the Eighth created Vicount Rochford, and afterward Earle of Wiltſhire, out of whoſe Progeny ſprung that moſt gracious Queene ELIZABETH, and the Barons of Hunſdon.

Rochford.

Lord Rochford.

Heere I have heard much ſpeech of a Lawleſſe Court (as they called it) holden in a ſtrange manner about Michaelmaſſe, in the firſt peepe of the day upon the firſt cocke crowing, in a ſilent ſort; yet with ſhrowde fines eftſoones redoubled, if not E anſwered, which ſervile attendance, they ſay was impoſed upon certaine Tenants there-about for conſpiring there at ſuch unſeaſonable time, to raiſe a commotion. But I leave this knowing neither the originall, nor the certaine forme thereof. Onely I heard certaine obſcure barbarous rhymes of it. Curia de Domino Rege tenetur ſine lege. Ante ortum ſolis, lucet, niſi polus, &c. not worth remembring.

* Lawleſſe Court.

Leaving the Tamis Banke, and going farther within the countrey, yea from Weſt to Eaſt, theſe places of name above the reſt ſtanding thus in order ſhew themſelves.

*

Havering an ancient retiring place of the Kings, ſo called of a Ring, which in that place a Pilgrime delivered as ſent from S. J. Baptiſt (for ſo they write) unto K. Edward the F Confeſſor: Horn-Church, named in times paſt Cornutum Monaſterium, that is, the horned Minſter, for there ſhoot out at the Eaſt end of the Church certaine points of leade faſhioned like hornes: Rumford, the glory whereof dependeth of a ſwine mercat; and Giddy-hall, an houſe adjoyning to it, which belonged to that Sir Thomas Cooke Major of London, whoſe great riches hoorded up together wrought him his greateſt danger.

Havering.

Rumford.

See the Annalles.

For, being judicially arraigned, (innocent man as he was) of high treaſon, and through the incorrupt equity of Judge Markham acquit in a moſt dangerous time, yet was he put to a very grievous fine, and ſtript in manner of all that he was worth: Brentwood called by the Normans Bois arſe, in the ſame ſenſe, and by that name King Stephen granted a Mercat and a Faire there, to the Abbat of S. Oſith; and many yeares after Iſabell Counteſſe of Bedford daughter to King Edward the Third built a Chappell to the memory of S. Thomas of Canterbury, for the eaſe of the Inhabitants: Engerſtone a Towne of note for nothing elſe but the Mercat and Innes for Travailers.

Brent-wood.

Heere am I at a ſtand, and am halfe in a doubt whether I ſhould now ſlip as an abortive fruite that conjecture, which my minde hath travailed with. Conſidering there hath beene in this Tract the City CÆSAROMAGUS, and the ſame doubtleſſe in the Romanes time of eſpeciall note, and importance; for, the very name, if there were nothing elſe, may evict ſo much, ſignifying as it doth Cæſars City, as DRUSOMAGUS the City of Druſus, which alſo ſhould ſeeme to have beene built in the honour of Cæſar Auguſtus. For, Suetonius writeth thus, Kings, that were in amity and league, founded every one in his owne Kingdome Cities named Cæſareæ in honour of Auguſtus. What if I ſhould ſay that CÆSAROMAGUS did ſtand neere unto Brentwood, would not a learned Reader laugh at me, as one Soothſayer doth when he ſpieth another? Certes, no ground I have nor reaſon to ſtrengthen this my conjecture from the diſtance thereof, ſeeing the numbers of the miles in Antonine be moſt corruptly put downe, which nevertheleſſe agree well enough with the diſtance from COLONIA and CANONIUM. Neither can I helpe my ſelfe with any proofe by the ſituation of it upon the Roman high-way, which in this encloſed country is no where to be ſeene. Neither verily there remaineth heere ſo much as a ſhadow or any twinkling ſhew of the name CÆSAROMAGUS, unleſſe it be (and that is but very ſclender) in the name of an Hundred, which of old time was called Ceuſford, and now Cheaſford Hundred. Surely, as in ſome ancient Cities the names are a little altered, and in others cleane changed: ſo there be againe, wherein one ſyllable or twaine at moſt bee remaining: thus CÆSARAUGUSTA in Spaine is now altered to be Saragoſa: CÆSAROMAGUS in France, hath loſt the name cleane and is called Beuvois, and CÆSAREA in Normandy, now Cherburg, hath but one ſyllable left of it. But what meane I thus to trifle, and to dwell in this point? If in this quarter hereby, there bee not CÆSAROMAGUS, let others ſeeke after it for me: It paſſeth my wit, I aſſure you, to finde it out, although I have diligently laid for to meet with it with net, and toile both of eares and eies.

Cæſaromagus called in the Itinerary table Baromagus.

Beneath Brentwood I ſaw South-Okindon: where dwelt the Bruins a Family as famous as any one in this Tract: out of the two heires female whereof, being many times married to ſundry husbands, Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolke, the Tirels, Berners, Harleſtones, Heveninghams and others deſcended. And of that houſe there be males yet remaining in South-hampton-ſhire. Alſo, Thorndon, where Sir John Petre Knight raiſed a goodly faire houſe, who now was by our Soveraigne King James created Baron Petre of Writtle. That Thorndon was in times paſt the dwelling place of a worſhipfull Family of Fitzlewis: the laſt of which name if we may beleeve the common report, by occaſion that the houſe happened to be ſet on fire in the time of his wedding feaſt, was pittiouſly himſelfe therein burnt to death. Burghſted, and more ſhort Burſted, that is, the place of a Burgh, which name our forefathers uſed to give unto many places that were of greater antiquity. This I once ſuppoſed to have been CÆSAROMAGUS: and what ever it was in old time, it is at this day but a good country Towne neere unto Byliricay, a Mercat towne of very good reſort. Likewiſe Aſhdowne, ſometimes Aſſandun, that is, as Marian interpreteth it, the Mount of Aſſes, where long ſince a bloudy battaile was fought, in which King Edmund ſirnamed Ironſide had at the beginning a good hand of the Danes and put them to rout, but ſtreight waies the fortune of the field turning about, he was ſo defeited that he loſt a great number of the Engliſh Nobility. In memoriall of which battaile we reade that King Canutus the Dane built a Church afterward in that place, what time as upon

A upon remorſe and repentance for the bloud that he had ſhed, hee erected Chappels in what part ſoever he had fought any field, and ſhed Chriſtian bloud.

Not farre from theſe, is Ralegh, a prety proper towne: and it ſeemeth to be Raganeia in Domeſday booke, wherein is mention made of a Caſtle that Suenus heere built, in which alſo we read thus: There is one Parke and ſixe Arpennes of Vineyard, and it yeeldeth twenty Modij of wine if it take well. Which I note the rather, both for the French word Arpenn and alſo for the wine made in this Iſle. This Suenus was a man of great name and of noble birth, the ſonne of Robert, ſonne of Wiwarc, but father to Robert of Eſſex: whoſe ſon was that Sir Robert de Eſſex, who in right of inheritance was the Kings Standard bearer, and who for that in a light skirmiſh againſt the Welſh, hee B had not onely caſt off his courage, but alſo caſt away his Standard, being chalenged for treaſon, vanquiſhed in duell, or combat, and thereof thruſt into a Cloyſtre, forfeited a goodly patrimony, and livelod, which was confiſcate to King Henry the Second, and helped to fill his Coffers. As for the Barony, it lay dead from that time a great while in the Kings hands, untill Sir Hubert de Burgh obtained it of King John.

Arpen. Wine. Radulphus de Dicero. The family of the Eſſex.

Above this the ſhores retiring backe by little and little admit two creekes of the Ocean entring within them: the one, the neighbour inhabitants call Crouch, the other Blackwater (which in old time was named Pant.) In the ſaid Crouch, by reaſon of the waters diviſion, there lie ſcattered foure Iſlands carrying a pleaſant greene hew, but by occaſion of inundations, growne to be moriſh and fenny, among which theſe C two bee of greateſt name, Wallot and Foulneſſe: that is, The Promontory of Fowles, which hath a Church alſo in it: and when the ſea is at the loweſt ebbe, a man may ride over to it. Betweene theſe Creekes lieth Dengy Hundred, in ancient times Dauncing, paſſing plentifull in graſſe, and rich in Cattaile, but Sheepe eſpecially where all their doing is in making of Cheeſe: and there ſhall ye have men take the womens office in hand and milke Ewes: whence thoſe huge thicke Cheeſes are made that are vented and ſould not onely into all parts of England, but into forraigne nations alſo, for the ruſticall people, labourers, and handicraftes men to fill their bellies, and feed upon. The chiefe Towne heereof at this day is Dengy; ſo called as the Inhabitants are perſwaded, of the Danes, who gave name unto the whole Hundred: Neere unto which is Tillingham, given by Ethelbert the firſt Chriſtian King of the Engliſh-Saxons, unto the Church of Saint Paul in London: and higher up to the North ſhore, flouriſhed ſometimes a City of ancient Record, which our forefathers called Ithanceſtre. For, Ralph Niger writeth thus out of S. Bede. Biſhop Chad baptized the Eaſt-Saxons neere to Maldon in the City of Ithanceſtre, that ſtood upon the banke of the River Pant, which runneth hard by Maldon, in Dengy Province; but now is that City drowned in the River Pant. To point out the place preciſely I am not able, but I nothing doubt that the River called Froſhwell at this day, was heeretofore named Pant: ſeeing that one of the Springs thereof is called Pantſwell, and the Monkes of Coggeſhall, ſo termed it. Doubtleſſe, this Ithanceſter was ſituate upon the utmoſt Promontory of E this Dengy Hundred, where in theſe daies ſtandeth Saint Peters upon the wall. For, along this ſhore much a doe have the inhabitants to defend their grounds with forced bankes or walls againſt the violence of the Ocean, ready to inruſh upon them. And I my ſelfe am partly of this minde, that this Ithanceſter was that OTHONA where a Band of the Fortenſes with their Captaine, in the declination of the Romane Empire, kept their ſtation or Guard under the Comes or Lieutenant of the Saxon-ſhore, againſt the depredations of the Saxon Rovers: For the altering of OTHONA to ITHANA, is no hard ſtraining: and the ſituation thereof upon a Creeke into which many Rivers are diſcharged, was for this purpoſe very fit and commodious, and yet heere remaineth a huge ruine of a thicke Wall, whereby many Romane F Coines have beene found.

It ſeemeth not amiſſe to ſet downe, how King Edward the Confeſſour graunted by a briefe Charter the keeping of this Hundred to Ranulph Peperking*, which I will willingly heere annex, to the end that wee, who ſift every pricke and accent of the law, may ſee the upright ſimplicity and plaine dealing of that age. And thus goeth the tenour of it, as it was taken forth of the Kings Records in the Exchequer, but by often exemplifying and copying it out, ſome words are mollified and made more familiar. A

In the Records Saint Hilary terme E.2.17. in the keeping of the Treaſurer and Chamberlaine of the Exchequer.

Iche Edward Koning
Have given of my Forreſt the keeping.
Of the Hundred of Chelmer and Dancing,
To Randolph Peperking and to his kindling:
With heorte and hinde, doe and bocke,
Hare and Foxe, Cat and Brocke,
Wild Fowell with his flocke, B
Partrich, Feſant hen, and Feſant cocke:
With green and wilde ſtob and ſtocke.
To kepen and to yemen by all her might,
Both by day and eke by night
And Hounds for to hold
Good and ſwift and bolde:
Four Greahounds and ſix racches,
For Hare and Foxe, and wild Cattes.
And therefore ich made him my booke:
Witneſſe the Biſhop Wolſton C
And booke ylered many on,
And Swein of Eſſex our Brother
And teken him many other,
And our Stiward Howelin
That by ſought me for him.

This was, the plaine dealing, trueth, and ſimplicity of that age, which uſed to make all their aſſurances whatſoever, in a few lines, and with a few gilt Croſſes. For, before the comming in of the Normans, as wee read in Ingulphus, writings Obligatory were made firme with golden Croſſes and other ſmall ſignes or markes: but the Normans began the making of ſuch Bils and Obligations, with a Print or Seale in wax, ſet to with every ones ſpeciall Signet under the expreſſe entituling of three or foure Witneſſes. Before time many houſes and land thereto paſſed by grant and bargaine without ſcript, Charter, or Deed onely with the Landlords ſword or helmet, with his horne or cup. Yea and many Tenements were demiſed with a ſpurre, or horſe-cury-combe, with a bowe, and ſome with an arrow. D

Seales or ſignets firſt taken up among Engliſhmen.

In the Creeke of Blackwater, which as I ſaid, cloſeth the North ſide of this Hundred, and is ſtored with thoſe dainty Oyſters, which wee call Walfleet Oyſters, their run two Rivers that water a great part of the Shire, Chelmer and Froſtwell. The River Chelmer flowing out of the inner part of the country which is woody, runneth downe firſt by Thaxted a little Mercate Towne ſeated very pleaſantly upon an high riſing E hill; alſo by Tiltey, where Maurice Fitz-Gilbert founded in times paſt a ſmall Abbey, unto Eſtanues ad Turrim, now Eſton, which noble Gentleman firnamed De Lovaine inhabited, as deſcended from Godfrey of Lovaine brother to Henry the Sixth of that name Duke of Brabant, who being ſent hither to keepe the Honor of Eye, his poſterity flouriſhed among the Peeres of this Realme to the time of King Edward the Third, when the heire generall was married into the houſe of Bourchier.

Thence it glideth downe to Dunmow, of old time called Dunmawg, and in the Tax booke of England Dunmaw, a Towne pleaſantly ſituate upon an hill with a prety gentle fall. Where, one Juga founded a Priory in the yeare 1111. But William Bainard, of whom Juga held (thus we finde it written in the private hiſtory of this Church) F the Village of little Dunmow, by felony loſt his Barony, and King Henry the Firſt gave it to Robert the ſonne of Richard, ſonne to Giſlebert Earle of Clare, and to his heires, with the honour of Bainards Caſtle in London: which Robert at that time was King Henries Sewar. Theſe be the very words of the Author: neither doe I thinke it lawfull for me to alter

A or reforme them otherwiſe than they are, although there be in them ſome Anachroniſmes, that is, a putting or miſtaking of one time for another, a thing that we meet with otherwhiles in the beſt Hiſtoriographers. For, there had not beene, as then any Earle of Clare in the family of Clare.

Now let us for a while digreſſe and goe aſide a little on either hand from the River. Not farre from hence is Plaiſy ſeated, ſo called in French of Pleaſing, in times paſt, named Eſtre, the habitation both in the laſt yeeres of the Engliſh Saxons, and alſo afterwards, of the great Conſtables of England, as witneſſeth Ely booke. At this towne the firſt William Mandevill Earle of Eſſex beganne a Caſtle, and two Princes of great authority, Thomas of Woodſtocke Duke of Gloceſter and Earle of Eſſex who founded heere a College, and Iohn Holland Earle of Huntingdon brother to King Richard
B the Second by the mothers ſide, deprived of loſt honorable title of Duke of Exceſter, when they could not keepe a meane betweene froward ſtubberneſſe and ſervile obſequiouſneſſe, found thence their ſubverſion. For Thomas, upon his raſh and headſtrong contumacy was on a ſudden violently carryed from hence to Calice and there ſmothered: and Iohn, for a ſeditious conſpiracy was beheaded in this place by King Henry the Fourth, that hee might ſeeme to have beene juſtly puniſhed by way of ſatisfaction for the ſaid Thomas of Woodſtocke, of whoſe death hee was thought to bee the principall practiſer, and procurer. From thence paſſeth Chelmer downe not farre from Leez, a little Abbay of old time founded by the Gernons, which at this
C day is the chiefe ſeat of the Barons Rich, who acknowledge themſelves for this dignity beholden to Richard Rich a moſt wiſe and judicious perſon; Lord Chancellor of England under King Edward the Sixth, who in the firſt yeere of his raigne created him Baron Rich. A little beneath, ſtandeth Hatfield Peverell, ſo denominated of Randulph Peverell the owner thereof, who had to wife a Lady of incomparable beauty, in thoſe daies, the daughter of Ingelricke a man of great nobility among the Engliſh-Saxons: This Lady founded heere a College, which now is in manner quite plucked downe, and in a window of the Church, whereof there remaineth ſtill a ſmall part, lyeth entombed. She bare unto her husband William Peverell Caſtellane of Dover, Sir Payne Peverell Lord of Brun in the County of Cambridge: and unto King William the D Conquerour whoſe Paramore ſhee was, William Peverell Lord of Nottingham. But now returne we to Chelmer, which by this time ſpeedeth it ſelfe to Chelmerford commonly Chensford (where, by the diſtance of the place from CAMALODUNUM, it may ſeeme that old CANONIUM ſometimes ſtood). This is a good bigge Towne ſituate in the heart of the Shire betweene two Rivers, who as it were, agreed heere to joyne both their ſtreames together: to wit Chelmer from the Eaſt, and another from the South, the name whereof if it be Can, as ſome would have it, we have no reaſon to doubt, that this was CANONIUM.

Canonium.

Famous it was within the remembrance of our fathers in regard of a ſmall religious houſe built by Malcome King of Scots, now of note onely for the Aſſiſes (for ſo
E they call thoſe Courts of Iuſtice wherein twice a yeere the cauſes and controverſies of the whole County are debated before the Judges.) It beganne to flouriſh, when Maurice Biſhop of London, unto whom it belonged, built the Bridges heere in the Raigne of Henry the Firſt, and turned London way thither, which lay before through Writtle, a Towne right well knowne for the largeneſſe of the Pariſh: which, King Henry the Third granted unto Robert Brus Lord of Anandale in Scotland: (whoſe wife was one of the heires of Iohn firnamed Scot, the laſt Earle of Cheſter) for that hee would not have the Earldome of Cheſter to bee divided among the diſtaves: and King Edward the Third, when as the poſterity of the Bruſes forſooke their allegeance, beſtowed it upon Humfrey Bohun Earle of Hereford and of Eſſex.
F But now of late, when King Iames at his entrance to the Kingdome beſtowed Baronies bountifully upon ſelect perſons, hee created Sir Iohn Petre a right reſpective Knight, Baron Petre of Writtle. Whoſe father Sir William Petre a man of approoved wiſdome and exquiſite learning, memorable not ſo much for thoſe moſt honourable places and offices of State which hee bare, (as who was of the Privie Counſell to King Henry the Eighth, King Edward the Sixth, Queene Mary, and Queene Elizabeth, and ſent oftentimes in Embaſſage to forreigne Princes) as for that being bred and brought up in good learning, he well deſerved of learning in the Univerſity of Oxford, and was both pitifull and bounteous to his poore neighbours about him, and at Egerſtone, where he lyeth buryed. A Froſh-well the River, more truely called Pant, and neere to his mouth, Black-water iſſuing out of a ſmall ſpring about Radwinter that belonged to the Barons of Cobham, after it hath gone a long courſe and ſeene nothing but Bocking a fat Parſonage, it commeth to Cogeſhall, a Mercate Towne, well knowne in times paſt for a Priory of Cluniacke Monkes built by King Stephen, and the habitation of ancient Knights thence ſirnamed De Cogeſhall, from whoſe heire generall marryed into the old family of Tirell, there branched farre a faire propagation of the Tirells in this ſhire and elſewhere. Then goeth on this water by Eaſterford, ſome call it East-Sturford; and leaving ſome mile of Whitham a faire through-faire and built by King Edward the elder, in the yeere 914. which alſo afterward was of the Honour of Euſtace Earle of Bollen; meeteth at length with Chelmer. Which now paſſing on whole in one chanell not farre from Danbury mounted upon an high Hill, the habitation for a time of the family of the Darcies, runneth hard by Woodham-walters, the ancient ſeate of the Lords Fitz-Walters: who being nobly deſcended were of a moſt ancient race, derived from Robert the younger ſonne of Richard ſonne to Earle Giſlebert: but in the age more lately foregoing, tranſlated by a daughter into the ſtocke of the Ratcliffes, who being advanced to the Earledome of Suſſex dwell now a little from hence in New Hall, a ſtately and ſumptuous houſe. This New Hall appertained ſometime to the Butlers Earles of Ormond, and then hereditarily to Sir Thomas Bollen Earle of Wiltſhire, of whom King Henry the Eighth getting it by way of Exchange, enlarged it to his exceeding great charges, and called it by a new name Beaulieu, which for all that was never currant among the people. After this, Chelmer with other waters running with him, being divided by a River-Iſland, caſting off that name, and now being called of ſome Blacke-water and of others Pant, ſaluteth that ancient Colony of the Romanes CAMALODUNUM, which many hundred yeeres ſince adorned this ſhore. Ptolomee tearmeth it CAMUDOLANUM, Antonine CAMULODUNUM and CAMOLUDUNUM: But, Pliny, Dio, and an old marble ſtone, induce us to beleeve that CAMALODUNUM is the right name. In the ſeeking out of this City, good God, how dim-ſighted have ſome been? whereas it bewraied it ſelfe by the very name and ſituation; and ſhewed it ſelfe cleerely to them that are halfe blinde: A number have ſearched for it in the Weſt part of this Iſle, as that good man, who thought himſelfe to carry, as one would ſay, the Sunne of Antiquity in his owne hand: others in the furtheſt part of Scotland: others wholly addicted in opinion to Leland affirmed it to bee Colcheſter: when as (the name ſcarce any whit maimed) it is called at this day, in ſtead of CAMALODUNUM, Maldon, in the Saxon Tongue Mealdune, and Mealdune, the greater part of the word remaining yet entire and in uſe. Neither hath the expreſſe remaine of the name onely perſwaded me to this, but alſo the diſtance ſet downe in Pliny from Mona, and the very ſituation in the ancient Itinerary Table doe affoord a moſt evident proofe thereof. That this name was impoſed upon CAMALODUNUM, of the God CAMULUS, I hardly dare imagine. Howbeit that Mars was worſhipped under this name Camulus, both an old ſtone at Rome in the houſe of Collotians, and Altars diſcovered with this Inſcription CAMULO DEO SANCTO ET FORTISSIMO, that is, TO CAMULUS THE HOLY AND MOST MIGHTY GOD, doe joyntly proove. And in an antique Coine of Cunobellinus, whoſe royall Palace this was, (as I have already ſaid) I have ſeene the portraict ſtamped of an head having an helmet on it, alſo with a ſpeare, which may ſeeme to be that of Mars, with theſe letters, CAMV. But ſeeing this peece of money is not now ready at hand to ſhew, I exhibite here unto you other expreſſe portraicts of Cunobellinus his peeces, which may be thought to have reference to this Camalodunum.

This

This Cunobelin governed this East part of the Isle in the time of Tiberius the Emperour, and seemeth to have had three sonnes, Adminius, Togodumnus, and Caratacus. Adminius by his father banished, was entertained by Caius Caligula the Emperour what time as he made his ridiculous expedition into Batavia, that from thence he might blow, and breath out the terrour of his owne person over into Britaine. As for Togodumnus, Aulus Plautius in a set battaile defeited and slew him, and over Caratacus, whom, as I said, he discomfited and put to flight, hee rode ovant in pety triumph. This is that Plautius, who at the perswasion of C. Berisus, the Britaine a banished man (for there never want quarels one or other of Warre) was the first after Iulius Cæsar that attempted Britaine under Claudius: whom Claudius himselfe, having shipped over the Legions, followed in person with the whole power of the Empire, and with Elephants (the bones of which beasts being found, have deceived very many) hee passed over the Tamis and put to flight the Britans, who upon the banke received and encountred him as he came toward them; and wonne with ease this Camalodunum the Kings seat. For which exploit after hee had named his sonne BRITANNICUS, and beene himselfe oftentimes saluted Imperator, within sixe moneths after he set first forth in his voyage, returned to Rome. But heereof have I have written before more at large, neither list I to iterate the same in this place. Claudius in Britannia.

When Camalodunum was thus brought under the Romanes subjection, Claudius planted a Colony there with a strong Band of old tried Souldiers, and in memoriall heereof ordained peeces of money to bee stamped with this Inscription: COL. CAMALODUN. Out of which it is gathered, that this happened in the XII. yeere of his Empire, and in the yeere 52. after the Birth of Christ. And in regard of those old experienced souldiers of the fourteenth Legion called Gemina Martia Victrix, whom Tacitus tearmeth the Subduers of Britaine, brought thither and placed in it, it was named COLONIA VICTRICENSIS, and the Inhabitants Cives Romani, that is, Citizens of Rome, in an old Inscription, which I heere present to you.

Servius. A Colony (if it may be materiall to know ſo much) is A Company of men that be all brought into one certaine place, built with houſes to their hands, which they are to have and hold by a certaine right. For the moſt part, old ſouldiers that had ſerved long, were brought to ſuch a place, both that themſelves might be provided for, and maintained, and alſo be ready in all extremity to helpe againſt Rebels, and enforme withall the Provincials in their duties by law required. Theſe Colonies alſo were of great eſtimation, as being pety reſemblances and images, as it were, of the City of Rome. Moreover they had their peculiar Magiſtrates both ſuperior and inferior: Of which becauſe others have written ſufficiently, I neede not to ſtand either upon them, or ſuch like points. In this firſt Colony that the Romanes planted in Britaine, there was a Temple built unto * Divus Claudius, Tacitus tearmeth it, The Altar of eternall dominion, Whereof Seneca maketh mention in his Play, after this manner. A ſmall matter it is, ſaith hee, and not ſufficient, that Claudius hath a Temple in Britaine which the Barbarous Nation adoreth, and prayeth unto, as to a God. There were Prieſts alſo elected in honour of him, by name Sodales Auguſtales, which under a ſhew of Religion laviſhly conſumed the Britans goods. But after ten yeeres, fortune turned her wheele and downe went this Colony. For, when thoſe old ſouldiers brought into theſe territories which they had won, exerciſed extreame cruelty upon theſe ſilly people, the burning broiles of Warre which before were quenched brake out into flames, with greater flaſhes. The Britans under the leading of Bunduica, who alſo is called Boudicia, by maine force ſacked and ſet on fire this Colony, lying unfortified and without all fence, and within two daies wonne the ſaid Temple whereinto the ſouldiers had thronged themſelves. The Ninth Legion comming to aide, they put to flight, and in one word ſlew of Roman Citizens and aſſociates together threeſcore and tenne thouſand. This ſlaughter was foretold by many Prodigies. The Image of Victory in this City was turned backeward and fallen downe: In their Senate houſe ſtrange noiſes were heard: The Theater refounded with howlings and yellings: Houſes were ſeene under the water of Tamis, and the Arme of the ſea beneath it overflowed the bankes as red as blood to ſee to, which now (for what cauſe I know not) wee call Blacke water, like as Ptolomee termed it IDUMANUM æſtuarium, under which is couched a ſignification of Blackneſſe: for, Idu, in the Britiſh tongue ſoundeth as much as Blacke. Yet, out of the very embers, the Romans raiſed it againe: For, Antonine the Emperour made mention of it many yeeres after. Howbeit in the Engliſh Saxons government it is ſcarce mentioned: Onely Marianus hath written, that Edward the ſonne of Ælfred repaired Maldun when it was ſore ſhaken by the furious rage of the Danes, and then fortified it with a Caſtle. William the Norman, Conqueror of England, as we reade in his * Commentary, had in this Towne 180 houſes in the tenure and occupation of Burgeſſes, and 18. Manſions waſted. But at this day, for the number of the Inhabitants, and the bigneſſe, it is worthily counted one of the principall Townes in all Eſſex, and in Records named, The Burgh of Maldon.

*Deified. The Altar and Temple of Claudius.

Dio ſaith, foureſcore thouſand.

Idumanus.

*Domeſday.

It is a Haven commodious enough, and for the bigneſſe very well inhabited, being but one eſpeciall ſtreet deſcending much about a mile in length. Upon the ridge of an hill anſwerable to the termination of Dunum which ſignified an hilly, and high ſituation, wherein I ſaw nothing memorable, unleſſe I ſhould mention two ſilly Churches, a deſolate place of White Friers, and a ſmall pile of Bricke built not long ſince by R. Darcy, which name hath beene reſpective heereabout.

Hence paſſing downe over the brackiſh water divided into two ſtreamlets, by Highbridge, I ſought for an ancient place which Antonine the Emperour placed ſixe miles from Camalodunum, in the way toward Suffolke, and called it AD ANSAM.

The bounds of Colonies. This I have thought to have beene ſome Bound belonging to the Colony of Camalodunum, which reſembled the faſhion of Anſa, that is, The handle or eare of a pot. For, I had read in Siculus Flaccus, The Territories lying to Colonies were limited with divers and ſundry markes: In the limits there were ſet up for bound-markes heere one thing, and there another: in one place little Images, in another long earthen Veſſels: heere you ſhould have little ſword blades, three ſquare ſtones or Lozenges painted, and elſewhere according

A cording to Vitalis and Arcadius, they were mere ſtones like flagons and ſmall wine pipes: why might not therefore a ſtone faſhioned like the handle of a pot bee ſet for a bound? Seeing that Antony according to his wonted manner called it Ad Anſam, and not Anſæ? But how religiouſly and with what ceremoniall complements, theſe bound-markes were in old time ſet, I will by way of digreſſion ſet downe heere out of the ſame Siculus Flaccus. When they were to place their bound markes, the very ſtones themſelves they did ſet upon the firme ground, hard by thoſe places wherein they ment to pitch them faſt, in pittes or holes digged for the purpoſe, they annointed them and with vailes and garlands bedecked them. This done, in thoſe pits wherein they were to put them, after ſacrifice made, and an unſpotted beaſt killed, upon burning firebrands covered over in the grave, they
B dropped in bloud, and thereupon they threw Frankincenſe and corne, Hony combes alſo and wine with other things, as the manner is to ſacrifice unto gods of bounds and limits, they threw after the reſt into the ſaid pit. Thus when all theſe Viands were conſumed with fire, they pitched the foreſaid bound markes upon the hot aſhes thereof, and ſo with carefull diligence faſtened them ſtrongly, and rammed them round about with fragments of ſtones, that they might ſtand the ſurer. But in what place ſoever this Ad Anſam was, I betake my ſelfe againe to my former opinion for the ſignification of the word: namely, that Ad Anſam was either a bound marke, or onely, a reſting place or ſome Inne by the high way ſide under ſuch a ſigne: and that I collect by the diſtance to have beene neere unto Cogeſhall. Neither were they any things elſe but bound markes or Innes, that in the Romane

And therefore to ſearch more curiouſly into theſe matters, were nothing elſe but to hunt after the windes. Yet I will heere impart what I incidently happened upon in a private note, while I was inquiſitive heereabout for Ad Anſam. In a place called Weſtfield three quarters of a mile diſtant from Cogeſhall and belonging to the Abbay there, was found by touching of a plough a great braſen Pot. The Ploughmen ſuppoſing it to have beene hid treaſure, ſent for the Abbot of Cogeſhall to ſee the taking up of it; and hee going
D thither met with Sir Clement Harleſton, and deſired him alſo to accompany him thither. The mouth of the Pot was cloſed with a white ſubſtance like paſte or clay, as hard as burned bricke, when that by force was removed, there was found within it another Pot but that was of earth; that being opened there was found in it a leſſer Pot of earth of the quantity of a Gallon covered with a matter like Velvet, and faſtened at the mouth with a ſilke-lace. In it they found ſome whole bones and many peeces of ſmall bones wrapped up in fine ſilke of freſh colour, which the Abbot tooke for the Reliques of ſome Saints, and layed up in his Veſtuary. But this by way of digreſſion, leaving it to your conſideration.

From Malden the Shores drawne backe intertaine the Sea in a moſt large and pleaſant Bay, which yeeldeth exceeding great ſtore of thoſe Oyſters of the beſt
E kinde, which we call Walfleet. And (that our Coaſts ſhould not be defrauded of their due fame and glory) I take theſe to bee thoſe very Shores, which, as Pliny ſaith, ſerved the Romanes Kitchins: ſeeing that Mutianus giveth unto Britiſh Oyſters the third place after thoſe of Cizicum, in theſe very words of his: The Oyſters of Cizicum be greater than thoſe that come from Lucrinum, and ſweeter than they of Britaine.

But neither at that time, nor afterwards, when Sergius Orata brought thoſe Lucrine Oyſters into ſuch name and great requeſt, did the Britiſh Shores, as hee ſaith, Serve Rome with Oyſters. So that hee may ſeeme to have given the chiefe price unto Lib.9.cap.54. Britiſh Oyſters. Neither thinke I were thoſe Oyſters other than theſe which Auſonius called Mira, that is, Wonderfull, in this Verſe to Paulinus.

F

The Britiſh Tides ſometimes lay bare,
Thoſe Oyſters huge, that wonderous are.

But, of theſe Oyſters and of their pits or ſtewes in this Coaſt I will give thoſe leave to write, who being deinty toothed are judicious Clerkes in Kitchenry. A

Into this Creeke, beſide other Rivers, Coln ſheddeth himſelfe, which growing to an head out of divers Springs in the North part of this County, paſſeth by the Towne of Hedningham or Hengham, commonly called Heningham, where was a goodly faire proper Caſtle in times paſt, and the ancient habitation of the Earles of Oxford who procured a Mercat thereunto. Over againſt which, upon the other ſide of the River ſtandeth Sibble Heningham, the place, as I have heard ſay, wherein was

The Italians reſound his worthy Acts with full mouth, and Paulus Iovius in his Elogia commendeth him. But for my part it may ſuffice to adde unto the reſt

Now whether this tooke name of a Colony hither brought, or of the river Coln, Apollo himſelfe had neede to tell us: I would rather derive it from the river, ſeeing, as I doe, that many little Townes ſituate upon it, are named Coln. The infinite deale of ancient Coine daily gotten out of the ground there doth moſt plainly ſhew that this flouriſhed in the Roman time in happy eſtate. Yet have I light of no peeces more ancient than of Gallienus. For, the moſt were ſuch as had upon them the Inſcriptions of the Tetrici, and the Victorini, of Poſthumus, C. Caraufius, Conſtantine, and the Emperours that followed him. The Inhabitants affirme, that

A Flavia Iulia Helena the mother of Constantine the Great was borne and bred there, being the daughter of King Coel: and in memory of the Crosse which shee found, they give for their Armes a Crosse enragled betweene foure Crownes: whence it is, that our Necham as touching her, and this place came out with these Verses, although Apollo was not greatly his friend therein, Helen Great Constantines mother.

Effulsit sydus vitæ, Colcestria lumen

Sydus erat Constantinus, decus imperiale,
Servijt huic flexo poplite Roma potens.

B From out of thee, O Cholchester, there shone a Starre of life,
The raies whereof to Climats seven gave great and glorious light,
This Starre was Constantine the Great, that noble Emperour, Whom Rome in all obedience lay prostrate to adore.

Verily shee was a woman of life most holy, and of invincible resolution and constancy in propagation of Christian Religion: Whereupon in ancient Inscriptions she is every where named PIISSIMA, and VENERABILIS AUGUSTA, that is, Most DEVOUT, and VENERABLE EMPRESSE. Beneath this, where C the River Colne runneth into the Sea, standeth to be seene Saint Osithes, a little Towne, whose ancient name, which was Chic, is growne out of use by reason of Osith the Virgin of royall Parentage, who being wholy devoted to the Service of God, and stabbed there to death by the Danish Pirates, was of our Ancestours honoured for a Saint: and in her memoriall Richard Bishop of London about the yeare 1120. built a religious house, of Regular Chanons. But now it is the chiefe seate of the right honourable Lords Darcy, called De Chich, whom King Edward the Sixth advanced to the honour of Barons when hee created Sir Thomas Darcy his Counsellour, Vice-chamberlaine, and Captaine of the Guard, Lord Darcy of Chich. S. Osith. Chic. Barons Darcy of Chich.

From hence the Shore shooting out, buncheth foorth as farre as to the Promon- D tory Nesse, which in the English-Saxon tongue is called Eadulphes-ness. What hath beene found in this place, have heere out of the words and credit of Ralphe the Monke of Coggeshall, who wrote 350. yeares agoe. In King Richards time, on the Sea-shore, at a Village called Eadulphnesse, were found two teeth of a certaine Giant, of such a huge bignesse, that two hundred such teeth as men have now a daies might bee cut out of them. These saw I at Coggeshall (quoth hee) and not without wondering. And such another Giantlike thing (I wot not what) as this, was in the beginning of Queene Elizabeths Raigne digged up by R. Candish a Gentleman, neere unto this place. Neither doe I deny, but there have beene men, that for their huge bodies, and firme strength were wonderous to behold: whom God, as S. Austin saith, would have E to live upon the earth, thereby to teach us, that neither beauty of body, nor talnesse of stature, are to bee counted simply good things, seeing they bee common as well to Infidels as to the godly. Yet may we very well thinke, that which Suetonius hath written, namely that the huge limmes of monstrous Sea-creatures elsewhere, and in this Kingdome also, were commonly said and taken to have beene Giants bones. Nesse. Giants. Giants bones.

From this Promontory, the shore bendeth backe by little and little to the mouth of Stoure, a place memorable for the battaile at Sea there fought betweene the English and Danes in the yeare 884. where now lyeth Harewich a most safe Road, whence it hath the name: For, Here-pic in the English-Saxon tongue, betokeneth a Station, or a creeke where an Army encamped. The Towne is not great, but well peopled, forti- F fied by Art and Nature, and made more sensible by Queene Elizabeth. The salt water so creeketh about it, that it almost insulateth it, but thereby maketh the Springs so brackish, that there is a defect of fresh water, which they fetch some good way off. Harewich. *

This is the Stoure, that running betweene Essex and Suffolke serveth as a bound to them both, and on this side watereth nothing else but rich and fruitfull fields.

But not farre from the head thereof ſtandeth Bumſtead, which the Family of Helion held by Barony, from whom the Wentworths of Gosfield are deſcended. A

Barklow. And what way this Country looketh toward Cambridge-ſhire Barklow ſheweth it ſelfe, well knowne now, by reaſon of foure little hils or Burries caſt up by mans hand: ſuch as in old time were wont to be raiſed (ſo ſome would have it) as Tombes for Soldiers ſlaine, whoſe Reliques were not eaſie to be found. But when a fifth and ſixth of them were not long ſince digged downe, three troughes of ſtone were found, and in them broken bones of men, as I was informed. The country people ſay that they were reared after a field there fought againſt the Danes. For, Dane-wort which with bloud-red berries, commeth up heere plenteouſly, they ſtill call by no other name than Daneſ-bloud, of the number of Danes that were there ſlaine, verily beleeving that it bloometh from their bloud. Walden. A little below ſtandeth upon a hill Walden of Saffron, called Saffron Walden, among the fields looking merily with moſt lovely Saffron. A very good Mercat towne incorporated by King Edward the Sixth with a Treaſurer, two Chamberlaines and the Commonalty. Famous in times paſt it was for a Caſtle of the Magnavilles (which now is almoſt vaniſhed out of ſight) and an Abbay adjoyning, founded in a place very commodious in the yeare 1136. wherein the Magnavilles founders thereof were buryed. Geffrey de Magnavilla was the firſt that gave light and life (as it were) to this place. For Mawde the Empreſſe in theſe words (out of her very Patent I copy them) gave unto him Newport (a good bigge Towne, this is hard by). For ſo much as hee was wont to pay that day whereon (as her words are) my father King Henry was alive and dead: and to remove the Mercat from Newport into his Caſtle of Walden, with all the cuſtomes that before time in better manner appertained to that Mercat, to wit in Toll, paſſage and other cuſtomes, and that the waies of Newport neere unto the water banke bee directed ſtreight according to the old cuſtome into Walden, upon the ground forfeited unto me: and that the Mercat of Walden be kept upon Sunday and Thurſday: and that a Faire bee holden at Walden to begin on Whitſunday even, and to laſt all the Whitſon weeke. (And from that time, by occaſion of this Mercat, for a great while it was called Cheping Walden). Alſo as it is in the Booke of Walden Abbay, hee the ſaid Geffrey appointed Walden to bee the principall place and ſeat of his honour and Earledome for him and his Succeſſours. The place where hee built the Abbay had plenty of waters, which riſing there continually doe runne and never faile. Late it is ere the Sunne riſeth and ſhineth there, and with the ſooneſt he doth ſet and carry away his light, for that the hilles on both ſides ſtand againſt it. C D

Commonly called Mandevilles.

That place now they call Audley End, of Sir Thomas Audley Lord Chancellour of England, who changed the Abbay into his owne dwelling houſe. This Thomas, created by King Henry the Eighth Baron Audley of Walden, left one ſole daughter and heire Margaret, ſecond wife to Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolke, of whom hee begat Lord Thomas, Lord William, Lady Elizabeth, and Lady Margaret. The ſaid Thomas employed in ſundry Sea-ſervices with commendation Queene Elizabeth ſummoned by Writ unto the High Court of Parliament, among other Barons of the Realme, by the name of Lord Howard of Walden. And King James of late girded him with the ſword of the Earldome of Suffolke, and made him his Chamberlaine: who in this place hath begunne a magnificent Building. Neere to another houſe of his at Cheſterford, there was a Towne of farre greater antiquity, hard by Icaldun, in the very border of the Shire, which now of the old Burgh, the ruſticall people uſe to call Burrow Banke, where remaine the footings onely of a Towne lying in manner dead, and the manifeſt tract of the very walles. Yet will I not ſay, that it was VILLA FAUSTINI, which Antonine the Emperour placeth in this Tract: and albeit E F

Ingrata haud læti ſpatia detinet campi,
Sed rure vero, barbaróque lætatur:

It takes not up large ground that yeelds no gaine,
But Country like, is homely rude and plaine:

Yet dare not I once dreame that this is that Villa Fauſtini, which in theſe and other Verſes is by that pleaſant and conceited Poet Martiall, depaincted in

A in his Epigrams. The fieldes heere on every ſide (as I ſaid) ſmell ſweetly, and ſmile pleaſantly with Saffron, a commodity brought into England in the time of King Edward the Third. This in the moneth of July every third yeere, when the heads thereof have been plucked up and after twenty daies ſpitted or ſet againe under mould, about the end of September they put foorth a whitiſh blew flower, out of the middle whereof there hang three redde fillets of Saffron (we call them Chives) which are gathered very early in the morning before the Sunne riſing, and being plucked out of the flower, are dried at a ſoft fire. And ſo great increaſe commeth heereof that out of every acre of ground there are made foureſcore or an hundred pounds weight of Saffron, while it is moiſt: which being dried yeeld ſome twenty pound B in weight. And that, which a man would marvell more at, the ground which three yeeres together hath borne Saffron, will beare aboundance of Barley eighteene yeeres together without any dunging or manuring, and then againe beare Saffron as before if the inhabitants there have not miſinformed me, or I miſ-conceived them. Saffron.

More into the South is Clavering ſeated, which King Henry the Second gave unto Sir Robert Fits-Roger (from whom the family of Evers are iſſued.) The poſterity of this Sir Roger, after they had a long time taken their name of their fathers forename, or Chriſten-name according to that ancient cuſtome, as Iohn Fitz-Robert, Robert Fitz-Iohn, &c. afterwards, by the commandement of King Edward the Firſt, C they aſſumed from hence the name of Clavering. But of theſe I am to ſpeake in Northumberland. Stanſted Montfichet heere alſo putteth up the head: which I will not paſſe over in ſilence, conſidering it hath been the Baronie or habitation in times paſt of the family De Monte Fixo, commonly Mont-fitchet, who bare for their Armes three Cheverus Or, in a ſhield Gueles, and were reputed men of very great nobility. But five of them flouriſhed in right line: and at the laſt three ſiſters were ſeized of the inheritance, Margaret wife of Hugh De Boleber, Aveline wedded to William De Fortibus Earle of Aumarle, and Philip wife to Hugh Playz. The poſterity male of this Hugh flouriſhed within the remembrance of our great Grandfathers, and determined in a daughter married to Sir Iohn Howard Knight; from whoſe daughter by Sir George D Vere, deſcended the Barons Latimer, and the Wingefeldes. Barons of Clavering. See in Northumberland. Barons Montfichet. The Montfichet Coat of Armes. Playz.

And a little below, is Haſlingbury to bee ſeene, the reſidence of the Barons Morley: of whom I ſhall ſpeake more in Norfolke. And cloſe to this, ſtandeth an ancient Fort or Military fenſe thereof named Walbery: and more Eaſt-ward Barrington Hall, where dwelleth that right ancient Family of the Barringtons, which in the Raigne of King Stephen the Barons of Montfichet enriched with faire poſſeſſions, and more ennobled their houſe in our fathers remembrance by matching with one of the daughters and coheires of Sir Henry Pole, Lord Montacute, ſonne of Margaret Counteſſe of Saliſbury, deſcended of the Bloud Royall. Haſlingbury. Barington.

Neither is Hatfield Regis, commonly called of a broad ſpread Oke, Hatfield Brad-Oake to be omitted, where Robert Vere Earle of Oxford built a Priory, and there lieth E entombed croſſe-legged with a French inſcription, wherein he is noted to be firſt of that name Robert, and third Earle of Oxford. Hatefield Brad-oke.

After the comming of the Normans, Maude the Empreſſe, Lady of the Engliſh (for ſo ſhee ſtiled herſelfe) created Geffrey De Magnavilla, uſually called Mandevil, ſon to William by Margaret daughter and heire of Endo the Steward or Shewar, the firſt Earle of Eſſex, that ſhee might ſo by her benefits oblige unto her a man both mighty and martiall. Who in thoſe troubleſome times under King Stephen deſpoiled of his eſtate made an end of his owne turbulent life with the ſword. And hee verily for his wicked deeds (as I finde in an old Writer) juſtly incurred the worlds cenſure and F ſentence of excommunication: in which while hee ſtood, hee was deadly wounded in the head at a little Towne called Burwell. When he lay at the point of death ready to give his laſt gaſpe there came by chance certaine Knights Templars, who laid upon him the habit of their religious Profeſſion ſigned with a red Croſſe, and afterwards when hee was full dead, taking him up with them, encloſed him within a Coffin of Lead, and hunge him upon a tree in the Earles of Eſſex. Regiſter of Walden.

Orchard of Old Temple at London. For in a reverent awe of the Church they durſt not bury him, becauſe he dyed excommunicated. After him ſucceeded Geffry his ſonne, who was reſtored by Henry the Second to his fathers honours and Eſtate for him, and his heires; but he having no children left them to his brother William, who by his wife was alſo Earle of Albemarle, and dyed likewiſe in his greateſt glory iſſueleſſe. Some yeares after K. John promoted Geffrey Fitz-Petre, Juſticer of England, a wiſe and grave Perſonage unto this honour in conſideration of a great maſſe of money and Title by his wife Beatrice the eldeſt daughter of William de Say, who was the ſiſters ſonne of that great Geffrey de Magnavill, the firſt Earle of Eſſex. This Fitz-Petre, a man (as an old Authour writeth) Paſsing well monied had formerly dealt with the Biſhop of Ely the Kings chiefe Juſticer, for a great peece of money preſently paid and by intreaty beſide; and then claimed, and demanded the Earledome in his wives right, as being the daughter of William Say eldeſt brother to Geffrey Say. Who gave him full Seiſin thereof, (againſt Geffrey Say) and required the money that hee promiſed: which within a ſhort time hee received of him every penny well and truely paid, for to bee brought into the Kings coffers. Thus being admitted, and confirmed by the Kings Letters Patent, hee held and poſſeſſed it taking Homage of all that held of him in Knights ſervice. And ſo was girt with the ſword of the Earledome of Eſſex by King John at the ſolemnity of his Coronation. This Geffrey Fitz-Petre was advanced to the high eſtate of Juſticer of England by King Richard the Firſt, when hee removed Hubert Archbiſhop of Canterbury from that Office by the Popes peremptory command: for that Biſhops ought not to intermedle in ſecular affaires. This Place the ſaid Geffrey Fitz-Petre executed with great commendation preſerving by his wiſedome the Realme from that confuſion which it after fell into by King Johns unadviſed carriage. His two Sonnes Geffrey and William, aſſumed unto them the ſirname of Magnavill or Mandevill, and enjoyed this honour ſucceſſively. As for Geffrey, hee by his wife was Earle of Gloceſter alſo, and being a young man loſt his life at a Turneament. William tooke part with Lewis of France againſt King John, and departed out of this World without iſſue. Theſe being thus dead childeleſſe, their ſiſters ſonne Humfrey de Bohun Earle of Hereford and high Conſtable of England, ſucceeded in their roome.

See the Earles of Hereford.

Of this mans Poſterity male, there ſucceeded many yeares together one after another, Earles of Hereford and of Eſſex: of whom I will ſpeake among the Earles of Hereford, ſeeing that they wrote themſelves Earles of Hereford and of Eſſex. Æleonor the eldeſt daughter of the laſt of theſe Bohuns, being given in marriage together with the Title of Eſſex unto Thomas of Woodſtocke Duke of Gloceſter, bare unto him a daughter named Anne, who had for her firſt Husband Edmund Earle of Stafford, from whom came the Dukes of Buckingham: and for her ſecond Sir William Bourchier, unto whom King Henry the Fifth gave the Earledome of Ew in Normandie. This William of her body begat Henry Bourchier, whom King Edward the fourth inveſted in the Dignity of the Earledome of Eſſex, in regard hee had marryed his Aunt, and was deſcended from Thomas of Woodſtocke. Hee had to ſucceede him another Henry, his Grand-childe, who being caſt out of the ſadle by a flinging horſe, loſt his life, leaving behinde him one onely daughter Anne, who being then little reſpected, King Henry the Eighth preſently and all at once made Thomas Cromwell, (whom hee had uſed as his Inſtrument to ſuppreſſe and aboliſh the Popes authority) Earle of Eſſex, Lord Great Chamberlaine of England and Knight of the Order of Saint George: whom before for his reaching politique head, hee had made Baron Cromwell of Oksham, The Kings Vicar generall in Spirituall matters, and Lord of the Privie Seale: and all theſe honours were heaped upon him within the compaſſe of five yeares.

Eliz. ſiſter to Rich. Duke of Yorke.

But in the fifth moneth after hee was Earle, hee loſt his head and ſo had the enterlude of his life a bloudy Cataſtrophe, as moſt of theſe have, who are buſie managers of the greateſt affaires. And then the ſame King thought Sir William Parr, upon whom hee had beſtowed in marriage Anne the onely daughter and heire of the foreſaid Henry Bourchier, worthy alſo to be entituled Earle of Eſſex.

But

A But at the laſt, after Parr was dead without iſſue, Walter D'Eureux Vicount Hereford, whoſe great Grandmother was Cecilie Bourgchier Siſter to Henrie Bourgchier whom I named right now, through the gracious favour of Queene Elizabeth, received this dignitie of the Earledome of Eſſex, and left it to his Sonne Robert. Who being adorned with ſingular gifts of nature, and ſupported beſides with the ſpeciall favour of his moſt gracious Prince, grew ſo faſt unto ſuch honour, that all England conceived good hope hee would have fully equalled, yea and farre ſurpaſſed the greateſt vertues and praiſes of all his Progenitours. But (alas) whiles he was carried away with popularity, and made haſt to out goe his hopes, hee caſt himſelfe headlong into deſtruction: as many more have done, who deſpiſing that which
B might come by patience with ſecuritie, have made choiſe to haſten thereto before time with their finall overthrow.

But our moſt gracious Soveraigne King Iames of his Royall benignitie hath reſtored his ſonne Robert to his bloud, and honours by Parliament authority.

ICENI.

ICENI.

THe Region next unto the Trinobantes which afterwards was called East-England, and containeth Suffolke, Norfolke, and Cambridge-shire with Huntingdon-shire, was inhabited in times past by the ICENI, called elsewhere amisse TIGENI: and in Ptolomee more corruptly SIMENI: whom also I have thought heeretofore to have been in Cæsar by a confused name, termed CENIMAGNI: and so to thinke induced I was, partly by that most neere affinity betweene these names ICENI, and CENI-MAGNI, and in part by the consent of Cæsar and Tacitus together. For Cæsar writeth that the Cenimagni yeelded themselves unto the Romans: which Tacitus recordeth that the Iceni likewise did, in these words: They willingly joyned in amity with us. But (that which maketh most to the cleering of this poynt) in a Manuscript old booke for CENIMAGNI, we finde written with the word divided in twaine, CENI AGNI. For which if I might not be thought somewhat too bould a Criticke, I would reade instead thereof ICENI, REGNI. Neither verily can you finde the Cenimagni elsewhere in all Britain, if they be a diverse people from the Iceni and Regni. But of this name ICENI, there remaine in this tract very many footings, if I may so tearme them, as Ikensworth, Ikenthorpe, Ikbortow, Iken, Ikning, Ichlingham, Eike, &c. Yea and that high street-way, which went from hence, the Historians of the former age every where doe name Ichenild-Street, as one would say, the Icenes street.

Ichenild-street.

What should be the reason of this name (so love me Truth) I dare not guesse, unlesse one would fetch it from the Wedge-like-forme of the country, and say, it lieth Wedgwise upon the Sea. For the Britans in their language call a Wedge Iken, and for the same cause a place in Wales, by the Lake or Meere Lhintegid, is of that forme named Lhan-yken, as Welsh-Britans enformed me: and in the very same sense a little country in Spaine (as Strabo writeth) is cleped SPHEN, that is, The wedge, and yet the same seemeth not to resemble a wedge so neere, as this of ours doth.

Sphen.

A mighty nation this was, as saith Tacitus, and after they had betaken themselves to the protection of the Romans, never shaken nor troubled unto Claudius his time. For then, when as Ostorius the Romane Lieutenant raised fortifications upon the rivers and disarmed the Britans, they assembled their forces and made head against him: but after that the Romanes had broken through the rampier, wherewith they had fenced themselves, they were vanquished

But when the English Saxons now had established their *Heptarchie in this Iland, this province became part of the Kingdome of East Angles, which of the site thereof Eastward they named in their language, Eastangle-ryc, that is, The Kingdome of East English: and it had for the first King thereof, Vffa, whence his successors were a long time called Vff Kines, who seem to have been Vassals sometimes to the Kings of Mercia, and sometimes to the Kings of Kent. Whose offspring being come to an end in S. Edmund; the Danes overran this country most piteously for the space of 50. yeares or thereabout, afflicting it with all the calamities that accompany the wars: untill that King Edward the elder having subdued them united it at length to his owne Kingdom of the West-Saxons. But afterwards, it had peculiar Presidents and Governors: which honorable place at the first comming in of the Normans, and a while after one Ralph born in the lesser Britain held; a man of a perfidious disposition and disloyall, who at a celebration of a marriage in most sumptuous manner, wickedly with many moe conspired the death of William the Conqueror: but in vaine it was to hope for secrecy and trust, among so many privie to the conspiracy: For, it was discovered, and he deprived of his dignity was attainted, and the rest beheaded. But these things are to bee handled more at large by the Historians: and now let us goe in hand with that which belongeth properly, to our purpose, that is, the places themselves. Ralph President of East-Angle.

"lived in the yeare of Christ 970. hath pictured out in these words: This part "which is called East Angle or East England is renowned, as for other causes,
"so in this regard, that it is watered almost on every side: being on the Southeast
"and East environed with the Ocean, and on the North-east with huge Fennes
"soked in moisture, which rising by reason of the levell ground from the midst in "manner of all Britaine, for the space of a hundred miles and more doth descend "with the greatest rivers into the sea. But of that side which lieth Westward the "Province it selfe is continuate to the rest of the Iland, and therefore passable
"throughout: but, least it should be overrun with the often irruptions and breakings in of enemies, it is fensed along with a banke like unto a wall, and a
"Trench: Inwardly the soile is fruitfull enough, and the country of a passing
"fresh hue, with pleasant Orchards, Gardens, and groves, most delectable
"for hunting, notable for pastures, and not meanly stored with sheepe and other
"cattell. I say nothing of the fishfull rivers, considering that of the one side the "sea licketh it with his Tongue: and of the other side there are by reason of the "broad Fennes and wide Marishes an infinite number of pooles two or three "miles over. Which Fennes doe afford to a multitude of Monkes their wished "private retyrings of a recluse and solitary life: wherein as long as they are enclosed, they need not the solitarinesse of any desert Wildernesse. Thus farre Abbo.

SOUTH-FOLKE or SUFFOLKE.

SUFFOLKE, which wee muſt ſpeake of firſt, in the Saxon Tongue Sud-polc, that is, South-folke, or people in reſpect of Northfolke, hath on the Weſt ſide Cambridge-ſhire, on the South the River Stoure, which divideth it from Eſſex: on the Eaſt ſide the German Sea, and on the North two little Rivers; Onſe the leaſt, and Waveney, which flowing out as it were of the ſame Fountaine, runne divers wayes, and ſever it apart from Norfolke. A large country it is, and full of havens, of a fat and fertile Soile, (unleſſe it be Eaſtward) being compounded (as it is) of clay and marle: by meanes whereof, there are in every place moſt rich and goodly corne fields, with paſtures as battable, for grazing and feeding of cattell. And great ſtore of cheeſes are there made, which to the great commodity of the Inhabitants are vented into all parts of England: Nay into Germany, France, and Spaine alſo, as Pantaleon the Phyſician writeth, who ſtucke not to compare theſe of ours for color, and taſt both with thoſe of Placentia: but he was no dainty toothed ſcholar out of Apicius ſchoole. Neither bee there wanting woods heere, which have beene more plentifull, and parkes; for many there are lying to Noble mens and Gentlemens houſes repleniſhed with game. Cheeſe.

This County was divided politically into three parts: whereof one is called the Geldable, becauſe out of it there is gathered a Tribute: a ſecond, Saint Edmunds liberty, for that it belonged to his Abbay: the third Saint Audries liberty, becauſe it appertained to Ely Abbay, unto which our Kings in times paſt granted certaine territories with Sach and Soch, as ſaith Ely Booke, without any exception either of Eccleſiaſticall or ſecular juriſdiction. But let us ſurvey it Chorographically, and beginning at the Eaſt ſide take a view of the better and more remarkeable places.

Where it lyeth Weſt and toward Cambridgeſhire, in the very limite ſtandeth Ixning, more famous in times paſt than now. For Audre the Virgin K. Annas daughter and canonized for a Saint, was heere borne, Ralph alſo Earle of this Eaſt England heere entred into conſpiracy againſt William the Conquerour, and Hervey the firſt Biſhop of Ely made a cauſey or high way from hence to Ely. Novus mercatus.

But now, for that Newmercate is ſo neer, whither men reſort with their wares and commodities more frequently, it hath begunne to decay. That this Newmercate is a Towne of late dayes built, the very name it ſelfe doth import: and it is ſituate in ſuch ſort, that the South part therof belongeth to Cambridgeſhire, the North ſide to Suffolke: and both of them have their ſeverall ſmall Churches: whereof this acknowledgeth Ixning, the former Ditton or Dichton, for their mother. Heereof I have found by reading nothing, but that under King Henry the Third, Sir Robert L' Iſle gave one part of it in franke marriage with his daughter Caſſandra unto Sir Richard de Argenton, from whom the Alingtons are deſcended. Newmercate, Newmarket Heath.

Heere lyeth out a great way round about, a large Plaine, named of this Towne, Newmarket Heath, conſiſting of a ſandy and barren ground yet greene withall, wherein is to bee ſeene that wonderfull Ditch, which, as if it had beene caſt by the devill, the common ſort call Devils Dike, whereas in very trueth, moſt certainly it is knowne to be one of them, wherewith the Inhabitants, (as Abbo writeth) fenced themſelves againſt the inrodes of their enemies, as ſhall bee ſhewed more at large when we are come to Cambridgeſhire. Yet in the meane time, I am heere to adverſtiſe the Reader, that the leaſt of all theſe ditches ſheweth it ſelfe two miles from hence betweene Snaile-well and Moulton.

More within the Country is that renowned Towne of Saint Edmund, which in the Saxons age, men called Bedepic-ȝueopð: and in the time of the Britans, as it ſhould ſeeme, was that VILLA FAUSTINI, whereof Antonine maketh mention: for of that opinion S. Edmunds Bury.

opinion was Talbot a man right skilfull in antiquities, and very much conversant in this part of England. The distance also, as well from the Iciani, as from Colonia in Antonine agreeth well enough: And as Villa in the Latine Tongue signifieth some Gentlemans house standing upon his land, so Gueopo, in old English betokened the same. For, that Abbo aforesaid, interpreteth Bedericſ-gueord, by these words Bederici Cortis, that is, Villa, that is to say, Bedericſ-Court, Farme, or Mansion house. Besides that, the Englishmen may seeme to have brought the significancy of that Latine word into their owne Language: For as Faustinus in Latin implieth a certaine meaning of prosperity: so doth Bederic in the German tongue, as writeth that most learned Hadrianus Iunius, where he interpreteth the name of Betorix (who in Strabo was the sonne of Melo the Sicambrian,) Full of happinesse and favour. But if these were divers persons, I willingly confesse that I am ignorant, who that Faustinus, and who this Bedericus was. Sure I am that it was not that VILLA FAUSTINI, which Martiall in his Epigrammes depainteth: and if I said it was the habitation of that Beric, who being driven out of Britaine, as Dio writeth, perswaded the Emperour Claudius to warre upon the Britans, I should not beleeve my selfe. But whatsoever it was, if it be not that Faustini Villa, yet seemeth it to have beene of famous memory, considering that when Christian Religion began to spring up in this Tract, King Sigebert here founded a Church; and Abbo called it Villam regiam, that is, A royall towne: But after that the people had translated hither the body of Edmund that most Christian King, whom the Danes with exquisite torments had put to death, and built in honour of him a very great Church wrought with a wonderfull frame of timber, it beganne to bee called Edmundi Burgus, commonly Saint Edmundbury, and more shortly, Bury: and flourished marveilous much. But especially since that King Canutus for to expiate the sacrilegious impiety of his father Suenus against this Church, being affrighted with a vision of Saint Edmunds, built it againe of a new worke, enriched it, offered his owne Crowne unto the holy Martyr, brought into it Monkes with their Abbot, and gave unto it many faire and large Manours, and among other things the Towne it selfe full and whole: over which the Monkes themselves by their Seneschall had rule and jurisdiction. Whereupon, Ioscelin de Brankland a Monke of this house, writeth thus: The men as well without the Burgh as within are ours, and all within Banna Leuca enjoy the same libertie.

Guord or worth.

Bery the Britan.

Afterwards, Herveie the Abbot comming of the Norman bloud, compassed it round about with a wall, whereof there remaine still some few Reliques, and Abbot Newport walled the Abbay. The Bishop of Rome endowed it with very great immunities and among other things granted, That the said place should bee subject to no Bishop in any matter, and in matters lawfull depend upon the pleasure and direction of the Archbishop. Which is yet observed at this day. And now by this time the Monkes abounding in wealth erected a new Church of a sumptuous and stately building, enlarging it every day more than other with new workes; and whiles they laid the foundation of a new Chappell in the Reigne of Edward the First, There were found (as Eversden a Monke of this place writeth) The walles of a certaine old Church built round, so as that the Altar stood (as it were) in the mids, and we verily thinke, saith he, it was that, which was first built to Saint Edmunds service: But what manner of Towne this was, and how great the Abbay also was while it stood, heare Leland speake: who saw it standing: The Sunne (saith hee) *hath not seene either a City more finely seated, (so delicately standeth it upon the easie ascent or hanging of an hill, and a little River runneth downe on the East side thereof:) or a goodlier Abbay, whether a man indifferently consider, either the endowment with Revenewes, or the largenesse, or the incomparable magnificence thereof. A man that saw the Abbay would say verily it were a Citie: so many Gates there are in it, and some of brasse, so many Towres, and a most stately Church: Upon which attend * three others also standing gloriously in one and the same Churchyard, all of passing fine and curious Workmanship.* If you demand how great the wealth of this Abbay was, a man could hardly tell, and namely how many gifts and oblations were hung upon the Tombe alone of Saint Edmund: and besides, there came in, out of lands and Revenewes, a thousand five hundred

A dered and three ſcore pounds of old rent by the yeare. If I ſhould relate the broiles ſeverally that from time to time aroſe betweene the Townesmen and the Monkes (who by their * Steward governed the Townesmen) and with how great rage they fell together by the eares, purpoſedly to kill one another, my relation would ſeeme incredible. But as great a peece of worke as this was, ſo long in building and ſtill encreaſing, and as much riches as they gathered together for ſo many yeares with S. Edmunds ſhrine, and the monuments of Alan Rufus Earle of Britaine and Richmond, Sir Thomas of Brotherton ſonne to King Edward the firſt Earle of Norfolke, and Marſhall of England, Thomas of Beaufor, Duke of Exceſter, W. Earle of Stafford, Marie Queene Dowager of France Daughter to King Henry the Seaventh, and many other
B worthie perſonages there Entombed; were by King Henry the Eighth utterly overthrowne. What time as at one clappe hee ſuppreſſed all Monaſteries; perſwaded thereto by ſuch as under a goodly pretenſe of reforming religion preferred their private reſpects and their owne enriching before the honour of Prince and Country, yea and before the Glory of God himſelfe. And yet there remaineth ſtill lying along the carcaſſe, as one would ſay, of that auncient monument, altogether deformed, but (for ruines I aſſure you) they make a faire and goodly ſhew, which whoſoever beholdeth, hee may both wonder thereat, and withall take pity thereof. England alſo, that I may note this alſo by the way if ever elſe it had loſſe
C by the death of any Man, ſuſtained here one of the greateſt. For, that father in deede of his Country Humfrey Duke of Gloceſter a due obſerver of Iuſtice, and who had furniſhed his noble witte with the better and deeper kinde of ſtudies, after hee had under King Henry the Sixth governed the Kingdome five and twenty yeares with great commendation, ſo that neither good men had cauſe to complaine of, nor evill to finde fault with, was here in Saint Saviours Hoſpitall brought to his end by the ſpightfull envy of Margaret of Lorain. Who ſeeing her husband King Henry the Sixth, to bee a man of a ſilly ſimple minde and faint hearted, to the end ſhee might draw into her owne hands the managing of the State, deviſed and plotted this wic-
D ked deed: but to her owne loſſe, and this Realme, in the higheſt degree. For Normandy and Aquitane were thereby ſhortly after loſt, and Warres more then civill enkindled in England.

Nere unto this Saint Edmunds Bury, is Ruſhbroke to be ſeene, the habitation of the worſhipfull Family of the Iernins, Knights: and not farre from thence Ikeſworth, where there ſtood an auncient Priory founded by Gilbert Blund, a man of great nobility and Lord of Ikeſworth, whoſe iſſue male by the right line, ended in William, that in King Henry the Third his dayes was ſlaine in the battell at Lewis, and left two ſiſters his Heires, Agnes wife to William de Creketot, and Roiſe wedded to Robert de Valeniis. Afterward, both here, at Haulſted neere by Rougham, and elſe-where, the E Family of Drury, (which ſignifieth in old Engliſh, A Pretious jewell) hath beene of great reſpect and good note, eſpecially ſince they married with the heires of Freſsil, and Saxham.

Drury.

More Northward is Saint Genoveſs Fernham, in this regard memorable, for that Richard Lucy Lord chiefe Juſtice of England tooke Priſoner there in a pight fielde Robert Earle of Leiceſter, making foule worke and havocke here; and withall put to the ſword above ten thouſand Flemings, whom hee had levied and ſent forth to the depopulation of his Country. Here hard by, I had the ſight of two very faire houſes the one built by the Kiſſons Knights, at Hengrave, the poſſeſſion in times paſt of F Edmund de Hengrave, a moſt renowned Lawyer under King Edward the Firſt: the other at Culfurth, erected by Sir Nicolas Bacon, Knight, ſonne unto that Sir Nicolas Bacon, Lord Keeper of the great Seale of England: who for his ſingular wiſedome and moſt ſound judgement, was right worthily eſteemed one of the two Supporters of this Kingdome in his time. Stoke Clare. On the South ſide wee ſaw the river Stour, which immediately from the very ſpring head ſpreadeth a great Mere, called Stourmeer: but ſoone after drawing it ſelfe within the bankes runneth firſt by Clare a noble Village: which had a Caſtle, but now decayed, and gave name to the right noble Family of the Clares, deſcended from Earle Giſlebert the Norman: and the title of Dukedome unto Leonel King Edward the Thirds ſonne, who after hee had married a wife out of that houſe was entituled by his father, Duke of Clarence. For he of this place with a fuller ſound, than that of

Who died at * Languvill in Italy, after he had by a ſecond marriage, matched with a Daughter of Galeacius Vicount of Millain: and in the Collegiat Church here lieth interred: as alſo Ioan Acres daughter to King Edward the firſt, married to Giſlebert de Clare Earle of Glocester. Here peradventure the Readers may looke, that I ſhould ſet downe the Earles of Clare ſo denominated of this place, and the Dukes of Clarence, conſidering they have beene alwayes in this Realme of right honorable reputation: and verily ſo will I doe in few words, for their ſatisfaction in this behalfe. Giſlebert by the daughter of the Earle of Cleremont had iſſue Richard, who ſucceeded him; Giſlebert, of whom came that Noble Richard Earle of Pembroch and Conquerour of Ireland; and Walter. Richard the firſt begotten ſonne was ſlaine by the Welſhmen and left behinde

Gilbert in King Stephens dayes was Earle of Herford: howbeit both he and his Succeſſours are more often and commonly called Earles of Clare, of this their principall ſeat and habitation, yea and ſo many times they wrote themſelves. After him dying without iſſue, ſucceeded his brother Ro- D ger, whoſe ſonne Richard tooke to wife Amice the daughter and one of the Heires to William Earle of Glocester, in right of whom his poſterity were Earles of Glocester. And thoſe you may ſee in their due place. But when at length their iſſue male failed, Leonel Third ſonne of King Edward the Third, (who had married Elizabeth the Daughter and ſole Heire of William de Burgh Earle of Vlſter, begotten of the Bodie of Elizabeth Clare) was by his Father honoured with this new Title, Duke of Clarence.

But when as hee had but one onely Daughter named Phillippa, wife to Edmond Mortimer Earle of March, King Henry the Fourth created Thomas his owne yon-

A long time after, king Edward the Fourth beſtowed this honour upon his owne brother George, whom after grievous enmity and bitter hatred, hee had received againe into favour, and yet at the laſt made an end of him in priſon, cauſing him, as the report currently goeth, to be

From Clare, by Long-Melford, a very faire Almes-houſe lately built by that good F

Sudbury. man Sir William Cordal Knight, and Maiſter of the Rolls, Stour paſſeth on, and commeth to Sudbury, that is to ſay, the South-Burgh, and runneth in manner round about it, which men ſuppoſe to have beene in old time the chiefe towne of this Shire, and to have taken this name in regard of Norwich, that is, The Northren Towne. Neither would it take it well at this day to be counted much inferiour to the Townes adjoyning: for, it is populous and wealthy, by reaſon of Clothing there, and hath for the chiefe Magiſtrate, a Major, who every yeare is choſen out of ſeaven Aldermen. Not farre

A farre from hence distant, is Edwardeston, a Towne of no great name at this day, but yet in times past it had Lords therein dwelling of passing great Honour, of the surname of * Mont-chensie: out of which Family Sir Guarin Montchensie married the daughter and one of the heires of that mighty William Mareschall, Earle of Pembroch, and of her begat a daughter named Ioan, who unto the stile of her Husband William de Valentia of the family of Lusignie in France, brought and adjoyned the title of Earle of Penbroch. But the said Sir Guarin Mont-chensy, as he was a right honourable person, so he was a man exceeding wealthy, in so much as in those dayes they accounted him the most potent Baron, and the rich Crassus of England. For his last will and testament amounted unto two hundred thousand Markes, no small wealth as the standard was then. From a younger brother or cadet of this house of Montchensie, issued by an heire generall the Family of the Waldgraves, who have long flourished in Knightly degree at Smalebridge neerer to Stoure, as another Family of great account in elder ages at Buers, which was thereof surnamed.

A few miles from hence Stour is enlarged with Breton a small Brooke, at one of whose heads is seene Bretenham a very slender little towne, where scarce remaineth any shew at all of any great building: and yet both the neere resemblance and the signification of the name partly induced me to thinke it to be that COMBRETONIUM whereof Antonine the Emperour made mention in this tract. For like as Bretenham in English signifieth an Habitation, or Mansion place by Breton, so Combretonium in British or Welsh betokeneth a Valley, or a place lying somewhat low by Breton. But this in Peutegerius his Table is falsly named COMVETRONUM and ADCOVECIN. Somewhat Eastward from hence is Nettlested seene, of whence was Sir Thomas Wentworth, whom King Henry the Eighth adorned with the title of Baron Wentworth, and neere thereto is Offton, that is to say, The towne of Offa King of the Mercians, where upon a clay Hill lie the ruines of an ancient Castle, which they say Offa built, after he had wickedly murdered Aethelbert King of the East-Angles, and usurped his Kingdome.

But to returne to the River Breton. Upon another brooke that joyneth therewith standeth Lancham a pretty Mercat, and neere it the Manour of Burnt-Ellcie, whereunto King Henry the Third granted a Mercate at the request of Sir Henry Shelton Lord thereof, whose posterity a long time heere flourished. Hadley, in the Saxons language headleze, is watered with the same brooke: a towne of good note in these dayes for making of Clothes: and in old time much mentioned by our Historians, because Guthrum or Gormo the Dane was heere buried. For, when Aelfred brought him to this passe, that he became Christian and was baptized, hee assigned unto him these countries of the East-Angles, that he might (to use the words of mine Author) cherish them by right of inheritance under the Allegiance of a King, which he had overrunne by robbing and ransacking.

From hence Breton speedeth it selfe by Higham, whence the family of Higham is so named, to Stour which joyntly in one streame runne not farre from Bentley, where the Talmachs of a celebrate ancient house flourished for a long time, and after a few miles neere unto Arwerton the house long since of the family of the Bacons; who held this Manour, and Browne, by conducting all the footemen of Suffolke and Norfolke from S. Edmunds dike in the warres of Wales. Now it belongeth to the Parkers hæreditarily, who by the Fathers side derive their descent from the Barons Morley, and by the Mothers from the Calthrops, a Family sometime of great account in these parts. Beneath this Stour falleth into the Ocean; and at the very mouth thereof, the river Orwell or Gipping dischargeth it selfe together with it.

This River springeth up in the very navell or centre, as one would say, of this shire, out of two fountaines, the one neere to Wulpet, the other by Gipping a small Village. Wulpet is a Mercat towne, and soundeth as much as, The Wolves pit, if wee may beleeve Nubrigensis who hath told as prety and formall a tale of this place as is that fable called the TRUE NARRATION of Lucian: namely, how two little Boyes (forsooth) of a greene colour, and of Satyrs kinde, after they had made a long journey by passages under the ground, from out of another world from the Antipodes and Saint Martins Land, came up heere: of whom if you would know more, repayre to the Author himselfe, where you shall finde such matter as will make you laugh your fill, if you have a laughing spleene. I wote not whether I were best to relate here, into what a vaine hope of finding gold at Norton hard by, a certaine credulous desire of having, enticed and allured king Henry the Eight; but the digging and undermining there sufficiently shew it, although I say nothing. But between Gipping and Wulpet upon an high hill remain the tokens of Hawhglee an ancient Castle, taking up much about two Acres of ground. Some affirme this to have beene called Hagoneth Castle, which belonged to Ralph le Broc, and that in the yeere 1173. it was by Robert Earle of Leicester won and overthrowne in the intestine warre betweene king Henry the Second, and his unkindely disloyall sonne.

Norton. Hagoneth.

Upon the same River are seene two little Mercat Townes, Stow and Needham, and not farre from the banke, Hemingston: in which Baldwin Le Pettour (marke his name well) held certaine lands, by Serjeanty, (the words I have out of an old booke) for which on Christmasse day, every yeere before our soveraigne Lord the King of England he should performe one Saltus, one Suffletus, and one Bumbulus, or, as wee read elsewhere, his tenour was, per saltum, sufflum, & pettum, that is, if I understand these tearmes aright, That hee should daunce, puffe up his cheekes making therewith a sound, and besides let a cracke downeward. Such was the plaine and jolly mirth of those times. And observed it is, that unto this Foe, the Manour of Langhall belonged.

Farter. A prety conceited tenure.

Neere unto the mouth of this river we saw Ipswich, in times past Gippwich, a faire towne resembling a Citty, situate in a ground somewhat low: which is the eye (as it were) of this shire, as having an Haven commodious enough; fenced in times past with a trench and rampire, of good trade and stored with wares, well peopled, and full of Inhabitants, adorned with foureteene Churches, and with goodly, large and stately edifices. I say nothing of foure religious houses now overturned, and that sumptuous and magnificent Colledge which Cardinall Wolsey a Butchers sonne of this place, here began to build, whose vast minde reached alwayes at things too high. The body politike, or corporation of this towne consisteth, as I was enformed, of twelve Burgesses (Portmen they terme them) out of whom are chosen yeerely for the head Magistrates two Baillives, and as many Justices out of foure and twenty others. As touching the Antiquity thereof so farre as ever I could observe, the name of it was not heard of before the Danish invasion, whereof it smarted: For in the yeere of salvation 991. the Danes sacked and spoyled it, and all the Sea coast with so great cruelty, that Siritius Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Nobles of England thought it the safest and best course they could take, to redeeme and buy their peace of them for the summe of ten thousand pounds. Nevertheless, within nine yeeres, they made spoyle of this towne againe, and presently thereupon the Englishmen valiantly encountred them in the field, but through the cowardly running away of one man alone, named Turkill, as writeth Henry of Huntingdon (for in matter of warre things of small weight otherwise, are of right great moment, and sway very much) our men were put to flight, and let the victory slip out of their hands. In the reigne of S. Edward, as we finde in the Survey booke of England, out of this towne Queene Edeva had two parts, and Earle Guert a third part: and Burgesses there were eight hundred, paying custome to the King. But after the Normans had possessed themselves of England, they erected a pile or Castle here, which Hugh Bigod defended for a good while against Stephen the usurping King of England, but surrendred it in the end: This fort is now quite gone, so as there remaine not so much as the ruines thereof. Some say it was in the parish of Westfield hard by, where is to be seene the rubbish of a Castle, and where old Gipwic, as men say, stood in times past. I thinke verely it was then demolished, when K. Henry the second laied Waleton Castle neer unto it even with the ground. For it was a place of refuge for Rebels, and here landed those three thousand Flemings whom the nobles of Englād had called in against him, what time as he unadvisedly

Ipswich. Domesday booke. Waleton.

A advisedly hee had made Prince Henry his sonne King, and of equall power with himselfe: and the young man knowing no meane, would bee in the highest place or none, set upon a furious desire of the Kingdome, most unnaturally waged warre against his owne father. Albeit these Castles are now cleane decaied and gone, yet this Shore is defended sufficiently with an huge banke, they call it Langerston, that for two miles or thereabout in length lyeth forth into the maine Sea, as hee saith, not without great danger and terrour of such as saile that way: howbeit the same serveth very well for Fishermen to dry their fishes, and after a sort is a defence unto that spatious and wide Haven of Orwell. And thus much for the South part of this Shire. Langerston.

B From hence the curving Shore (for all this East part lyeth full against the Sea) shooting forth Northward straight-way openeth it selfe to the * Deben, a Riveret having his spring-head neere unto Mendelesham; unto which Towne, the Lord of the place H. Fitz Otho, Master of the Mint, purchased the liberty of Mercat and Faire: by whose Heires there fell no small Possessions unto the Boutetorts Lords of Wily in Worcestershire, and from them againe in the Raigne of Richard the Second, unto Frevil, Barkley of Stoke, Burnel, and others. * Others call it Thredling. Boutetort.

This River Deben first floweth hard unto the little Mercat Towne Debenham, and giveth it the name, which others would have to be called more truly Depenham, for that the waies every where about it, by reason of a clay ground and the same over C moist, are very deepe and cumberous. From thence it runneth by Vfford the seat in times past of Robert de Vfford Earle of Suffolke, and by a Towne over against it on the other side of the River named Rendelisham, that is, as Beda interpreteth it, Rendils Mansion place, where Redwald King of the East Saxons kept usually his Court, who was the first of all his Nation that was baptised, and received Christianity; but afterwards, seduced by his Wife, he had in the selfe same Church, as saith Beda, one Altar for Christs Religion, and another for sacrifices unto Devils. In this place also Swidelm a King of the East-Angles was likewise afterwards baptised by Bishop * Chadda. Rendelisham. * Cedde.

From hence the River Deben passeth downe to Woodbridge, a little Towne beaD tified with faire houses; where at certaine set times are holden Assemblies for Saint Andrees Liberty: and after it hath gone some few miles, it is received into the Ocean at Bawdsey Haven.

By this time now the Shore creepeth by little and little Eastward to the mouth of the River * Ore, which runneth neere to Framingham Castle, belonging sometime to the Bigods by the bounty of King Henry the First: and forthwith on the West side thereof spreadeth (as it were) into a lake. A very faire and beautifull Castle this is, fortified with a banke, ditch, and walles of great thicknesse, wherein are thirteene towres, and inwardly furnished with buildings right commodious and necessary. From hence it was that in the yeare of our Redemption 1173. what time E as King Henry the Second his rebellious sonne tooke armes against his father, Robert Earle of Leicester, with his mercenary Flemings infested this Country farre and neere: from this Castle also in the yeare 1553. Queene Mary entred upon her Kingdome, for all the ambitious fretting and fuming of Iohn Dudley Duke of Northumberland against King Henry the Eighth his Daughters. * Some name it Winchell. Framlingham.

Then commeth the River to Parrham a little Towne, the Lord whereof William Willoughby King Edward the Sixth honoured with the Estate of a Baron: and afterwards running by Glemham, which gave name to an ancient Family descended from the Bacons and Brandons; at Oreford, that tooke the name of it, disburdeneth himselfe into the Sea. A bigge Towne this was and of great resort, fenced also with a Castle F of a reddish stone, and appertained in times past to the Valoineis, and afterwards to the Willoughbies, but complaineth at this day of the seas unkindnesse which shrinketh backe from it by little and little, and beginneth to envie the commodity of an Haven unto the Towne. Neither have I any thing else to say of Oreford, unlesse it please you to runne over these few words of Ralph Cogeshall an old Writer. Parrham. Barons Willoughbey of Parrham. Oreford.

In King Henry the Seconds daies, ſaith hee, when Bartholmew Glanvile kept the Caſtle of Oreford, it happened that the Fiſhermen caught a wilde man within their nets, who in all parts and members of his body reſembled a man, had haire on his head, a huge beard with a Piloe devant, about the breaſt exceeding hairy and rough: who notwithſtanding ſlipt away ſecretly to the Sea and was never ſeene after: So that it may bee very true, which is ſo rife with the common people, That there is nothing bred in any part of Nature, but the ſame alſo is in the Sea: and that it is not altogether a fained Fable, that Plinie hath reported of a Triton taken on the Shore of Portugall, and of the Seaman caught in the Streights of Gibraltare.

Tritons and Monſters of the Sea.

Not much higher, lyeth Aldborough for Situation right ſafe and very pleaſant within Slaughden vale, where from the Eaſt the Sea, and from the Weſt the River beateth. This name Aldburgh, is by interpretation the Old Burgh, or as others would have it, The Burgh upon the River Ald. Now it is an harbour very commodious for Sailers and Fiſhermen, and thereby well frequented, and acknowledgeth the Ocean Sea to be favourable unto it, how ſpitefull ſoever and malicious it is to other Townes in this Coaſt. Neere unto it, what time as in the yeare 1555. by reaſon of unſeaſonable weather the Corne throughout all England was choked and blaſted in the eare, there grew Peaſe miraculouſly among the rocks, without any earth at all about them about the end of September, and brought downe the price of Corne. Yet the wiſer ſort of men doe ſay that Pulſe being caſt upon the Shore by Shipwracke is wont otherwhiles to come up againe there, ſo that the thing is not to bee thought miraculous: But, that the like uſually every yeare grow of their owne accord among the ſtones on the Shore of Kent, I have ſhewed already.

Aldburgh.

Peaſe growing out of the Rockes.

From hence coaſting along the Shore, at ten miles end, wee met with Dunwich, in the Engliſh Saxon tongue Dunmoc, whereof Beda maketh mention: where Felix the Burgumdium that reduced the Eaſtangles againe into the faith, when they were backeſliding from Chriſt, in the yeare of Grace 630. placed an Epiſcopall See, whoſe Succeſſours for many yeares together were Biſhops over all Eaſt England. But Biſe the Fourth Biſhop after Felix, when hee became very aged and ſickly withall, being not able to diſcharge ſo great a Juriſdiction, divided it into two Sees: the one continued ſtill in this Dunwich, the other hee placed in North Elmham, a little Towne. In the Raigne of William the Conquerour, Dunwich had in it two hundred and ſixe and thirty Burgeſſes: an hundred poore people: it was valued at fifty pounds, and threeſcore thouſand Herings, of gift. For, ſo wee reade in Domeſ-day Booke. In the foregoing Age, it was well peopled and frequented with Inhabitants: famous alſo for a Mint therein: and in the Raigne of Henry the Second, as William of Newborough writeth, It was a Towne of good note, and full ſtored with ſundry kindes of Riches. At which time, when England was all on a light fire with new ſtirres and broiles, it was ſo fortified, that it made Robert Earle of Leiceſter affraid, who with his Army over-ranne all the parts there-about at his pleaſure. But now by a certaine peculiar ſpite and envie of Nature, that ſuffereth the greedy Sea to have what it will and encroche ſtill without all end, the greateſt part thereof is violently carried away with the waves, and by reaſon that the Biſhops many yeares agoe tranſlated their Seat to another Place, it lyeth (as it were) deſolate. A little above it, the River Blith voideth it ſelfe into the Sea, on whoſe banke Southward wee ſaw Blithborow a ſmall Towne, which for no other thing is memorable, but becauſe Anna a Chriſtian King was there buried, whom Penda the Mercian ſlew in a pitched Field. It was beautified by King Henry the Firſt with a Colledge of Chanons, who granted the ſame as a Cell to the Chanons of Saint Oſiths. And it was made a Mercate by the meanes of Iohn Lord of Clavering, unto whom King Edward the Second gave this Liberty together with the Faire. And verily a goodly Inheritance hee had in this Tract, as who derived his Deſcent from the Daughter and Heire of William Cheney*, who held the Barony of Horsford in the County of Norfolke, and erected the little Abbay at Sibton.

Here

A Heere the Promontory Easton-Nesse shooteth out, and reacheth farre into the East, which is deemed to bee the farthest East point in all Britaine; Ptolomee calleth it Ἔκτασις or EXTENSIO. And that you may not doubt, that this is the very same which wee call Easton, bee it knowne unto you, that Eysteney in the British tongue is the same that in Greeke Ἔκτασις, and in Latine Extensio, that is, A stretching forth: although this name may seeme with as good probability to have beene imposed in our English Language, of the Situation Eastward. Upon the point of this Promontory standeth Easton a Village of Fishermen well neere eaten up by Sea, and on South side of this Promontory, Southwold lieth in the Plaine, full against the open shore of the sea: a Towne well enough frequented through the benefit of an Haven B that the River Blith emptying it selfe there into the Sea maketh; and at every high water it is so invironed with the waves, that it seemeth to bee an Island, and a man would wonder that it is not overflowne. In so much as when I saw the manner thereof, I called that saying of Cicero into my remembrance: What should I speake of the Sea Tides about Spaine and Britaine, and of their Flowing and Ebbing at certaine times? Surely, they cannot bee without the hand of God, who hath restrained and gaged the waves within their bounds. More within the land Wingfield sheweth it selfe, where the walles of a Castle halfe downe are to bee seene: which hath given name to a family in this Tract that is spred into a number of branches, and is besides for knighthood and ancient Gentility renowned, and thereof it was the principall seat: C Also Dunnington, which standeth much upon the Lord thereof Sir Iohn Philips, father to that Sir William who married the daughter and Heire of Baron Bardolph, whose daughter and Heire likewise Iohn Vicount Beaumont tooke to Wife: But now the Habitation it is of the ancient Family of the Rousses. Not farre from hence standeth Huntingfield, which had a Baron of that name in King Edward the Third his time, and neere unto it Heveningham, the residence of the Family of Heveningham, knights: who are knowne to bee of very great antiquity: and not farre off standeth Halesworth, in times past Healsworda, an ancient Towne of the Argentons, and now of the Alingtons: unto which Sir Richard Argenton obtained at the hand of King Henry the Third the libertry of a Mercate.

D I gave you to understand before, that two small Rivers, Ouse the least, and Waveney on the North side, divided this County from Norfolke; which Riverets rising out of a Marish ground by Lopham-ford, from two springs but a little a sunder one from another, take their courses divers wayes with creekes full of shallow fourds. Along by Ouse which runneth Westward, there is nothing in this Quarter to bee seene worth the report. By Waveney side that tendeth Eastward, first is Hoxon in times past Hegilsdon ennobled by reason of King Edmunds Martyrdome. For E there the most cruell and bloudy Danes (that I may use the words of Abbo) having bound the most Christian King to a tree, for that hee would not renounce Christianity, shot him in with sharpe arrowes all his body over, augmenting the paines of his torment with continuall piercing him with arrow after arrow, and thus inflicted wound upon wound, so long as one arrow could stand by another: And as a Poet of middle time verified of him.

Iam loca vulneribus desunt, nec dum furiosis
Tela, sed hyberna grandine plura volant.

Though now no place was left for wound, yet arrowes did not faile,
These furious Wretches; still they flie thicker than winter haile.

In which place afterwards stood a very faire house of the Bishops of Norwich, untill they exchanged it not long since for the Abbay of Saint Benet. Hard by, at Brome, dwelt a long time the family of Cornwallis, of knights degree: of whom Sir F Iohn Cornwal was Steward of Edward the Sixth his Houshold while hee was Prince; and his sonne Sir Thomas, for his wisdome and faithfulnesse became one of the privie counsell to Queene Mary, and Controller of her royall House. Beneath it lieth Eay, that is, The Island; so called, because it is watered on every side with brookes, where are to bee seene the rubbish, ruines, and decayed walles of an old Castle

Upon the River of Waveney,
I would ne care for the King of Cockeney.

Yet notwithſtanding afterwards he obtained at the hands of King Henry the Second (by giving him a great ſumme of money and pledges withall of his loyalty) that it might not be overthrowne and raſed. Not farre thence from the banke, you may Mettingham. ſee Mettingham; where, upon a plaine, Sir Iohn ſirnamed De Norwich Lord of the place built a foure ſquare Caſtle and a Colledge within it, whoſe daughter, and in the end the Heire of the ſame Family, Robert de Vfford aforeſaid, Earle of Suffolke tooke to Wife with a goodly Inheritance.

Now Waveney drawing neerer unto the Sea whiles hee ſtriveth in vaine to make himſelfe a twofold iſſue into the Ocean, the one together with the River Yare, and

Luthingland. the other by the meere Luthing, maketh a pretty big Demy Iſle or Biland, which ſome name Lovingland, others more truely Luthingland, of Luthing the lake ſpreading in length and bredth, which beginning at the Ocean Shore is diſcharged into the Ri-

Leſtoffe. ver Yare. At the entrance whereof ſtandeth upon the Sea, Leſtoffe, a narrow and little Towne: and at the iſſue of it Gorlſton, where I ſaw the towre ſteeple of a ſmall ſuppreſſed Friery, which ſtandeth the Sailers in good ſtead for a marke. Within the

Somerley towne. land, hard by Yare is ſituate Somerley towne, the habitation in ancient time of Fitz Oſbert, from whom it is come lineally to the worſhipfull ancient family of the Iernegans Knights of high eſteeme in theſe parts: farther up into the land where Yare and Waveney meet in one ſtreame, there flouriſhed Gnobersburg, that is, as Bede interpreteth it,

Gnoberi urbs. Gnobers City, we call it at this day Burgh-Caſtle. Which, as Bede ſaith, was a moſt pleaſant Caſtle, by reaſon of woods and Sea together, wherein a Monaſtery was built by Furſæy a holy Scot: by whoſe perſwaſion Sigebert King of the Eaſt-Angles became a Monke and reſigned up his Kingdome: who afterwards being drawne againſt his will out of this Monaſtery to encourage his people in battaile againſt the Mercians, together with his company loſt his life. In that place now there are only ruinous walls in forme, as it were, foure ſquare, built of flint ſtone and Britiſh Bricke, but all overgrown with briers and buſhes: among which otherwhiles are Romane peeces of coines gotten forth: So that it may ſeeme to have been one of thoſe fortifications that the Romans placed upon the River Yare to repreſſe the piracies of the Saxons: or rather that it was the ancient GARIANONUM it ſelfe, where the Stableſian Horſemen had their

Suffolke hath had Earles and Dukes out of ſundry families. There bee of the later writers who report, that the Glanvils in times paſt were honoured with this title: But ſeeing they ground upon no certain authority, whereas men may eaſily miſtake, and I have found nothing of them in the publike records of the Kingdome, they muſt pardon me if I beleeve them not, untill they produce more certainty. Yet in the meane while I confeſſe, that the family of the Glanvils in this tract was of right good note and high reputation. Neither have I hitherto learned by witneſſes of credite, that any one was entituled Earle of this Province ſeverally before the daies of King B Edward the Third, who created Sir Robert Vfford Earle of Suffolke a man much renowned both in peace and warre, the ſonne of Sir Robert Vfford Steward of the Kings houſe under King Edward the Second, by Cecily de Valoniis Lady of Orford. After him ſucceeded his ſonne William, who having foure ſonnes that were taken away by untimely death during his life, died himſelfe ſuddenly in the Parliament houſe as he was about to report the minde of the Commonalty. And then Sir Robert Willoughby, Roger Lord Scales, and Henrie Ferrars of Groby the next of his blood and his Heires divided the Inheritance betweene them. Afterward King Richard the Second promoted Michael De-la-Pole to this Title, and made him L. Chancellor of England. Who, as Thomas Walſingham writeth, imployed himſelfe more in trafficke and C Merchandiſe, (as having beene a Merchant and a Merchants ſonne) than in martiall matters. For he was the ſonne of William De-la-pole, that firſt Maior of Kyngſton upon Hull, and for his wealthy Eſtate, adorned by King Edward the Third with the dignity of a Baneret. But when as in the proſperous confluence of ſo many advancements the mans nature was not capable of ſo great fortunes, he was enforced by his adverſaries envy to depart out of his Country, and ſo died a baniſhed man. His ſonne Michael being reſtored, died at the ſiege of Harflew, and againe within one moneth his ſon Michael was ſlaine in the battell of Agincourt leaving daughters onely. Then William his brother ſucceeded, whom King Henry the ſixt ſo favoured that hee made him alſo Earle of Penbroke, and then Marqueſſe of Suffolke, to him and the heires D males of his body. And that both hee and the heires of his body ſhould carry the golden rod having a Dove in the top thereof, on the Coronation day of the King of England: and the like rod or verge Yuory at the Coronation of the Queenes of England. And afterwards hee advanced the ſame William for his great ſervice and deſerts to the honour and title of Duke of Suffolke. Certes hee was an excellent man in thoſe dayes, famous and of great worth. For whereas his father and three brethren had in the French wars loſt their lives for their Country; he, as we finde in the Parliament Rols of the 28. of King Henry the Sixth, in the ſame war ſerved full 34. yeeres: For ſeventeene yeeres together he never returned home from warfare; being once taken priſoner when he was as yet no better than a private Knight, hee paid downe for his ranſome twenty E thouſand pounds of our Engliſh mony: hee was of the Kings privy Counſell 15. yeeres; and a Knight of the Order of the Garter 30. Hereupon, as he ſtood in eſpeciall grace and favour with his Prince, ſo he incurred therefore the greater envy of the common people, and ſome emulatours: being grievouſly charged with treaſon and miſpriſions. And therefore called before the King and Lords of the Parliament, after he had anſwered the Articles objected, referred himſelfe to the Kings order. Whereupon the Chancellor by the Kings commandement pronounced, that whereas the Duke did not put himſelfe upon his Peeres, the King touching the Articles of treaſon, would be doubtfull, and as for the Articles of miſpriſion, not as a Judge by advice of the Lords, but as one to whoſe order the Duke had ſubmitted himſelfe, did F baniſh him the realme and all other his dominions for five yeeres. But when he was embarked for Fsance, he was by his adverſaries intercepted upon the ſea and beheaded. He left a ſon nam'd Iohn De-la-Pole, who wedded K. Edward the fourth his ſiſter, and of her begate Iohn Earle of Lincolne by K. Richard the Third proclaimed heire apparant of the Crowne: whoſe ambitious minde puffed up and giddy therewith could could not containe it ſelfe, but ſoone after brake out againſt King Henry the Seaventh, to his owne deſtruction (for in the battell at Stoke he was quickly ſlaine) to his fathers death alſo, (who for very griefe of heart ended his dayes) and to the utter ruine of the whole family, which together with them was in a ſort extinguiſhed and brought to nothing. For, his brother Edmund being Earle of Suffolke fled into Flanders: began there to conſpire and ſtir up rebellion againſt King Henry the Seaventh, who, albeit he feared him, would ſeeme to favour him, and as a Prince better contented with repentance than puniſhment, freely pardoned him for ſundry offences, that he might winne him. But after he was thus fled, his eſtate was forfeited, and the King never thought himſelfe ſecure from his practiſes, untill he had ſo farre prevailed with Philip Duke of Burgundy, that he was delivered into his hands (againſt the Law of hoſpitality toward ſtrangers, as ſome then gave out) upon ſolemne promiſe in the word of a Prince that his life ſhould be ſpared. Nevertheleſſe he was kept cloſe priſoner, and after executed by King Henry the Eighth (who thought himſelfe not tied to his fathers promiſe) what time as hee firſt minded to make warre upon France, for feare leaſt in his abſence ſome troubles might bee raiſed at home in his behalfe, yet his yonger brother S. Richard de la Pole a baniſhed man in France, uſurped the title of Duke of Suffolke: who being the laſt male (to my knowledge) of this houſe, was ſlaine in the battell of Pavie (wherein Francis the firſt, king of France was taken priſoner in the yeer of our Lord 1524.) fighting manfully among the thickeſt of his enemies. For whom, in conſideration of his ſingular valour, and high parentage the Duke of Burbon himſelfe, although hee was his enemy, made a ſumptuous funerall, and honored the ſame with his preſence in mourning blacke. In the meane time, king Henry the Eighth adorned Sir Charles Brandon, unto whom he had given in marriage his owne ſiſter Marie widdow, and Dowager to Lewis the twelfth king of France, with the title of Duke of Suffolke, and granted to him all the Honours, and Manours which Edmund Earle of Suffolke had forfeited. After whom ſucceeded Henry his ſonne a childe, and after him his brother Charles: who both died of the Engliſh ſwet upon one day in the yeere 1551. Then king Edward the Sixth honoured with that title Henry Grey Marqueſſe Dorſet, who had married Francis their ſiſter but he enjoying the ſame but a ſmall time loſt his head in Queene Maryes dayes for complotting to make his daughter queen, and was the laſt Duke of Suffolk. From that time lay this title of Suffolke void, untill that very lately king James advanced to that honour Thomas Lord Howard of Walden, the ſecond ſonne of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolke, whom for his approved fidelity and vertue he alſo made his Lord Chamberlaine, in his firſt entrie into the kingdome.

NORFOLCIÆ comitatus, quem olī ICENI Insederunt. Continens in Se opida Mercatoria XXVII Pagos et Villas DCXXV. Una Cum Singulis hundredis et fluminibus in eodem. Auctore Christophore Saxton.

NORTH-FOLKE.

NORTH-FOLKE, commonly Norfolke, which is by interpretation, people of the North, lieth Norward of Suffolke, from which it is divided by thoſe two little Rivers which I ſpake of, Ouſe the leaſt, and Waveney, running divers wayes: on the East and North ſide the German Ocean which is plentifull of Fiſh beateth upon the ſhores with a mighty noiſe: On the Weſt, the greater Ouſe, a River diſporting himſelfe with his manifold branches and diviſions ſecludeth it from Cambridge-Shire. It is a Region large and ſpacious, and in manner all throughout a plaine champion, unleſſe it bee where there riſe gently ſome pretty Hills; paſſing rich, exceeding full of Sheepe, and ſtored with Conyes: repleniſhed likewiſe with a great number of populous Villages: for, beſide twenty ſeven Mercat townes, it is able to ſhew Villages and Country Townes 625: Watered with divers Rivers and Brookes, and not altogether deſtitute of Woods. The ſoyle, according to the variety of places, is of a divers nature: Some where, fat, ranke, and full of moiſture, as in Merſhland and Flegg: otherwhere, but Weſtward eſpecially, leane, light, and ſandy: elſewhere, ſtanding upon clay and chalke. But the goodneſſe of the ground a man may collect by this (whence Varro willeth us to gather it) that the Inhabitants are of a paſſing good complexion: to ſay nothing of their exceeding wily wits, and the ſame right quicke in the inſight of our common lawes: in ſo much as it is counted, as well now, as in times paſt, the onely Country for beſt breed of Lawyers: ſo that even out of the meaneſt ſort of the common people, there may be found not a few, who if there were nothing elſe to beare action, are able to fetch matter enough of wrangling controverſies, even out of the very prickes, titles, and accents of the Law. But leaſt, whiles I deſire brevity, I become long by theſe digreſſions which may diſtaſte; I will turne my penne from the people to the places; and beginning at the South ſide, runne over briefly thoſe which are more memorable, and of greater antiquity.
